Broil filets on lowest rack at hottest broil for 15 minutes, turning 3 times. Remove larding fat and string. Drain off all drippings. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Bake in a slow oven, 250° F., for about 25 minutes for a rare steak. Five minutes before serving, place under broiler again and broil, turning frequently for even browning. If you like, pour Burgundy over beef in pan. Remove beef to a wooden board. Sprinkle lightly with salt and pepper. Slice ¾" thick. Arrange on warm platter and pour drippings over meat. Garnish with water cress. Serve with straw potatoes and green peas. A 2½-pound filet will yield eight to ten ¾" slices. Makes 8 servings.

Béarnaise Sauce

6 shallots or 3 tablespoons onion, peeled and chopped fine
1 cup tarragon vinegar
2 teaspoons fresh parsley or 1 teaspoon dried, chopped fine
2 teaspoons fresh tarragon or 1 teaspoon dried, chopped fine
8 egg yolks, slightly beaten
1 cup soft butter
Salt and pepper
Cayenne

Put first 4 ingredients into a saucepan. Simmer, uncovered, until the liquid is reduced to about 6 tablespoons. Strain through cheesecloth. Place yolks in top of a double boiler over just-simmering water. Add the strained liquid a little at a time, beating constantly. Continue beating and add the butter, 1 tablespoon at a time, making sure each tablespoon disappears before adding the next. Never let water boil. Season to taste with salt, pepper and a tiny pinch of cayenne. Makes 3 cups sauce.

Carrots with Seeded Green Grapes

1 cup butter
2 teaspoons fresh chervil or 1 teaspoon dried, chopped fine
⅛ teaspoon garlic powder
Pinch of celery salt
12 carrots
2 teaspoons dried basil or 12 leaves fresh
3 cups seeded green grapes
2 tablespoons lemon juice
Salt and pepper

Melt butter in a saucepan and add chervil, garlic powder and a good pinch celery salt. Let stand. Scrape carrots and cut into strips about ⅛" square and 3" long. Cook until crisp-tender in boiling salted water to which you have added the basil. Remove from the heat immediately and add the grapes. Let stand 3 minutes—no longer, or the grapes will become bleached. Remove basil if you used fresh. Drain off all water. Add lemon juice and butter mixture. Shake the pan. Salt and pepper. Makes 8 servings.

Rainbow Fruit Tart

PASTRY
2 cups flour
½ cup superfine sugar
¼ teaspoon cinnamon
Rind of 1 lemon, grated
¾ cup butter
3 egg yolks, slightly beaten

FILLING
1 cup heavy cream
¼ cup sugar
1½ teaspoons vanilla
Strawberries, hulled
Orange sections
Black grapes, seeded
Green grapes, seeded

GLAZE
1 cup plus 2 tablespoons water
2 tablespoons sugar
4 teaspoons arrowroot or cornstarch
1 teaspoon lemon juice
Red food coloring

For pastry, sift flour, sugar and cinnamon. Add grated lemon rind and mix well. Using 2 knives or a pastry blender, cut the butter into the flour mixture until it resembles fine crumbs. Add egg yolks and mix until pastry forms a ball. You may have to use your hands. Knead in the bowl 1–2 minutes. Wrap in waxed paper and chill for 1 hour. Now roll out ⅛" to ¼" thick on a lightly floured board and line a 10" pie plate. Handle quickly being careful not to stretch the pastry. Crimp the edge, but be sure pastry does not overhang the plate. Chill for another hour. Prick well over bottom and sides. Put waxed paper in pastry shell and fill ½" deep with dry rice or beans. Bake in a very hot oven, 450° F., for exactly 5 minutes. Remove from oven and lift out waxed paper and rice. Reduce oven heat to 350° F.; replace pie plate and bake 12 minutes, or until just golden. Cool in pie dish on a wire rack.

FILLING: Whip heavy cream, sugar and vanilla until thick and glossy. Spread evenly in the bottom of the cold pie shell. Arrange fruit on top of the cream. Carefully spoon the glaze over the fruit. Keep in a cool place until serving time—do not refrigerate.

GLAZE: Heat 1 cup water and sugar in a saucepan until simmering. Mix arrowroot or corn-starch with 2 tablespoons water and lemon juice to form a smooth paste. Add to the water-sugar mixture. Cook and stir until smooth, thickened and clear. Tint pale pink. Cool. Makes 8 servings; cut them small—this pie is very rich.

Duckling Bigarade

3 4–4½-pound ducklings, dressed and quartered
6 oranges
3 tablespoons sugar
3 tablespoons vinegar
3 cups chicken broth
3 cups fresh orange juice
2 tablespoons lemon juice
1 tablespoon grated orange rind
1½ teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
4 tablespoons cornstarch
½ cup cold water
Orange sections

Roast ducklings in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1½–2 hours, depending on weight and youth of birds. Turn frequently and prick skin very frequently to make sure all fat gets out. After first ½ hour of roasting, place partly squeezed orange halves on each piece of duckling. Save the juice for use later. Remove orange halves ½ hour before the end of roasting. About the same time start to make the sauce. Put the sugar and vinegar into a saucepan and cook until the mixture caramelizes. Do not allow to burn. Add chicken broth, orange juice, lemon juice, grated orange rind, salt and pepper. Mix well and keep warm over low heat. When duckling is fork-tender, remove from oven and drain on paper towels. Place skin side down in a clean baking pan and pour hot sauce over duckling. Return pan to moderate oven, 350° F., for 5 minutes and baste once. Drain sauce back into saucepan. Keep duckling warm. Mix cornstarch with cold water and add to the sauce. Cook and stir until smooth and thickened. Arrange duckling on a large platter and spoon some of the sauce over each piece. Garnish with orange sections. Serve the remaining sauce in a sauceboat. Makes 12 servings duckling and 5 cups sauce.

Green Grapes and Sour Cream

6 cups seedless green grapes, stemmed
1 cup commercial sour cream
½ cup dark brown sugar

Wash grapes and dry well. Chill 2–3 hours. Add the sour cream and toss the mixture with two spoons. Serve with about 1 tablespoon brown sugar sprinkled over each portion. Makes 8 servings—about ¾ cup each portion.

Quiche Lorraine

Pastry for a 9″ pie shell
½ pound bacon
4 eggs
1¾ cups light cream
1 teaspoon salt
Pinch white pepper
Pinch cayenne
½ pound Swiss cheese, grated

Line a 9″ pie plate with pastry. Crimp the edge to form a standing rim. Chill while you prepare the filling. Cook the bacon until crisp and drain on paper toweling. Crumble into small pieces. Beat the eggs slightly and add the light cream, salt, white pepper and cayenne. Mix well. Arrange crumbled bacon in pastry-lined pan. Add Swiss cheese to form the next layer. Pour egg-cream mixture over the cheese. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., 35 to 45 minutes, or until a silver knife comes out clean from the center of the mixture. Remove from the oven and allow to cool 7–10 minutes on a cake rack before cutting. Makes 8 servings—for appetizer course.

Veal Casserole

4 pounds veal cutlet, cut into 1″ cubes
About ¾ cup butter
2 large onions, peeled and chopped
2 cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
2½ cups chicken broth
½ cup tomato paste
1 whole bay leaf, crumbled
2 teaspoons salt
1 tablespoon fresh parsley (1½ teaspoons dried), finely chopped
1 teaspoon orégano
⅛ teaspoon pepper
4 tablespoons flour
Cold water
½ cup heavy cream
30 button mushrooms, wiped clean

Heat 2 tablespoons butter in a skillet and sauté the veal, a little at a time, until brown all over. Add more butter as needed. Drain veal on paper towels and transfer to a 3½-quart casserole (or divide between 2 smaller ones). In the same skillet sauté the onions and garlic in about 2 tablespoons butter until golden. Add chicken broth, tomato paste, bay leaf, salt, parsley, orégano and pepper. Simmer 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Mix the flour to a smooth paste with a little cold water and add to the skillet. Cook and stir until smooth and thickened. Pour over veal. Cover tightly and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1 hour and 45 minutes, or until fork-tender. Uncover for the last ½ hour. When tender, add heavy cream and stir gently. Keep warm. Sauté the mushrooms in 4 tablespoons butter until golden. Add to the casserole just before serving. Makes 8 servings.

Orange Soufflé

½ cup butter
¾ cup flour
1½ cups milk
1½ teaspoons grated orange rind
1 teaspoon orange extract
6 egg yolks
¾ cup sugar
3 oranges, cut into sections
8 egg whites

ORANGE CUSTARD
2 cups milk
4 tablespoons sugar
2 teaspoons grated orange rind
½ teaspoon orange extract
8 egg yolks, slightly beaten

Melt butter in a saucepan. Add flour and mix well. Gradually add milk, orange rind and extract. Cook and stir until mixture becomes very thick. Remove from heat. Beat together egg yolks and sugar until lemon-colored. Add to the sauce a little at a time, beating constantly. Cook and stir over low heat 4–5 minutes. Cool thoroughly. Butter and flour an 8-cup soufflé dish. Arrange orange sections over the bottom. Beat egg whites until very stiff but not dry. Carefully fold egg whites into cold sauce mixture a little at a time, making sure no specks of egg white are visible. Turn into soufflé dish. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 10 minutes. Raise the heat to 450° F. for 15 minutes, then lower the heat to 350° F. and bake 30–35 minutes more, or until set. The soufflé is done when the mixture is firm to the touch and brown. Serve immediately with orange custard and/or whipped cream. Makes 8 servings.

ORANGE CUSTARD: Put first 4 ingredients into the top of a double boiler. Heat slowly. Add warm milk mixture a little at a time to the yolks, beating constantly. Return mixture to double boiler over just-simmering water. Cook and stir just until thickened. Serve warm in a sauce bowl with the orange soufflé. Makes about 3½ cups.

EGG-IN-A-BASKET... easy with this "handy ham"

You can make six to a dozen Eggs-in-a-Basket on a cookie sheet for Sunday brunches.

ADD A SPLASH OF MUSTARD AND MINCED ONION TO UNDERWOOD DEVILED HAM. RING AROUND THE EDGE OF TOASTED ENGLISH MUFFINS OR BUNS. DROP AN EGG IN CENTER. BAKE 12 MINUTES AT 350°.

It's just one way this "handy ham" brings exciting flavor to your favorite egg dishes. Underwood Deviled Ham takes up so little space, it's easy to keep plenty on hand for ham treats in a hurry.

DOES MOST ANYTHING HAM CAN DO ...AND JUST AS DELICIOUSLY, TOO!

Made from whole hams finely ground and deftly seasoned for a wonderful can't-be-copied flavor.

Pudding Cheesecake

No cooking!

the tart-sweet smoothness of Jell-O Lemon Instant Pudding—the mellow tang of Borden's Cream Cheese—the crunchiness of graham cracker crust!

"BUSY-DAY" LEMON CHEESECAKE

1 large (8-oz.) package Borden's cream cheese • 2 cups whole milk
1 package Jell-O Lemon Instant Pudding
1 8-inch graham cracker crust

Stir cream cheese until very soft, blend in ½ cup milk. Add remaining milk and the pudding mix. Beat slowly with egg beater just until well mixed, about 1 minute. (Do not overbeat.) Pour at once into graham cracker crust. Sprinkle graham cracker crumbs lightly over top. Chill about one hour. Serve to 8 delighted people—a real party dessert so easily—thanks to Jell-O Instant Pudding and Borden's Cream Cheese.

P. S. It takes the special qualities of Jell-O Instant Pudding to make this luscious cheesecake. Cooked pudding will not give satisfactory results with this recipe.

TEENAGE SECRET MARRIAGE EPIDEMIC

Catalina High P.T.A. president Lucille ...etter, mother of two daughters; Mrs. Jack ...'Hara, who has three sons currently attend...ng the school; brisk Dorothy Graham, mother ...f four were among its members.

How far had the marriage epidemic spread? ...ould there be more than twenty of the ...agically too-young marriages? Were there ...oungsters so frightened by what they had ...one that they did not dare reveal their secret ...o anyone? Was there a "conspiracy of ...lence"?

"Finding answers turned out to be like ...ghting a fog," one mother says. "Exactly ...ow many secret marriages were there? There ...asn't any way of telling. And were the mar...ages legal?"

Teenagers talked to one another about it. ...ne boy reported that after he married, no ...eek went by without some other boy's ask...g, "How do you go about getting married in ...ogales?" But only a few talked freely to ...dults.

"It was a crazy thing to do," admitted one ...irl whose brief, secret marriage ended in ...ivorce. "We'd been going together and we ...ought we were in love. We heard (I guess ...very teenage kid in town hears) that it was ...asy and quick to get married in Nogales and ...obody at home had to know about it. It ...ounded exciting. We left a school dance and ...rove down. After we got across the border ...e didn't know where to go. We went into a ...ar and asked a bartender. He said his ...rother-in-law was a judge and he'd take care ...f everything. He did. We lied about our ...ges. He knew, but he didn't care. It cost us ...bout twenty dollars—all we had."

Fifteen-year-old Karen and Tom, just ...rned sixteen, were willing to tell their story ...ecause, "It might make other kids think ...rice and that would be a good idea."

They had been going steady for a year. ...hinking that they were getting "too serious ...o young," their parents persuaded them to ...op going steady and date other people. It ...dn't work. "We didn't want to date other ...eople," Karen says. "We just wanted to be ...gether." But they accepted restrictions set ...by their parents—only one date a week, ...ouble dates only. Plans were made to send ...aren away to school in another city.

Reluctantly, their parents allowed them to ...tend the junior prom and the traditional all-...ght party that follows it. "We checked and ...und that both dance and party were going ...be well chaperoned," Tom's mother says. ...he children had been so good about accept...g our dating rules. We let them go. You ...ve to trust your children a little!"

With the threat of separation hanging over ...m, Tom and Karen eluded the chaperons ...d went home (they knew their parents were ...) to change from their party clothes. They ...ve to Nogales. Once across the border, they ...d no idea what to do next. A cab driver ...ed that for them. He could take them to ...ace where they could get married.

...e drove them for a long time through ...row dark streets. "Four dollars' worth," ...n remembers. It was a lot because Nogales ... small city and cab fares are low. They ...dered if they might be driving in circles. ...lly they stopped.

"The place where we were married had a ...e front," Karen remembers, "with gold ...rs on the window in a sort of arch. We ... to find it again months later, but we ...r could."

...ey filled out forms printed in Spanish. ..."didn't understand much of it." They lied ...t their ages.

...ooking at them it is hard to see how any...ould be fooled. Karen is childishly slight, ...as a child is pretty. That night she wore ...ess slippers, Bermuda shorts and a pink ...er. She looked fifteen years old. Tom is ...nd wide-shouldered. He will be a big man one day. But at sixteen he still retains the unmistakable gangly, not-quite-finished look of the adolescent.)

The ceremony was in Spanish. The cab driver acted as interpreter. "It cost thirty dollars, about all I had, including cab fare back to the border," Tom says.

On the drive back to Tucson they began to feel scared about telling their parents what they had done. It was as if they hadn't really thought about this part of it before. "We won't tell them for a while," they decided. "Unless we get pregnant." Or unless Karen really was sent away to school.

Karen felt one other, smaller regret: "I wish I'd been married in a pretty dress. I wish we'd had the kind of wedding it's nice to remember."

The pattern of the secret marriages varied very little, the committee found. "It was like a jigsaw puzzle, the pieces all fitting together to make a picture." A school dance—generally during a holiday season. Permission to stay out later than usual. Availability of a car. The excitement of "being in love." The intimacy of a going-steady relationship. And the memory of hearing from friends, "It's easy to get married in Nogales."

After that came the exciting sixty-five-mile drive through the night, the intriguing foreignness of the city across the border, the helpful bartender or cab driver, fees that came to "about all I had" (reports ranged from $20 to $50)—and the secret that was going to be awfully hard for two youngsters to tell parents who had trusted them.

Parents who found their fifteen- and sixteen-year-olds involved in these secret marriages didn't want to talk about it. "We'd like to help," they told members of the committee. "We don't want to see any more misguided youngsters drawn into this mess. But ——"

(One teenager's startling comment: "They don't want to talk because they think there's something dirty about teenage marriages. They're afraid it's contagious—the more talk, the more marriages.")

The reaction of most parents was to protect their children. "Don't they face enough problems already, being married at their age? Fifteen-year-old girls pregnant, sixteen-year-old boys being forced to leave school and find jobs without even finishing their education!"

Some parents refused to accept such a hasty, ill-considered marriage, and separated the young couple. They wanted to keep this quiet too.

There was bitterness of another sort in one mother's statement: "Gossips are always eager to say, 'Oh, those kids had to get married or they wouldn't have done it that way.' We don't want our children hurt by that kind of gossip. So we would rather not talk."

Parents had other reasons for not wanting to talk: "We can't be sure that our children haven't broken the law—that they aren't subject to court action."

Mothers spoke of rumored "reprisal" threats made against anyone who talked. They were too fantastic for real belief, but they added a note of fear.

The members of the committee had not wanted to hurt or embarrass anyone. They simply wanted to find a way to stop the too-young marriage epidemic. They had meant to keep their investigations confidential until they were complete, then study the findings carefully before deciding on a plan of action. But suddenly they found their quiet study not only public, but explosively controversial.

A youth conference was being held in Tucson. A question about the border problem was addressed to Arizona Governor Paul Fannin: "If the stories about youthful drinking, narcotics, vice and 'quickie' marriages are true, don't you think something should be done to keep unescorted teenagers from crossing the border?"

"I certainly do," said Governor Fannin, and went on to deplore the fact that such things were so easily available to our teenagers. He also deplored the fact that teenagers were so ready to take advantage of them.

Newspapers picked up the story. MEXICAN MARRIAGE MILL LURING TUCSON YOUNGSTERS, headlined the Tucson Daily Citizen.

People who had not heard rumors of the situation were shocked to read about it. Did anyone know exactly how many Tucson teenagers had been married in Nogales? The news report brought up a new question. How many of the marriages were performed by qualified officials and how many were performed by "wildcatters"—unscrupulous operators selling black-market marriages that were not marriages at all?

Pima County Attorney Harry Ackerman has had "At least twenty-five phone calls about these Nogales marriages from teenagers or their parents in the past months. Most of them are probably not legal," in his opinion. "They are void, or subject to annulment."

Intent had a lot to do with it. "If a couple's intent was to evade Arizona's marriage laws (including age requirements) by leaving the state, then their marriage is void."

Most of the teenage marriages seemed to fall into this category.

Mr. Ackerman suggested as most ministers and guidance counselors did, that if the marriage was to be accepted, the young couple should be remarried in the United States. If it was not to be accepted, he recommended legal annulment or divorce proceedings. "It is an advantage to have a judicial declaration on record, for the sake of a possible future marriage."

In Nogales, Mexican officials denied that a "marriage mill" existed there. They pointed out that Mexico's marriage laws are even stricter than Arizona's. Without consent of their parents, a couple must be twenty-one years of age before they can be married there. (Arizona's laws say the girl must be eighteen, the man twenty-one.)

For several days the "marriage mill" story was argued in the newspapers with increasingly divided opinions.

"It's a good thing to have it out in the open," one mother said flatly. "We should know the truth, even if it does embarrass some people."

Her words were echoed (privately) by a prominent Tucsonian. "The border creates a bad situation with our teenagers," he said. "You don't cure a bad situation by keeping it hidden. Teenage kids probably shouldn't be allowed to cross the border without their parents. Parents aren't facing up to their responsibilities when they don't keep track of their children's activities."

Others felt that the situation was "very delicate." Talk of closing the border might seriously damage the long-term friendly relationship between Arizona and Sonora. "How do you think the Mexicans would feel if we said we didn't consider their country a proper place for our teenagers to go?"

("But why should they want our youngsters down there alone if they get into trouble?" a committee member asked. "I can't believe that they do.")

"Both Arizona and Sonora spend millions of dollars advertising the tourist attractions of the border," a Tucson businessman said frankly. "Who wants to put up barriers to tourist travel after you've invited it? Tourist income is important to the development of this area—important on both sides of the border."

Recently San Diego, California, had established control of juveniles at the nearby Tijuana border crossing, long a local source of trouble. Was Tucson's answer a law closing the Arizona border to all teenagers not accompanied by an adult relative?

"Controlling juveniles at the border is probably a good answer," Mr. Ackerman says. "It would help solve not only the teenage marriages but a lot of other things that affect our teenagers as well—liquor, and drugs, and Why So Many Early Marriages?

"Teenagers have to do what 'the gang' does. If the gang is getting married at fifteen, that's what they all want to do."

"Children just can't wait to grow up these days," one mother says sadly. "They think marriage is some sort of magic that will make them grown-up overnight."

A teenage bride tries to explain: "When you're fifteen you feel so confused and alone. You think if you get married you won't be alone, you'll have somebody. It looks easier to stand on four feet than on just two."

"Parents are too obsessed with chasing the almighty dollar and keeping up with the Joneses to look after their kids. Kids need the security of discipline. They need it most of all when they're sure they need it least—when they're teenagers."

"These days we give our children too much—money, freedom, cars—everything but the thing they need most: a sense of responsibility. Do we fail to give them that because we have lost it ourselves?"

The Reverend William Hobbs, of Tucson's First Methodist Church, takes a thoughtful view: "It may be that these youngsters think they are doing the right thing when they marry, not the wrong. They may think, 'I've been taught that it is wrong to have sexual intercourse outside marriage. But if I get married it will be all right.' They are confused about the moralities of marriage. As parents we must do a better teaching job."

Asked "Why keep the marriages secret?" teenagers replied:

"Parents wouldn't let you do it if you told them, would they? Most of the time you think a parent is nothing but a killjoy, always wanting to spoil your fun."

"Just to have a secret. Because it's exciting to have such a big secret."

"Most of the kids think that if a couple stays married for three months parents can't have the marriage annulled. So they keep it secret until the three months are up."

prostitution." He adds, "Arizona has always had good relations with Mexico. I've got a lot of good friends down there myself. But the problem does have to be solved. With more and more transportation available to juveniles all the time, it's going to do nothing but increase."

The Reverend William Hobbs, of Tucson's First Methodist Church, felt: "The border presents a problem with our teenagers, there is no question about that. And the too-young marriages are as serious an aspect as the problem has. I have under counseling now three or four young couples who married in Nogales. Each year I remarry about the same number who have decided to reconfirm vows made perhaps too casually.

"We need border controls," Mr. Hobbs goes on. "But we, as parents, can't count on making a border policeman a stand-in for our conscience. We owe it to our children to teach them personal standards of integrity so that they can handle whatever happens to them—from an auto accident to deciding the right time and place to get married. If we allow our children complete freedom before they are ready for it, we must be prepared to take the consequences."

In mentioning auto accidents, he pointed out another compelling reason for keeping unescorted teenagers away from the border. Though the Nogales highway is wide and well engineered for safety, its fatal-accident rate is so high that it has become known as El Camino del Muerte, the Road of Death. Drunken driving is blamed in many cases.

Rabbi Bilgray, of Temple Emanu El, "would not oppose some sort of juvenile-control law at the border. But it should be tempered and intelligent control that tries to make the juvenile see why we are doing it. It must not be just another law on the books—so harsh a law that it will not be enforced."

At first other high schools in the city had said that they would like to join Catalina's parents' group in studying the youthful marriage problem. Now they changed their minds. "We feel that the percentage of married students in our schools is too small to present a major problem."

"Maybe the percentage is small," one embittered parent said. "But it gets a whole lot bigger if your own son or daughter is part of it!"

"I can't believe that Catalina is alone in this secret teenage marriage thing," a committee member said firmly.

Many Tucsonians felt that Catalina was "greatly to be commended for not turning its back on the situation, but bringing it out into the open and recognizing that it is a problem."

"Not really the schools' problem, either," said Mrs. Retter, "but ours, as parents."

Dr. Robert Morrow, superintendent of Tucson schools, saw the rash of teenage marriages as "A matter for concern, certainly, but no cause for panic. Even one or two student marriages present a problem if the children go into marriage without their parents' consent and without realizing what they are doing. But I do not believe that Tucson's high-school marriage rate is unusual. I don't think we have many secret marriages."

The number of acknowledged married students currently attending the four city high schools: Tucson High, with an enrollment of 2300, had four married girls and one married couple. Of Pueblo High's 1800 students there were three married girls, two married boys and two who had just dropped out of school. Rincon High (2400 enrollment) duplicated Pueblo High's figures. Of Catalina's 2500 students, the official figures were seven married girls, five married boys and one couple.

(Of these figures one student said positively, "I think they are mistaken. I know of at least twenty-five marriages. And ten more that are planned.")

Why were there more student marriages at Catalina than at the other high schools?

Dr. Morrow thought it was a matter of economic location. "There are more kids with money at Catalina than at some of the other schools. Fewer students are required to work at jobs; they have more time on their hands. More boys have cars. More families in that area can afford to support children who marry, so that they can stay on in school."

As to a juvenile-control law at the border: "It may have merit if it is carefully worked out between states on both sides of the border. Good neighborliness should not be lost."

The committee went to Nogales, Sonora, to talk to Mr. T. Leonhardy, the American consul.

Mr. Leonhardy said that Nogales officials were eager to co-operate in preventing a "marriage mill" in their city. They did not feel that one existed. "Nogales is a clean city. Not like some of the other border cities."

Any Mexican official who knowingly married an underage couple would be removed from office. (A Tucson newspaper said that two had already been removed.) But it was not always possible for an official to tell when a couple lied about their ages. Some teenagers looked more mature than their years. At least one couple had produced statements of parental consent which later turned out to be forged. Some brought witnesses to aid them with false statements.

But Nogales officials assured Mr. Leonhardy that they would be doubly vigilant. They would not issue tourist permits ("Which foreigners must have to be legally married in Mexico") to young couples whose age they had the slightest suspicion about.

"They said they would send any such couples here to the consulate to talk to me," Mr. Leonhardy said. "They are doing just that." He added with a smile, "Several times I've been awakened at night with requests for information on how to get married in Nogales. I tell such couples that it is just as easy to get married on the Arizona side of the border."

What about the "wildcatters"—the illegal operators selling black-market marriages?

If such operators existed and could be caught, they would be prosecuted, Mr. Leonhardy said. Wherever you found such people—on whichever side of the border—they were criminals. Nogales authorities wanted them in operation no more than Tucson parents did.

"Bring me proof, documentary proof, of illegal marriages performed in Nogales and I will be happy to go to the governor—Governor Alvaro Obregon, of Sonora—with it. He has already assured me of his co-operation."

But documentary proof would not be easy to find. Parents had already spoken of their fears of exposing their children to public embarrassment or possible legal penalties. The investigation seemed to have come to a halt.

It had accomplished one thing. The publicity in Tucson and the increased vigilance in Nogales appeared to have halted across-the-border marriages of Tucson teenagers.

"Only temporarily, I'm afraid," one mother worried. "People forget. We need a permanent solution." (In the harsher words of one county official, "As soon as the heat is off, the same unscrupulous wildcatters could be right back at the old stand, selling the kids anything they think they want.")

Suggestions were made. Teenagers who wanted to cross the border unescorted might be required to carry permission cards signed by parent or guardian and notarized at the nearest consulate. "That would emphasize parental responsibility," said Mrs. Graham.

"Perhaps it would help if Tucson newspapers published records of all marriages of Tucsonians taking place in Nogales," Mrs. Retter said. "Removing the secrecy would make the idea less appealing to kids."

Juvenile controls at the border still seemed the best answer.

The committee found that some members of the Arizona state legislature had considered the matter of a bill designed to stop teenage traffic across the border two years ago.

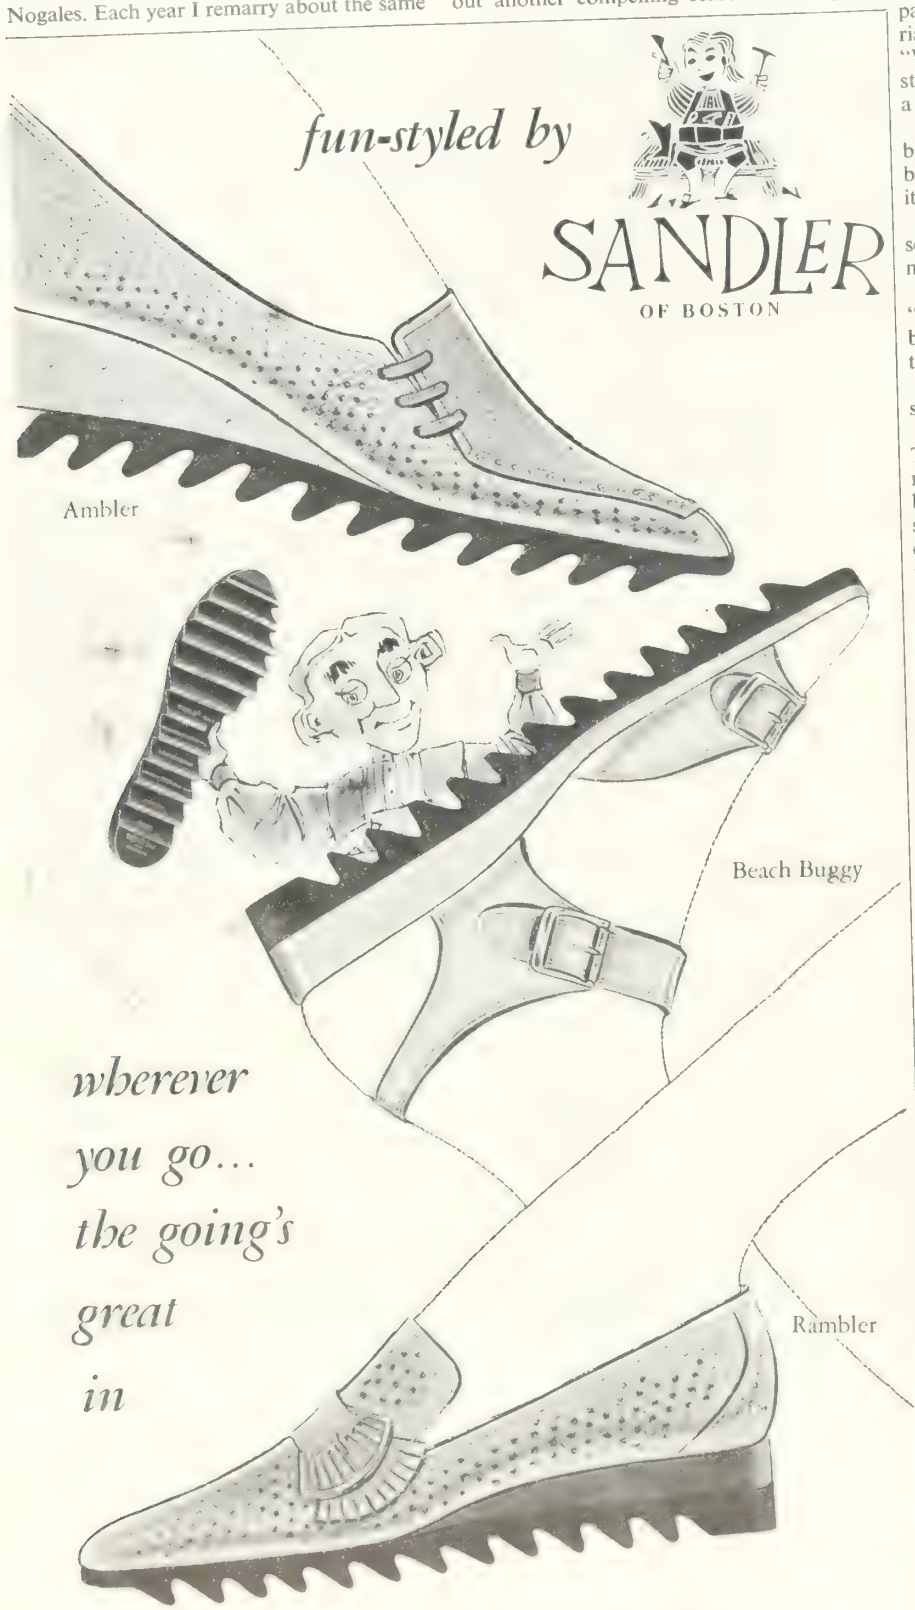
"We found it was unconstitutional for a state to pass a law governing an international border," says Mr. Ackerman, who was a member of the legislature at the time. "Only the Federal Government can pass such a law."

Then from San Diego, California, came news reports that promised real help. Far from being alone in its teenage border problems, Tucson was sharing them with cities and towns all the way from California to Texas. And the problems were being investigated by the United States Senate subcommittee on juvenile delinquency.

"Legislation to close the entire border to unescorted teenagers is a possibility," announced Missouri Senator Thomas C. Hennings, chairman of the subcommittee, after conducting personal investigations in the San Diego-Tijuana area. "It is a matter for the entire subcommittee, of course, but evidence is overwhelming that something should be done. And it won't be just hand wringing."

California was urging a law barring teenagers from crossing the border unaccompanied by an adult relative.

Tucson's small, independent committee had its own plan of action under way:



Contact Senator Hennings and his staff committee.

Co-ordinate its work with that of groups in other Arizona towns.

Push for more education in "the realities of marriage" via Family Living courses in the Tucson schools.

Work toward better understanding and communication between parents and teenagers.

(An eighteen-year-old boy has a clue to offer here. "Parents should behave like parents," he says. "Fathers should be fathers, not pals!")

"At Catalina High School a group of our teenagers is drawing up a teenage code of behavior," says P.T.A. president Mrs. Retter. "Parents are working on a code for parents." She smiles. "On second thought, maybe it should be the other way round?"

What chance for success do these hasty, too-young marriages have?

"The odds are long against them," says one counselor with many years of guidance work behind him. "Kids of fifteen and sixteen just haven't lived long enough to understand the adjustments that marriage demands. They aren't mature enough. The first baby—together with the hard work and the sense of being tied down that a baby means—brings realization."

If you asked one seventeen-year-old deserted wife, or another just turned twenty who has a two-year-old baby to support, you would not get an encouraging answer.

A sixteen-year-old husband who has had to leave school and take a trainee's job that barely supports his sixteen-year-old wife and their two-month-old baby might not be too hopeful either.

Sixteen-year-old Tom and fifteen-year-old Karen are determined to make a success of their marriage. Their chances look better than most. They have one important thing the counselor says it takes to make such a very young marriage succeed: "Good, understanding parents on both sides."

"These days you don't throw your children out to fend for themselves if they do something you don't like," Tom's mother says. "Their marriage happened much too early, but it was something that would have happened four or five years from now anyway. I have to admit that Karen is probably just the girl I would have chosen for Tom four or five years from now."

Together with their families they worked out a plan. Tom would finish school. Karen, too, if possible. To do this they would need—and have—financial help from their parents. But they would help themselves too. Tom would work at a part-time job. They would live with his family and Karen would learn how to cook and keep house.

It worked very well. (Though Tom's younger brother was heard to mutter with twelve-year-old disgust, "Mom, does he have to kiss her all the time?") But early one morning a white-faced, frightened Tom woke his mother. "It's Karen," he said. "She's got a terrible pain!" Rushed to the hospital, fifteen-year-old Karen lost her expected baby.

"We were all desperately worried," Tom's mother says. "They were so young to take a blow like this. They were looking forward to the baby so eagerly. But they came through their loss. They were shaken and unhappy, but they were not crushed."

The families made another joint decision. It would be better for Karen to return to school than to stay home and brood over her loss.

"We're proud of the way they are handling things," says Tom's mother. "They both have part-time jobs now. They say they prefer not to be completely dependent. Karen does her share of the housework and she is learning to be quite a good cook. They study together and their grades in school are higher than ever before. They had fallen way off during the year that they were going steady."

Karen and Tom would like to postpone having a family until after they finish school.

"We have lots of time. We'll be better parents if we finish our education first."

"I know that our marriage wouldn't have worked without the help our families are giving us," Karen says honestly.

She is equally honest when teenage schoolmates ask her advice about getting married immediately. "Wait until you're through school," she tells them. So does Tom.

Is she sorry that she did not wait? Karen pauses for a long moment.

"Tom and I are together," she says then. "We are so happy. I can't say I'm sorry. Except for one reason. A big reason."

What is it?

"If either of us had had any real idea how much our marriage was going to shock and hurt our parents, I think we would have waited. I think a lot of kids would wait if some way could be found to get that across to them. You don't realize all the things parents do for you. If they have always given you everything, you take it all for granted. You don't think that giving is going to stop if you get married. But lots of times it does."

Karen is especially happy about one thing. When she and Tom repeated their vows at a quiet ceremony on this side of the border she wore a pretty dress. "And it was the kind of wedding it's nice to remember." END

TO ELLA: WHEN WE WERE TWELVE YEARS OLD

By WILLIAM STAFFORD

Tired that day we were; we found honey in an old tree.
Small we were, tired and small.
No one remembers but me—

Honey there in the broken branch, honey found in the wild;
you looking out over bending grass, and looking far, for a child—

Far to a land all curved and green,
a place the wind blew from, a poured-out land all honey-smooth—
a land that never did come.

Both stockings in this photograph are unretouched—but only one is a Burlington Support Stocking.

Quick—which is the Burlington Support Stocking?

Both her stockings are all-nylon. One is a regular daytime sheer, the other a Burlington Support Stocking. But—which is the Burlington Support Stocking?

It's so sheer, nobody can tell! That's the first exclusive feature of the Burlington Support Stocking (it's on her right leg). You'll also like the two-way stretch top, cottony cushion sole, and the freedom foot that never cramps your toes.

But most of all, you'll like the firm support Burlington Support Stockings give you. Overtired calf and thigh muscles are lifted and comforted. Your legs are molded and beautified, as if by gentle fingers.

With all this, Burlington Support Stockings are only $4.95 a pair—and they outwear many, many pairs of your ordinary nylons. Buy a pair today, and you'll walk happily ever after!

Blue Bonnet

Looks, Cooks and Tastes Like The "High-Price" Spread

...because

NATURE FLAVORS both!

When they make the "high-price" spread they normally add a flavoring agent. It comes from nature herself—it's what gives you that natural taste. And nature helps flavor BLUE BONNET the very same way, so you get that natural, delicate taste like the "high-price" spread.

The taste of the "high-price" spread is a natural taste. And BLUE BONNET has a similar taste—because nature flavors both.

Result? The taste you've always hoped for in a margarine is yours in every pat and pound of BLUE BONNET . . . the subtle, natural taste that makes its delicious way into everything you spread it on, melt it on, or cook it with.

THE DUKE AND THE GIRL

out of the ordinary. Just another bride, pretty as a picture, served up in a soufflé of white tulle. "Miss Dawn Compton, a former friend of the Duke of Winfield, marries."

"Nice for her," said Mathilda. "But what?"

"I checked up, as a matter of interest. Twenty of this season's brides have been launched with some similar label—friend of the duke's. What's going on? Is he all that romantically inclined? There's an article in it, and you are the girl to do it. Day in the country do you good. Interview. Something light and humorous to lighten the solid maternity of the October number."

"Darn," said Norma Pimm. "I wanted that assignment badly. You get all the best ones these days. Oh, 'tis love, 'tis love gets a girl out of the office into the autumn sunshine."

"Nonsense. It's sheer ability," said Mathilda, grinning.

Norma was tied to a column on health problems. She had been in love with Bill for years. She sighed, inserted a sheet into her typewriter and typed the headline angrily: THE FIRST MONTH, and away ahead of her stretched the dreary other eight.

"Go on. Wallow in aspic," she said over her shoulder. "Some people have all the luck. There may even be champagne."

One pictures a duke surrounded with a certain splendor, and although the weeds on the drive did not lead one to look for very much, Mathilda confidently expected the front door to be opened by a butler. A small, malevolent old woman appeared and, looking her up and down, said, "Another friend of the duke's, I suppose," and sniffed.

"No. A reporter from Mothers' Monthly," said Mathilda pleasantly. "I have an appointment."

"They all have appointments. Come in. All this coming and going, not like the good old days. It takes it out of you!"

Something had certainly taken it out of her, thought Mathilda, for a flatter old woman she had never seen. She must have been all of a hundred, or even a hundred and fifty, and obviously getting more disagreeable as time went on.

She flung a door open and said, "Another of them," and departed. Mathilda found herself facing a long, lean young man wearing corduroy trousers and a green pull-over from which the elbows had long since departed. The duke, presumably. He was younger than she expected. She had looked for someone with a beard. He looked at her as though she, too, was not quite what he had been expecting.

"Do come in. I'm sorry it's so cold in here, and so untidy. I'll light the fire. Truth to tell, I had forgotten you were coming today. Stupid of me."

He knelt by the open grate and struggled with a lot of damp wood; she watched him, thinking he looked much more like a don than the gay Lothario he evidently was. He must possess hidden charm which did not, as they said in the office, have instant impact. She looked about her. Family portraits, suits of mail, halberds and visors—and, hanging from the high gallery, old battle honors. He certainly had the lot, and she told herself it would not be difficult to do an amusing piece on this setup.

"Now I'll make you some coffee," said the duke. He did something at a side table with a pan and an electric kettle. The result was awful, but at least it was hot. Mathilda warmed her hands gratefully on the cup. The duke sat down opposite her, his gentle face a cameo against the carved stone of the fireplace. "It was extremely good of you to come, though I don't imagine I have anything of the slightest interest to tell you. The place has gone to ruin, I'm afraid, and it's difficult to know what to do for the best. You must tell me the sort of things you want to know and I shall do what I can."

Naturally he thought it was historical facts she was after, and she had to go carefully. A girl can't go barging straight into a man's love life without any preliminaries. She asked some intelligent questions about the architecture, the gardens, the date of the tower, and the plumbing, and so worked round to the domesticities.

"And staff?" You always asked about staff on these occasions.

"Staff?" said the duke, obviously taken aback. "Oh yes, staff. There isn't any of what you could actually call staff—these days, you know. That old lady you saw used to be my mother's maid. She lives in the lodge. I inherited her with the place; also Campion the butler. Aged eighty. They don't work, of course. They just sort of go with the place. As a matter of fact, I have to look after them. Unfortunately we were never taught the sort of things that are useful in life as it is today. Cooking, and so forth."

A sinister rumbling and rattling came from the wainscot.

"Mice," said the duke, with a sad smile. "Ancestral mice. I inherited them with the place too."

He got up. "I say, look at the time! One o'clock. I should offer you some lunch, after you've come all this way, but do you know, I am not at all sure there is anything." He looked about him vaguely as if half hoping to locate a poached egg on toast somewhere around.

"That's all right. I brought lunch with me," said Mathilda. She was a practical girl who did not take risks, and although the aspic-and-champagne idea had been a nice one, she had not counted on it. "Perhaps you'll join me?" she said.

He brightened. "If you have a spare sandwich ——"

Mathilda was a seasoned traveler. She did not rely on sandwiches. She had a barbecued chicken, some tomatoes, rolls and a Camembert cheese. The duke gazed at these things as one might who, opening Tutankhamen's tomb, finds unlooked-for treasure therein.

"There is one thing I can provide," he said. He came back with a dusty bottle. A long, slender-necked bottle that seemed to be full of sun.

"I have coffee," said Mathilda quickly as he moved toward the table.

"You think of everything. I can't imagine how you do it," said the duke. "Shall we draw the couch to the fire? We might be a bit warmer."

"Do you know, I believe I was quite hungry," said the duke.

The same idea had struck Mathilda. Fed, he was much easier to interview, and as they finished her excellent coffee she got down to brass tacks.

"Quite honestly, it's the romance angle we are interested in," she said. "Have you never thought of marriage?"

A charming smile crept over his face and he helped himself to the second chicken leg absent-mindedly.

"Marriage? Indeed, I have thought a great deal of it. Though not strictly in the manner I infer you mean."

"One gathers you have many lady friends," said Mathilda, going warily.

"I don't mind telling you, in confidence. It was an idea that suddenly came to me. Not all my ideas," said the duke, "are much good, but this one was."

He settled himself comfortably, crossing his long, thin legs at the ankles. Mathilda had a sudden vision of him in stone, lying in a cathedral, his feet on a lion to show he had died far from home. He was exactly the type for it.

"You see, death duties took everything there was in the kitty," said the duke, "and this place, as you see, needs a great deal done to it. I had to raise money. I could not leave the place. Campion and Jeannie are too old to be on their own here. I have to support them in the circumstances to which they have become accustomed."

"But I thought the Welfare State ——"

"It provides the bread," said the duke simply. "But they are accustomed to jam. So I tried first one thing, then another, and nothing came of it, so I suddenly went in for matrimony."

"I see," said Mathilda, who didn't. "Do go on. It's fascinating."

"You think so? How nice! Well, strange as it may seem to you, there are a lot of people afoot today with tons of money but little knowledge of what can be done with it. People who are, to my mind, quite needlessly aware of their mereness, and anxious to appear to move in what they consider the right circles."

His approach was, Mathilda realized, the oblique one. There was nothing for it but to nod and wait until the ball fell on the green.

"Of course it required tact. Quite considerable tact. And good staff work. I approached sundry parents with my suggestion, and after that I never looked back. They handed me on to one another. Their co-operation was wonderful. Though my fees are high, I could have made them higher and got away with it. No one ever demurred. It is a most extraordinary thing, but do you know that to dine with me in town, go dancing—say, twice—and spend a not very comfortable weekend here, heavily chaperoned, is of inestimable social benefit to a girl? We have had no failures. The last one, Dawn Compton, has done very well indeed for herself."

"So I saw," said Mathilda.

"I charge an over-all fee, and that includes a letter of congratulation which is frequently displayed at the wedding, and a small wedding present—I usually find something suitable in the attics. I would like to take you round the attics."

"I would love to see them."

"I expect, like many other people, you consider all this most undignified," said the duke. "But today who of us can afford dignity? I have half a dozen people hanging on me one way and another. They have their rights. I have only my obligations. And it's no worse than my Aunt Agatha, who in the good old days presented any number of young women from The Potteries at court for a round sum. Her need was not nearly as great as mine."

He looked around sadly.

"Of course if I were better at these things I would tidy the place up and open it to the public the way everyone else does—sell souvenirs, give teas, and so on."

"That is what you ought to do," said Mathilda. "There is any amount of money to be made that way. A restaurant in the old coach house . . . small tables with candles on them; it wouldn't take any time at all."

"It might not take you any time at all," said the duke sadly. "I don't have any talents that way. I am busy on a book about historical drama and it takes all the time I have. Though women appear to be able to conduct two professions at the same time, quite successfully, and even produce children in their spare moments, I have yet to come across the man who can cope on this scale. And now, would you care to see round? Better put on your coat. There is some rather ghastly ormolu and a great variety of works of art, as well as a gazebo in which one of the Georges is generally supposed to have done something or other rather peculiar."

By the time the tour was over, Mathilda's notebook was full and she knew that she had the material for a humorous article full of impact, and that the inside story of the duke's girl friends was a rare scoop. Surely she should not scruple to use it. He had said it was confidential, but he had not asked her to promise anything, nor was there anything in writing.

"It has been such a pleasant day," said the duke. "I wish I thought we might meet again sometime. I would very much like to see your article before it's published, if I may."

"I'll send you a copy," she said.

A querulous voice from the background called, "David! David! Have you got those sleeping pills from the chemist for me yet? You know very well I ——"

"Oh, dear. I've left undone something I ought to have done," said the duke. "I must go. Good-by. It's been so nice."

When she got to the turn in the drive he had not gone. He was standing looking after her, the moldering pile of his ancestral home looming behind him like an animal about to swallow him.

"What was he like?" asked Miss Pimm.

Mathilda said slowly, "A nice guy."

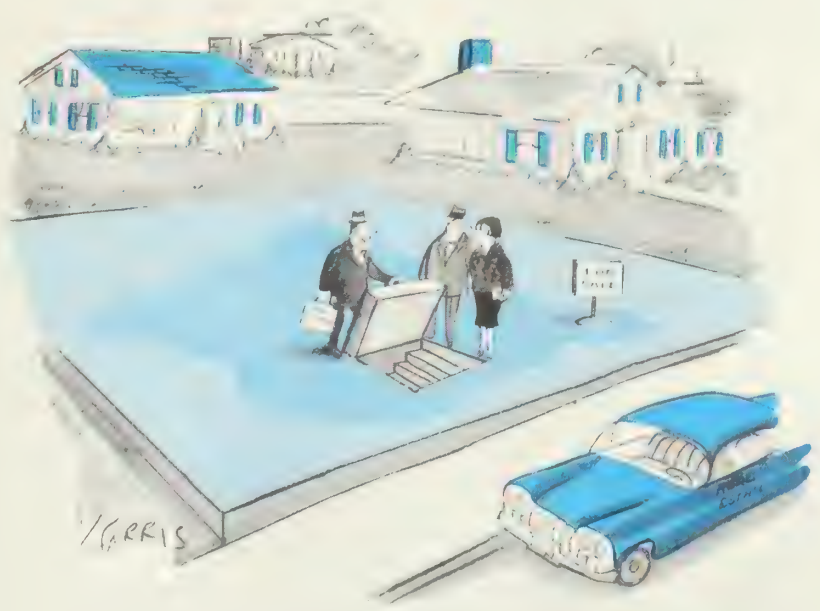
Bill twisted around in his swivel chair and stared at her angrily. "What do you mean, you can't do it? You've been at it for more than ten days. What's come over you, girl?"

She said, "It isn't funny, Bill. I thought it was at the start—and I tried, but I can't do it."

"All right. Give me your notes and I'll have someone else ——"

She said sharply, "No."

"What do you mean—'No'? Those notes were made on our time, and they belong to us."



She said slowly, "No. They belong to David. I'm going to give them back to him."

"So that's it, is it? David! Well, at least we know where we are at last. You're nothing but a little social climber—swept off your feet by a swell, are you? Show you a bit of luxury, and you lose what head you ever had."

The last sight she had of Bill was of his furious face, glaring up at her from his desk, not understanding why it was she laughed and laughed. And in that moment she had a swift vision of how Bill would look when the breakfast bacon was not to his liking.

The front door of Winfield House stood open, so she walked in. The duke was in the big hall, dressed as before, only the holes in his elbows were rather larger.

"Do you know," he said without preliminaries, as if she had been there all the time, "I am beginning to think you are absolutely right and that if I work hard, I might have the place ready to open in spring. In spring, it is very beautiful here. The daffodils are absolutely wonderful. Miles of them."

"We could sell them for two shillings a bunch," said Mathilda, also as if she had been there all the time. "We could make flower and vegetable stalls under the arches round the courtyard."

"An excellent scheme. Later there are tulips, and after that ——" He broke off and stared at her. "Did you say 'we'?"

"I did. I've been given the sack. Will you give me a job? I have a sudden passion to lead an outdoor life."

He put down the pile of books he had been collecting and came and stood beside her.

"You aren't fooling me? You mean it?"

"Let's have some lunch and talk it over."

He said regretfully, "I'm afraid there isn't ——"

"I've brought it with me."

"This is too good to be true," said the duke, and she wondered if he meant the hot soup in a vacuum jug, cold ham and biscuits and cheese, but apparently he did not. "All this last ten days I have done nothing but think about you. It has never happened to me before. Girls have just come and gone, and no doubt many of them were a lot more beautiful than you are, but they did not appear so to me. I could not do a stroke on my book."

"And I could not do a stroke on my article. I flogged Pegasus," said Mathilda solemnly, "but he would not start."

A cascade of mice rattled behind the wainscot.

"Remind me to get some traps," said the duke. "I say, let me do that. I'm afraid the wood is damp again."

Mathilda knelt on the wide stone hearth and fed the reluctant flame with pages of her notebook until it flared up, gilding her face.

"What's all that?" asked the duke.

"A good laugh," said Mathilda. "Snappy. With lots of impact."

He knelt beside her, trying to read the words before the blaze took them. "All your notes! Are you sure you don't need them?"

"Quite sure," she told him. She leaned her cheek for a moment against his convenient shoulder.

"How wonderful. I shall never have to have any more lady friends," said the duke. "Mathilda! Not a name I have ever been greatly addicted to, and now it seems to me the most beautiful name in the world."

did not repeat her question, but, climbing the smooth-worn path across the fence, for a moment shaded her eyes with her hand against the light, then seated herself where she stood, her hands folded round her knees. From far away her frock, catching the sun, would now be visible like a golden flower in the green. He sat down in the shade of the trees, where his eyes could rest on her form. The air here at the edge of the wood was clear and warm, the light full and timeless, the stubble fields breathed a generous sweetness. A pale-blue moth came and settled upon a sun-baked stone beside her.

He did not want to break up their happy hour in the wood, and remained silent for a while.

"I was thinking," he said at last, "of the old people who lived here before us, and who cleared and broke and plowed this land. They will have had to begin their work over and over again. In very old days they had bears and wolves to fight, then Wendish pirates and invaders and then, later again, hard and unsparing masters. But were they to rise from their graves, on a harvest day like this, and to look out over the fields and meadows before us, they might still consider that it had been worth their while."

"Oh, yes," she said and looked up toward the blue sky and the clouds. "And they will," she added, "have had real fine hunting, with those bears and those wolves." Her voice was as clear as a bird's, with a faint ring of the island dialect, like a melody, to it. She talked as if she played.

"And they might then, today," he said, "forget the wrongs done them."

"Oh, yes," she said once more. "It is all a long time ago." She smiled a little to herself. "Now you are thinking of a peasant," she said, "since you talk of wrongs."

"Yes," said he, "I was thinking of a peasant."

"And why," she asked, "are you digging your old peasants out of the mold to bring them with us into the wood today?"

"I might tell you why," he said, but sat on silent.

"You are a clever, wise, learned man, Eitel," she said. "Your land is better worked and looked after than the land of your neighbors. People talk about you and your reforms and inventions. The king himself has said that he would there were more like you in his country. You give more thought to your peasants' welfare than to your own. You have been away for years in foreign countries to study new farming systems and how to make their lot easier and happier to them. And yet you speak as if you were in debt to them even now."

"I may be in debt to them even now."

"I remember," she said thoughtfully, "that one day when we two were children and were walking together in the wood—just like now—you began telling me of the wrongs done, in old times, to the peasants in Denmark. I was older than you, but you spoke so gravely that I forgot my dolls for your tales. I almost believed, then, that the Lord God must have decided to create our whole world over again, and that you must be one of the angels whom He had chosen to assist Him in the task."

"You were the angel, I think," he said, and smiled a little, "who had the patience to listen to the fantasies of a lonely boy."

They sat in silence for a while, thinking of the time of which they were talking.

"Today," she said, "I know a little more about the world, and I do not think that it is going to be created over again—not in our time. I do not know, either, that one must think it unjust that there are both noblemen and peasants on the earth, any more than that there are both pretty and plain people upon it. May I not brush my own hair without grieving for the sake of the women who have thin, dull hair?"

He looked at her long silky ringlets, and called to mind the many times that he had loosened them and wound them round his fingers.

"But to you," she went on, "it is as if it were all your fault that there are poverty and distress in the world. It is as if you were tied with a rope to those old peasants of whom you talk."

"Yes, I may be tied to them with a rope," he said.

She sat silent for a long time, her hands round her knees. "If I had been a peasant's wife," she said low and happily, "you would not have taken me."

He did not answer her. He was seized and transported, as often before, by the fact of her nature's being so entirely without shame. She blushed easily, with joy or pride, but never with guilt. And that, he reflected, was why he found peace with her as with no other human being. He had heard and read, and he knew from his own experience, that a man's love of a woman never for a long time outlives possession. But he had been the lover of this young lady, his neighbor's wife, for two years. Her little daughter, up at her husband's house to which the wood belonged, was his. And his desire and his tenderness were stronger today than two years ago, so strong that he had to hold himself back so as not to draw her to him or to kneel down before her and kiss her hands in sweet, wild gratitude. It would be the same, he felt, were they to live to old age. And it was not by her beauty or her gentleness that she did hold this happy and painful power over him. It was because she knew not shame nor remorse, nor rancor. After a while he also reflected that in her last words to him she had spoken the truth.

"You," he said at length in a changed voice, low as her own, "you have never wronged the people whose lives were in your hand. Your family, your fathers have lived in good understanding with the peasants on their land, as with the land itself."

"My family and my fathers were like others, I think," said she. "Papa had such a temper! When he had taken something into his head, it would have to be done; he did not worry much whether it was reasonable or not."

"But the name of your fathers," said Eitel, "has not been loathed by the people who served you. Your harvesters have sung while they reaped their fields."

She thought the matter over. "Have you got the barley in, with you?" she asked.

"Yes, it is in," he answered, "except for a little in the lower field and a bit in 'Mylady's Paddock.'"

"It would not make much difference to you, I do not think," she said after a moment, "whether they sang or not while they reaped for you. That is what I have been wondering about [illegible] studies? It has made you a stranger among your equals. You do not take much pity on your friends, be they ever so unfortunate in cards or in love. And if you sell them a horse, you will know what price to ask, and stick to it. But when you are trading with a peasant you will feel, I think, that you must give him the whole horse for nothing. And for all that, there is no great affection for the peasants in your heart.

"Those old men," she continued slowly, "those old lords of the land whom you cannot forget—maybe they took more pleasure in having their servants about them than you do. They felt that those people belonged to them; they made merry with them and were pleased and proud when they were comelier or shrewder than the servants of their neighbors. But you, Eitel, you do not want your own valet to touch you—you dress and undress without him; you ride about without a groom; you go out with your gun and your dog all alone. Why, when that old tenant of yours, to whom you forgave his lease, wanted to kiss your hand, you would not let him do so, and I had to give him mine to kiss, so as not to let him go away empty! It is not out of love for your peasants that you rack your brain and allow yourself no rest. It is out of love for something else. And what that is I know not."

FAME: climbing a greasy pole for $10 and ruining trousers worth $15.

JOSH BILLINGS

"Nay, you are mistaken," said he. "I love this land of mine, every acre of it. In foreign countries, in the big towns there, I have been sick with longing for this very soil and air of mine."

"I know," said she, "that you love your land as if it were your wife. But you are not the less lonely for that. And I wonder, Eitel," she added with a vague mockery or pity in her voice, "I wonder whether in all your life you have really loved any human being except just me."

At her words he looked back searchingly into the past. She herself, he reflected, wherever she had been had found something to love.

"Nay," he said once more after a while, "I have indeed loved very deeply a human being—a long, long time ago. But at the same time you are right. It is not out of love for my servants or my peasants that I do, as you say, rack my brain and allow myself no rest. It is out of love for something else. And the name of that thing is justice."

"Justice," she repeated wonderingly and became silent. "Eitel," she said at last, "we two need not worry ourselves about justice. Fate is just, God is just. Surely He will judge and retribute, without our assistance. And we human beings may leave off judging one another."

"And yet," he said, "we human beings take upon ourselves to judge one another. Yet we take upon ourselves to sentence one another to death.

"Did you ever know," he asked after a pause, "that my father had a man put to death?"

"Your father?" she asked. "Had a man put to death?"

"Yes," he answered, "he was a peasant."

"I believe that they told me so," she said, "when I was a little girl."

"They told you so, Ulrikke," he said. "They told an old story, a nursery tale, to a little girl. But to me it was a different tale, for my own father was in it."

"It seems to me that I remember your father," said she, "and that he set me on his knee and played with me. And yet that can hardly be. But Mama has talked about him many times, and has told me that he was a handsome, gallant, gay gentleman. A very fine horseman and afraid of nothing—like you."

"My father died before I was born," he said. "That, to me, has seemed to mean that he did, from the very beginning, wish to give all that was his into my hands."

"You need not grieve at that," she said.

"I need not grieve at that," he repeated slowly. "You are thinking of his land and of his fortune. That inheritance of mine has been growing with me myself, during my minority. But he left me more. His own guilt and that of his fathers, that dark shadow which they cast wherever they walked—that, too, is an inheritance which may also have been growing until today."

"Until today?" she asked.

He caught the vague echo of resentment in her voice—their happy day together darkened by ancient incomprehensible shadows. His heart ached a little at it.

"Listen," he said. "I have never spoken to you of my father. Today if you would hear me, I should like to speak of him.

"I have never seen his face or heard his voice, yet in my small world when I was a child he was ever with me. His portrait on the wall showed the face of a handsome, gallant, gay gentleman, and the people round me have talked to me of him as your mother did to you for who speaks ill to a child of his dead father? How did it then happen that this dead father came to his child a dark figure looming over the little boy, wrapped in a black cloak of guilt, gloom and shame, formidable? Yet I was never afraid of him. It does, I believe, happen like that with children: the grown-up people will tell them of a troll or hobgoblin, and the child will become familiar with the troll and will, in its own way, make it belong to him. In the peaceful house, filled with gentle women, my father and I belonged to each other, and if he was formidable I was formidable as well.

"As I grew older," he continued, "and of my own or by the hand of my tutor began to think and reason more abstractly, my idea of a moral order of the world, of right and wrong and of justice, all grouped themselves round his figure as if they did indeed come to me through him. It was then that I realized the nature of our partnership. He had a claim on me: there was something that I must do for him; he required me to pay his debt.

"As then I read the story of Orestes, I reflected how much easier was his task than mine, since he had a virtuous father to revenge. As I was taught my catechism, the words that stuck in my mind were these, 'I am in my father and my father is in me.'

"In the end, five years ago, when I was eighteen and his land and fortune were given into my hands, when I was known to the world no longer as Master Eitel but by the name of my fathers, it became clear to me what I had to do. So I made up my mind to go to foreign countries, there to study how to make the lot of the people on my land happier.

"This is what I have thought of, Ulrikke," he continued. "The Christian religion will tell us of our duty toward our brothers and our neighbors, the people living round us today. It bids us take up the cause of the abandoned, the destitute and the downtrodden among them. It was first preached by artisans and fishermen.

"But there is another kind of religion which speaks not of brothers or neighbors but of fathers and sons. It proclaims our duty toward the past, and it bids us take up the cause of the dead. To that religion the nobleman is priest. And for this reason are we noblemen and bear old names, for this reason is the land given into our hands: that the past, and the dead, may put their trust in us. My brother or my neighbor, after all, if I strike him may return the blow, and the oppressed around us, if too hard tried, may rebel. But if we are not there, who will look after the past? And who will then be abandoned and destitute and in very truth downtrodden as the dead? For this reason do I bear my father's old name, which has been known in the country for many centuries, that my dead father in his grave, who can trust in no one else, may trust in me.

"To cut away from the past," he said very slowly, as if to himself, "to annihilate it, is the vilest of all breaches of the laws of the cosmos. It is ingratitude, and running away from your debt. It is suicide: you are annihilating yourself in it. I have heard it said, or have read somewhere," he added and smiled a little, "that a thing is not true until it is twenty-five years old—almost my own age. I shall not, at the moment when I have become, truthfully, what I am, in cutting off my roots, turn myself into a shadow, into nothingness.

"You tell me," he went on, "that it is not out of love for my people that I am working, and you are right. For in this I am doing the work of my father. I will him to be able to speak someday to the man he wronged, 'Now your death has been paid for, Linnert.' I have been told—a very long time ago, and I do not remember by whom—that for eleven years, the last eleven years of my father's life, the peasants on his land did not speak his name, but in speaking of him used other names, of their own invention. I will them to name him again, someday, as they say, 'The son of this man dealt fairly with us and was just to us.'

"There can be," he said after a while, "there can be no lawful love between me and them while they do still fear and distrust my father in me. And I cannot allow them to touch me while I still know them to be shrinking from his blood within my veins. When I have paid off my father's debt, it will be time for me to stretch out my hand and let them kiss it."

"I do not think, though," said Ulrikke, "that any of the families round here are afraid of your father's name or of his blood. If you had not gone away to foreign countries, while we were both so young, I think that Papa and Mama would have been well pleased to have you and me marry. I was told that they did indeed talk about it, even before you were born."

He sat silent, once more checked in his course of thought by her mysterious lightheartedness. Her words brought him back to Germany and to the time, five years ago, when letters from home had informed him that she was married. Until that hour he had felt sure that he and she belonged to each other, and had been too simple to know or to reckon with the forces which had stepped in and had carried her off. Later on, after his return to Denmark, he had understood. Her mother, a beauty and bel-esprit of European fame, at this time had had her eyes opened to the fact that her daughter was nineteen years and sweet and graceful, and in haste—in jealousy, or in a fit of wild motherly tenderness, and in order to save that daughter from her own tempest-tossed career—had married off the maiden to an old man. Now, for a few moments, he called to mind those dark nights in which, from his wet, burning pillow, he had stormed against the gods, and had seen the playmate of his childhood as the central figure in a classic group: the white-robed virgin upon the sacrificial altar of a nonhuman power.

But she, who had been the dedicated victim of his picture, today sat in the wood, and talked of their disaster as if it had been the tragedy of a hero and a heroine in a book. For a long time he remained silent, with the ring of her voice in his ear.

"And what was now," she asked, "the story of your father and the peasant? I do not quite remember it. You might tell it to me."

"I have never told it to anyone," he answered.

"Who, then, told it to you yourself?" she asked again.

He searched his mind and was surprised to find that he could not answer her question.

"I do not remember," he said, "that it was ever told to me. I must have heard it when I was a very young child."

"But it has been in your thoughts all your life," said she. "It is time that I should hear it, here in the wood."

It took him some time to fetch up a recollection which was stored so deep down in his being. When at last he spoke, his words came slowly, and more than once in the course of his tale he had to stop to collect his thoughts.

"There was," he began, "on my father's land a peasant named Linnert. He came of a very old peasant family, which had always belonged to us, and it is believed that many hundred years ago the farmstead of his people had stood where our house does today stand, and that the foundations of it were still existing deep down in the ground. Through the ages these peasants had all been handsome, ingenious and deep, and many tales were told about their extraordinary physical strength. For these reasons my own people had been proud of them—such as you said just now that the old lords of the land would be proud of their peasants—yet none of them had ever been in service in our house. This Linnert was born the same year as my father, and since my father had no brothers or sisters, the peasant boy was taken on as a playfellow to him.

"Now," he went on slowly, "in telling you this tale of mine I can give you no explanation why things in it happened the way they did. I have tried to find an explanation. I have been wondering if there might be found, deep down, some reason for the happenings. I have imagined that there might be a woman at the bottom of them. For the maidens of that old peasant stock were cow-eyed and red-lipped, as its young men were hardy and chaste, and my father was a lusty youth, and might well have cast his eye upon a pretty girl on his own estate. But I have found nothing of the kind, nothing at all. I can only, in going through my story, state that things happened in this way—that it was so.

"There was at that time," he took up his account, "south of the manor house and overlooked by its windows, a stretch of grassland on which the peasants' cattle were wont to graze together with my father's. Later on, the peasants ceased to bring their cattle there, and my father had the land included into the park.

"Now one summer the rain failed, the grazing dried up, and the peasants suffered much loss. My father himself had to take home his young stock to feed it in the byre, and upon this occasion his cowmen by mistake took with them a small black bull calf that belonged to Linnert. Linnert on the next day walked up to the manor and claimed his calf back. My father, when it was reported to him, laughed. Linnert, he declared, was a clever fellow, to charge his master's cowmen with theft, and so increase his stock. He would have to be rewarded for his inventiveness. So my father had a fine big calf brought from his own byre and handed over to Linnert. Here, he made his people tell him, he had his calf back. But the peasant refused to take it, declaring that it was not his, and remained standing by the byre all day waiting for his own calf.

"Next morning my father had a fine young bullock led down to Linnert's lot and once more made his cowmen tell the peasant that here he had his calf back. But it fell out as the first time. Linnert came back with the bullock on a rope. 'This fat young bullock is not mine,' he said. 'There shall be justice on earth. My small calf was not half so big, nor half so handsome. Give me back the small black bull calf of mine.' And just as the day before, he remained standing in the farmyard till late in the evening, waiting for his calf.

"My father by that time had a very magnificent full-grown bull, which he had bought at a high price in Holstein, but the animal was vicious and had gored a cowman to death. His neighbors had warned him that he would have to part with it, but he had answered them that he did still have people on his land who could manage a bull. Now he bade three men—for a lesser number dared not take on the job—to lead the bull down to Linnert's byre, and sent a message with them. 'If this

Woman's 'Difficult Days' and Her Perspiration Problems

Doctors tell why her underarm perspiration problems increase during monthly cycle. What can be done about it?

Valda Sherman

Science has now discovered that a thing called "emotional perspiration" is closely linked to a woman's "difficult days." So much so that during this monthly cycle her underarm perspiration problems are not only greater but more embarrassing.

You see, "emotional perspiration" is caused by special glands. They're bigger and more powerful. And when they're stimulated they literally pour out perspiration. It is this kind of perspiration that causes the most offensive odor.

New Scientific Discovery

Science has found that a woman needs a special deodorant to counteract this "emotional perspiration" and stop offensive stains and odor. And now it's here . . . a deodorant with an exclusive ingredient specifically formulated to maintain effectiveness even at those times of tense emotion . . . during "difficult days" when she is more likely to offend.

It's wonderful new ARRID CREAM Deodorant, now fortified with amazing Perstop,* the most remarkable antiperspirant ever developed! So effective, yet so gentle.

Used daily, ARRID with Perstop* penetrates deep into the pores and stops "emotional perspiration" stains and odor . . . stops it as no roll-on, spray or stick could ever do!

You rub ARRID CREAM in . . . you rub perspiration out. Rub ARRID CREAM in . . . rub odor out.

Twice as effective as roll-ons

Doctors have proved ARRID is more effective than any cream, twice as effective as any roll-on or spray tested. And yet ARRID CREAM Deodorant is so gentle, antiseptic, non-irritating . . . completely safe for normal underarm skin.

So . . . to be sure you are free of the embarrassment of "emotional perspiration," use this special kind of cream deodorant. ARRID with Perstop* stops perspiration stains . . . stops odor too, not only during the "difficult days" but every day.

Remember, nothing protects you like a cream, and no cream protects you like ARRID. So don't be half safe. Be completely safe. Use ARRID CREAM Deodorant with Perstop* to be sure. Try it today. Buy a jar at any drug or cosmetic counter.

he had the peasant told, 'is your own animal, which I have unlawfully taken from you, it is hereby returned to you with my apology. But if it is not yours, and if you yourself are such a great man as to know that there shall be justice on earth, surely you will be great enough to bring it back to me on Sunday evening.' For Sunday was my father's birthday, and as was his custom he was giving a dinner party to ladies and gentlemen of the neighborhood. And he thought it not impossible that Linnert might indeed bring home the bull before the eyes of his guests.

"All these things happened in the month of August, and for a week the weather had been exceptionally hot and sultry.

"Already on Saturday morning, while my father was being powdered, the people in the farmyard cried out loudly, 'Here comes Linnert riding on the Holstein bull!' My father ran to the window to see a sight, the like of which he had never seen, for Linnert came through the farmyard gate and up the courtyard, astride the bull as if he had been a hack. The bull was covered with dust and froth, his sides went in and out like a pair of bellows, and blood ran from his nose. But Linnert sat up straight on his back, his head high. He reined up his mount in front of the tall stone stair just as my father came out of the front door, his head only half powdered.

"'You are the bonny horseman,' my father cried, 'and I shall have you rechristened, for a peasant's name no longer befits you, but you will have to be named after him who brought the wild bull of Crete alive to Peloponnesus!' He took a step down the stair and added, 'But why do you come today? I bade you come tomorrow, when I should have had all the fine people of the isle here to see you.' 'I thought,' Linnert answered, 'that when your bull and I had got you to look at us, we needed no more people.' My father went down the last steps. 'Then this is like one of our earliest games,' he said, 'and I shall drink a cup of wine with you, Linnert, and have you take home the silver cup filled with rigsdalers.' 'And one of our last games, I think,' said Linnert. And with that he did indeed turn the bull and make him walk down the courtyard to the byre door. My father had his powdering finished.

"But one hour later the cowherd came up from the byre and reported that the bull had died. As the herd had set him in his stall, the blood had run thicker from his nose, he had sunk on his knees, and a little later he had laid his head on the floor. And then he had died.

"'And what is Linnert doing,' my father asked, 'for whom I have been waiting here to drink with him?' The cowman answered that Linnert, just like the other day, was waiting in the farmyard.

"My father had Linnert brought before him.

"'You have ridden a bull to death,' he said. 'It is a deed of which people will be talking for a hundred years to come. If now he is your own bull, it is all your own affair, and the meat and the hide will be yours. But if the bull was mine, you will have to pay me for him. To whom of us, now, did the bull belong?' 'It was not my bull,' Linnert answered, 'and I did not come up here to get a bull, but to have justice.' 'You shame me, Linnert,' said my father, 'for I thought that in you I had not only a strong man, but a shrewd one. But here you tell me that I have given you more than your due, and yet you go on asking me for what I cannot give you, seeing that it is not to be found on earth. Now I ask you again, for the last time: To whom of us did the bull belong?' Linnert answered, 'That big bull was yours, and it is the small black bull calf that is mine.' 'Have it your own way,' said my father. 'You have then killed my best bull on me, and you will have to pay for it. And since you are so keen on riding, you shall ride once more today.'

"The timber mare, which had not been used for many years, was still standing in front of the barn. My father had Linnert lifted onto it. It was a hot day, and in the course of the afternoon it grew still hotter. When the shadow of the barn reached the timber mare, my father had it dragged out into the sun."

Eitel for a moment stopped in his tale. "My father," he repeated, "had it dragged out of the shadow into the sun.

"It was the habit of my father," he again took up the story, "in the afternoon to go for a ride in the fields. As this afternoon he passed the timber mare and the man upon it, he pulled up his horse. 'Say the word, Linnert,' he said. 'When you call to mind that the bull was yours, my men will take you down.' Linnert answered not a word, and my father lifted his hat to him and rode out of the yard.

"Once more, as my father came back from his ride, he stopped by the timber mare. 'Have you had enough, Linnert?' he asked. 'Yes, I believe that I have had enough,' the peasant answered. At that my father had him lifted off the timber mare.

"'Are you then,' he asked him, 'going down on your knees to kiss my hand and thank me for my mercy?' 'Nay, not that,' answered Linnert. 'My small black calf I could touch and smell, but I smell no mercy on your hand.' At that same moment the clock on the stable struck six strokes. 'Then set him up again,' said my father, 'and let him sit until he splits in two.'

"As now the dusk fell," Eitel continued, "my father looked out of the window and saw that the peasant had fallen upon his face on the plank. 'Go, Per,' he said to his valet, 'and have Linnert taken down.' The valet returned. 'They have taken down Linnert,' he said. 'He is dead.'

"It was found that the bull had gored Linnert and broken two of his ribs. There was blood standing under the timber mare.

"This matter became known and talked about, and it caused my father some trouble. For things were no longer, in his days, what they had been in the days of my grandfather or my great-grandfather, when the masters could do as it pleased them with their servants. A complaint was put before the king himself. But my father had not known that the man had been gored by the bull. And so in the end no more was done about it."

"That is how it happened," said Eitel. "I have told you the story you wished to hear."

Both the young people were silent for a while. "But that story," said Ulrikke, "happened many years before you were born."

"Yes," said Eitel. "It happened ten years before I was born."

"How is it then," she asked, "that you come to think of it today?"

"I can tell you that too," said he. "I have come to think of it today because this morning I was told that the grandson of the peasant Linnert had been sentenced to death for the double murder of a keeper and his boy, and is to have his head cut off in Maribo tomorrow, at noon."

She shuddered slightly at the gruesome news. "Alas, poor creature," said she. "But what," she asked after a moment, "has that got to do with your father and the peasant?"

"I shall go on with my story," said Eitel, "and tell you what it has got to do with my father and the peasant.

"As you know," he said, "my mother was gentle and kind to everyone. She had, I believe, been grieving over this matter, although it happened ten years before she was married to my father. It came to pass about the time when I was born that Linnert's daughter was left a widow with a babe at her breast, for the peasants, as you know, marry young, and Linnert by the time of his death had been married for ten years. My mother then may have bethought herself of the old story. For she sent for the peasant woman who, like herself, was nineteen years old, and took her on as a nurse to her own child. I have been told that my mother's lady friends did warn her, fearing that Lone might have kept her own father's death in mind, and now might be hard to my father's child. But my mother answered them that she thought too well of human nature to fear any such thing. If that was finely spoken, it was a fine thing as well that her trust was never betrayed. I told you, just now, that in my life I had loved one human being besides you. It was of this woman, of Lone, that I was thinking."

"Is she still alive?" Ulrikke asked. "And is it for her sake—poor woman—that you grieve today?"

"Yes," he answered, "as far as I know she is still alive. She stayed with us until I was seven years old, and they took on a tutor for me. Then she married our parish clerk, and later on she went with him to Fünen. Yes, it is for her sake, too, that I grieve today.

"For in telling you of Lone," he went on, "I am, as I said just now, only going on with my story. Lone was well treated in our house, she had fine clothes and a pretty room next to the housekeeper, and among all the servants she was my mother's favorite. And Lone repaid my mother's kindness according to her means. Those two young widows, the mistress and the servant woman, were, I believe, truly devoted to each other. When my mother died, Lone, they say, did not speak a word for a week, so deep was her sorrow. My mother's friends by that time had had to take back their words of misgiving about the peasant woman: when I grew up so strong, they now said, it was Lone's milk that I had to thank for it, it was Linnert's strength that she was passing on to the child she nursed, and I, too, might come to ride home a bull someday! I have not thought of Lone for a long time; today I have thought of her. She was always with me, since my mother was too delicate to have me about her, and I have seen her in my mind like a big hen covering me with her warm wings, sitting by my bedside when I was ill and concocting strange sweet and bitter medicines for me, and I have remembered the songs that she sang and the fairy tales that she told me. For in her family they all had a gift for poetry, and the young men made up ballads, as the old women preserved the myths and legends of the isle."

"We ought to be grateful to Lone then, you and I," Ulrikke said gently.

"Yes, we may well be so," said Eitel, "you and I. But there is one more character in the story, and he has no reason to be grateful to anyone. Those happy years of mine were not happy to Lone's own son."

"Her own son?" she asked.

"Yes," said he, "the one who is to end his life tomorrow at Maribo. I have known little about him. Lone can never have spoken his name to me; he was named after her own father: Linnert. Today I have asked people about him, and have found out more. Lone, I was told, sent him away, a long way off. She was loyal to her duties, and may have feared that the nearness of her own child might make her less zealous in fulfilling them. While he was still a child, he became shepherd boy on a farm of which they tell me that the farmhands were starved and eaten up by vermin. When he grew up he was apprenticed to a keeper at another place, and that was the ruin of him, for there he learned to handle a gun, and so took to poaching. I was told that he was ever a wild boy, given to drink and brawls. And now in the end he has become a manslayer and has forfeited his life.

"It is because of this boy that I have today dug the old peasants out of their graves and brought them with us into the wood. Or they may themselves have risen from the grave and have come with us, because this my milk brother is so soon to join them there.

"You once believed, you tell me," he said with a faint smile, "that the Lord God, were He to create a juster world, might deign to choose me to assist Him. But it looks to me now as if the Lord God, through all this, has meant to impress on me that an injustice once done can never again be rightened. My

(Prize-winner in 11th Pillsbury Bake-Off)

1 1/4 cups sifted Pillsbury's BEST All-Purpose Flour
3/4 tsp. soda
1/2 tsp. salt
1 1/4 cups dates, cut in pieces
3/4 cup firmly packed brown sugar
1/2 cup water
1/2 cup butter
1 cup (6 oz. pkg.) Nestlé's Semi-Sweet Morsels
2 unbeaten eggs
1/2 cup orange juice
1/2 cup milk
1 cup chopped walnuts

Sift flour with soda and salt. Combine dates, brown sugar, water, butter in large saucepan. Cook over low heat, stirring constantly, until dates soften. Remove from heat. Stir in Chocolate Morsels; beat in eggs. Add dry ingredients alternately with orange juice and milk. Blend thoroughly after each addition. Stir in walnuts. Bake in well-greased 15x10x1-inch jelly roll pan at 350°F. for 25 to 30 min. Cool; spread with glaze. Cut in bars.

Orange Glaze

1 1/2 cups sifted confectioners' sugar
2 tbs. soft butter
1 to 2 tsp. grated orange rind
2 to 3 tbs. cream

Combine sugar, butter and orange rind. Blend in cream until of spreading consistency.

mother wished to righten an injustice when she took Linnert's daughter into her house and made the peasant woman her friend, but all the good she did thereby was to take away the very mother's milk from that woman's own child. I myself have dreamt that with my own life and my own blood—a nobler blood, in spite of all—I might wash away the blood that ran under the timber mare. But it has all come to this: that more of that same blood will be running at Maribo tomorrow. All my life I have felt my father to be a prisoner in the chains of guilt and hate, and I have believed that the moment would come when I would hear him say to me, 'It was well that you set me loose.' But when, now, will these words be spoken?"

"Oh, Eitel," said Ulrikke, "we cannot tell. There may be another justice than ours, which in the end will set all things right."

"Think you so?" he said, and after a moment: "Listen now. This morning a rumor spread that the prisoner had escaped from prison. I thought then that he might look me up, to lay his curse on me and on my father's memory. If he had come—if he comes tonight—can I comfort him with the words with which you try to comfort me: 'There may be another justice than ours, which in the end will set all things right'?"

Once more there was a long silence. In the midst of it, suddenly, the quick persistent little tap of a woodpecker was heard in a tree close by.

"I know the one of whom you are speaking," said Ulrikke.

He tore himself from his train of thought. "You know him?" he asked in surprise.

"Aye," she said. "Once upon a time we were friends. I was a girl of thirteen, and it was to our keeper at home that he was apprenticed. I now understand that it must have been the same boy, for his name was Linnert. I was alone at home that summer; Mama was in Weimar. He and I were often together in the wood. We searched for birds' nests, and he taught me to imitate the cuckoo so that I could call it to me, and to troat to a buck. Nobody knew of it. I remember that I once tucked up my skirts and walked with him hand in hand down the brook, all the way from where it runs into the wood to where it comes out of it. He was strong and light of movement, and he had the thickest, softest hair. Once," she went on, her voice clear and happy at the memory, "he fell down from a tall tree and scratched his face, because he would not let go a wood pigeon's nest and eggs that I had wanted to get. We walked down to the brook, so that he could wash off the blood, and there, all of a sudden, he dropped down as if he were dead. I sat with his head in my lap, there in the wood."

She sat sunk in her own thoughts, gazing into the distance.

"I gave him a kiss," she said, "when he woke up. His skin was as smooth as my own. I said to him, 'You must never cut off your hair, and you must never grow a beard.'"

It was as if in her words she had held a flower to her face. A queer little pang of jealousy was in the sweet smell of it. He looked at her, took in her person and poise. A hundred kisses he had had from those red lips. Well, twelve years ago the lost, bleeding boy had had one too. Tomorrow the head which had lain in her lap was to be cut off by the executioner; he would lift it up to the crowd to see by that pretty hair which was never to be cut off.

"When I imagined," he said, "that the hour was to come when I might say, 'Now your death has been paid for, Linnert,' I was thinking of the man whom my father killed. I have known nothing till today of young Linnert. I tell myself, now, that that hour will never come, but that, instead, this boy will be passing sentence on me."

She turned toward him, gave him in one single movement her whole face, the dark smiling eyes and the trembling lips.

"On you!" she cried. "When I love you!"

She sank from the fence into his embrace, like a flower turned by the wind. They lay breast to breast, and the moment closed over their heads like a wave of the sea, washing away past and future. She lightly put two fingers under his chin and lifted up his face.

"Oh, you upholder of the past!" she said. "Soon, soon all these things round us will be things of the past. Soon, soon I shall be poor old Great-grandmother Ulrikke, who is now in the churchyard, but who did once meet her lover in the wood. Did her lover love her there?"

"Did he love her there?" he whispered down into her hair. "Paradise, to him, was in her arms!"

"Alas," she whispered back against his collarbone. There was a laughter and a sign in the whisper. In such a way smiled and sighed the famous beauties of that great world which was hers by birthright, but which she had never known, because she was a flower grown up in the shade. In her lover's arms, in jest, she mimicked those heroines whom her mother worshiped and imitated.

"Why does my heart sigh?" he asked.

"Alas," she whispered once more. "Paradise! People like you will never go to paradise. You will only be happy in hell."

Now it was he who tenderly forced her face up. "What do you mean, sweet?" he asked.

She looked him in the eyes solemnly and archly. "Oh, yes," she whispered as before, "there you would be at peace to forget all about your justice. For there nothing can become any worse than it is. And there nobody will be any worse off than you yourself."

Once more she laid her face on his shoulder. He would have spoken, but her nearness, the light weight of her body against his own, overthrew his reasoning. The silent forest depths all around him, and her own deep silence so close to his heart, became one to him, and unresistingly he let himself sink into them.

A while after she said, "I must go," and did up her hair.

She had insisted on giving suck herself to her youngest child, her lover's daughter, and now the child was drawing her back to it by invisible bonds.

As she put in her comb she said, "You know that Mama is staying with us?"

He said, "I shall walk with you as far as the forest gate."

They walked together, happily, without words. By the forest gate she turned round to him. "Remember," she said, commandingly and imploringly, her eyes at the moment of parting filled with tears, "you are to live."

He, who remained leaning on the gate in the deep green shade, let his gaze follow the white figure as it walked on lightly and grew smaller. Is she thinking of me at all? he wondered.

The great park of the house joined the wood; the tall forest trees gradually withdrew to give place to lawns, shrubs, gravel paths and flower beds. The mistress of the garden followed the path leading to the house.

Afternoon sun and shade shared the garden between them. Crimson and purple asters glowed in the beds. Two gardener's boys were raking the paths; the old head gardener himself from a distance caught sight of his lady, took off his cap and approached to show her a big scarlet-and-yellow dahlia, which he himself had forced and now wanted to name after her. She praised the flower and fastened it in her fichu. By the big garden stair her small son freed himself from the hand of his nurse and ran to meet her. As she lifted him up he grasped at the bright flower at her breast. She teased the child with the flower, brushing his face with it and holding it up out of his reach. When he sulked she pressed him to her, patted his cheek and pulled his hair. But she did not kiss him; her lips still belonged to the wood. She handed him over to his nurse, and hastened on, impatient in her errand.

As an hour later she entered her mother's rooms she found the curtains drawn, tables and chairs covered with a multitude of scattered garments, and her mother herself in violent agitation pacing the floor like a lioness in her cage. For a moment the older woman stared, as if horrified, at the younger. Immediately after she hurried toward her, broke down altogether and wailed low. Ulrikke looked round the room for the cause of her mother's despair. The lovely Sibylla had put on a long, floating riding habit of black velvet with a short coat of green cloth to it, and had not been able to button the coat.

"Oh, Rikke," the mother cried out, "I have grown old."

In a sudden fierce movement she turned to her own image in the long, dim looking glass within the darkened room. The curls of the image were tousled and its face was swollen with weeping. Accusingly the woman of flesh and blood cried out to it in a low hoarse voice, "I was lovely once!"

Ulrikke in general would find words of comfort when her mother bewailed the loss of her great beauty. Today she said nothing, but only clasped the doleful figure in her arms, holding her so close that she could not again gaze into the glass.

"If I had grown thin!" Sibylla moaned on her daughter's breast. "If I had become a skeleton, a skull, a memento mori to the trivial crowd, who refuse to think of time or eternity! Then I should still be an inspiring figure to them! And upon my entrance into a ballroom I should still strike sparks from them all: epigrams, poems, heroic deeds—and oh, passion as well. I should at least inspire them with horror, Rikke, and I should expect to inspire horror. But I am fat!"

The fatal word, actually pronounced, struck her dumb for a few moments.

"It is not death," she again took up her theme, this time speaking slowly and solemnly, "it is not death which I do personify to them. It is dissolution and decomposition. There is an odious abundance of this body, which was once so perfect in its proportions. There is too much of these arms, these hips, these thighs—of this bosom! Rikke, my bosom makes people laugh!

"If a human being had done this to me," she cried out suddenly, "I should have had my revenge; I should have had the men who adored me stand up to revenge such cruelty. For picture to yourself what it means: to take a young woman—happy, innocent, trustful—and slowly, slowly to draw out her teeth and her hair, dim her eyes, distort her body, crack her skin and her voice, and then to exhibit her to the world as if all naked—'Voilà la belle Hélène!' It is not right! It is not just! There is no justice on earth!"

The aging lionne had drawn the curtains of her window, because powder and rouge no longer sufficed to hide the decay of her loveliness. She, who had loved sunlight and candlelight and the light of surprise and adoration in all human eyes that met her own, now like a hunted animal fled from all light, took cover in a dark room, and within the darkness raved about a future among the blind.

In her daughter's arms she still held herself back, a hard-tightened knot. She felt the warmth and strength of the young body so close to her own, shut her eyes and groped for a way out of her misery. Her friends, other ladies of her own age, did find comfort, she knew, in the youth and happiness of their daughters. Could she possibly do the same thing? The answer came immediately: No. She divined that Ulrikke had a lover, and before today she had wondered whether the harmony of a youthful idyll might have power to turn her mind from the disharmony of her own stormy, insecure affairs of the heart. The answer, now as before, came immediately: No. In growing distress she asked herself whether this incapacity might be her punishment because five years ago she had deliberately sold the girl's happiness for a short postponement of her own death sentence.

And would I then, she asked in her heart, have forgone my respite of five years? Once more the answer came inappealably: No. If today, she said to herself, things were what they then were, I should do as I then did. I could do nothing else. So help me God, I could not! The old nursery tale of the vampire which gets a new lease of life by drinking the blood of young creatures ran in her mind. Bewildered by the idea, she lifted her daughter's hand and set her teeth in one of the slim fingers, then, horror-struck, dropped the hand. She opened big glassy eyes, eyes which had once been sung by great poets, and stared at Ulrikke.

"Oh, you know not," she whispered, "what it is to have been loved with passion, with the proudest that a man has got in him! And then in the end to be loved out of pity. You too," she added, her stiff gaze still on her daughter's face, "you too do love me out of pity!"

Ulrikke went on gently caressing her. Across her mind, like shadows of clouds across a sheet of water, ran the shadows of that woe and fear that seemed to darken the lives of all human beings. In her mother's wild lament at her breast she heard an echo of her small daughter's furious weeping an hour ago, of her lover's melancholy monologue in the wood, and at last of the bitter loneliness, far away, of her doomed playmate. All, all of them seemed to grieve and fear. Was there so much to grieve at and to fear in the world? Was death ever sad and fearful? For the first time in her life she realized that she, too, was to die. But though to the others death seemed to look like a dark bottomless sea, to her herself, she imagined, it would be a shallow water into which she might wade, her skirts tucked up, with a serene face.

What a goose I am, she thought, to give myself up to such silly fancies!

"Oh, what a goose you are, my little Mama," she said, loosening her arms from her mother's form. "You are just as lovely now, when you look like the goddess Juno, as ever you were when you were as slim as a reed! Come, your stays are too tightly laced, let me undo them for you and set you loose!"

As if all the lines of the elder woman's face had been held together by that same silk cord which her daughter was now undoing, they were suddenly smoothed out, and a little childlike smile ran over the face. At the cessation of physical torture her mental misery, too, lessened, and hope rushed to her heart. She might still be loved!

Once more she lifted Ulrikke's hand to touch it with her lips.

"Oh, dear Mama," said Ulrikke, "if today you and I went down to bathe in our old place, where the river bends—as when I was a little girl—the five weeping willows there would, just as then, bend down to kiss your white shoulders. Look," she added, taking her flower from her fichu and fastening it upon the lapel of that same green riding coat which had caused such bitter tears, "this flower old Daniel gave me. It is a new dahlia which he himself has forced. Nobody on the whole isle has got the like of it. He begs you to let him name it after you, 'Sibylla,' because it is so sweet and so big. Gaze at yourself now, gaze at Sibylla! It is truer than that silly glass."

Eitel rode home from the wood across the stubble fields. When he came onto his own land he set his horse into a canter and made it jump some low stacks of rakings.

His mind was still resting in the happiness of the forest meeting, tranquilly, like a trout between two stones in a brook, keeping its stand by the slightest movements of its fins. His eyes strayed over the landscape. By this time flights of wild duck began to draw their thin lines low down on the sky; big, light rosy clouds were towering up above the horizon; far away to the west the sea met the sky in a stripe of grave blue. His ears caught many distant sounds round him: a cart rolling along the road, people shouting as they were driving home their cattle. But he kept his own being collected, he would think of nothing but her.

He called to mind how, three years ago when he and she had met again, they had dreamed of the time when she would once more be free, and to the eyes of all the world the two should belong to each other. Now he no longer knew whether, were that time to come, he should be any happier than he was now. There was infinite sweetness in their secret intimacy. To love her, he thought, to him

PRIZE RECIPES

Easy Lenten dishes with a luxury look and taste

CRABMEAT ROLLS • POLENTA WITH TOMATO SAUCE • CREOLE TUNA CHOWDER

Why not give up routine cheese and fish dishes for Lent in favor of prize meatless creations like these? By using Heinz-made foods as ingredients, you can clear your culinary decks for the more creative part of cooking! You'll fix Creole Tuna Chowder in minutes with the help of two ready-prepared Heinz favorites—saucy Heinz Macaroni Creole and Heinz Condensed Cream of Mushroom Soup (so good it's often used undiluted as a heated sauce for fish or vegetables). You'll enrich and spice Crabmeat Rolls by the simple addition of the world's favorite tomato flavor, Heinz Ketchup! And you'll cut the time it takes to make Polenta with Tomato Sauce by using better-tasting Heinz Condensed Tomato Soup. It blesses the delicious result with its own ruddy color and subtle seasonings.
P.S. We'll wager you'll give these enticing dishes a big play long after Lent.

CRABMEAT ROLLS

from Mrs. Virginia Drake, Fort Lauderdale, Florida

Thin Pancakes—Combine ⅔ cup sifted, all-purpose flour, ½ tsp. salt, 1 egg, ⅔ cup milk, 1 Tbs. melted butter or margarine. Beat until smooth. Using 3 Tbs. batter for each pancake, bake 6 thin cakes on hot greased griddle.

Filling—Combine 1 egg and ½ cup rich, spicy Heinz Ketchup. Add ½ cup soft bread crumbs, 2 Tbs. minced onion, 1 Tbs. minced parsley, 2 tsp. clear, sparkling Heinz Vinegar (preferably delicate, herb-flavored Tarragon), ⅛ tsp. hot pepper sauce, 1½ cups flaked fresh or canned crabmeat. Spread ¼ cup mixture on each pancake. Roll up jelly-roll fashion. Secure with toothpick. Place rolls in greased baking dish. Sprinkle with grated Parmesan cheese. Bake 10 min. in 400°F. oven. Serve hot with topping of sour cream. (Makes 6 servings.)

from Mrs. B. D. Berry, Monroe, Louisiana

Combine ¾ cup corn meal and 2 cups milk in saucepan. Cook over medium heat, stirring frequently, until mixture comes to a boil. Boil 3 min. Remove from heat. Beat in 1 egg. Stir in ½ cup grated Parmesan cheese, 2 Tbs. salad oil, 1 tsp. salt, ⅛ tsp. pepper. Spread in 10″ by 6″ by ½″ baking dish. Sprinkle with 1 cup grated Swiss cheese. Combine 1 clove minced garlic, ½ cup chopped onion, 1 can (10¾ oz.) Heinz Condensed Tomato Soup, 2 Tbs. water, 1 tsp. Heinz Vinegar, ½ tsp. salt, ⅛ tsp. pepper. Spoon over cheese. Bake at 375° F. 40 min. Let stand 10 min. (Makes 6 servings.)

CREOLE TUNA CHOWDER

Blend 2 cans (10½-oz. size) Heinz Condensed Cream of Mushroom Soup with 1½ soup cans of water in saucepan. Add a 15¼-oz. can of mouth-watering Heinz Macaroni Creole Style with Mushrooms and a 6½-oz. can tuna, which has been drained and flaked. Heat to boiling point, stirring occasionally. Serve with crackers or crusty French bread. (Makes 6 servings.)

A perky butter sauce for baked or broiled fish is made by combining equal amounts of butter or margarine and the liquid from Heinz Sweet Pickles or Heinz Dill Pickles. Add a generous dash of marjoram. Heat until butter is melted. (Also a wonderful way to sauce broccoli, carrots or beets!)

was like washing his face and hands, or like diving down, in a clear, evenly running stream, which was ever renewing itself, and it was fitting that his path to the stream and his bathing place itself should be hidden to all the world.

When above the trees he caught sight of the tall roof and proud gables of his house, he slowed down his steaming mount. He did not ride up the broad stately lime avenue to the courtyard, but took the narrower poplar avenue which led to the farmyard. Here ears, straw and thistledown from the harvesting lay in the deep wheel tracks and stuck high up in the branches of the poplars.

Within the house, in the long library, the light of the sunset fell through the windows as the light of the afternoon had been falling through the tree crowns onto the spot where they had been sitting together. The old oak floors shone in it like dark forest pools; the gilt frames of the portraits, the tints of silk and velvet became alive and luminous like tree stems, foliage and mosses. This last deep glow of the day was her trembling smile at their parting, her compassion and the promise of a next meeting.

He was shortly expecting a visit of a learned old man from Copenhagen, a prophet of the new reforms, and was looking forward to their talk together. When he had had supper he told his young German valet, whom he had brought with him from Hannover, that he was not to be disturbed, and fetched down a number of heavy books to look up such matters as he would discuss with his guest. He could still, in the window recess, read by the last daylight, and he sat down with a book on his knee and other books on the window sill.

While he was reading, his valet came into the room to place a three-armed candlestick on the table, remained standing by it and announced,

"There is a person outside who asks to have speech with gnädiger Herr."

His master did not look up from his book. "It is late," he said after a moment.

"That is what I said myself," said the valet. "But this person has come afoot, in great haste, and will not be turned off."

Eitel closed his book and again was silent. "Let him come in then," he said at last.

"It is a woman, gnädiger Herr," Johann said. "She tells me her name is Lone Bartels. The housekeeper seems to know her, and assures me that she has once been in service in the house."

"A woman," said Eitel. "Lone Bartels. Bring her in."

Presently he heard his old housekeeper talking lowly to somebody outside the door. It was opened, and his guest entered.

She dropped a curtsy by the door and stood still there. She was not dressed like a peasant woman, but had on a white cap and a black silk apron, beneath which she kept her hands. She was a heavy woman with a pale, as if mealy skin, a parish clerk's wife, who had not needed to do hard work. She looked straight at him.

He had felt an immediate deep relief and happiness on learning the name of his visitor of this late hour. But as now his and Lone's eyes met, against all reason he was seized with a kind of cold, deadly fear, which made his hair stand on end. It was not, here, a distressed mother come to plead for the life of her son. It was the old dark ages, eternity, destiny itself entering his room.

He was terrified at his own terror. Only after a long silence did he take a step toward the woman before him. And when the candlelight was no longer between him and her, he recognized the face once so well known, and beloved by the child above all other human faces. Almost without knowing what he did, he folded her in his arms, he felt her big soft body filling them, and smelled her clothes. It was as if he had lain at her breast yesterday.

"So you have come to me, Lone," he said, surprised at the sound of his own voice, which rang almost like the voice of a child.

"Yes," said the woman. "Now I have come."

She spoke as in old days, low and slowly. During her years in a nobleman's house she had laid off her peasant's dialect, she spoke like an educated woman. They looked each other in the face.

"It is good that you have come," said he.

"I wished to see my dear master," said she.

"Nay, Lone," said he, "do not call me master. Say 'Eitel' as you did in the old days."

A faint, slow blush mounted into her pale face. Otherwise it remained immovable, the lips pressed together, the eyes very clear.

"How is it with you, Lone?" he asked.

"Now it is well with me," she said and drew her breath deeply. "Now that I see you again."

The familiar ring of devotion in her voice went to his heart. And at the same moment his sudden deep terror at her arrival was explained to him. It was she, he now knew, who long, long ago had told him the story of his father and Linnert.

Had she now come to give him the means of making up for it? For a while he kept as still as she. He would allow himself a few minutes in which to speak to her as he had done when he was a child, before he let her name her tragic errand to him.

"You ought to have come earlier," he said. "Why have you not come to see me, Lone, these many years?"

"Nay," she answered, "there was no need for that. I knew that things were going well with you." Her bright eyes did not leave his face. "I have been waiting," she said after a short pause, "to hear that you had married."

"Would that have pleased you, Lone?" he asked.

"Yes, that would have pleased me," she answered.

His thoughts strayed far away, then came back to her.

"But I have had news of you," she said, "every year."

"You have had that?" he asked.

"Why, yes," she answered. "I heard that you had gone far away to foreign countries. Once the weaver from here came to a wedding in Fünen, and he told me that you had become a very learned man. And two years ago you came to Fünen yourself, and bought a pair of horses at Hvidkilde."

"Yes," he said, searching his mind, "I bought the two bay wheelers there."

He led her to a small settee by the wall, beneath the portrait of his father and mother, and sat down with her, her hand in his.

"Aye, you were always the one for horses," said the woman. "When you were a small boy you had a hobbyhorse with you wherever you went."

"I had that, Lone," he said.

"In those days we rode many miles together, you and I," she said and smiled a little without parting the wrinkled lips, "right up to the king's castle. I sewed all your horses for you, out of leather and wool and bits of silk ribbons."

"You did that," Eitel said, his thoughts with those mounts of long ago; if now he searched his memory he would find their names there. "Nobody could do it as well as you."

For a while the two sat silent, hand in hand. He thought, But it is of her son that she means to speak to me.

"You had to have them in bed with you," said Lone, "so that they, too, might listen when I was telling you a story."

"You knew many stories, Lone," he said.

"Do you still remember them?" she asked.

"I think I do," said he.

"It was only this morning," he said after a while, "that I heard of your son, Lone."

She stirred a little in her seat, but did not speak at once. "Yes, now he is to die," she said at last.

This calm, collected resignation moved him, as if he and the humble mother were mourning together over her child.

"He has been in my thoughts all day," he said. "I have considered begging the king's mercy for him in Copenhagen. I would fain have gone to Copenhagen to do so, Lone."

"You would fain have done so?" she said.

"But he is a manslayer, my poor Lone," he said. "He has killed a man. I fear that it would be no good begging the king's mercy for him."

"Yes, he has killed two men," said Lone.

"Then it may be the best thing for him," Eitel said, "to atone for his guilt. Then nobody can bear him any grudge."

"No," she said, "then nobody can bear him any grudge."

"But I can get you leave to see him in prison tomorrow morning," said he.

"That is not needed," said she.

"So you have already seen him there?" he asked.

"No," Lone answered, "I have not seen him there."

"They have not dealt fairly with you, then," said Eitel. "They should have let you see each other, and speak to each other. But I shall go with you to Maribo and see to it that it be done. We will go together tomorrow, you and I."

"We went to Maribo, too," said the woman, "the time we took our rides together."

"In return for that, Lone," he said gently, "should I not now drive you to Maribo, so that you may see your son?"

Once more she waited awhile before answering. "I have not seen him for twenty years," she said.

"Why have you not seen him for twenty years?"

"There was no reason why I should see him," she said.

"How did it come to pass," he said, "that your son did fare so ill?"

"It had to be so, I think," she said.

"But you might have fetched him back when you married and got a house of your own," he said. "Was it your husband who would not let you do so?"

"No, the clerk would have let me do as I liked," said Lone.

"Did you never help him," Eitel asked, his voice low like her own, "when he got into trouble?"

"No," the woman answered.

"You ought to have done so, Lone," he said slowly. "He has been lonely and friendless. I myself ought to have remembered him before today. You were as good to me as if I had been your own child. I should have stood by your son."

"There was no reason why you should do so," said Lone.

He went to the window, but felt her eyes following him and came back to her. He thought, When I heard that she had come, I believed that she had come to judge me. But it is harder still that she should have come to acquit me. "Yet he is still your son, Lone," he said, "be his trespasses ever so grave."

"No," said Lone.

A sort of sorrowful resentment blended with his compassion for the woman. He thought, She cannot lay all this on me. It seemed to him that he must at all costs reawaken in the heart of the mother some kind of love for her doomed son.

"You are a woman, Lone," he said. "You will remember the time that you bore him. He is the child that quickened in your body, even now when he has forfeited his life."

"No, it is not so," she said. "It is you who are my child."

He was so deeply absorbed in his own thoughts that at first he did not hear what she said. It was only when once more he found her eyes upon him that he caught her words.

"Me?" he said, and after a few seconds, "Of what are you speaking, Lone?"

"Aye, now I shall speak the truth," said Lone.

"The truth?" said he.

"Yes," she said. "Linnert is the master's boy. I took away the child and put my own in his stead, when I was giving suck up here."

The door opened, and Eitel's valet came in with the evening wine, as he was wont to do when his master sat up to read. He placed the silver tray on the table, looked at his master and the woman and went out.

When the door had closed behind him, Lone rose, and remained standing up before Eitel.

"I can bear witness to God and man," she said, "that what I have now told you is the truth."

"You do not know what you are saying," he said.

"Yes, I know what I am saying," said she. "Well may I remember the time that I bore you, and the time when you quickened within my body. For you are my child."

He thought, Anguish and distress have upset her reason, and waited a little to find the right words to speak to her.

"It is an ancient nursery tale that you are telling me here, Lone," he said. "The tale of the changelings, so old that one smiles at it. You mean to help your son by telling it me. But you are mistaken. I shall do what I can for him without it."

"It is not to help him that I tell it you," she said. "It is all one to me whether they cut off his head or not."

"Why do you tell it me, then?" he asked.

"I did not know for certain, till the day before yesterday," she answered slowly, "that he was to die. When I knew, I thought, 'Now this has been brought to an end.' And then I came to see you once more."

"Why did you wish to see me once more?" he asked.

"I wished to see how great and happy you were," she answered.

"There is no one in the whole world," she went on, "who has known of this except myself. And now you know too. The clerk has never known of it. I shall not tell it to our parson on my deathbed. But now I have come to tell you how it all happened."

"Nay, you shall tell me nothing," he said. "All this is but what you have dreamt, my poor Lone."

She stood up straight before him.

"I have got no one in the whole world," she said, "to tell it to except you; I have been waiting to do so for twenty-three years. If my tale is not told now, it will never be told."

She brought out her hands from beneath her apron and slowly smoothed it down, and this had been a familiar gesture of hers in his childhood, when he had been obstinate, and she was talking sense to him. "But if it be your wish," she went on, "that I shall go away without saying more, I can do so too."

He was silent for a while. "No," he said. "You may speak, to lighten your heart. I shall hear you." He seated himself in the armchair by the table, but the woman remained standing up.

"Aye, now I shall begin," she said very slowly, "and I shall forget nothing.

"It was on the very first evening that I came up here that I changed the master's child for my own. The child up here had been born three days after mine. He was small, and he cried much. I sat by his cradle and sang to him until I had made him sleep. Then I got up and made up a doll out of a pillow and of silk ribbons in the room, just as later I made up horses for you, and laid it in the cradle, and I drew together the cradle curtains. I told the maid of her sweet ladyship that I was now going home to my own house to fetch my Sunday shawl and two new aprons of mine, but that she was to leave the child alone the while, for now it had been fed and was quiet. But I took the child with me under my cloak and kept it warm, and I could do so because it was so small. On the stair of the western wing I met the housekeeper, and she stopped to talk to me, and asked me if I had got plenty of milk. 'Aye,' I answered her, 'the child that I lay to my breast will thrive, and will not cry.' But I was telling myself as we stood there that if the child now cried, it would be all over with me. But it did not cry, not that time.

"I laid the child in my own old cradle within my own house, but you I took out of it, and I hid you in a basket that I was taking with me and covered you up with my Sunday shawl and two aprons of mine."

"Nay," Eitel interrupted her. "Speak not like that. Speak not, in this tale of yours, the word you."

Lone thought the matter over and again began.

"I laid, then," she said, "my own child, my son, in the basket, and I walked up to the house, and I had to stop from time to time, for my own child was heavier than the other. There was a full moon, so that the road was clear and light all the way.

"The week after," she went on, "the christening was to be held. On that day a lot of great people came to the house, and the old Countess of Krenkerup bore the child to the font. I drove to the church in the same coach as her, with four horses. I held the child on my lap, and only in the porch did I give it over to her. And as now I heard my son christened Eitel after the master's father, and Johann August after the master himself, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, I said to myself, 'Now that is done which cannot be undone.'"

"And why should you have wished it done?" Eitel asked.

Lone laid her right hand upon the table. "For this reason," she said: "When her ladyship first sent for me, to give suck to the child, and I walked up through the farmyard, I passed the timber mare. It was still standing there, in front of the barn. Her sweet ladyship had wanted it taken away, but the master had said no. I had never till that day been up to the house, but as I walked past it, by the side of her ladyship's lackey who had been sent to fetch me, I remembered how, when I myself was ten years old, they had brought back my father from it. And on the evening of the day when my child had been christened in church, when all the fine guests were gone and the house was dark, I once more walked down to it. I laid my right hand upon that hard wood, and spoke to my dead father and said to him, 'Now your death has been paid for, Linnert.'

"And do you believe me now?" she asked.

"No, I do not believe you," he answered. "I could not believe you if I wanted to."

Lone drew her breath deeply, looked round the room and again looked at him.

"This is the one thing that I had never thought of," she said slowly and dully, "that when I told you my tale you were not to believe it. I had thought that you yourself would remember how I carried you from our own house to the house of the master."

She stood sunk in her own thoughts. "That house of the clerk's in Fünen," she went on, "I was never really in it. It seemed to me that all the time I was over here, with you. But it was not in this great house of the master's that we lived together. It was in that old farmhouse of ours, the old people's house, which is standing deep down below. Down there I held you in my arms, and we spoke together sweetly. Is that what you tell me now, that you have never been down there?"

"You know yourself," he answered her, "that I have never been down there."

Eitel rose from his chair. "And if all other things within your tale had been possible," he said, "would it be possible, Lone, that a good woman like you could have behaved so to a friend who trusted you, to my mother?"

Lone took a step toward him, and although she still looked straight at him, she seemed somehow to be groping her way. "Do you call her gracious ladyship your mother even now?" she asked. As she came nearer, he drew back a little, and she followed him slowly in the same half-blind way. "Do you flee me now?" she asked.

He stood still, realizing that he had indeed meant to flee from the woman before him.

"Lone," he said, "once you were dearer to me than any other human being. At this hour it seems to me that you may still be so, aye, as dear as if you were indeed my own mother. Or that I should hold you in horror, like one of the witches in whom old people believe, gloating over a crime against nature, as one mad with wickedness, wishing to drive me mad with her."

So he and the woman remained standing face to face.

"And shall there be no justice on earth?" she at last asked.

"Yes, there shall be justice on earth," he answered.

"But justice," Lone went on in a low wailing voice, "justice, with you and me, cannot mean that when I did carry you up to the house, in danger of my life, so as to give it all to you, it was the house and the people up here who took you over and made me one of theirs! Justice," she wailed on low, her body doubling up as in great pain, "cannot mean that I am never once to call you my son, and never once to hear you call me mother!"

Eitel stood gazing into the woman's pain-quivering face.

I have been off my mind, he thought. I have spoken hard to an old sorrowful peasant woman, who has taken refuge in my house. I have said that I must loathe and fear an old parish clerk's wife from Fünen. He went up to Lone and took her hand.

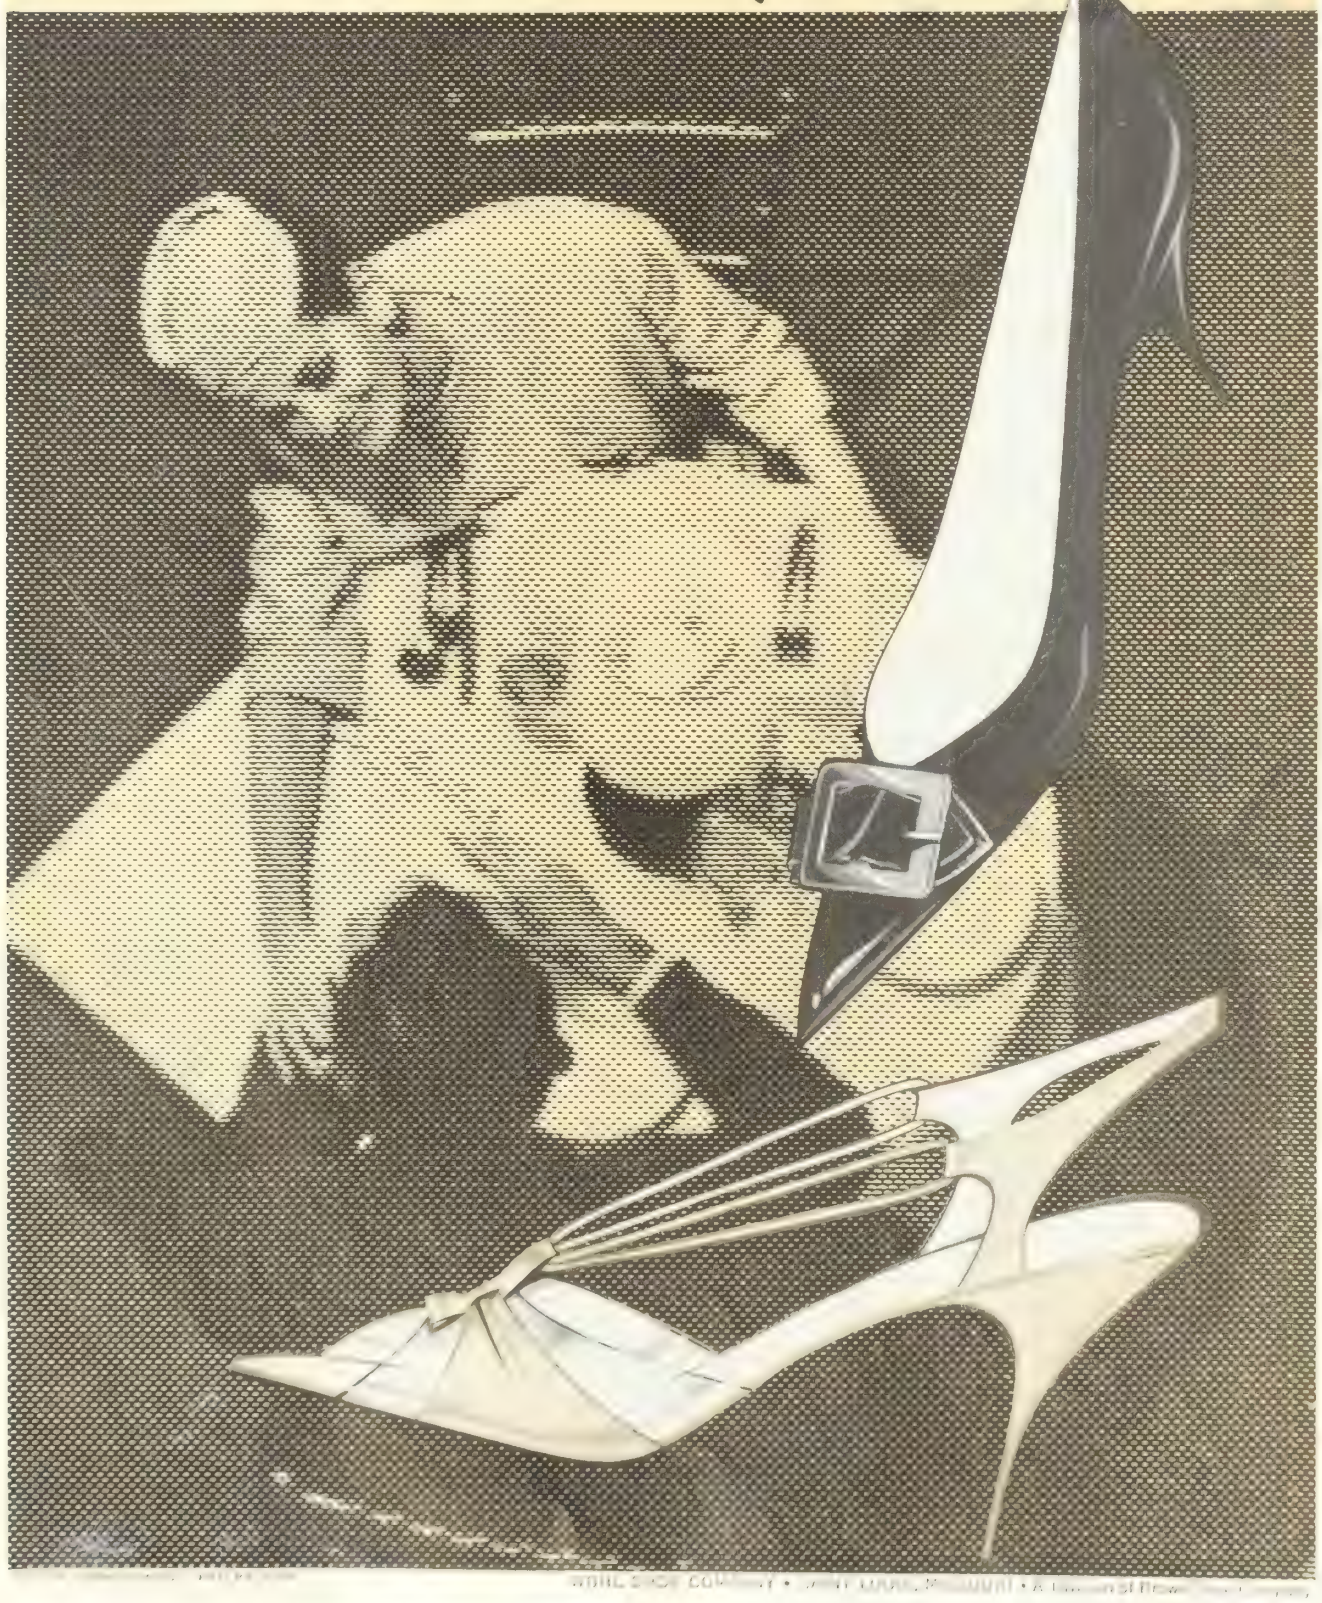
"Yes, my poor Lone," he said, "you are to call me your son, and to hear me call you my mother. We did so many times, years ago. And nothing has changed between you and me since then."



Lone very slowly with her right hand fumbled along his arm from wrist to shoulder and back again, then let the hand sink. "I have come a long way to see you tonight," she said.

"And I have not looked after you, Lone," he said. "You should have had something to eat and drink. Now I shall have it brought for you. You shall sleep tonight in your own room. And tomorrow," he added after a pause, "as I said before, I shall drive with you to Maribo. You shall come back with me from there, to stay in my house as long as you choose."

He stood with her hand in his. Wonderingly he felt, deep down in his mind, a reluctance to put an end to a talk which had been filled with such ugly confusion, and heard, there, a voice cry out sadly, "Never more.

never more." He put off the parting for a moment.

"At this time of night, Lone," he said, "it happened that I would wake up from a bad dream. Then you would sing to me till I fell asleep again. I remember now, too, that one of the horses which you made for me was sewn of crimson silk, with a mane of gold fringe from one of my father's court coats, and that his name was Guldfaxe."

"Yes, that was his name," said Lone.

Her eyes still met his, but they were now without expression, the eyes of a blind woman.

After a long silence she whispered, "May you sleep well."

"And you, Lone, little mother," he said.

He listened to her steps down the long corridor.

When the sound had died away, he took the heavy candlestick from the table, walked up to his father's portrait on the wall, and lifted the candlestick up high, so that the smiling face was fully illuminated. "Hullo, my father," he said, "did you hear that? You were a handsome, gallant, gay gentleman. What now, if the nursery tale that the clerk's old wife has told us had been true? You would then have seen the son of the servant whom you wronged and killed giving up his life and his thoughts and his happiness even, in your service, to clear your name and wipe out your guilt. Would that seem to you the crowning joke of the whole affair—a fine extravaganza? Would it be at that that you are now laughing?"

He was still standing so, the candlestick in his raised hand, when the door behind him opened once more, and his old housekeeper came in noiselessly.

Mamzell Paaske had been in his father's house before he had married, and it was a privilege of hers to enter the son's room unannounced, when she had matters of importance to communicate or discuss.

In her young days she had been a beauty and had had offers of marriage from all parts of the isle, but she had refused to give up her spinsterhood. Now in her old age she had become extremely pious. There was still a pathetic loveliness in the very small, delicate figure, and she was light and graceful like a lady of high birth. At the moment she was deeply moved, and was wiping her eyes with a small folded handkerchief.

Another old woman, Eitel thought as he set down the candlestick. This one may be twice the age of the first. Can it be that she will bring me twice as strange a message?

He told her to take a seat, and she sat down on the edge of a chair, her old head nodding and shaking a little all the time.

"Dear me, how sad, how very sad," she began.

"What is it that you want of me?" he asked.

"Oh, me, it is of Lone that I am thinking," said Mamzell Paaske. "So Lone came back to the house once more, after all. The way up here has been heavy for her to walk this time. She was so proud here in the old days, in the fine clothes that her ladyship gave her. Dear master, will you, now, be able to obtain mercy for that poor unhappy son of hers?"

Mercy, Eitel repeated, in his own thoughts. "No, Mamzell Paaske, I fear that it cannot be done."

"Nay, I understand, I see," said the old housekeeper. "Justice must have its way. And he was caught in the act, I am told, and has been sentenced to death by the learned, venerable judges themselves.

"In other ways Lone is well preserved, I am bound to say," she continued. "She has had easy days with the parish clerk. I remember him well, he was a peaceful man, if a little stingy. You will know, dear master, that he is somehow related to the Paaskes. It is hard on him that his stepson should fare so ill."

"What is it you want of me?" he again asked.

"Take it not in bad part, dear master," she said. "I wished to hear a little more about this great misfortune and about poor Lone."

"You might have spoken to her yourself," he said.

She wiped her small mouth with her handkerchief.

"I dared not do that," she said. "You will know yourself that at times Lone is not right in her head."

"I never heard of that," he said.

"But it is so all the same," said Mamzell Paaske and again nodded her head. "We were well aware, all of us up here in the house, that she was not like other people. All her folks were queer. In the village they will tell you that in old days there were witches among them. Lone was a good, faithful servant all her time, to her ladyship and to you yourself, master. But by a full moon she was not herself."

"By a full moon?" Eitel repeated.

"Yes, by a full moon, like tonight," said she. "She would say many strange things then, and make people believe them.

> Trust thyself; every heart vibrates to that iron string. EMERSON

"I knew Linnert, too," she added after a moment.

"Did you know him?" he asked. "How did he look?"

"Oh, they were all fair folks," she answered. "But they were all of them queer. They would not fall in with the world such as it is."

"Still my mother will have thought well of them," he said, "since she took Lone into her house when I was born."

"No, no, not at the time when you were born, dear master," said she. "It was not till after you had been christened, and when it was found that the first nurse here had too little milk, that her ladyship sent for Lone."

"Not till after I had been christened?" he repeated. "Do you remember that for certain?"

"Oh, dear master," said she, "how would I not remember for certain everything from that good old time? Those were the happy days, when all in the house was put into my hand. The fine linen, the plate, the china and glass, the things even that had been given to the lords and ladies of the house by the king. And as to the servants of the house, too, it was I who took them on or sent them away. Aye, this your first nurse, Mette Marie, it was I who engaged her, and later on—since her ladyship was not well enough to look after things—it was I who found that she had too little milk, and sent her away. Then Lone came up here to be your nurse."

"Were you here, too," Eitel asked after a while, "at the time when Linnert brought back the bull and died?"

"Yes," said Mamzell Paaske, "I was here then too. And in my humble way I warned my dear master to let him off. 'My dear noble lord,' I said to him, 'do not go on with this. There may be blood in it.'"

They were both still for a minute.

"You were here," Eitel then said, "when my father was my own age. Was he a hard man even then?"

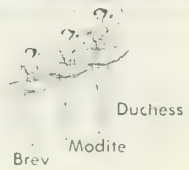
"Nay, nay," said she. "My lord was a handsome, gay gentleman; he was never hard. But he was bored. Great lords are bored, that is their grief, just as the peasants have got their cares and worries in life. I myself, by the grace of God, have been lucky. I have never been bored, nor have I had cares or worries."

"Look after Lone well tonight," Eitel said after another silence. "Let her be short of nothing, now that in her misfortune she has come to my house."

Mamzell Paaske had been looking away, thinking about the time of which she had spoken. Now she turned her face round toward him in a little birdlike movement. "I cannot do that, dear master," she said. "Lone has gone."

"Gone?" he repeated.

"Aye, indeed she has gone," said the old woman.



"When did she leave?" he asked.

"Just after she had come from you," she answered. "I met her on the stairs, but she would hardly speak a word to me. And then she walked away."

"Where did she go?" he again asked.

"Oh, I did not ask her," she answered. "I thought that she would be trying to get to Maribo this very night, and that it would be too pitiful to question her."

"She had come a long way," said Eitel. "Did she not want to take a rest?"

"She did so," said Mamzell Paaske. "When she took leave of me she said, 'Now there is nothing more for me to do. Now I shall take my rest.'"

"You ought not to have let her go away tonight," he said.

"I thought so myself, dear master," said she. "But Lone always wanted to have things her own way. One did not like to go against her."

She saw that her news had made an impression on her young master, and sat on a little enjoying her own importance. But as he did not speak again she got up.

"Well, good night then, my dear master," she said. "The grace of God be with all of us. May you sleep well."

"And you yourself," said he. "It is late, too late for you."

She nodded her head in a kind of friendly assent. "Yes," she said, "it is late. Too late."

But when she had got up she lingered. She fixed her clear eyes on his face, stretched out her small hand and touched the hem of his coat.

"My good noble lord," she said. "My dear Master Johann August. Do not go on with this thing. There may be blood in it."

She turned the door handle without a sound.

Eitel for a second time took the candlestick from the table, went up to his father's portrait and stood still before it. He remained there till the candlestick weighed down his arm, then set it back. For a long time the two faces, the painted and the live, looked at each other.

"We heard it all, you and I," he at length said, "and it makes no difference. A good, faithful woman set her heart on revenging an injustice in a way more hideous than the injustice itself. In that hour the revenge was taken. I was your son, but she made me hers. We ourselves, my father, and these people of ours have got the roots too tightly intertwined, deep down in the ground, ever to be able to free ourselves of one another."

He went to the window and looked out. The night was clear and cold, such as nights will become at the end of summer. The full moon standing behind the house laid the shadow of the building on the broad moat below, which here in front of the windows widened into a lake, and was patterned, as in a mosaic, with broad, flat water-lily leaves. As far as the shadow reached, the water was brown as dark amber, but farther out in the moonlight its sheet was misty with delicate silver. On the other side of it, the grass of the park was silvery, too, with the heavy dew; the small darker spots on it were wild ducks, asleep. A feeling of deep satisfaction ran through him as he called to mind that the harvest was in.

The still moonlit landscape called up the idea of a perfect harmony to be found somewhere in the world. His thoughts went to Ulrikke, and dwelt with her for a long time. A few hours ago he had held her in his arms. Soon he might hold her so again; all the same, things were over between her and him. For of what had happened tonight, of his two talks with a couple of old women, each of them in her own way somewhat off her mind, he could not speak to her. He thought of his small daughter, who in her short life he had seen but a few times. It was fortunate, he reflected, that the child was a girl. She would grow up to be like Ulrikke. Women, he told himself, have got another kind of happiness than we, and another kind of truth. The picture of Ulrikke as a little girl, and of her and the prisoner at Maribo in the wood, once more passed before him. It brought no pain with it; it was as if he had been an old man, content to leave the two at play in the green shades, while he himself was advancing upon another long lonesome road.

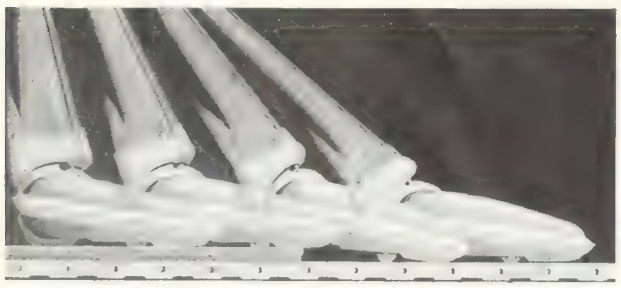
As he turned away from the window his eyes fell upon the books on the table, which a short time ago he had taken down and had meant to consult. He set them back on their shelves, one by one, and looked the shelves over, walking from one bookcase to another. Much human knowledge and wisdom were stored here in the tall, heavily bound books. Did any of them have anything to tell him tonight?

At length at the end of the room he found on a shelf an old storybook from his boyhood. He took it down and laid it on the table. He let it fall open at random, and, standing up, by the light of the candles read one of the old tales through.

Once upon a time, the story ran, there was in Portugal a proud and hasty young king. To him one day came an old knight, who in the past had led the armies of the king's father to victory. The king received him with great honors. But when the baron stood before his liege, without a word he raised his arm and struck the king's face. Angered as never before, the young king had the offender thrown into his deepest dungeon and had the scaffold raised for his execution.

But in the night the king pondered the matter and counted the great services which this same old knight had rendered his father. So early in the morning he sent for his vassal, ordered all his courtiers out of earshot, and demanded from him the true reason for the affront.

"My lord," said the white-haired warrior, "I shall tell you the reason. Once, when I was a young man, such as you are today, I had an old steward who had served my family faithfully all his life. One day in a fit of unjust wrath I struck the servant who could not return my blow. My steward is dead these fifty years. I have looked for, but never found, means to atone for my blow. In the end I have decided that the best way to do so would be to strike the face of the man who, above all others, had power to return the blow. For that reason, my lord, did I strike your royal face."



"Verily," the king said, "now I understand you. You have chosen for your blow the face of your king, of the mightiest man you knew. But if your arm had been long enough, it would have been the face of your God Himself, Who justly deals out reward and punishment, that you had struck."

"It is so," the old man said.

"Verily," the king said again, "this blow of yours, then, is the truest homage that I ever received from a vassal. And I shall answer you as truthfully myself.

"I shall answer you, first, in the manner of a king." With these words he loosened his gold-hilted sword from his sword belt, held it out to the baron and said, "Take this, my good and faithful servant, as a token of your king's grace and gratitude.

"And," he went on, "I shall answer you, secondly and in accordance with your wish, in the manner of Almighty God. I tell you, then, that I cannot quench the thirst for justice within your soul. For I shall not alter my own law. Until the hour when you meet again that old servant of yours whose face you struck, you will carry the burden of your shame with you wherever you go. Till then you will be, in your castle in the mountains, by the side of your wife and in the circle of your children and grandchildren, or in the arms of a young mistress, forever lonely, the loneliest man in my kingdom."

With these words the young king of Portugal dismissed his old liegeman.

Eitel set back the book on the shelf and seated himself in his armchair by the table, his chin in his hand.

Forever lonely, he repeated in his thoughts. The loneliest man in the kingdom.

For a long time his mind wandered to all sides.

The prisoner at Maribo, he thought in the end, is as lonely as I am. I shall go to him.

I like not only to be loved, but also to be told that I am loved. The realm of silence is large enough beyond the grave.

GEORGE ELIOT

As he made this decision he felt like a man who, having lost his way in woods and moors, comes upon a road. He knows not whereto it leads, whether to salvation or destruction, but he follows it because it is a road.

Now, he told himself, now, after all, I shall sleep tonight.

He alone, of all people, he continued his thoughts, will help me to sleep tonight. All through this long evening I have been fearing or hoping that the rumor of his flight from prison were true, and have been waiting for him. It is no good waiting for him any longer. I shall go to Maribo tomorrow.

Early on Wednesday morning the old coachman of the manor got an order to get the carriage ready. A while after, he was told to take out the closed carriage. The old man was puzzled; his young master was not in the habit of using the closed carriage in fair weather. But a little later he again had a different order; he was to take out the new, light open carriage from Hamburg.

What is the matter with Eitel today? he asked himself. Never before have I had, in one morning, three different orders from him.

With his foot on the hub, Eitel hesitated whether to take the reins himself, then he handed them over to the old man. "Drive quickly," he told him, "until we come into the town of Maribo. Then go slowly through the street." He thought, I shall not try to hide my face from the people today.

The weather this morning was colder than the day before, and the landscape less rich in color and light. A wind blew in from the sea; there might be rain before evening. In the fields and above them the sea gulls were moving restlessly.

The sound of the carriage wheels changed from a softer to a louder rumble as they rolled from the highroad onto the paved street of Maribo. Eitel had the carriage stop outside the courthouse. There was a clock on the house. As on the stone stair in front he was informed that he would find the police magistrate in his office, the clock above his head struck eight strokes.

The police magistrate himself, old Counselor Sandoe, who came out in a hurry to meet him, was a small rigid official of the old school, who still wore his little pigtailed wig. He had sat in his peaceful office in Maribo as long as the people of the town could remember, but this was his first death sentence. It made him conscious of his own high significance; at the same time the idea of it was curious and disturbing to him. He was now cheered by the prospect of discussing the event with a young nobleman whom he had known from birth.

He grew silent, pushing his lower lip over the upper lip, at Eitel's demand to see the condemned man in his cell and to speak with him alone there.

"This person," he said, "hardly seems to have any human qualities left. He has passed more years of his life in the woods and on the moors than in a house. I suppose that he has never loved any human being. I gather from our good Pastor Quist, who has sacrificed much of his time to him, that he knows no more of the word of God than of law and justice. Verba mortuo facta."

He recounted how his prisoner, when seized red-handed in the manslaughter, had defended himself with most extraordinary strength, and had knocked down three men before he was taken. The counselor had had him put in chains, but even thus did consider him dangerous.

"His mother was my nurse," said Eitel. "She came to see me last evening. If anything can still be done for him, I shall want to see it done."

"For him?" said the old gentleman. "This person hardly has sufficient understanding of his position to take it to heart. I cannot even imagine any last wish that he might have to state. It is true, though, that this morning he asked that his hair should not be cut until on the scaffold itself, and that we would have him shaved. Out of commiseration with a man who is to die at noon, I sent for the barber. But does such a wish bespeak remorse or amendment?"

"I wish to see him," said Eitel.

"Let it be so then," said the counselor. "Possibly our humane feelings are most urgently called upon in the case of those deepest sunk. In the name of God, we will go to him."

He sent for the jailer, and preceded by him the old and the young gentleman walked down a long whitewashed corridor and a few stone steps. The jailer turned the heavy key in the lock.

"Beware, there is one more step inside the door," said the counselor.

The small room which they entered had one narrow grated window high up in the wall. Its stone floor was covered with straw. To Eitel, coming from his drive through the light landscape, the cell seemed almost dark.

The condemned man sat on a bench so low that his chained hands between his knees rested on the floor. His dark head dropped so that his long brown hair was hanging down over his face. His clothes were in rags, one sleeve of his coat torn off, and he was barefooted. He made not the slightest movement at the entrance of his visitors.

"Stand up, Linnert," said the counselor. "There is a noble gentleman here who wants to see you." He gave out Eitel's name with much dignity, more in honor of Eitel than of the prisoner.

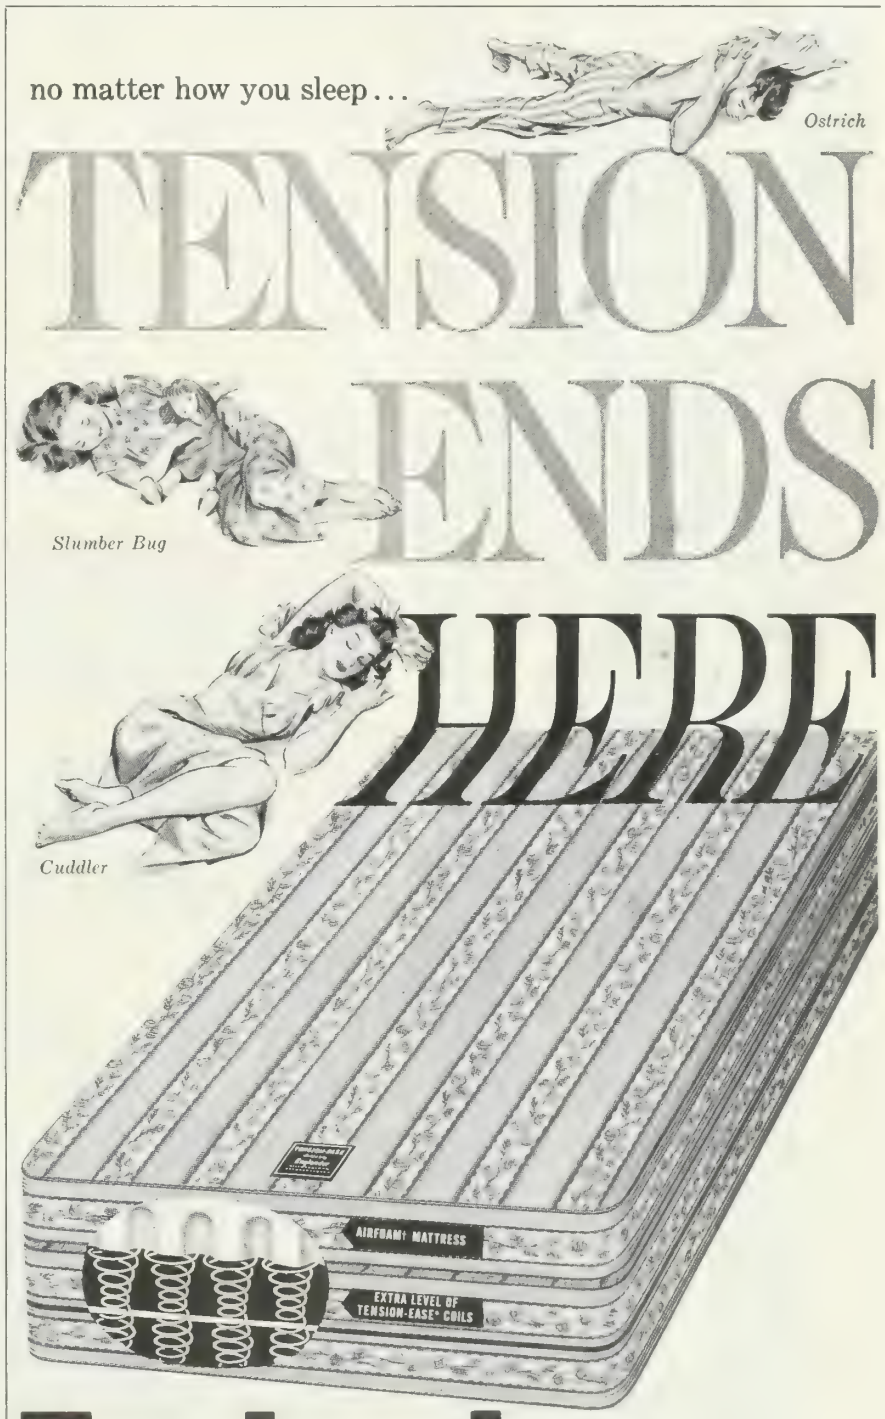
Linnert for a while sat on as if not aware that he was being spoken to. Then he rose without raising his head or his eyes, and sat down again in exactly the same position as before. The counselor gave Eitel a short glance, confirming his statement as to the hopelessness of concerning oneself about a creature like this.

To Eitel the filth and degradation before him were so loathsome that if he had wanted to, he could not have taken another step toward the figure. After a while he saw that this poacher and murderer, of his own age, ravished by a wild lawless existence, lean and tanned by sun and wind, was beautifully built, with long limbs and rich hair. He felt that this body would be strong and supple, every muscle and sinew of it hardened and trained to the utmost. In the movements of the prisoner as he had risen and again sat down, there had been an extraordinary collectedness and grace and a kind of obstinate joy of life. In his renewed immobility now there was the calm of the wild animal, which will keep more deadly still than any domestic animal. It was to Eitel as if he had, within his own wood, come upon a fox and was now himself standing immovable to watch him.

He noticed that the wrists of the prisoner were swollen and raw from the iron round them, and a choking feeling, as at the sight of a pretty wild animal in a trap, oppressed the visitor's chest.

"Be pleased to unchain him while I talk to him," he said to the counselor.

"It will hardly be advisable," the old magistrate answered, and added in German, "He is still most unusually strong, and he is probably desperate. You may be exposing your life."



"Nay, unchain him," said Eitel.

After some hesitation the counselor made signs to the jailer to remove the chain from the prisoner's wrists. It fell upon the stone floor with a hard clank. Linnert stretched his arms a little along his sides and lowly yawned or growled like a man waking from his sleep.

"Leave us alone," said Eitel.

The counselor threw a last glance at the two men whom he was to leave alone. "I shall be waiting just outside the door with this man here," he announced in a loud voice, and followed by the jailer left the cell.

Eitel stood looking at the man who was to die. I shall speak to him, he thought. Shall I be able to make him speak? I myself may have half a century before me in which to say what I want. But what he has to say must be spoken before noon. And by the way, after noon, what will I myself find to speak of, for fifty years?

Linnert sat motionless as before. Eitel was uncertain whether he did realize that one of his three visitors had stayed on when the others left.

"Knowest thou me, Linnert?" he at last asked.

The prisoner remained dead still for a minute. Then he looked up askance, beneath his long hair, and Eitel was surprised to see how light the eyes were in the dark face.

"Ay, thee I know well enough," he said, and after a moment added, "And thy woods, too, and that long marsh that thou hast got out westward."

He spoke the dialect of the island so markedly that Eitel had some difficulty in understanding him. In the fight when he was taken, he had had his upper lip split and a tooth knocked out, he pulled his mouth awry and lisped as he spoke, and all through the conversation he hesitated a little after each of Eitel's questions, as if he had to set his mouth right before answering.

His remark had not been offered as a challenge or a jeer, although he must have realized that it would be clear to Eitel in what manner he had acquired his intimate knowledge of his woods and marshes. It fell more like a light, sprightly communication between acquaintances exchanging news. In exactly that way, Eitel reflected, the fox on the forest path, in passing, would render the farmer a quick, snappish, jovial report on his poultry yard.

"Thy mother once was nurse to me," Eitel said.

Once more Linnert hesitated a little, then asked in the same unconcerned manner as before, "What was her name now?"

"She is named Lone Bartels today," Eitel answered. "Many years ago she married the parish clerk. Thou, Linnert, art my milk brother." The word echoed through his mind, Brother.

"Was it so?" said Linnert. He was silent for a while and then added, "It will have been but a poor drop of milk that I ever got out of those paps."

"I have come today to see whether I can help you in any way," said Eitel.

"In what way art thou to help me?" the prisoner asked.

"Will there be nothing at all that I can do for thee?" Eitel asked.

"Nay," said Linnert. "They are going to help me here, I think, with all of it."

During the pause that followed, the prisoner a couple of times spat on the floor, stretched out his bare foot and rubbed out the spittle in the straw. No more than his remark did his gesture contain any mockery or spite of the visitor; it had all the character of some humble game or pastime, in which the guest, did he care to, might join.

In the end Linnert himself, after having twisted and writhed his mouth, took up the conversation. "Aye, there is one thing," he said, "that thou canst help me with if thou wilt. I have got an old bitch, she is mine. She has got but one eye. She is on a rope by the wheelwright at Kramnitse. She is not wont to be chained up. Thou might send down that keeper of thine and have her done away with."

"I shall have thy bitch brought up to my house and looked after there," said Eitel.

"Nay," said Linnert, "she is no good to anybody except just me. But it might be well if thou wouldst shoot her thyself—and then, as thou takest her along with thee to do it, talk to her." After a moment he said, "She is called Rikke, after someone."

Eitel slowly put his hand to his mouth and down again.

"I will tell thee something, in return," Linnert suddenly said. "Thou hast got a brace of otters in thy mill brook that nobody knows of but me. Early one morning last winter I saw that the rime had melted on the grass round the air hole of their den. Since then I have kept an eye on them. I was down there, time and another, this summer, and sat by them all day. I watched the old otters teach their four young ones to swim. They are big now; they have got fine skins. The hole is below the eastern brink; it will be easy to thee to take them there."

"It is all right," said Eitel.

"Aye, but thou hast got to remember," said Linnert, "that their den is in the place where the river bends, by the five willows."

"Yes," said Eitel, "I shall remember.

"I have been thinking of thy lot in life," he said after a pause, "ever since I heard of thee. My people have wronged thy people, and it ought not to have gone so with thee. I would do justice to thee today, were it in my power."

"Justice?" said Linnert wonderingly.

Just then Eitel heard the clock on the front of the house slowly and as if pensively strike nine strokes, and wondered whether Linnert, too, counted these strokes.

"Hast thou ever been told, Linnert," he asked, "that the manor house stands where the farmstead of thy people was once standing, and has been built on top of it?"

"Nay, that I have never heard," said Linnert.

There was a long silence in the cell, and Eitel's mind was following the hands of the clock that were now slowly going on, tick, tick, marking the minutes. In the end Linnert shot up a swift glance, as if to find out whether his guest was still with him.

"Linnert," Eitel said, "thy mother came to me last night to tell me a curious tale. She told me that at the time that she was nurse at the manor she sent away the lord's child and put her own in its stead."

A new pause. "Is that so?" Linnert then asked. "That will have been a long time ago."

"Yes," said Eitel. "It will have been twenty-three years ago. At the time when neither of us knew who he was."

Linnert sat on, so still that Eitel could not tell if he had heard him or not.

"Was it true that the woman told thee?" he asked at last.

"No," Eitel said. "It was not true."

"Nay, it was not true," Linnert repeated. Then, suddenly, with the same kind of fox joviality as before: "But if it had been true?"

"If it had been true," Eitel said slowly, "then thou, Linnert, wouldst today have been in my place. And I—who knows?—in thine."

Linnert seemed to have once more come to rest on the bench, his eyes on the floor, and Eitel thought, Is it all over now? Can I go away now?

At that same instant the prisoner rose and stood up straight, face to face with his visitor. The heavy chair at this rattled a little against his foot. The sudden, unexpected, light and noiseless movement was so extraordinarily vigorous that it had all the character of an assault meant to give the attacked party no time for defense.

The two young men, now standing very close to each other, were of the same height. For the first time during their conversation they looked each other in the face meaningfully, conscious of a trial of strength. A strange, fierce light spread over Linnert's face.

"They would have been mine then," he said, "the deer and the hares and partridges that I have shot in thy fields and thy woods?"

"Yes," said Eitel, "they would have been thine then."

The prisoner's thoughts seemed to run away from the small dark cell to those fields and woods of which he had spoken.

"And thou wouldst have owed it to me then," he said, "that thou canst go out with thy gun in a fortnight, when the young partridges are fledged, and again in three months, when the tracks of the game are on the snow, and that thou mayst troat to a buck in thy woods next spring."

"Yes," said Eitel.

As Linnert stood so, without stirring, with his eyes in Eitel's but sunk in his own thoughts, the blood mounted to his face twice in a deep dark wave. Only a short time ago, it seemed to Eitel, he had looked into a face which bore a likeness to this one. Was it the hard glint of triumph in Lone's face which here, in the shade of death, did mellow into a smile?

All at once the prisoner threw back his head, so that his long hair was flung away from his brow. He raised his right hand. It was lean, dark-stained, and earth and blood stuck under the nails. The smell of it was nauseating to Eitel.

"Wilt thou then," he asked, "go down on thy knees to kiss my hand, and thank me for my mercy?"

Eitel for a moment kept standing before him. Then he bent one knee on the stone floor, in the straw where Linnert had spat, and touched the outstretched hand with his lips.

Linnert very slowly withdrew his hand, very slowly raised it to the top of his head, and scratched deep down in his long hair. He twisted his swollen mouth into a smile or grin.

"They are biting," he said. "It was well that thou didst set me loose." END

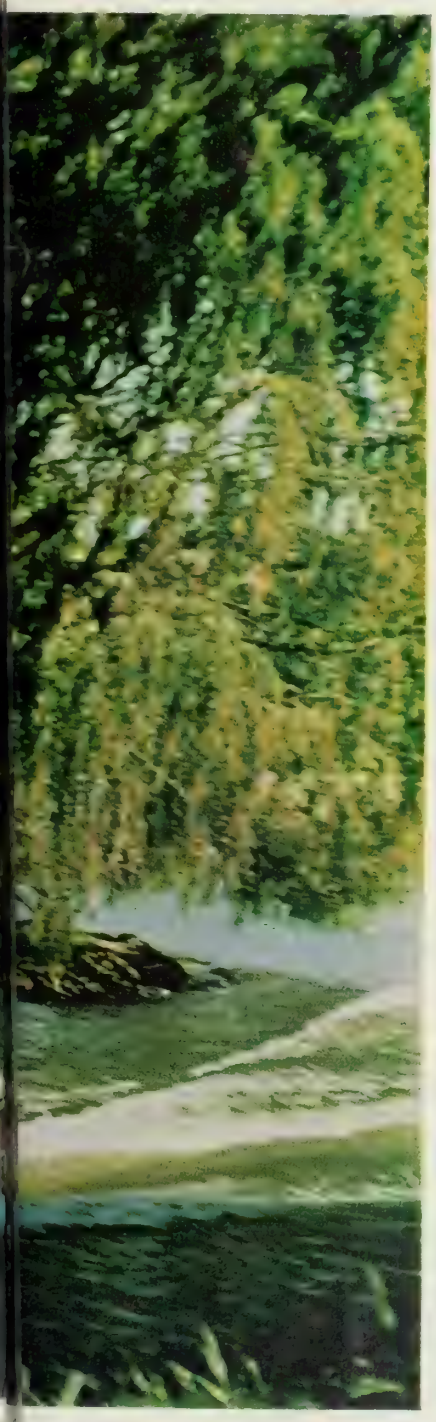
RICH BEYOND MEASURE

"We've found something bigger than making money!"

Center of the wheel on the Graham farm is their round aluminum house and the pond Bill dug with a rented bulldozer. Behind the house the pumps of two oil wells nod vigorously

By GLENN MATTHEW WHITE PHOTOGRAPHS By JOSEPH DI PIETRO



Marge Graham picks up her telephone at Private Enterprise, Inc., and suddenly her face blooms. "I'm one of those women love made beautiful," she was saying, smiling lightly; "or at least it did the best it could. Anyway, I feel much more attractive than when Bill married me twenty-three years ago."

Now, as she listens, the miracle happens before your eyes. The voice is one she is accustomed to hearing. It's Bill's. The words are familar, too—and loud: "Say, Marge—do you know I love you? I love you! I love you just an awful lot—you know that?" It doesn't sound like blarney and Marge doesn't suggest to him that it is. She is smiling broadly now, with amusement and delight, but believing every word. The words come faster: "Marge, honey, will you do me a big favor, just a big favor?" She nods regally and picks up a pencil. Bill goes on: "Will you do something for me? Look, Marge, I want you to ——"

It's business and it is possible to avoid overhearing exactly what Bill is saying. You know that whatever it is he wants her to do she will try to do. While the phone conversation continues, you study the large charcoal sketches of their six children on the wall behind her desk. Marge had mentioned they were done quickly by a street artist one lunchtime in Montmartre.

There's Becky, the oldest. She's twenty, a junior at Northwestern University. Poised, mature, responsible, Becky loves children and hopes to teach.

Connie is next in age—eighteen, a senior at Augusta (Kansas) High School. A pretty, rather fragile-appearing blonde, she is introspective, sharply intelligent and physically strong, like the rest of the family.

Marge the younger is sixteen, a junior at East High School in Wichita. Outspoken, unabashed, ready to roughhouse, she can shift to low key and demure femininity in an instant.

Teddy, fourteen, is the oldest boy, a student at Missouri Military Academy. Reliable, good-natured, dryly humorous, he began to use a slide rule almost as soon as he learned to multiply, and he taught Becky to play chess when he was eleven. (Father Bill has no use for chess or a slide rule and, according to Becky, he can't add.)

Billy, aged eleven, is wide-eyed, sensitive, gentle, handsome. Being the middle boy, he suffers stoically.

Jackie, an engaging sprite of nine years, is the baby of the family. Billy and Jackie go by bus to the Andover Elementary School, a public school six miles from their farm home.

Marge has put down the telephone and she shares your study of the sketches. "The greatest blessing we have," she says, "is that all our children are strong and healthy—and I am too. Six healthy babies and not a single miscarriage or serious illness—my doctor says I'm lucky! We are all lucky to have one another and I am very, very thankful. We have been fortunate in making money, too, but I don't feel rich that way. I know we are, but I certainly never expected to be and it truly doesn't seem very important to me."

Money is a little more important to Bill Graham. As a young man he had many ambitions—one of them was to make a million dollars. He has realized that ambition. Now he, and his wife and children too, are dedicated to something he says is "bigger than making money"—Private Enterprise, Inc.

Private Enterprise, Inc., is a stock company designed to help establish small businesses in all parts of the world. It is Bill's own dream child and he devotes almost every waking moment to it. He is as eager to make money as ever, but now it's for other people: the stockholders of Private Enterprise, Inc., and the "little man" on a foreign shore who would have no chance without them. YOUR HANDS TALK

What do they say about you?

Simple care can give you lovelier hands in a few weeks

By Ruth Miller

Every time you lift a fork, wave good-bye, shake a hand...your own hands are in the spotlight. They're you...as expressive as your face, as telltale as your voice. Why not start today...to make them as lovely as you'd like them to be?

Cracking, splitting nails? A few seconds a night...less time than it takes to brush your teeth...can do wonders! Begin massaging Cutex Nail-Flex into the base of your nail between the cuticle and the first finger joint. This gentle cream contains lanolin, cholesterol and white iodine to strengthen and harden your nails.

Ragged cuticle? Never cut it, except to remove a bad hang-nail. Cutting your cuticle toughens it, can lead to infection. Instead follow this safe and simple method. One...wrap the tip of a Cutex genuine Orangewood Stick in cotton. Two...moisten the cotton generously with Cutex Oily Cuticle Remover. Three...push back the cuticle gently all around the base of the nail with the moist cotton. The Cutex Oily Cuticle Remover will float away dead tissue and leave your cuticle soft and perfectly shaped. As an added touch, finish off your home manicure with Cutex Cuticle Oil.

Stubby nails? The way you file your nails can make your fingers seem more tapering...help nails grow longer, too. Harsh metal files often cause splitting. So does a sawing motion. File your nails from side to tip with a flexible Cutex Emery Board, leaving 1/16 inch of nail at the corners. Then use the curve of your cuticle as a guide in shaping the tips. Overly pointed nails will break more easily, call attention to stubby fingers.

Your hands are one of your greatest beauty assets. Surely they deserve the same attention you give your face... and your wardrobe!

Outside the calm of Marge's office there is a frenzy of purposeful activity in the Graham Building on North Broadway in Wichita. Electric typewriters and tabulators are whirring, phones are ringing, words and figures are going out in ripples, literally around the world. The building houses the Graham-Michaelis Drilling Co. as well as Private Enterprise, Inc., and it is the central office for the Grahams' extensive real-estate holdings. Marge Graham has worked beside Bill every step of their way from poverty to wealth, and half of their assets belong to her. Bill has a hard-working family and a hard-working staff, but he is the driving force and he has only one speed—fast forward.

He has made enough money to go on vacation for the rest of his life. Why does he work so hard? Marge says, "Making money is a challenge to Bill, just as tennis or golf is a challenge, and he has to win. But he has always dreamed of doing something bigger than making money—and in Private Enterprise, Inc., he has found it. I know Bill won't rest long until it's as successful as all his other ventures." Men who work with him do not attempt to explain him. They say it is hard enough to keep up with him, much less try to figure out what makes him tick. According to his friend Tom Orr, "He takes seconds to make decisions most businessmen would consider for weeks. If it has the sweet smell of success to Bill, that's it—others can wrestle with the details."

Bill Graham was born on a farm near El Dorado, Kansas, about twenty miles from Wichita, the youngest, the smallest and the most favored son of a grocery-store owner. He grew up believing life was tough but that the competition was open. He liked it that way. He read every Horatio Alger book he could get his hands on. Mark Tidd was his hero, and he resolved to emulate him. His father offered only one bit of advice he remembers: "If you ever work for the Government," he told him, "I'll disown you!"

Bill thinks growing up on a farm was the making of him. "What advantages farm kids have over city kids! I was a little guy, so I had to play it smart, but my world was wide open and I was free to do anything I wanted to. Man, how I wanted to win! I wanted to win in everything so bad I could eat it. I meant to win in everything. I played to win—and I did win. Why, when I got to town I had it all over those other kids six ways from Sunday."

He worked his way through Northwestern University by washing dishes, selling Christmas cards and razor-blade sharpeners. He sold a sharpener to the president of Northwestern, Walter Dill Scott, and induced him to write a note saying it was a good sharpener. Then he went around to professors and department heads and tried to sell them on the strength of the letter. They bought, although they knew the president still used his old straight edge. "I learned something about human nature selling those things," Bill says. "I throw away a blade every time I shave now, but I feel a little guilty doing it."

With his graduation from Northwestern nearing and no job in sight, Bill called upon the president of the Wilson packing company in Chicago to ask for a job on a cattle freighter. He planned to hitchhike around the world. While waiting to see him, he sold the office manager a razor-blade sharpener. Wilson's son-in-law, Harry Williams, came out before the deal was closed, and Bill sold him a sharpener too. He then accepted their offer of a job with the company. They sent him to a meat-packing plant in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, before he could work himself up in the home office

In Cedar Rapids, he lived at the Y.M.C.A. One evening he and his roommate, John English, listed twenty qualities they felt they wanted in a wife. Their requirements differed considerably, but first on the list for both was that she must be religious. To find religious dates, they went to the young people's meetings of various churches. In this way Bill Graham met Marjorie March. The year was 1935. He was twenty-five; she was nineteen.

Marge's father was a railroad switchman. When she was graduated from high school, her family didn't have the money to send her to college, but she was determined to attend Coe in Cedar Rapids. To earn enough to pay her way, she took a job as a household helper at $4 a week. Her chores included scrubbing the floors, which she did on her knees. "I can still see my mother, tears streaming down her face, when I left our house to take that job," she remembers. "When I met Bill, I had progressed to employment as an elevator operator. I didn't have many dates—I don't know why . . . oh, yes, I do too know why! When Bill wrote to his father about meeting me, he said, 'She's not much to look at, but she's awfully nice!' My best dress was a $9.95 special from the department-store bargain basement. I wasn't chic, heaven knows, and I know now I wasn't even well groomed."

She was in the same crowd with him at picnics and other group affairs on many occasions, but he dated the "cute gals" and months went by before he asked Marge for a date. Then he casually asked if she would go to a movie with him. According to Bill, this was a carefully planned maneuver. He and John English had listed, then discussed and examined in detail again and again, those qualities each felt the girl he married must have. Furthermore, they had narrowed the possibilities in Cedar Rapids down to one or two girls each. ("You turn up enough angles on any proposition," Bill says, "and you're bound to turn up the right one!") There was only one question unanswered in his mind, so on his first date with Marge he asked it: "Marge, do you think you could love me—and marry me?"

Marge did not say it was so sudden. She said, "Why, yes, Bill—I really do!" She justifies her quick decision by saying she knew a good man when she saw one. "I had so admired him from afar that it wasn't hard to say that I could love him, since he mentioned it, though I don't think I would ever have come to that conclusion myself."

They had one more date, which completed Bill's courtship, except for letters. He was called to El Dorado because of the death of his father and did not return to his job in Cedar Rapids. They corresponded regularly, but not daily, and after seven months Bill sent Marge a small diamond by mail. They were married in October, 1936, in Marge's home church, the First Christian in Cedar Rapids.

"My wedding cost exactly $50, which came from a small paid-up insurance policy," Marge remembers. "We couldn't afford flowers so dad cut great branches of autumn leaves and banked them against a trellis. We were married by candlelight."

They returned to live in Wichita, where Bill had begun to sell real estate, but they did not begin immediately to live happily after. "We quarreled a lot during those early years," Marge says—"bitter quarrels just short of physical violence. We fought about everything—where to go, what to eat, whom to see, what to buy!" They both worked hard in the real-estate office, she on the telephone trying to get listings, and Bill selling.

They had nothing. At the end of a day they would empty their purses to see what they could afford for dinner. If they had enough, they would go to their favorite Chinese restaurant where they could get a meal, with all the rice they could eat, for 65 cents. At other times they filled up on bread. Most of the time they ate at home, and Marge did the cooking, unless they worked until late at night as they often did.

Bill managed to borrow a little money with which he bought equities in old, deteriorated houses. He and Marge moved into each one, repaired and redecorated it, then sold it at a profit. "We never lived anywhere much longer than three months," Marge says. "In three years we lived in twelve houses—some of them perfectly awful until we fixed them up."

Bill Graham's financial progress is best recounted by an old friend: "Well, there was no place for a boy like Bill but the big city, so he came to Wichita. He stood around on the corners and looked at the big buildings and said to himself, 'Heck, there ought to be big money in real estate.' So he borrowed $200 from the Fourth National Bank—don't ask me why the bank loaned it to him—and for $20 a month he rented a ratty loft above a clothing store, I think it was—ceiling eighteen feet high and nothing in it but a naked electric light bulb dangling. He got himself an old battered desk somewhere and he installed a telephone. Bill was in business, on nothing, and in debt. That's the way he stayed, too, for a while, then he saw in the newspaper that a plot of land called Mathewson's Pasture was for sale. With borrowed capital he managed to get an option on the land, and he had enough money left to build one house. In ten days time he was building it. He found a partner to do the work and soon he had the pasture filled with four-unit dwellings. He could borrow money easily then and moved on to other housing developments."

The stories men tell about Bill Graham are fantastic, but hardly more fantastic than the truth. "He's always been an expert at getting groups of men and money together," summarized Dwight Button vice president of the flourishing Fourth National Bank in Wichita, which has loaned Bill large sums of money since that first $200. "I remember when Bill had that upstairs real-estate office—he had a hard time paying the rent on that for a few years, but he had the nerve to go around and ask rich men how they made money. We somebody must have told him!"

In 1947, when Bill was at his peak in real estate ventures, having built 700 houses, called an oilman into his office and informed him he had decided to go into the oil business.

"Bill, you don't know a thing about the oil business," his friend pointed out.

"You are right," Bill said. "You are absolutely right!" He unrolled an oil-plot map and spread it out before them on his desk. "But look here—here's a cluster of drillings in this section, and here's a cluster of drillings here and there's a bunch there, but there's none right here in the middle. Why not?" Bill wanted to know.

"I don't know why not, but I'm sure there are good geological reasons for not drilling there."

"Well, that's where I'm going to drill—right in the middle. You want in?"

"No thanks, Bill."

Bill leased the land in question, drilled "right in the middle" and brought in six oil wells out of seven drillings.

"Just little squirts," he says, "but a beginning in the oil business."

Marge is one who knows that Bill does not take the development of a new business so blithely, nor is he, she insists, the "hard, cold businessman" he sometimes pretends to be. "I think he is a good businessman," Marge says, "but not hard or cold." He claims his successes are good luck only after the hard work is done. In the early days of their marriage, he worked sixteen hours a day with single-minded concentration on the job at hand. Marge, too, worked a six-day week in the real-estate business, with time out for babies, until after the third was born. When Jackie, the sixth, was old enough to go to school she returned to full-time employment for Private Enterprise, Inc., without title or salary.

The quarrels that rocked their first year dwindled abruptly after one especially loud verbal knockdown. "Marge," Bill said, when their rage had subsided, "every business has to have a boss. Marriage is our business and I am the boss. I have to be the boss, don't you understand? And you will have to accept me as I am. I can't change me—and neither can you." That settled it—or almost. It took a little tapering off. Marge decided she loved him too much to go against his will and, besides, he was in debt and working so hard and it was emotionally exhausting for her to be continually fighting and falling in love all over again.

She speaks of this with genuine amusement now; she thinks it is absurd for any husband and wife to quarrel about which one will prevail. She is as honest and open about her love and admiration for Bill as she is about everything else. ("I think he really is a great man, don't you?") Bill says, "Marge is the greatest, absolutely the greatest!"

"Of course it's not all sweetness and light—no family is," Marge says. "Ours is a family of strong-minded rugged individualists. That's the way I want it, but it doesn't make them easy to live with. It's never boring, though—and I can still snarl pretty good sometimes."

Love is the family password. Often Marge says, "I love you, Connie!" or "I love you, Billy!" or "I love you all!" Bill says "I love you" to the children as well as to Marge, and in a way that can't be faked. When Becky visited the home of a girl friend for the first time, she thought the girl's father and mother were on the verge of divorce because they never said, "I love you."

Early in their married life, the Grahams met the late Father Samuel E. West, of St. James' Episcopal Church, who interested them in the Episcopal faith. They are members and the whole family attends church regularly. Bill and Marge believe in loving God and man. "But you just can't sit back and fold your hands," Bill says. "You've got to do something. We think that is a Christian premise. We are all born with certain talents, and if we use what we have, that is fulfillment. If we have a lot and use only a little, that is sin." This is the religion he believes in. He asks a lot of everybody, especially Marge and the children, and he gets a lot.

Marge tells her daughters they will have to work at marriage and that it will not be easy. "Girls want their husbands to be successful," she says, "but often they don't anticipate, nor are they willing to pay the price. I am really appalled that some young wives expect their husbands to do housework."

She doesn't believe a husband should in any way assume the wife's role, even if the wife works outside the home. She says Bill never got up at night to take care of a child. He pays attention to the children when he chooses to, which is often, but not at her behest. When she worked, and had no help at home, she did all the housework too. Sometimes Bill would wander into the kitchen and dry a dish or two, but his thoughts would be elsewhere. Soon he would say, "Honey, do you want me to dry these dishes or do you want me to get on the telephone and maybe make fifty dollars?" She let him go about his work.

The closest Marge comes to nagging is her insistence that he spend an hour a day in some form of recreation. Every moment Bill is awake he has a compulsion to be active, and sports help him to get his mind off work. He naps easily and can go to sleep in the middle of a sentence he is speaking, but he wakes up full of zip, often in the early hours of the morning, and begins to plan his next move. He is likely to continue the sentence he interrupted for sleep and go on talking

He believes everybody should do that which they fear to do. When he found that flying made him sick he decided to learn to fly. Doctors told him that for some people there is no cure for airsickness and advised him to stop flying. He forced himself to fly a great deal more, even though it nauseated him so that he had to make forced landings to quiet his stomach.

Marge was terrified of flying, so he insisted that she accompany him. She would grit her teeth, shut her eyes and mutter the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed or anything else prayerful she could think of at every take-off. Bill let her know that he found this behavior annoying. She had only one recourse—to take flying lessons herself and cure her fears by knowledge and skill.

She soon found that she loved flying, but Bill balked when it came time for her to solo. She had had twenty-seven hours of instruction and was more than ready, but Bill said no. Marge said yes. "For one of the few times in our married life, I acted directly contrary to his orders. I simply had to solo. One day

RULES FOR LIVING—
according to the Grahams

HIS: SHARE—share profits, dreams, joy, all that you have. All that you give unstintingly of yourself will come back to you a hundredfold.

EMBRACE new ideas, new programs, borrow money—always! Travel a new route. It leads to more fun, as well as profit.

AVOID major arguments. Bickering and quarreling never pay.

TRUST people and pick business associates smarter than you.

ASK as many informed persons as possible their opinions before making a decision.

GO STEADY with a project, whatever it may be—love, marriage or business. Problems become easy after sixteen hours a day of undivided effort.

BELIEVE in God, believe in people, believe in yourself, believe life is good. There is no other security.

NEVER underestimate the power of working with your family, especially your wife.

HERS: LOVE God, your family, everyone. And don't forget to tell them about it.

PULL your share of every load plus a little more. It's the only way to self-respect.

WORK for the fun of it, for the challenge and purpose it gives life.

KNOW that anything of lasting value can be bought only with effort and not with money.

CULTIVATE worth-while, happy people and learn their secrets of successful living.

DEVELOP your funny bone. Humor gives spice to life and avoids many quarrels.

when he was out of town, I did—and told him later. He didn't say much." He then delayed her flight test for a private pilot's license as long as he could. When she insisted on taking it, he phoned the examiner and told him he didn't think she was quite ready. The examiner later called him to say Marge was one of the best new pilots he had ever tested, man or woman. As a reward Bill bought her a Piper Tri-Pacer, a plane much easier to fly than his own Bonanza, but he soon found giving Marge an airplane was a mistake.

"I flew all the time," she recalls blissfully. "I loved it so much I would get up at five in the morning to fly." When Bill called home and asked for Marge, one of the children would answer, "Mom's up in the air."

Finally Bill grounded her and sold their planes. "I can't take the chance of raising six kids by myself," he said. "Neither can I," Marge answered. Bill rarely flies a plane these days, but he flies the airlines all the time. And he never gets airsick.

Though Bill is constantly in the business of making his own luck, some of it does seem phenomenal. While flying he noticed a lovely strip of level land—ideal for a landing field—fifteen miles from Wichita. He thought he would like to buy the spot for a summer home. He wanted his children to have a taste of farm life. Also, he had promised Becky he would buy her a horse when she was eight. Her birthday was approaching and he needed a place to keep a horse. By sheer chance, he was able to purchase an entire section—640 acres—of the land he had spotted from the air.

About the same time he was able to buy, for $1000, the assets of a corporation set up to build and sell the Dymaxion house, a circular prefabricated aluminum structure designed by Buckminster Fuller. The assets consisted of two Dymaxion houses, one of them dismantled, the other set up and furnished. This he had moved to his newly purchased property. His oil business was prospering, so he took the summer off, hired a bulldozer and, operating it himself, made a large pond in front of the house and built a little island in it, and constructed several roads.

When the summer was over, no one in the family wanted to leave the farm. They sold their house in town, enlarged the aluminum house and made it their permanent home. That was twelve years ago, and they are still there. The address is 1960 Easy Street. The street number changes with the years. Besides the greatly enlarged Dymaxion house and two houses for resident farmers, the hangar and the stables, there are a tennis court, a golf-driving range, a trapshooting and pistol range, a Trampoline, a motorboat for fishing and water skiing, and numerous other attractions.

One of the attractive features of the place Bill did not plan. After they were established on Easy Street, a friend, Jack Gaty, insisted there was oil on the property and offered to pay half the drilling costs for half a share. Bill told him every farmer in Kansas thought he had oil on the old homestead. He didn't, but if Jack wanted to drill, he could go ahead and drill. He would take half, plus the one-eighth royalty that goes to the landowner. Before the drilling was completed, he took the family to Varadero Beach, Cuba, for a short vacation. While they were sunning themselves, he received his first overseas phone call. "Bill," Jack Gaty shouted in his ear, "there's oil flowing all over your farm!"

Five producing oil wells have been brought in on the land bought because he wanted a landing strip and a place to keep a horse. Of the two now operating, one is still pumping its quota of twenty-five barrels a day after nine years. The Grahams have an interest in many other oil and gas properties, but Bill says the unexpected oil well on the farm, in the duration and quality of its production, is probably the best.

One day, when he was about forty-five, Bill took a pencil and a scrap of paper and began to add and divide the best he could. "Marge," he said, "I've figured out that if we take a two-engine plane—one that costs about $60 an hour to fly—and fly around the world, staying at the best hotels when we choose to stop, we'll be richer when we get back to Wichita than before we started. Ain't that awful?"

Marge agreed. "We both realized we had reached our goal as far as making money was concerned. Now it was up to us to do the worth-while things we had promised ourselves we would do. We wanted to make a greater contribution to life that had been so good to us—but how to do it posed a real tough problem. Charity or gifts, we knew, was not the answer. They have a way of backfiring; and besides, we did not have enough money to make a real dent in any of the world's ills."

Bill had been brooding along these lines since they had visited India in 1952. The bitter poverty they saw in Calcutta—thousands of people, emaciated and hungry, sleeping on the streets—was something he could not erase from his mind. Later, Bill told Tom Orr he was thinking about taking his family to India to live for a year, not in luxury as most foreigners and fabulously wealthy Indians do, but to live right with the very poor. "It would be good for the kids," Bill reasoned, "let them know what real poverty is—and maybe we could help some of those people."

"Here's your supper, mom. I'll try to whip up some dessert."

"Bill," Tom said, "you're crazy—no, you're not!" He asked Marge one day when he saw her alone what she thought of Bill's notion to take her and the six children to India to live in poverty for a year.

"I think it is a very good idea," Marge said quite seriously. "If that's what Bill wants to do, that's what we'll do."

They did not go to India to live in poverty for a year, though Bill still thinks it is a good idea. Seeking a practical way to be useful to society on another occasion, he decided—not for the first time—that he just adored Marge, that he was a lucky man to have her for a wife, and that it was all because of the extreme care he took in selecting her. "There would not be so many unhappy marriages if couples would match themselves more carefully," he concluded. "If they cannot do it themselves, what they need is a Mate Selector Machine to do it for them."

He visualized his Mate Selector Machine as a device into which relevant requirements, qualities and characteristics of couples planning to marry would be fed, perhaps punched on tape or cards, and an indication of their chances for a happy marriage would come out. Bill was ready to contribute money for the development of such a device, and he made a special trip to Los Angeles to discuss the project with Paul Popenoe, director of the American Institute of Family Relations. Dr. Popenoe pointed out some of the difficulties—the number of factors needed and the problem of determining them objectively—and Bill's Mate Selector Machine did not materialize. He has the satisfaction of knowing that much has been done in the development of tests for marital success since, some showing a high degree of accurate prediction, and it is not unlikely that an automatic mate selector will one day be constructed. Marge thinks the secret of how she got Bill will still remain with God, however.

The idea for Private Enterprise, Inc., began during a family around-the-world vacation in 1957. The adventures of a family of eight, with six children ranging in ages from six to sixteen, on a trip around the world would make a book in itself, but there is space here for only a few highlights. Moreover, Bill Graham has gone around the world three times since 1957; the Graham family, except Becky, spent two months circling South America in the summer of 1959, and in November Bill spent twenty days in South Africa. With the development of Private Enterprise, Inc., the cast of characters in the Graham drama expands to many thousands and the setting becomes the world.

On the family around-the-world trip, Becky handled all hotel and travel arrangements, following Bill's simple edict: "Nothing complicated now! No advance reservations—we don't want to be tied down to a schedule!" Although each girl was assigned a boy to help and supervise, the usual squabbles developed. In Honolulu they held their first council and took a vote as to whether to send Jackie, who had misbehaved, back to Kansas. He squeaked through by a four-to-three vote, just as he was sure he would. Grinning, he said, "When we cross one more ocean, you'll have to send me back *front*wards, won't you?"

In Japan, when Bill found that people could climb Mt. Fujiyama, with which he was wholly familiar from calendar prints, he was determined that the entire Graham family would climb it. Marge's travel diary tells it best:

> I, of course, was practical, logical, and told him that we could never do it—Jackie at six was too young. I would be happy to stay in Tokyo with the two small boys. He and the rest of the children would have more fun without us.
> Bill, pleasant, but in his "I've set our sail" mood, took us shopping in Tokyo for long underwear, rubber-soled shoes, etc., for the climb. "Now, Marge," he said, "you might change your mind—and if you do you'll be glad we have their warm things." I knew I was sunk. I grew subtle. . . .
> "Jackie looks like he's coming down with a fever."
> "Too bad—we'll take his temperature."
> About this time I remembered those lectures I had delivered to the kids—"Now we must be good sports, and be willing to try new things in order to get the most out of this trip." So we went out from Tokyo—long underwear, rubber-soled shoes and all. And we were saved—it rained.
> Reprieve! Happily I enjoyed my bath and massage at the Fugiya Hotel. It rained the next day too. The gods were with me, I thought! But after twenty years I still hadn't reckoned with the Graham whim (of iron). What a terrible thing to be a part of a family that has the do-or-die attitude! The next morning we were up and on our way to the train station, at six—me with my best "we must be good sports" smile, the kids in assorted humors—and no breakfast.
> We reached the base of the mountain once more, and it wasn't raining!
> "Now, Marge, I'm not going to force you," Bill said. "You can turn back at any time." But I knew I was a "gone goose," for in my family the impossible is always possible—if you try.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE, INC.

The purpose of Private Enterprise, Inc., the company Bill Graham heads, is to make a profit by investing in small businesses, mostly in undeveloped foreign countries. Its corollary purpose is "to strike Communism at the grass roots." Only 10 per cent of its funds will be invested in the United States. The investment in any single business is usually limited to $10,000. It is made only in businesses that have a good chance for a high degree of success and where foreign investors will supply matching funds. Profits (or losses) are shared equally. The foreign entrepreneur is guaranteed the privilege of buying the entire business when he has doubled the total original investment.

And it's a sin to be a quitter. I had to climb Mt. Fuji.

We hired four guides and up we started. We began what in my memory seems to be just lifting up one foot and then the other—on and on and on. We climbed steadily for about four hours and stopped at the eighth station cottage, about 10,000 feet, where we stopped for the night.

We stayed in the sack until 4:30 the next morning, though I don't know why, for only the little ones did much sleeping. On my trip out to what could, by a stretch of the imagination, be called a toilet, I found I couldn't lift my right leg high enough to step over the doorsill. Two thousand three hundred and ninety-five feet straight up to go, and I couldn't lift my leg! In a half hour, after a repast of toast and tea, we were on our way. The climb was steep and with every step my leg cried out to stop this foolishness. I really wanted o stop, but how could I face the kids if I stopped? 've climbed on and on—one foot after the other. ackie came back to see how I was.

"Mommy," Jack said, "there's a bee-u-tiful ew if you'll stop looking at your feet!" And ire enough, there was—the whole panorama of apan's countryside, with green valleys and blue kes stretched below me. It was a breath-taking ght, but I had little breath at this point.

About this time the guide came up to me and id, "I help you, mamma-san." He put a rope ound my waist and the two ends over his oulder and proceeded to pull me up the ountain. By this time I had no pride at all. very fifteen or twenty feet he would stop for me rest, and above me I could see and hear my ildren calling, "You can make it, mommy. e're proud of you!"

My guide asked, "Mamma-san, how old are u?" How old was I? Hadn't I just had my ty-first birthday the day before? Every muscle hin me ached, every joint was grinding. ife, to the Grahams, is like that mountain nb. Each step, each year must surpass the . This is, of course, impossible—but that is always possible. Here is Marge's account, scribbled in haste without thought of publication, of their approach to Calcutta and the beginning of Bill's big idea:

The big Constellation was tossed about by the mighty turbulent air: it lurched and dipped and groaned and circled for sixty long minutes, I heard the mechanism that works the flaps and wheels, and I knew we were going in to land. I pressed my eyes to the window. Nothing was visible—even the navigation light on the wing tip was a blur of red. I prayed—as I always pray in emergencies—and then the wheels hit the runway, and I said a prayer of thanksgiving. It was a sorry-looking group of Grahams that filed off that airplane—half sick, sleepy, weary, disheveled. . . . Then we saw our Indian friend, Gautum Khanna. Our spirits lifted. We were in India—India, land of vast poverty, or unbelievable wealth—a land where the people are just waking to its potential, a land important to everyone's freedom.

We went sight-seeing the next day. The guide began by telling us that Calcutta is not a very old city—just a little over 300 years old. How young our wonderful United States is! Three hundred years ago it was not even a dream. But Bill eyed grimly the truly unbearable poverty of the ocean of people around us, and he had an idea. . . .

His idea had begun to take form in Bangkok, Thailand, where Bill met several bright young men waiting to get a government job. "Why don't you start your own business?" he asked them. They replied they had no capital and no way to get any. Bill then offered to put $5000 into the businesses of each of five young men. Word got to the newspapers and the next day he was mobbed by applicants. In India, after making a similar announcement, he was besieged by many hundreds again. He felt certain that he had struck something fundamental—no man who owns a business is eager to become a Communist—and it seemed to him it ought to be highly profitable as well.

Marge's travel diary becomes very sketchy after Calcutta. There are some brief notes of interest—for example, Jackie's plaintive plea:

"Please come and get Ted out from under Marge. She's sitting on him and I want him to play with me."

And the camel ride on the road to Agra:

"Mommy hasn't had a turn—mommy wants a turn!" Most emphatically that was the last thing in the world she wanted. But I looked around and saw my three little boys, so thrilled with their first camel ride, and I knew they couldn't imagine anyone with soul so dead as not to want to ride a camel. So ——

Before they reached Europe the travel diary had been abandoned altogether. Father Bill was burning with an idea, not quite formulated, and he wanted to get back to Wichita and think it through. He had found a business big enough to challenge him or any man, and Marge knew there would be no letup until he made it a success. And if this was his desire, it was hers also. She would work with him without the slightest doubt of ultimate triumph and only a little weariness from the wild ride and the rough road ahead.

After Private Enterprise was established as a corporation, Becky wrote to her father, who had been absent from his family over Thanksgiving on company business:

We all missed you terribly, and we gave thanks on that day, to God, that you are our father and that you are happy. Isn't life glorious? Many times I turn over in my lazy mind the question why I'm here, but no matter how long or hard I wonder, I always come out with contentment that I am, and I am thankful. . . . Youth is such a joyful, carefree time. Like money or material things, it can slip away so quietly and so damagingly suddenly. Yet, I suppose, if you play the game right, youth is never lost, but remains unto death.

The Grahams believe they are "playing the game right"—Bill most of all. He does not know what will be the outcome of Private Enterprise, but he is fighting every step of the way and loving every minute of it. He is on his way, traveling endlessly, driving relentlessly, speaking incessantly. To a group of businessmen, his speech is dynamic—and direct: "I've got a dream, see? I want to tell you about this dream because I can't make this baby come true without your help, believe me. I've made a lot of mistakes. I've made all the mistakes in the books. If you've got questions when I finish talking, I want you to give them to me real good ——"

In the offices of Private Enterprise, Inc., Bill sets a hectic pace. On the phone to Sam (or Merle, or Bill, or Dudley): "Sam, you are right! You are absolutely right! Now, don't you think it would be better if ——"

His business is not separated from his home and family, so home life is hectic too. On the phone to Becky at Northwestern: "Beck-o! I love you, you know that? Becky, you're wonderful! Are you still in the School of Education? When are you going to switch to business —— Becky!"

To any of his children's voices on the amplified telephone: "You want a dollar! Have you done any work? Look, here, Billy" (or Jackie or Teddy or Connie or Marge), "you are just about my Number One Kid this week. Do you realize that? You're my Number One Kid!"

And to Marge, who is always at the other end of the line: "Marge—do you know I love you? I love you! I love you just an awful lot—you know that? Marge, I want you to ——"

Do Face Creams Work Better at Night?

By HELEN F. PORTER

As a beauty consultant with a good healthy sense of curiosity about cosmetics, I've never been content to use a face cream without "checking up" on it. I'm constantly testing it to see whether it continues to give good results and to find out whether there's a better way it can be applied.

HELEN F. PORTER

Sometimes my experimenting leads to beauty news, as in the case of Polyderm, an unusually good face cream made by Prince Matchabelli. As those of you who have been reading my column know, I have been recommending this cream for some time. When used during the day, Polyderm kept my skin smooth and moist, healthier looking too. Recently, I tried something new with Polyderm. I used it every night before going to bed and discovered this: Polyderm seemed to give even better results when used at night.

Curiosity aroused, I contacted the research director who developed Polyderm. I had quite a surprise in store, for the scientific gentleman said the tests he and his colleagues had been carrying out confirmed my discovery. Polyderm does seem to work better at night, and for a very good reason . . . it works in perfect synchronization with sleep. As he explained it, Polyderm works at night like clockwork—recharging dry and tired skin.

It seems that when we sleep at night, one of the body's clock mechanisms sets off a signal that brings cell renewal to a peak of activity, and new skin cells form almost twice as fast as they do during the day. But as we get older, these new-forming cells no longer have the quota they once had of some very essential natural elements—polyunsaturates. These polyunsaturates, which are almost 50% richer in 20-year-old skin than in skin at 40, are very important for the smooth, fine-grained glow of youth.

This is where Polyderm enters the picture as a great boon to beauty: for this face cream recharges the skin with polyunsaturates whenever it is applied. But at night, during sleep, Polyderm recharges the skin at the very time skin cells are multiplying the fastest.

Polyderm's exclusive formula contains all 3 essential polyunsaturates, in stabilized, natural form. No other cream has this powerful "recharging" combination.

Yet, for all its potency, Polyderm is a light feminine cream. It penetrates quickly, moisturizing thoroughly—and it's absolutely greaseless. After I apply Polyderm, my pores never feel stuffed, and I never wake up to a grease-stained pillow.

I've been using Polyderm this new way for a month now—applying it every night to get the full benefit of its "recharging" power. (For extra moisturizing, I use it during the day under make-up.) I must say I'm thrilled with the results. My complexion has taken on a fresher, brighter, more youthful look. My skin never feels dry or tired, and what's more, it has a new, alive feeling every morning.

If you're using Polyderm now and would like to get even better results, try applying it this new way—every night. If you haven't tried this exciting cream yet, you can buy it at leading drug and department stores in three sizes: $2, $3.50, and $5, plus tax. Or get a sample size jar by sending 25¢, your name and address to Polyderm, c/o Prince Matchabelli, Dept. L-3, P.O. Box 98, Mt. Vernon 10, N. Y.

THE CUP

Pauline dimpled. "I'll knock twice next time," she promised.

Peter began to laugh, donkey-fashion, and his face slid into the latest expression he had devised to frighten his sister. The eyes glazed, the lids lowered to half-mast, the nostrils flared, and the upper lip curled, exposing an eyetooth.

Elaine turned away, shuddering. "Please," she said, "no more of that. You make me feel I've mothered a snake."

"You mean," Pauline piped, "after all the practicing he's done you're not going to let him look like that any more?"

George said, "Pauline, where are your shoes?"

Pauline looked at her feet. "Somebody stole them," she said calmly.

"If your shoes are lost," Elaine told her, "you'll go barefoot. Honestly, young lady, I'm getting out of patience with you." She hesitated and then continued, fully aware that this sort of thing was frowned on by psychologists, "Lillian Barnstead is a year younger than you, and she dresses herself and never loses anything. Why can't you be like her?"

"Well, why can't you," Pauline asked pleasantly, "be like Mrs. Barnstead?"

Elaine gulped. It was a direct hit. Amy Barnstead's neatness was legend.

George gave Pauline a pat on the rear. "Little girls don't talk to their mothers like that," he said.

"Mamma!" Launee, a dreamy-eyed eleven-year-old, came rushing into the room. "Mrs. Halverson's in the kitchen, and ——" Her glance crossed her father's, and she came to a dead stop. "Oh, dear." She backed up to the door, knocked frantically and began again. "Mrs. Halverson's in the kitchen, and she's crying."

"Oh, no!" Elaine said. "Why, Irene never cries; she's so brave." She hurried toward the door. "Something dreadful must have happened."

George blocked the way. "I'll speak to her," he said quietly, and Elaine suffered a twinge of apprehension.

"Now, George," she said, "I don't mind a little early-morning grumpiness, but if you think I'm going to let you ——"

George put his face in order. "This isn't early-morning grumpiness," he stated. "This is George Douglas setting out to do something he should have done long ago. As a matter of fact"—he leaned against the dresser and folded his arms—"I made up my mind last week when I brought Ted home and Irene Halverson followed us all over the house that I would speak up at the first opportunity. This is it."

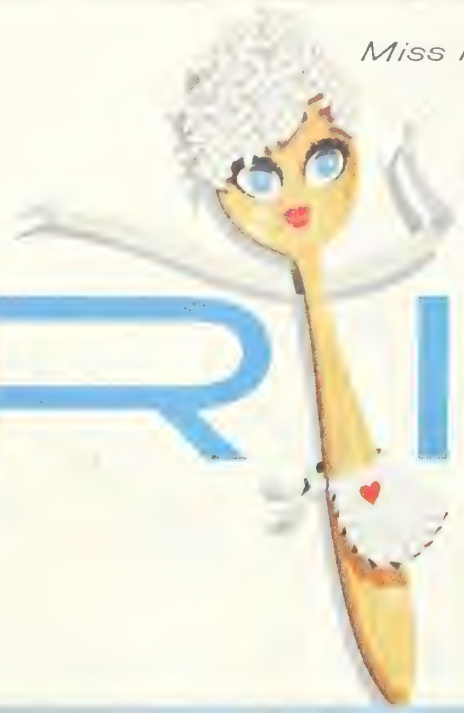
"Darling," Elaine said tearfully, "she didn't know he was your boss."

"Pal, she called him." George's eyes were hard. "She stuck her head off to one side the way she does and said, 'Nice workshop we have here, isn't it, pal?' And slapped him on the back."

"She's so hungry for friends," Elaine said. "So desperately hungry. And she can't see at all unless she holds her head at just the right angle. Now that's my idea of trouble, George. Real trouble." Agitated, Elaine took a turn about the room. "But do people feel sorry for her and try to help? They do not. They feel sorry for themselves because they have to look at her. And they avoid her when they can and say insulting things when they can't. Now I ask you, is that fair? How would you like it, George, if people hated you because of something you couldn't help?"

George said, "People don't hate Mrs. Halverson because of something she can't help. They hate her because she uses a weakness as an excuse for imposing on others and for not doing anything—anything at all—for herself."

"Now that's not fair," Elaine said warmly.



"There's nothing wrong with her hands, is there?" George demanded. "She's quite capable of washing her own hair, and you know it, but she trots over here every week wanting a shampoo for herself and that little girl of hers. And she expects you to do her washing. Believe me, Elaine, you aren't doing her yourself or your family any favor when you oblige."

"What I do for Irene is nothing," Elaine said. "Nothing at all. The important thing is that I'm willing to do it. That's what matters to Irene."

"Rubbish!" George's voice took on a singsong quality. "Now my grandmother was blind during the last years of her life, but her house was always as neat as a pin, and so was she. And she knitted scarves and mittens for her grandchildren. And baked bread and cookies on the day she died."

"And when Irene gets old," Elaine said sturdily, "I'm sure she'll be just like your grandmother. She's really a very fine, strong person. Why, I've seen her walk away from encounters that must have nearly broken her heart with her head high ——"

Miss FLUFFY RICE says:

"EASY, DELICIOUS! VERSATILE, NUTRITIOUS!

RICE IS YOUR MOST USEFUL FOOD!"

RICE MAKES GLAMOROUS DISHES AT BUDGET PRICES. Almost endless, the pretty (and good and thrifty) dishes you can turn out with America's wonderful rice. Like Floating Islands: Prepare vanilla pudding mix. Follow directions on package. Dilute with milk to thin sauce. Chill. Combine 3 cups freshly cooked rice with 3½-oz. can coconut. Shape into 6 servings; cool. Arrange in sauce; top with orange segments.

RICE HELPS CUT CALORIES. Because rice tastes good seasoned with things like bouillon and tomatoes—doesn't have to have rich gravies or butter—it can really help cut down on calories. For instance, this Rice and Shrimp Bake is a fine Lenten dish with only 160 calories a serving: Slice top from large eggplant. Scoop out pulp; dice about 2 c. Cover, simmer 10 min. with ¼ c. sliced celery, 1 c. tomato juice. Add 2 c. cooked rice, 4-oz. can button mushrooms, drained, 2 doz. cooked shrimp, ½ c. chopped green pepper, ¼ c. chopped onion, 1 tsp. Worcestershire Sauce, ¾ tsp. salt, dash pepper and curry. Fill eggplant shell; bake in mod. oven (375°F.) about 40 min. Serves 4.

RICE FOR AN EASY, DELICIOUS CHANGE! You'll find that rice makes a perfect partner for any meat, vegetable, or fruit. And it's so easy! There's no peeling, paring or washing. Remember, too, a pound of rice makes 12 servings. Tasty idea: cook your rice in bouillon instead of water if you want to skip the gravy.

Let rice help with your meal planning, beginning right now. Thrifty, wholesome, and so versatile . . . rice is your most useful food!

GIRL SCOUT CAMP JOBS

Girl Scout councils throughout the country are now considering applicants for summer-camp jobs. They employ women engaged in professions or business, preparing for careers, or retired. Salaries vary.

If you are interested in opportunities for service in a Girl Scout camp, call your nearby Girl Scout council, for information about camp jobs near home. "—— and her skirt two inches above her knees," George concluded. His expression grew quizzical. "You know, dear, in some ways you're as abnormal as these friends of yours. You meet a member of the great unwashed and immediately begin scratching through the dirt, hell-bent on uncovering a fine soul. Now normal people know instinctively that the condition of the body reflects the condition of the soul."

"Normal people," Elaine repeated, and the contents of the cup bubbled away, leaving it quite, quite dry. He thinks I'm crazy!

"My gosh, Elaine." It was George's turn to walk about the room. "My complaint's legitimate. No man in the world would put up with what I do. I'm tired of coming home to a zoo every night. I'm tired of bumping into Irene and discussing the weather with old Bill Dobbs and stepping on the Marney kids. Why can't we have decent, respectable people for friends? People like—like the Barnsteads."

Elaine sat down on the bed. "All right," she said flatly.

George viewed her with suspicion. "All right, what?" he asked.

"All right, I'll do what you want," Elaine said. "I'll send Irene and Bill Dobbs and the Marney children home, and I'll—uh—dig in Amy Barnstead for a while. Maybe she has a fine soul too."

"I'm perfectly serious." Elaine rose, smiling. The empty feeling wasn't so bad once you got used to it. "Come on, I'll prove it."

Irene Halverson and her small daughter Letty were seated at the kitchen table.

"Have some pancakes," Georgia, a plump teen-ager, was urging. "Mother says I make awfully good pancakes."

"Oh. I couldn't eat," Mrs. Halverson moaned. She was a small, skeleton-thin woman clad in a sequin-trimmed dress, a hat with an ostrich feather on it, and red ankle-strap shoes. "Oh, what'll I do, what'll I do!" And she rocked back and forth, a gaudy bundle of misery.

Georgia bent over her. "You won't have to do a thing," she said, accents warmly maternal. "We'll do everything. I'll bathe Letty every night when I do Becky, and mamma will make those old busybodies wish they'd never been born. Oh, mamma"—as Elaine entered the kitchen—"the most terrible thing! They're trying to take Letty from Mrs. Halverson!"

"Mrs. Barnstead is passing around a partition," Ronnie elucidated, attacking his eighth pancake with gusto. "What's a partition?"

"It's something I'd like to pass around," Peter declared, "right where it would do the most good."

He opened a large book, chuckling quietly.

"Quiet, children," Elaine said. "What's the trouble, Irene?"

Irene blew her nose. "It's just like they say," she explained miserably. "The old bags around here are passing around a paper saying that I'm an unfit mother and that Letty should be ——" She broke down, gasping, "Oh, don't let them, don't let them!" One clawlike hand extended appealingly. "I couldn't live without Letty, you know that."

"Don't cry," Georgia told Irene comfortingly. "Mamma will fix everything. Why, you're the best mother around here. You keep Letty with you all the time, and you teach her things. Not many little girls only three years old can tie their shoes and say the alphabet. You'll speak to the ladies, won't you, Mamma?"

"Yes, speak to them," Irene wept. She lifted her head, the right eye swiveling frantically as it searched for a focus.

"Dear," George began haltingly, "maybe ——"

But Elaine said, "I'm sorry, Irene, but I'm afraid this is a legal matter. You'd better talk to the district attorney."

Irene said "Oh" and the room grew absolutely silent. "Will you go with me?"

"I'd love to," Elaine assured her, "but I'm going to be busy today. I'm sorry."

Irene said "Oh" again and achieved, finally, focus. Two spots of red appeared on her cheekbones. "Well, in that case"—she picked up a bundle of laundry—"you probably won't have time for this either. Come on, Letty."

And she marched out with her head high, and her dress two inches above her knees.

George said, "Dear, don't you think maybe you were ——" He broke off as Elaine looked at him. "Dear, you did the right thing."

Peter, absorbed in his book, laughed. "Anisometropia!" he said, rolling the syllables off his tongue. "Boy, there's sure some good words in here!"

Elaine glanced over his shoulder. He was reading a dictionary.

"Really, Peter," she said, annoyed, "I wonder if you realize how ridiculous you are."

The boy's neck reddened. "I—I'll go clean my room."

"Say!" George pulled Elaine to him and gave her a little shake. "We only kid around here, remember?"

Elaine smiled. "Do you know, dear," she said, laying a finger on his collar, "it's often occurred to me: you're probably the only man in town who wears a tie on his day off."

George's hands couldn't have jerked away faster if they'd been burned.

Launee came into the room holding the baby a careful six inches in front of her.

"She's wet!" she announced. "She wants her mother."

Elaine held up her hands, palms out. "Well, I don't want her," she said and turned away.

Identical expressions of horror blanketed the children's faces.

"I'll take her," Georgia said quickly. "Launee, you finish daddy's pancakes."

"I don't believe I'm hungry," George said.

"Well, in that case"—Elaine studied the kitchen windows thoughtfully—"I wish you'd go around the house and start taking down curtains. I'm going to wash everything in the house today. But everything. And, Pauline, I want you to run over to Barnsteads' and tell Mrs. Barnstead I'd like to see her when she can spare the time. I'll be in the basement."

Amy Barnstead, hair neatly pinned, dress impeccably ironed, clattered down the basement steps.

"Now see here, Elaine," she cried, ready for battle, "you can talk until you're blue in the face, and it won't do you any good. I'm not going to have Letty Halverson raised in the same neighborhood as my Lillian, and that's that."

"I don't blame you," Elaine said. "Lillian's a lovely girl." She lifted a tablecloth. "Does this look white to you, Amy?"

"We-ell." Amy scrutinized the cloth. "A rainy-day white, maybe."

Elaine sighed. "That's what I thought." She added it to a huge pile. "I'll bleach it."

Amy moved to the washer and stuck her finger in the suds. "Here's the trouble. Your water isn't hot enough."

"Oh, dear." Elaine stuck her finger in the suds too. "I'm using both washers, and it's hard for the heater to keep up. But it's nice and warm, Amy!"

"Well, you can't have white washes with nice warm water," Amy told her. "It has to be almost boiling." She looked around the basement. "And you shouldn't try to do everything in one day."

"What else do I do wrong, Amy?" Elaine said grimly.

Amy's eyes narrowed. "You're in a funny mood," she said. "Well, let's see." She stroked her chin with thumb and forefinger. "Of course your main trouble is that you try to do too much. No one—not even you, Elaine—can lead a choir, be a den mother, and take care of seven children and a nine-room house too. Not properly, they can't."

"You're right," Elaine said. "I'll give up the Scouts and the choir."

"And all those pigeons and rabbits and hamsters out there"—Amy jerked her head toward the garage—"they ought to go too. Animals are expensive and covered with germs. I've never allowed my children to have pets."

"Then I won't either." George started down the steps, screw driver in hand, and Elaine smiled up at him amiably. "Dear, your wife has just decided to give up the Cub Scouts, the choir, the pigeons, the rabbits and the hamsters so that she'll have more time for your home. Isn't that good news?"

George said stiffly, "The pets belong to the children."

"Nonsense!" pronounced Amy. "Nothing belongs to children. They're not of age."

The basement door opened and Georgia bellowed, "Mamma! Mrs. Marney's here!"

"That's nice!" Elaine bellowed back. "Send her down."

"Oh, Mrs. Douglas!" Evelyn Marney stumbled down the steps too excited to be interested in footwork. "I'm sorry to bother you, but it's important. Terribly important."

"It's always good to see you," Elaine said, staring. Could this vivid young woman be the defeated, pasty-faced Mrs. Marney?

"I've decided"—Evelyn slid down the last two steps—"I've decided to leave Mitch. Yes, I have. And he can"—she laughed tremulously—"he can stay out all night every night, and I won't need to know or care!" Her eyes shone. "I feel as if a nightmare had ended!"

"Leaving your husband won't solve anything," Amy said disapprovingly.

"Oh, but it will, it will!" Evelyn insisted. "I'll be able to think—it seems like such a long time since I've been able to think—and maybe I'll be able to figure out what went wrong with Mitch and me, and know what to do about it."

Elaine said, "Where are you going?"

The girl turned pink. "Home. I haven't seen mom in three years, and there's nobody like my mom. She thinks I'm important, you see. And she'll scold me and love me and—and remind me to say my prayers." Her voice quavered slightly.

"Ah, but you're not a little girl any more," Amy pointed out. "You're a grown woman with four babies."

Evelyn's lip quivered. "I'm hoping you'll watch the children just once more so I can pack and leave before Mitch gets home. You will, won't you?"

"I'm sorry, dear," Elaine said, "but I have this tremendous washing, and I just couldn't today."

"But Mrs. Douglas!" Evelyn's eyes opened wide. "It means everything to me."

"I'm sorry." Elaine moved to the automatic washer which was nearing the completion of its cycle. "Some other time, maybe."

"Some other time won't do!" Evelyn's tongue darted around her lips. "Right now—right this minute—I can leave Mitch, but if I see him . . . I might not . . . be able . . . to." She gave Elaine one quick animallike glance of appeal and looked at the floor again. "You're sure you can't watch them?" she asked.

"I'm sure," Elaine said firmly.

"Well—thanks anyway." And Evelyn dragged herself back up the stairs.

Elaine dropped an armload of clothes into a basket. "These are ready to hang. Amy, I'm going to start some towels, and then I'm going to take you on a tour through the children's rooms. They're always in a clutter, and maybe you can tell me what to do about it."

The children surrounded Elaine, complaining bitterly and noisily. She put her hands over her ears. "Hush!" she said. "Be still, every one of you. We're going to follow Amy's suggestions, and that's that."

"But my stamps!" Peter cried. "And my chemistry corner."

"And my blackboard walls," Georgia wailed.

"And our playthings!" Launee wept. "Mamma, you know very well we've always played house in my room."

"Your father will fix you a playroom in the basement," Elaine said. "From now on the bedrooms are to be used only for sleeping."

Here are a few of the most famous bachelors of world history: Michelangelo, Rafael, Petrarch, Alexander Pope, Sir Isaac Newton, Schopenhauer, Charles Lamb, Whittier, Swinburne, Voltaire, Cecil Rhodes, Phillips Brooks, John Burroughs, James Buchanan, Walt Whitman, Lewis Carroll, Henry James, Lord Kitchener, Chopin, Liszt, Beethoven and Paganini.

"And just where," George asked politely, "is this playroom to be located?"

"Well, dear," Elaine said, "there's lots of unused space in your shop. Georgia, you'd better start making sandwiches. It's way past lunchtime. If anyone wants me"—she fled down the hall—"I'll be in the basement."

She put the last batch of clothes in the washer and then, on an impulse, took off her dress and put that in too. There! she thought triumphantly. That does it! And I'll stay up tonight and iron, and tomorrow we'll be as clean as the Barnsteads.

"Mamma!" Launee opened the door a crack. "Becky threw something in the you-know-what, and it flooded."

"Oh," Elaine said. "Well, go tell your father."

"I did." Launee opened the door a little wider. "He said, 'Who cares?'"

"Oh," Elaine said again. "Well, go tell Peter then. He'll care."

"Mamma!" Georgia's head appeared above Launee's. "Mr. Dobbs is on the front porch." She giggled in spite of herself. "He thinks it's going to rain."

"You shouldn't laugh," Launee reproved. "It isn't funny to Mr. Dobbs."

"Rain!" Elaine rolled her eyes. "There isn't a cloud in the sky! Tell Mr. Dobbs ——" But there was really no point in putting it off. "Tell him I'll be right up."

"Oh, Mrs. Douglas!" Mr. Dobbs, plump, white-haired, desperate, seized her wrist with fingers of iron. "It's going to rain!"

"What makes you think it's going to rain?" Elaine asked curiously. "It's a lovely day."

"I can feel it!" The old man raised his head and scanned the heavens fearfully. "The air is beginning to press closer to the earth. And soon it will be as dark and cold and damp"—his voice was sepulchral—"as the grave. Oh, Mrs. Douglas, I can't go through it again, I just can't! What shall I do?"

"I'm sorry, Mr. Dobbs," Elaine said, "but I can't help you."

The old man stared at her, his terror submerged in astonishment.

"Aren't you going to tell me about how the rain brings flowers?"

"No," said Elaine.

"Or describe how it washes the air, making it clean and fresh and nice to breathe?"

"No," said Elaine, "I'm not. And after this, when you think it's going to rain, don't come to me. There's nothing I can do about it."

She turned toward the door, waving casually at Amy Barnstead, who was standing, openmouthed, on the front steps of her home. And there flashed into Elaine's mind a picture of her dress churning away in the washing machine in the basement. Oh, dear! she thought. "Lovely day, isn't it?" she called.

Amy tossed her head and went into her house, slamming the door behind her.

The old cat, Elaine thought. I wonder who she'll report this to.

"Mr. Dobbs," she said, "it's really a beautiful day, and while there's a chance that it might rain, there's also a chance it might not! You think about that."

She patted the leathery cheek and slunk into the house.

"Mother!" Georgia confronted her, scandalized. "And you yell at me if even one little inch shows!"

"And I'll yell at you again," Elaine said, shoving past. "Go peel some potatoes."

She fled to the basement, weeping.

George came out of his workshop. "What's the matter?" he asked.

"Nothing," Elaine sniffed. "I'm just disgraced for life, that's all."

George looked interested. "Well," he said, crossing the basement, "let's have the sordid details."

Elaine lifted her head. Tears poured silently down her cheeks. A sob caved her chest in. "It's like this: I've been trying all day to be normal—like you wanted—but just now I went out on the porch and talked to Mr. Dobbs—like this. Oh, George!" She buried her face in his handkerchief. "I am crazy, aren't I?"

George put his arm around her. "Now let's get this straight," he said. "You forgot you didn't have your dress on?"

"Yes."

"And you went out and talked to Mr. Dobbs with just your slip on?"

"Yes."

"And you want to know if I think you're crazy?"

Elaine trembled. "Yes."

"Darling"—George shook his head sadly—"I know you are."

Immediately Elaine felt better. "Oh, George. I'm not either. Crazy people don't feel bad about the things they do, and I feel terrible."

"Oh, yes, you are," George insisted. "You are completely and absolutely and positively nuts, and I was never so happy about anything in my whole life." He mopped his forehead. "You see, dear, what I had in mind was for you to be mean to others and nice to your family, but I guess nutty people don't operate that way. So please, I beg of you, never attempt normality again." He drew a deep, quavering breath. "Another day like today would kill me." Elaine laughed. "What's funny?"

"Nothing," she said. A lovely liquid warmth was relieving the dryness of the cup. My, she thought, I must have really been cross today. She laughed again.

The basement door opened, and Launee's gentle voice trickled down.

"Mamma, Mrs. Halverson is here, and she says her washer is going and do you have anything for her to do? And Mrs. Marney just took Becky and the baby over to her house. She says you need a rest. And—and Mr. Dobbs wants to tell you something."

A worn shoe moved out into the air and settled cautiously on the top step. The rest of Mr. Dobbs followed.

"I'm sorry"—he was red-faced with anxiety—"that I upset you, Mrs. Douglas. I'm almost certain it isn't going to rain. Almost certain."

He maneuvered awkwardly and disappeared.

Elaine turned toward her husband. "Now what," she asked, perplexed, "does that prove?"

George shrugged. "Nothing, I guess," he said, "except that your friends seem well aware of a truth that I caught a glimpse of today. Life without love is absolutely impossible." Emotion smoldered deep in his eyes.

"Darling," Elaine said lightly, "do you know what's the matter with you? You're hungry. Come on, I'll fix you a sandwich."

He said, "You do that," and Elaine led the way up the stairs, humming a little tune.

It was a nice world.

CHILDREN NEED SOMEPLACE TO GO AND SOMETHING TO DO

of some way to get the kids off the streets that they'd feed them. We don't have much trouble with delinquents in Bristol, but on Halloween sometimes there's roughhousing. There wasn't a bit of it that night though."

Today, Bristol has the lowest delinquency rate of any town of its size in the area. Townspeople attribute the good record almost entirely to the recreation program. There are always a few who stand up in town meeting every March and say that the tax money ($6200 for recreation, $1000 for gym classes out of the current $15,275 budget, which is completed by donations from clubs and industry) should go to education instead or that recreation is a lot of danged nonsense. But bit by bit they are being won around.

"Times are different from what they used to be. Most everybody years ago kept a cow or two, and some hens. Children had chores to do. But there are very few wood boxes to fill up today. I guess children have got to have someplace to go and something to do."

Almost 90 per cent of Bristol's youngsters, grades five through twelve, are active in the center's programs, a survey has shown. Newcomers to the town quickly learn there is a welcome for everyone.

"We were pretty worried about how our seven-year-old would make out in a strange town," one parent admits, "but the recreation program gave him all the friends he could possibly need."

The Community Center has a paid staff of one full-time director, his wife on a part-time basis, an ice-skating-rink attendant, and two lifeguards for summer duty at the beach donated by a resident. Teen-age and adult volunteers assist the summer playground program and day camp. Mothers and fathers donate cars for transportation, help teach dancing, tumbling, rope jumping, forestry.

Open all day and nearly every night, the center building's facilities are available free to clubs, service groups and even private families. Equipment for summer camping and winter sports can be borrowed from the center without charge.

"I feel I have four fine children," says Mrs. Filteau up at the dry-cleaning store, "and I have to thank the Community Center a lot for it. Even if I hadn't been a working woman ever since we came here fourteen years ago, I don't know that I could have given my youngsters the things it did. They're all grown now, but they still come home and want to know what's going on down there.

"If you ask me, it's a mighty wonderful thing."

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

classes three nights a week—and I knew I'd have no energy to cook. I'm not a master chef anyway. So I picked up potato salad and a couple of barbecued chickens, which happened to be on sale And some canned goods for the pantry shelves.

"When I walked into the house Jack was reading the evening paper. He hadn't done the vacuuming or washed the ash trays, which are his chores. He hadn't even hung up his clothes. His jacket and his big, clumsy shoes lay on the floor beside the pajamas he'd tossed aside that morning. His razor decorated the coffee table.

"He didn't get up to help me with my load of groceries. He didn't even say hello. When I suggested he put away his jacket and shoes, he didn't budge. When I asked him for a dollar and a quarter to pay for his barbecued chicken he said chicken was too high-priced for his budget for the week—and that he'd already eaten a hot dog at the corner drugstore. I ate my chicken in the kitchen and put his in the freezer, so he couldn't change his mind and eat it later. There was more trouble when I drank a bottle of soda pop Jack had bought. He made me pay him for it.

"Half an hour later it was time for school. By then I guess Jack's conscience was pricking him. He gave me back my soda-pop dime. He helped me hunt my books, I helped him hunt his, and we drove off together. No matter how mad or sulky Jack may be, he never forces me to take the bus to school. He accepts that drive as his financial responsibility.

"The rain was over. We turned on the radio to our favorite program and he let me hold his hand all the way. It was almost like old times, when we were sweethearts and not married. At school we separated—we go to different classes—and as usual he pulled away when I tried to kiss him good-by. Jack is studying banking subjects—the bank pays half his tuition—and I carry a regular commercial course. Frankly, I don't see much sense in throwing away my good money on night school, but I don't like to sit by myself in the evening and I don't want Jack to outstrip me intellectually. Mother says it's always a mistake for a wife to lag behind.

"On the drive home I still felt warm and loving toward Jack. I suggested he put his arm around me, but he said he needed to keep his attention on the road. He wasn't so scary in a car when we were single. On the contrary, I had a struggle to keep our petting from becoming too strenuous. I was hurt by his coolness, but I didn't let him know. I suggested we stop and bowl for a while. Jack said it was too late, that he was too tired. I suggested we stop in the neighborhood tavern and dance one time. I was crazy to dance. I almost begged. Jack said in a nasty voice that he was still tired, and that there would be a crowd at the tavern.

"I wondered why he'd mentioned the crowd. I wondered if there was another meaning behind the remark; I wondered if he hesitated now to appear with me in public. Jack and I used to go everywhere when we were courting—to dances, to the movies, to church, to the beach, to the clubhouse. Every Saturday and Sunday—and every other evening my mother permitted—Jack took me someplace. Since our marriage he hasn't taken me any place that is any fun. In twelve months we haven't been to six movies. We go to work, we go to school, we sit at home, and that is it.

"Some men who are glad to be seen with a Spanish sweetheart feel like hiding a Spanish wife. Quite often I wonder if Jack is secretly ashamed of me and is sorry I'm not blond and fair-skinned like his mother. Whenever I ask, he says he admires brunettes and thinks I'm cute—but that could be politeness. He never says he's glad we're married.

"Tears came in my eyes. Jack saw the tears. He asked if my cold was worse—I had told him about my sniffles—and then he said I could have his handkerchief if I needed to blow my nose. He had no idea I was unhappy. I was so frustrated by his dumbness that I nearly broke down and bawled like a baby. But I resisted. Long ago my mother taught me to control my feelings—she hates the stereotype of weeping, breast-beating, overemotional Latins. Jack, the insensitive oaf, recommended I use a gargle when we got home.

"When we reached there I made one last effort to recapture the loving warmth I'd felt for him earlier. I undressed quickly, put on one of my trousseau nightgowns—black lace, his favorite—but I wasn't fast enough. He was already sound asleep in a chair, and snoring. He was so anxious to escape my company he hadn't even bothered to take off his clothes. I shook him awake. We had a terrible battle. I threatened to go back to my parents; Jack told me to go ahead. I telephoned and asked mother to drive over for me, which she didn't really want to do. Even before I packed my clothes and mother honked at the curb Jack was half asleep again. He didn't suggest I change my mind. So off I went.

"Last night—I had been gone four days—Jack must have decided he missed me a little. He drove over to my folks' apartment as though nothing had happened and asked if I wanted to come back to him. I told him I would have to think about it. Mother is trying hard not to influence me, but I believe I know where she stands. She didn't approve of my marriage in the first place—she favored another sweetheart of mine—but she is firmly convinced wives should stick by their bargains and their vows. She has proved it in her own life. Years ago she took back and forgave my father, although he'd run off and been unfaithful to her.

"I seldom differ with mother, who is the smartest person I've ever known, but in my opinion Jack and I should stay apart until we learn how to establish a better marriage. I just can't understand what happened to us. On our wedding day a year ago we seemed almost ideally suited to each other. To be sure, his people are Scotch-English—his father and mother are divorced—and his religious training was less strict than mine. But religion has made no trouble. We're both Protestants.

"Jack and I didn't marry impulsively. We have known each other since our freshman year in high school. From the beginning he went all out to convince me that the differences in our backgrounds were trivial and unimportant. He talked long and loud about our similarities. Both of our families were poor. Both of our mothers worked, his mother as a cashier, mine as a kindergarten teacher. Both he and I were only children, both of us were studious. In our courtship days both of us loved athletics and dancing; both of us liked the same kind of music.

"We both held part-time jobs in the high school cafeteria where we met. He made and served the sandwiches and I served the salad and ice cream. The beau my mother preferred—his name was Peter and he was Spanish-speaking—worked behind the counter with us. Since I was going steady with Peter at the time, I smiled at the new boy but I didn't talk to him; Jack talked to me. From the first he was determined to cut out Peter. He offered to teach me to drive his jalopy—he was sixteen I was fifteen—if I would teach him Spanish.

"I accepted the bargain. Peter and I broke up and I started going steady with Jack. He learned only a few words of Spanish, but he joined our church and played on the basketball team. Jack hasn't been in church since we were married there a year ago, although I sing in the choir every Sunday. Back in our high school days he was generous with his car. I'm stupid mechanically and it took me quite a while to learn to drive. Occasionally we skipped school to fit in my driving lessons.

"One fine morning we were tooling along with me at the wheel. Unfortunately, I passed a police car on the wrong side. The police stopped us and asked to see my license. I had no license. They then asked why we weren't in school and we had to admit we were cutting class. Worse still, when they asked Jack for his address he was so rattled he couldn't remember the street number and said he did not know where he lived. He tried to explain I had recently moved to the neighborhood, but the police decided we were smart-alecky kids and needed a good scare.

"They handed us a summons. Next day our two mothers met in juvenile court. Both of them had to take off the afternoon from their work. My mother tried to be sympathetic, but she was upset and frightened I might turn into a delinquent. His mother was furious and showed it. She snubbed my mother and me and insinuated that I had started her son on the road to ruin. Our case was dismissed. Several weeks later Jack wanted to introduce me properly to his mother and he took me to his grandparents' house where they were living. His mother jerked down the window shade and wouldn't answer the door. I didn't meet her again until Jack and I announced our engagement four years later.

"Jack's mother isn't a bad sort as mothers-in-law go; at least she doesn't interfere with us or meddle in our affairs. But I don't like her. For one thing, I can't forget the way she humiliated me when I was a scared kid and needed a friend. For another thing, she belittles Jack. Last month he got a raise at the bank and told her in great excitement and she said, 'Well, it's high time.' Last semester his night-school grades were the highest in the class, but she reminded him that his previous grades were only average. Despite her meanness to him, Jack hurts me by crediting her with every bit of the success he has achieved. If there is any credit to pass around it should go to me and my mother. She and I persuaded him to continue his education and enter banking when he finished high school. His mother and grandparents were willing for him to settle for a job in a grocery store.

Dinner is a major daily activity, which can be accomplished only by intelligent people. It is not enough to eat. To dine, there must be diversified, calm conversation. It should sparkle with the rubies of the wine between courses, be deliciously suave with the sweetness of dessert, and acquire true profundity with the coffee.

"Jack owes more to my mother than he will admit. All through high school he practically lived in our apartment. He ate half his meals with us. As soon as my mother realized how serious I was about him, she stopped trying to break us up. But she worried that we might become sexually involved. At her urging I discussed the problem frankly with Jack. When I quoted mother and the teachings of our church, he agreed we should be careful about indulging in heavy petting. In fact, he eventually agreed a kiss at the door should be our limit. At that time I thought Jack was noble and self-sacrificing; I now wonder whether he is cold by nature.

"Nowadays I can't get two words out of Jack, and since I'm on the quiet side myself our house is often like a graveyard. In high school we used to talk about our future home and the children we would have. I used to think Jack would make a wonderful father. He never talks about raising a family any more. He doesn't compliment me or make me surprise gifts any more. In high school he was always surprising me in wonderful ways. One day he told me I had pretty hands and asked what type of rings I admired. In art class that afternoon I drew a design for him. As a graduation present he gave me a diamond engagement ring, a perfect copy of my design.

"Both our mothers thought we were too young to marry—my father thought so too—and we promised to wait a year. We kept the promise. My mother then asked for another postponement. We waited a second year for her sake. The long wait paid. Jack saved enough to make a sizable down payment on a house—my parents also helped buy the house—and everybody thought we were set for a wonderful marriage

"My disillusionment started with our honeymoon. It was my first trip away from home and I expected a lifetime memory. Jack was tired from working to repair and refurbish our house—and he used the trip as a rest cure. It seems to me he slept the whole week. He wasn't a very satisfactory lover. Indeed, he seemed embarrassed and shy. One morning I saw him in the shower and he turned white with shock. That embarrassed me.

"When we got home we found my parents had redecorated our living room and I was delighted. Jack was furious. He promptly repainted the living room. That hurt my mother's feelings.

"Right off we had to report to our jobs and right off we had trouble about the housekeeping. I thought Jack should pitch in and help with the cleaning and cooking, as my father does. When he refused I hired an older woman from the church as a cleaner. He objected to the cost, which I paid. So I fired her. He then criticized my inefficiency and complained the house was always dirty. He even wanted me to hand him the same amount of money I'd paid the cleaning woman every week so he could apply it on house payments. I wouldn't do it. In my opinion a husband should provide his wife and family with shelter and food.

"When my birthday rolled around last July I got no present, although I had given Jack a fine camera for his birthday. Jack said he had forgotten the date, but I didn't believe him. He'd never forgotten my birthday before. He was punishing me because I bought myself a coat. He objects to my spending my money on my own clothes. I believe he would like to take complete charge of my weekly check.

"It breaks my heart to live apart from Jack, but I believe it will break my heart to live with him unless he changes. I want him to drive me to work without a fuss, help with the housework, remember our anniversaries and show me some warmth and affection. I want him to stop behaving like a child."

JACK TELLS HIS SIDE:

"Rita's childish selfishness is ruining our marriage," said tall, fair-skinned twenty-two-year-old Jack. "She wants to spend every penny she earns on clothes, on recreation and lavish gifts. She would like to blow in fifteen or twenty dollars every weekend when both of us should be studying. We can't spare the time or the money to run around like single people.

"Rita is more like a giddy, irresponsible girl friend than a real helpmeet. Up to now she hasn't invested a nickel in payments on our house and she once told me in a rage that she'd rather lose the place than put one penny of her earnings into it. It's a matter of principle with her. She figures I should be grateful because her parents helped with the down payment on the house and that the balance of the purchase price is my personal obligation.

"To Rita's way of thinking, a husband's money should support the family; a wife's money belongs exclusively to her. She gets fifty dollars a week; I get eighty-five dollars a week. I'm bankrupting myself to maintain our house and keep up the car payments. Unless she is willing to share the transportation expenses, I see no reason why I should drive her to work or anywhere else.

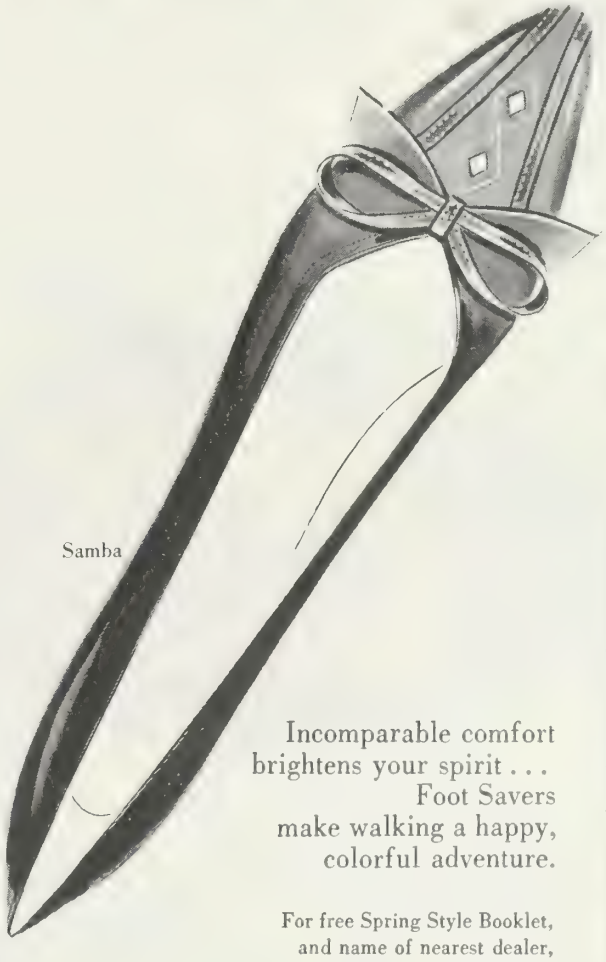
"Every time I get firm about it she gets mad and punishes me as though I were a schoolboy. She sulks, she won't talk, she pretends she doesn't hear a thing I say. Or she goes and spends the night with her mother on the pretext that her family's apartment is close to the bus line. Whenever Rita gets mad—and she gets mad often—she runs to her parents. She leaves me with an unkempt house, an unmade bed, an empty refrigerator. When she walked out last Monday I couldn't even find an egg, a slice of bacon for breakfast.

"I did find her lingerie soaking in the bathroom basin. Rita washes her own clothes, but she won't rinse out a pair of socks for me. Before she bounced off on Monday she chewed me out for leaving my pajamas and shoes in the living room, but she refused to clear the bathroom and hang up her laundry. The stuff is still soaking in the basin, and you can be sure I won't touch it. Maybe she can con her father into coming over and doing the job. He's the Milquetoast type.

"In our year of marriage Rita has packed and gone home three different times. I've lost count of her overnight visits. She has slept in her family's apartment more nights in the past year than she has slept in our house, and she has eaten more meals there. While I choke down a drugstore sandwich or patronize the local diner, she feasts on her father's baked ham or his wonderful pot roast.

"My father-in-law is chief cook and bottle washer in that setup. Rita's mother teaches school; Rita's dad operates a little restaurant and runs the family home as well. Years ago he strayed off the reservation with another woman and my mother-in-law took him back on the condition he would assume the household management. He cooks, sweeps, dusts, washes; once I saw him busy with the sewing basket. I must say he doesn't seem to mind his domestic duties and my mother-in-law assists him when she is in the humor. I'm sure Rita would love to turn me into a carbon copy of her dad, but I'm not available. I am a man and I intend to behave like a man in marriage.

"Within limits my mother-in-law isn't a bad sort. She was good to me as a kid; in some ways she was kinder than my own mother. It annoys Rita to hear me compliment my mother and she calls me insincere. I'm not insincere. Because Rita constantly praises her mother, I feel duty-bound to speak up for mine.



"My mother-in-law dominates Rita's actions and thinking and interferes with our lives in every particular—always, of course, for our own welfare. She tried to persuade Rita to marry a Spanish boy until she found that was impossible. I thoroughly disliked the way she masterminded our courtship. Every kiss Rita and I exchanged was promptly reported. Rita then relayed back to me her mother's reactions and how far her mother thought our petting should go. I respected my mother-in-law's concern for Rita—I think mothers should be concerned about their children—but the constant feeling of being under observation made me feel uneasy and self-conscious. To this day I regard my mother-in-law as a sort of third party or chaperon present at our love-making. It dulls my interest in sex. I don't suppose that fact matters much to Rita. She is a nice girl and I'm pretty sure she isn't very strongly sexed, even though at times she can be awfully mushy.

"Rita likes to hold hands and make a show in public. At the movies or in the car she drapes herself around my neck and gets mad when I push her away. At home if I want to clip the shrubs in peace she follows me outside and hangs around. It's almost impossible for me to walk around the block to think out a problem without her tagging along. I like to be alone when I'm busy and preoccupied.

"I've always thought that hugging and kissing belonged to teen-agers and little children who are at an age to crave affection. I can remember how hungry I was as a child for affection. I got little. My mother, a motion-picture cashier, worked too hard. She was always at her job when it was my bedtime and other kids' mothers were tucking them in and telling them stories. My grandparents worked hard, too, and I know they felt they were doing their part by providing a roof for my mother and me. Many evenings when the old folks thought I was in bed I sneaked out and went down to the theater. I would hide behind a billboard across the street and watch my mother selling tickets and wish the two of us could be at home together, a mother and child like other mothers and children.

"During those evenings I decided I wanted to grow up fast and have a child of my own to love. When I was a small boy it seemed to me I never owned anything. I shared a bedroom with my mother. I didn't have my own desk, my own bureau. I didn't even have a regular place to hang my clothes. One time, I recall, mother gave me a horn for Christmas, but I was allowed to blow it only when grandpa would not be disturbed. So it didn't seem like my horn. Grandma would let me use my scooter only when she sat on the porch and saw to it that I didn't get in the street. So it didn't seem like my scooter. I couldn't invite other kids to play in the yard because they killed the grass and were too noisy. So it didn't seem like my yard.

"I determined that all the things I couldn't have I would give a child of mine someday. After Rita and I started going together we used to talk about the children we wanted. I loved her, I thought she was pretty and I pictured her as the right mother for my child. After we married we had no more talks about children. Rita was too occupied combating me in every way. If we ever get around to having children, it will probably be because her mother has decided the time is right.

"Back when I dreamed of my future family I also dreamed of a wife who would be a tender, loving companion. Rita is no companion to me. In fact, I don't feel as though I have a wife. She is with me one day and gone the next. She won't cook or wash or clean for me. She takes no pride in our home. She even let her mother choose our color scheme. When we got back from our honeymoon we found our living room was painted yellow. I loathe yellow. Rita and I had our first fight when I painted the yellow walls a pleasant shade of dark green. She loathes green.

"By her own lights Rita considers herself generous. She gives me more presents than I give her; she overlooks no anniversaries. I don't need the gifts. I'd rather have cash to apply to the bills. On my birthday she gave me a fancy camera for which I can't afford to buy film. She gave her mother a set of books that cost twice as much as the camera. On Saturdays and Sundays when I think she should stay home, she either nags me to take her somewhere or goes off to church with her mother. I've nothing against Rita's religion, but she spends more time in church than she spends in our kitchen. I protest about her absences, but it does no good. She loves her mother more than she loves me."

THE MARRIAGE COUNSELOR SAYS:

"Youth explained most of the difficulties between Rita and Jack. Although they were in their twenties, in some respects they seemed almost too young to be married. In their treatment of each other they were behaving more like a competitive little brother and sister than a man and wife. In their efforts to cling to their personal independence and score over each other, they were of course sacrificing any possibility of achieving a harmonious marriage.

"Yet Rita and Jack were lonely, fearful young people who craved and needed each other's love, consideration and companionship. Their childhood backgrounds had left them emotionally insecure and unprepared to handle an adult relationship. Rita had been simultaneously dominated and pampered by her mother. Jack, too, had been dominated, even as he was pushed aside. Convinced as a small boy that he had been rejected, he grew up with insufficient self-confidence. Rita, who had felt handicapped among many of her contemporaries by her Spanish origin, was also low in self-esteem. Timid and inclined to hide their inadequacies and anxieties from each other, Rita and Jack were nevertheless very stubborn. The fact that each had been an only child undoubtedly disposed them to go it alone at the first sign of trouble.

"When sensitive Rita got her feelings hurt she didn't announce the truth to Jack and thus clear the air. Instead, her immediate reaction was to pay him off by hurting his sensitive feelings in return. Jack would then seize the excuse to hit back at her. This vicious circle had to be broken.

"Rita and I analyzed the whole series of marital misunderstandings and I helped her to interpret Jack's behavior. She hadn't paused to think about the 'why' of his actions or to wonder whether her actions had challenged him to treat her badly. When she recognized that most of his attacks on her were dictated by a wounded ego, something obvious to any outsider, she decided she would try to wound him less often. Neither she nor Jack was meanspirited. She moved back to their house in a different frame of mind.

"In the beginning of the counseling she and Jack and I discussed and defined the institution of marriage on an a-b-c level. Both required primary instruction. Jack hadn't been exposed to a normal home life in his formative years. His long-vanished father held no place in his memory or thinking. Actually, the man he knew best was his father-in-law, and he wasn't tempted to model himself upon that browbeaten man. Jack didn't know how to play the part of a husband.

"Rita had acquired her notions of how to be a wife by observing her strong-minded mother. She saw nothing peculiar in her parents' domestic arrangements, although her elders had reversed the usual roles of man and woman. Accustomed to her father's position in the family, Rita didn't understand why Jack objected to following her whims slavishly, fetching and carrying for her, bearing the major burden of the housework.

"In our second interview she conceded that she hadn't married a man like her father and that to be a successful wife she should learn to understand and value Jack for himself. Both she and Jack conceded that they had carried individualism too far and that sharing is an integral factor in every good marriage. They began to share their thoughts and inner hopes and their daily disappointments, too, by talking together instead of brooding in silence and bewildering each other with mysterious fits of the sulks. They stopped concealing their fears and frustrations and naturally increased their mutual understanding and drew strength from the communion.

"When Jack went outside to tend the garden and Rita followed, she didn't let him snub her into returning to the house where she could cook up some petty revenge for an imagined affront. She spoke up frankly and told Jack she wanted and felt entitled to his society. He then reminded himself that his exaggerated appetite for solitude was a leftover of his bachelor ways and out of place in marriage. In psychological terms Jack was what we call a 'low affect' person—which means, among other things, that he found it difficult to make affectionate contact with others. 'Low affect' people sometimes regard marriage almost as an invasion of privacy.

"Jack's standoffish attitude, an echo of his boyhood, was harming both him and Rita. Now he set himself the task of demonstrating in outward ways the fondness he really felt for her but which he had kept under wraps. The symbols of love were important to Rita—a compliment she could repeat at the office, an unexpected caress, a box of candy to mark an anniversary. It wasn't necessary for Jack to put undue strain on his already overextended budget in buying the little gifts. The cost of the love token didn't matter to Rita.

"In their sexual relationship the couple had got off to a poor start. During the courtship Jack had made up his mind that Rita was the type of girl who was little interested in sex. The opposite was true. To Rita, as to many young women, the rules of courtship and of marriage are radically different. A little reeducation helped Jack to realize that as a wife Rita welcomed his advances and was offended whenever she felt herself rebuffed. He learned to recognize the advances she made to him—he had supposed that nice women never took the initiative—and to respond to her. Once he changed his conception of her personality, he became more ardent. Rita stopped talking over their private affairs with her mother. She showed him by both words and deeds that he had the first place in her affections.

"Early in our consultations Rita and Jack sat down together and tackled the thorny subject of their finances. Not once in their year of marriage had they discussed the topic honestly and as a whole. Instead, they used picayune money differences to express other unspoken grievances. When Rita insisted that Jack shoulder nearly all the financial burden, she was voicing an old-fashioned conventional view and at the same time demanding that her husband show his love for her in a tangible way. When she grasped the fundamental error in her thinking on this point and fully understood that the lopsided budget was driving Jack into debt and driving his love away from her, she admitted she had been illogical and unfair. She then agreed to split the transportation, food and utility expenses. In exchange for Jack's carrying the payments on the house, which both considered his responsibility, she undertook to pay for all recreation.

"When she became more reasonable about finances, Jack became more amenable to assisting her at home. They divided various tasks so they could co-operate and operate as a team. He washed the dishes and she dried them. While he ran the vacuum cleaner, she dusted. While she cooked a meal, he put away the groceries and set the table. Thus each lost the lone-wolf habit of looking after himself without regard to the other.

"I haven't seen Rita and Jack for almost two years, but I heard the latest news from him the other day. He completed his evening business courses a year ago and now holds a better job at the bank. Rita has quit her job. She is awaiting the birth of their first child, an event that she and Jack are looking forward to with great joy. They have grown up emotionally and are prepared to greet the child with serenity and confidence."

in a hot skillet. During the winter months I was determined to be the doctor who found a cure for the common cold. In the spring, when I wasn't dreaming of being tagged by the New York Yankees, I was planning to be an explorer and unearth King Solomon's mines. I was both a cartoonist and a reporter on The Pony Express, our high-school paper, and when I wasn't creating a world-stopping cartoon I was plotting ways to set the old planet in better motion with a by-lined column to be called: Earth Is My Beat.

In the summer I was an apprentice carpenter at 75 cents an hour with the Boone Construction Company; and if you're thinking the similarity in names got me the job, you're right. But dad's partiality ended right there and my brother, Nick, and I kept those jobs by trying to work twice as hard as any of dad's other employees, even though the building business, for me, was a dead, dead end almost from the beginning.

At fifteen I was also a "semiprofessional" singer; professional when the Kiwanis Club or the Lions paid me $5 to sing pop and Western numbers at their banquets and semi when the Shakespeare Club paid me with a free meal for doing the same thing. I was also entering every possible kind of singing contest, and it was like being addicted to revolving doors because I always came out just where I went in—nowhere! I was dashing up one dead end after another, having a wonderful time investigating; and then suddenly, after losing all those contests in Nashville, Tennessee, I found myself on a straight, straight path that led me into the big, big world via Ted Mack's Amateur Hour and the Arthur Godfrey Talent Scouts in New York, and a hit Dot recording, "Two Hearts, Two Kisses," in Chicago. I popped out of the maze a singer—loving every minute of it.

The point is that few of us know, in the early teens, just where or when or how we'll emerge from the maze. But, li'l' brothers and sisters all, on that where and when and how hangs the fate of the world. Big talk? You bet. You have to use big talk to put over big ideas. And here is a big, big, BIG one.

The World of Tomorrow already belongs to those of you searching your way through that teen-age maze today.

Out of it will come our future Presidents, our First Ladies, the doctor who will lick cancer, our statesmen with blueprints for peace, the mothers who will raise another Young America, the teachers who will teach it, the first couple to pioneer living on Mars, maybe, and perhaps a girl who will finally outguess the Sphinx. What else? You name it! Whatever you can conceive and execute will be part of that World of Tomorrow.

Looking back now, that maze seems no maze at all really, but an exciting, very special teen-age land where every twist and turn presents a challenge and an opportunity. It's a God-given testing time, and we're supposed to make the most of it. There's some magic in it, too, 'cause each one of the interests you have is a key which may unlock for you a door that would be a dead end to me forever.

Now, how can you best find your particular way?

DIRECTION FINDERS

You really need a compass to guide you through the maze of opportunities to that thing best suited to you—and actually we all have such an instrument built in from birth, if we'll just use it. It has six parts that have to be oiled and set in motion if we're not to get bogged down or confused.

First, there's Imagination. You have to dream! That might raise a few adult eyebrows, because I know parents and teachers that "allow as how" whenever a teen-ager is assigned a chore or a good stiff piece of homework he's off immediately in a cloud of daydreams. But this is the wrong kind of imagination for the purposes I have in mind.

Here's the idea.

Last June when I was out in Hollywood making Journey to the Center of the Earth I went down to the Los Angeles public library. I like grazing through libraries and I browsed eventually into the Social Science room. A flock of high-school seniors appeared to have strayed in ahead of me and there they were pecking over one another's shoulders like pigeons after corn. I couldn't resist asking the librarian what had caused this astoundin' migration.

"Oh, they're doing a term paper on vocations," she informed me in a strenuous library whisper. "Every year about now we're mobbed when some of the English teachers hand out this assignment."

"They certainly seem to know what they want," I whispered back.

She laughed. "There is information on over four hundred vocations catalogued in separate folders in that enormous filing cabinet over there—everything from Accounting to Zoology—and each year nine tenths of them fight over six folders. The boys want Lawyer, Doctor and Engineer in that order, and the girls Air Line Hostess, Model and Nurse."

Now that's an example of limited imagination that could unbalance the world as completely as an H-bomb. Think of it! Stewardesses with no pilots to fly them. Models with no designers or textile manufacturers to put the clothes on their backs. Doctors with no druggists. Nurses with no hospitals. Engineers with no concrete. Lawyers with no Peter Gunns to catch them clients. No singers. No farms. Like help!

My curiosity over those 394 spurned vocations wouldn't stop until I had a look at the files. The seniors had overlooked some goodies, too—like Puppetry. If they had been the kind of eight-year-olds that I was, to make a living at puppetry would be almost as much of a lark as singing. And for something different—well, did you know that the Blacksmith is not extinct? In fact, a man who's handy with a hammer and anvil today could command $3.00 an hour. Then there were such novelties as Rigging, and Scrap, and Catering, and fat folders on old faithfuls like Teaching, Social Service, Newspapers.

There were few files, either, that wouldn't have been as worth-while exploring for females as for males. The times when girls were excluded from many fields went out almost fifty years ago with the bustle and the side saddle, long before you or I can remember. My mother has a little clipping that always made her chuckle, indicating how shocked conservative Boston was when the gals began their invasion into the man's world. It was published in a Boston paper in 1901:

Oh, we might have heard serenely,
Of the overthrow of kings,
Of the flight of many comets,
Of the fall of Saturn's rings;
But the world seems sadly muddled,
Things have surely gone amiss ly bold ride women their Boston nags
the like Since this.

Wow! What would they have thought of the Blue Jean Brigade or the Slack Set?

But the girls can still be as limited as they were in side-saddle days if their vision doesn't travel beyond Air Line Hostess, Model or Nurse. Also, I have a horrible feeling that some of those tired guys I saw sitting around the entrance to the maze swearing opportunity had passed them by were the very ones that couldn't dream anything besides Lawyer, Doctor, Engineer, and who found those fields out of reach either timewise, moneywise or talentwise.

It seems to me that the people who get in a rut, who come out of high school or college without a direction, settle disinterestedly for the first job they can get and then plow it for the rest of their lives, bog down because that Imagination needle isn't swinging freely.

The second needle that has to be set on your compass would seem to swing toward an opposite pole, but you need it for balance. It's Realism. You can call it being practical, down-to-earth, or whatever appeals to you, as long as you get it in motion. But if we don't couple this with our dreams we'll be "kooks" with our heads in the clouds and no legs to move around on.

There's no realism in planning to be an opera singer and fill the Metropolitan with

Serve the happy taste of Prunes

Prunes give a happy lift to any meal. The clean, cheerful taste of prune juice starts a happy morning. There's a light satisfaction about prunes and cottage cheese for lunch. And prune chiffon pie has a mellow delight.

At any meal, prunes are good to eat and naturally good for you. Plump, tender, tree-ripened California Prunes are chock-full of natural fruit sugar, A and B vitamins, iron and other essential minerals...all the things that make you healthy and give you a happy outlook on life. Treat your family to prunes often. Your grocer has them in cartons, bags, ready-cooked in jars or cans . . . and as appetizing prune juice.

Get that happy feeling with Prunes—the California Wonder-Fruit sound if you have a voice the size of mine, or being a melody writer if you're tone deaf. Or if you believe as one girl did, that "a lyric is something written to be sung by a liar." My math was much too limited for engineering. As for the New York Yankees, it looks as if Mickey Mantle still has a good year or two left in him.

A buddy of mine who teaches in high school told me that since the science-fiction craze has been coupled with the big push moonward, many of his freshmen students dream of being scientists. "And some of them will make it," he said. "But for quite a number it just isn't practical. Take the young dreamer who committed this amazing idea to paper: 'To separate hydrogen from oxygen in water (H_2O), evaporate the wet part and the rest is oxygen.'" Very little talent for being exact in an exact field, huh? Or would you have said the same thing? Don't look at me—I don't know how either!

You get the idea? Unless we check our dreams against our true potential and all the facts available, things just get mazier and mazier (I'm not sure there's such a word, but it says what I mean, anyway).

To get your Reality needle swinging freely, it's a good idea to work as an apprentice when and where you can. Try sizing yourself up honestly, and then discuss your aptitude for the things that appeal to you with impersonal observers like teachers or personal ones like parents, who often know things about our character and potential that we don't know ourselves. Read practical books as well as the kind that stimulate the imagination. Go to the library and browse. There's nothing square about a library (except the shape of the rooms). Honest!

Equally fascinatin' and realistic are the number of "supporting roles" required to keep each major industry, profession, and what have you, in full operation. Most of us start with dreams of being the star in a given field. If medicine attracts you, naturally you first want to be a doctor or nurse. But if everyone is to star, who'll do the technical and lab work? Who'll fill the prescriptions? Who'll plan the hospital meals for the patients? Or you like the smell of grease paint and the world of entertainment? So, of course, you want to be an actor or an actress, a singer or a dancer. But what if you can't act? Or sing? Or dance? Does that mean that, to be realistic, you have to give up this world of glamour? Not if you can sew. Or handle electricity. Or man a camera. No production ever went on without the full co-operation of the wardrobe mistress. No TV stage was ever visible without the electrician. No movie was ever "put in the can" without the cameramen. Don't think that there isn't real satisfaction in these jobs, either.

Robert Henri, a well-known artist, tells about the time he attended a private showing in a famed New York art gallery. He was admiring a fine canvas by Sargent when his attention was distracted by a big, brawny fellow standing beside him who looked like anything but a painter. "They have given me a good place at last," the fellow muttered to himself.

Henri couldn't resist asking, "Are you in this line of work?"

The man nodded. "Been in it twenty years and this is the first time I ever got such a good showing."

"Indeed?" Henri was puzzled. "And which is your work?"

"Right there." The man indicated the canvas in front of which they both stood with satisfaction.

"That . . . why, Sargent painted that," Henri said.

"Painted it? Oh, yes. I think Sargent was the name of the fellow who painted the picture. But it was me that made the frame."

He and Sargent were in the same line of work and he was proud of it.

Now, to keep us pliable while Dreams and Realism pull us first one way and then another, there's Flexibility. Flexibility is, so far as I can see, a mixture of 50 per cent courage and 50 per cent humor. You have to be daring enough to try things and able to laugh at yourself if you fall on your face.

So you want to be a ballet dancer? You study hard, stretch, bend, practice faithfully for years. And you can't make the grade. Are you going to fall apart? What if you've devoted your college years to a specialty, got your degree, and then find that you've no real taste for that profession? Are you gonna sit down inside the maze and sulk? Or are you equipped to start again? I've always been fascinated by the ability of people who have humor and courage to bounce right back and take another tack.

Add to Dreams, Realism, Flexibility three more direction finders and we should be able to find and stay on the beam. The additions are: Enthusiasm, The Ability to Work and a Purpose.

Enthusiasm is the fuel that keeps us running and without which we'd surely stall sometimes. It's what makes one girl consider babysitting a way to "meet interesting people" and another feel it is just a well-paid chore. It's a fresh point of view that cuts right through old established methods (say the horse and buggy) and comes up with something new (say a car or a plane). What if the first auto makers hadn't had enthusiasm?

The Ability to Work is an anchor for the visionary dreamer as well as a firecracker for the rut-sitter. It may get the one out of the clouds and the other into a standing position. It overcomes obstacles and "bad breaks." As a wise man once said: "Any time you want to wipe out hard luck, just use hard work as an eraser." People blame many things for their failures, even Divine Providence. But it's a good idea, before abandoning a project because you feel a lack of talent, to check how much effort you've put into it. Have you given it a fair shake?

Dr. Adam Clarke loved writing, and although he got a lot done, it was a slow, laborious job for him. A young minister, knowing him as a man of great faith, asked him if he prayed about it. "Oh, yes, I pray," said Dr. Clarke. "But I also get up very early in the morning." In other words, he worked!

Someone said that "genius is 10 per cent inspiration and 90 per cent perspiration." I don't know about that percentage, but I'm sure genius has the ability to work!

According to the Bible, the workman is always worthy of his hire. It's O.K. to enjoy your earnin's.

But money should get neither too much nor too little emphasis.

What Purpose, then, besides money, should spur us on in our search for a life's work? It seems to me that our natural aim should be twofold: Creativity and Service. In a book called Charting Your Course (Macrae Smith Company, Philadelphia) which I found while browsing in the library (Social Science room), the author, Henry S. Galus, speaking specifically to teen-agers, broke the opportunities for creativity and service into thirteen major fields. He said you could work to feed people, to shelter them, supply their daily needs, service those daily needs, to protect people, transport them, inform them, entertain them, to heal, help, improve their spiritual life, their material life, and to serve all the people. To me this is a terrific approach. You can turn these round and make them into questions.

Is the thing I most want to do to inform people? If so, what are my choices? I can be a teacher, a newspaperman, a writer, a radio commentator, to name only a few. Do I wish to entertain them? Yes! Well, I, P. Boone, will sing out and hope for the best. But you might wish to write music, or TV scripts. Or learn stage make-up. You see how it goes. Each major field encompasses many allied vocations.

Now I have a personal addition to make to this very fine list. Do you want to do the only thing that combines every one of these thirteen major fields—and is open to only a special segment of Young America? There is one vocation that offers this remarkable opportunity. It is Homemaking. And the special segment includes every one of you girls. (Sorry, fellas, you can skip the next two paragraphs. I'm left out too.)

Girls, check the above list. Doesn't a wife-mother shelter, feed, inform, transport (oh, don't they transport!), entertain, heal, help, and so on? Perhaps this is why I've got such a special respect for homemakers. I'll admit we guys help a little with the shelter, food, protection, discipline, and so on, but primarily the talent here belongs to you ladies. In this vocation no special training is ever wasted. So you have a good voice, but not good enough for Broadway? I can promise you a more appreciative audience when you do your lullabies for the Sleeper Set at bedtime. You're a born comedian, but not quite good enough for Hollywood? I'd love to sit at your dinner table. You're an ace at math, but will settle for home and family instead of teaching? I wish you'd been in my family when I hit algebra and geometry. You studied bookkeeping? You'll get flowers from your husband when income-tax time rolls round. You want to work for all the people? Perhaps you can raise a son worthy to be President of the United States. One of the greatest Presidents we ever had, Abraham Lincoln, gave full credit for "all that I am or ever hope to be" to his mother. Certainly you can, under God, raise all your children to be good Americans.

Believe me, I have watched my own mother, my wife, the fine homemakers I know, and I can tell you that I truly think this is the most important objective any of my daughters could have in order to be fully creative and useful.

Did you ever think that in creativity and service man is really superior to anything else on this planet? It gives him true "dominion." A beaver can build a first-class dam because that's what beavers do. It's race instinct. And a spider can spin a fine web. But the beaver can't suddenly decide to spin the web while the spider builds the dam. Nor can either of them carry laughter to a sick friend, water a thirsty flower, bind up the wounds of an antelope, or paint a picture that will bring more joy to the forest.

You see? It seems to me to be a divine trust to at least try to find and develop all the talents we possess, and to use them creatively in the service of other folk. Which throws me squarely up against a line that crops up in your letters from time to time: "I don't know if I have any talent, but ——" There are no "buts." You have talent. And I can prove it!

YOU AND YOUR TALENT

I don't believe that there is such a thing in this world as a "no-talent" guy—or gal. I, personally, have never met one. I'll confess I don't know as many of you face to face as I wish I did, but I do get around quite a bit. I've met guys and gals who thought they could sing and couldn't. Or thought they could build a better mousetrap and didn't. But that only meant they were still in the maze. Later most of them found their right place and showed their true ability.

Y' know, sometimes I read what I write to you and get to thinking that maybe I'm sounding like an authority. Well, I've got news. I'm not. I'm just a slightly older guy sharing my experience with you because you've been nice to me, and I'd love to give you any boost I can. But when it comes to big things, I'll play fair with you. I'll back up my experience with real authority.

Now hear this—this is real authority!

Jesus, Himself, told a great story about this matter of talents. He said "the kingdom of heaven" was like a man who was going away on a long trip who gave gifts to his servants before he left. He gave them talents. He didn't give them all the same number; some got five, some two, some only one, but everybody got something. Then he went on his journey and when, after a long time, he returned, he asked them what they had done with his gifts. Now one of them had been afraid, and buried his talent, and the great man was anything but pleased. This servant got into a lot of trouble and was pretty unhappy. But to each one who had used his talents and made it grow, the man said: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord."

Isn't that a terrific promise? To use our talents, to increase them, is to enter into joy. That makes it a purpose with a purpose, right?

An expert named Trench in a famous lecture on "The Study of Words" referred to the use of the word "talents" in this parable recorded by St. Matthew. Copied here from that old Boone scrapbook is what Trench said: "Men may choose to forget the ends for which their 'talents' were given them . . . they may practically deny that they were given at all; yet in this word . . . abides a continual memento that they were so given . . . and that each man shall have to render an account of their use."

But why forget or deny when the use of your talents means "joy"?

And so, happy maze to you, Kris—and Carl, and Joan, and Tom, and Sue, and all the hundreds of you who have written me in one way or another about your personal talent search. Remember, the search leads toward joy. I'm cheering for each and every one of you. Let me know how and where and when you come out!

I think it's preferable not to try to control ıildren by telling them often how dangerous ittle I wouldn't interfere at all, assuming it sn't my business.) And in the rare case ere a child is regularly hurting others with-t sufficient provocation, I'd try hard to get )fessional advice.

When a psychiatrist is treating a child who excessively fearful because of guilt, he freently has to reassure him that everyone has gry thoughts at times and that thoughts n't kill—or even hurt. The psychiatrist esn't encourage the child to carry out any anness toward others, and doesn't permit patient to hurt him or the furnishings. But does urge him to talk about his hostile feels, so that he can see that they are natural, l so that, together, they can find out where y come from and how to cope with their
ise. Parents can't expect to be able to dis-er the deep roots of serious emotional nptoms. But they can help to keep their rmal children healthy by admitting casually, imes when there has been a blowup, that ryone, including parents, gets sore once in hile and that this is no crime in itself. This s not mean that the parents should relax r regular rules about what is permissible ction.

o draw a fine line, I think that if a child in

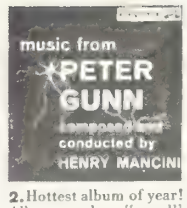
To introduce you to THE RCA VICTOR POPULAR ALBUM CLUB

ANY FIVE for only $3.98

[NATIONALLY ADVERTISED PRICES TOTAL UP TO $29.90]

EITHER STEREO or REGULAR L.P.

. . . if you agree to buy six albums from the Club during the next 12 months



THIS exciting new plan offers you the finest stereo or hi-fi music being recorded today—for far less money than you would normally pay. You may now join either the Stereophonic Division or the Regular L.P. Division of The RCA Victor Popular Album Club in a short trial membership—and receive the five albums of your choice for only $3.98.

You save up to 40% with this introductory offer alone. After the trial membership, if you continue, you will save about one third of the manufacturer's nationally advertised price through the Club's Record-Dividend Plan. This plan lets you choose a free regular L.P. or stereo album (depending on which division you are enrolled in) with every two you buy from the Club.

Every month you are offered a wide variety of albums (up to 200 a year). One will be singled out as the album-of-the-month. If you want it, you do nothing. It will come to you automatically. If you prefer an alternate—or nothing at all—simply state your wishes on a form always provided. For regular L.P. albums the nationally advertised price is usually $3.98, at times $4.98; for stereo albums the nationally advertised price is $4.98, at times $5.98 (plus—in all cases—a small charge for postage and handling).

1. Singing strings, soothing moods: Autumn Leaves, Star Dust, By the Sleepy Lagoon, While We're Young, Estrellita.

2. Hottest album of year! All-star modern "mood" jazz—combo and big band—from NBC-TV series. Fallout!, more.

3. Blues types, rhythm backing: Hallelujah I Love Her So, One for My Baby, Fare Thee Well, God Bless the Child.

4. Original soundtrack recording from Rodgers and Hammerstein film hit. 15 hardy perennials. M. Gaynor, R. Brazzi.

5. All-time best-selling classical album by the extraordinary pianist who took Moscow and the world by storm.

JOURNALITIES

From the author of our new serial, The Mistress of Mellyn, beginning on page 44: "It is essential that I hide my identity under the pseudonym, Victoria Holt, for reasons I cannot at present disclose. My husband and I live in London, with Kensington Gardens and Hyde Park just across the road. I have tried to write a story which will excite readers as much as it excited me."

Dr. Schauffler

Dr. Goodrich Schauffler (Tell Me, Doctor, page 34) tells us: "I was born in Highland Park, Illinois, attended Williams College and Harvard Medical School, with postgraduate work at Chicago. I then came to Portland, Oregon, where for thirty-three years I have specialized in gynecology and obstetrics. I have five children, ten grandchildren."

John MacDonald

The Trap of Solid Gold, page 64, belongs to a character who earns so much money he goes broke, a circumstance made believable by the skill of the writer, John MacDonald. He estimates he has earned more than a half million dollars in fourteen years of writing and "saved very little of it." Before that he was an Army colonel and didn't need money.

LET'S SHOW A LITTLE RESPECT!

Dear Editors: The Capitol building in Washington is a stately and dignified setting for the Government of the United States; why, then, must tourists make a shambles of it?

Last summer when I visited the Capitol, I was shocked to the core by what I saw. Certainly I think it's wonderful that so many thousands of Americans bring their children to Washington each summer to show them our Government in action, and I watched with emotion as reverence was communicated from parent to child.

Nevertheless, I saw: A woman weighing at least 250 pounds, wearing a sleeveless plaid blouse, and blue jeans rolled up to her knees. At least a dozen women over fifty wearing abbreviated shorts and shirts. (All of them were bare-legged and most of them had varicose veins.) Many wore sun suits, some of which were strapless. Among hundreds of women, I observed only two who wore hats and carried gloves.

Almost all the teen-age girls I saw wore Bermuda shorts or shorter shorts; teen-age boys slouched under the classic arches with sport shirts open to their navels. Only one child (a Negro) seemed to have been scrubbed and dressed properly in deference to the place he was visiting. Some of the children were barefooted, many wore only rumpled shorts or play suits.

The men tourists were equally unkempt. A typical outfit was a wild Hawaiian shirt, wrinkled shorts, nylon socks halfway up hairy calves, and dusty black shoes. They all seemed to be chewing gum, and many carried bags of peanuts and threw the shells on the beautiful tile floors.

Washington is hot in summer, and one cannot expect a family coming in from a steaming day of sight-seeing to look as if they had stepped out of a bandbox. But the Capitol is air-conditioned; the legislators and newspapermen who work there all day wear ties and jackets. It would therefore seem possible that before entering the building women could cover their explosively naked sun dresses, men could put on coats and ties, and everyone's hair could be combed. As for shorts—well, don't they belong in the country and at the beach, and not on the streets of a big city?

Is it old-fashioned of me to suggest that our appearance, like our behavior, should suit the setting in which we expect to find ourselves? We make ourselves neat for church and teach our children to do likewise—partly out of respect for ourselves, and partly out of respect for a house of worship. Should we not show a similar respect for the building where our nation finds its heart and being? Sincerely yours,

Wallingford — MARGARET P. BRITTER

SAY HELLO TO YOUR NEIGHBOR

Dear Editors: In the six years of my marriage, I've lived at eleven addresses in seven towns, four states, two nations. There has, of course, been great variety in accommodations, but with one exception, each move has had this in common: loneliness.

I'm writing to suggest that the JOURNAL start a drive to renew the old courtesy of calling—on new neighbors, the sick, the old, the forgotten. Our society is so mobile now that we need this gracious gesture more than ever.

Sincerely,

Falls Church — JUDY ROGERS

MY FAVORITE DOCTOR

Dear Editors: Not for him the plush office, the swank car, the bank-account diagnosis in strict appointment hours. His was a plain, simple office up a flight of dusty stairs over the drugstore in a small Oklahoma town. Any hour of the day or night could find him rattling hurriedly along in his antiquated car, bellowing lustily, Jesus, Lover of My Soul, or some other hymn with a "good beat" to it, to answer a call—perhaps to one of the better homes on "the nice side of town"; or to a small shanty over in darktown; or "out ten miles past the Friend schoolhouse to the first road beyond the next section line and turn down three miles to the house—we'll hang a lantern on the gate."

As a child, I would go with him on some of his country calls, soaking up quite a bit of philosophy as we'd jolt along a washboard road. "See how tall that hill looks in the distance?" the doctor would say. "Now, you watch how it melts down to nothing as we get closer. That's the way trouble is. From a distance, it may look mighty big, but no use worrying about it, for the closer you get to it, the smaller it becomes."

Comforting came naturally to him, radiating from his soft Southern speech. Somehow a sore throat instantly was better on his simple prescription of a warm-water-and-salt gargle; and no pulse could be much out of line when, if by chance, as he'd sit counting it holding his beloved pocket watch which was never wrong, the Rock Island would whistle outside town, and he'd frown and say, "Train's late. Due at 6:15 and it's now 6:18½."

Or "Great Caesar's ghost," he'd explode, making short work of any who were inclined to hypochondria. "What are you doing in bed? There's nothing wrong with you a little hard work and home cooking won't cure!"

My doctor pioneered to Oklahoma when it was still Indian Territory, and despite his simple, homespun deceptiveness, he kept a sharp mind up to date, poring over the American Medical Journal and professional books any moment he could spare from his large, but not lucrative, practice. He seldom, if ever, presented a bill, for "an honorable man pays his debts"—a theory not shared by all his patients.

During his later years, he became city and county health physician, and one day care and overwork made him collapse. When he was released from the hospital, it was with stern warnings to "take it easy" by his fellow physicians. Just two nights later he answered a call to attend a woman in labor at an itinerant trailer camp. The seventy-eight-year-old doctor sat through the cold night on an upended wooden box, bringing a child into the world. It was his last call. The stroke which hit him the next morning took his life.

His name was Eli Lide Dawson. To me, there is no question of who is "my favorite doctor." He was the greatest, and I am proud he was my father.

Sincerely,

Studio City — JAN DAWSON JENSEN

Dear Mary: I am still bleeding a little about the picture you and Doris [otherwise known as Dream Girl—ED.] chose to appear in the February JOURNAL, but I am also on the road to recovery, and offer you forgiveness and absolution. But wasn't that a dreadful picture? It makes me look a little like Trujillo, the dictator of the Dominican Republic, but I don't look at all like him. . . . Do you still have that 8x10 of me at the typewriter outdoors? That is the one I would like to see published.

WHEN GADGETS WON'T WORK

Dear Editors: Two years ago we were faced with the problem of redoing a superannuated kitchen. Our architect suggested that we buy all the same kind of equipment, which we did. We were told that one repairman would then be familiar with all the equipment and the number of service calls would be minimum. Not so, alas!

Our confidence was first disabused when, after two weeks of use, the dishwasher refused to relinquish our plates, glasses and silverware. I explained to the company serviceman that I considered this an emergency! I asked only that they open the dishwasher immediately, not repair it. For five solid days, while I made numerous pleading phone calls, we stared at the dishwasher in helpless fury and ate off paper plates. Similar incidents followed.

The crashing climax was reached on the day when five different gadgets broke down at once. The wall-oven thermostat turned temperamental, the dishwasher handle broke, the refrigerator meat-tray groove fell off, the range indicator light burned out and the dryer apparently had ambitions to be a refrigerator and was cold, cold, cold!

I suggested that one competent electrician be sent to fix all my recalcitrant widgets. Their men, said the company service bureau, were not "jacks of all trades." So it took four trips and three men to set everything right.

The servicemen from the company were always pleasant and reasonably able. But I can't help feeling that I'm being charged for all their unnecessary trips. So I now have an intelligent "jack of all trades" who finds no difficulty in fixing everything. I love my new gadgets—when they work.

Sincerely yours,

May I Tell You About My Heart Attack?

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

The best way to deal with a heart attack is to be the kind of person who is unlikely to have one! For certain types of personality do have an affinity for certain diseases.

You are, for instance, more likely to suffer a heart attack if you are an intellectual worker than you are if you are a manual worker, or if you are an executive than if you are a shipping clerk. You are more likely to suffer one if you have strong ambitions than if you are easygoing, and if your reaction to conditions of stress is anxiety than if it is anger. If you are given to anger you are more likely to have peptic ulcers. Keeping up with the Joneses is good for ulcers and bad for the heart, though keeping up with your own ideals of yourself may be even worse for the latter. If you are the choleric type that blows off steam, you are less likely to have a heart attack than if you are outwardly calm and apparently in full possession of yourself while inwardly you are emotionally bottled up.

Recent studies have suggested that writers, artists, executives, scientists and, above all, physicians are the chief candidates for angina pectoris or coronary thrombosis. These are people who are perpetually trying to surpass themselves, have a very high sense of responsibility, and grieve over failures. If you are under forty-five you are more likely to have a heart attack if you are a man than if you are a woman. Doctors believe that the presence of certain hormones in women of childbearing age protect their circulatory systems and hearts. After the menopause women are about as susceptible as men.

Among doctors heart attacks appear to be almost an occupational disease—as peptic ulcers are called the occupational disease of newspapermen. Generally this latter has been attributed to the pace of their lives, their careless methods of eating, and their tendency to drink too much—a picture of the newspaperman which is considerably exaggerated.

Newspapermen see, more than most, the seamy side of life and observe the follies of mankind, even of men in high office. Except when they achieve an eminence that allows them effectively to blow off editorially, what they see makes them angry, and anger makes them dyspeptic. If they gobble their food and drink too much, the cause is the same that gives them ulcers. It is sociopsychological.

If you do not believe in the interrelation between social and psychological factors and the state of health of the bodily organism, consider what has happened to the incidence of ulcers between the sexes since the end of the Victorian age and the emancipation of women! In the days of Life With Father, father was the unquestioned boss of home and family and lived in a highly secure emotional atmosphere. In those days mamma had the ulcers—the incidence of this disease among young women was extraordinarily high. Papa's insides were all right. Now, when men still bear the chief brunt of family responsibility but without the superior security of status that they once had in the family, papa has the ulcers.*

A certain snobbery exists among people who have recovered from heart attacks, probably attributable to an unconscious realization that, in some respects, they belong to an elite. Recovered victims—and their number is innumerable—have what amounts to an exclusive club; and the President's heart attack made them even more snooty. You have to have had a heart attack to know to how numerous a fellowship you belong, because before you are out of the hospital you will receive cards from total strangers, letters of advice, and messages that amount to congratulations rather than condolences, from members of the unregistered Coronary Club. These usually testify to the writers' feeling better than they had for years once they had recovered. All but one who wrote to me confessed, however, that they had never again lived exactly as they had before; they had cut out many activities that actually they did not greatly enjoy and performed only for social reasons. Some had found joy in new activities as substitutes—one had become an enthusiastic amateur painter.

Having been ordered to reduce or eliminate their intake of animal fats and sugars, they found the treatment was not temporary and that they had to keep them reduced. The reason for this is the existence of chloresterol (fatty deposits) in the blood vessels, the presence or absence of which can be determined by tests. Of course if those deposits are there, they narrow the vessels and compel the heart to work harder. You will be advised not to eat fatty foods of any kind, avoid cream and use only vegetable fats or oils when they are required. If you have been prejudiced against margarine, you will have to get over it. You will also have to reduce your intake of eggs, because of the fatty yolk. And if you have been a heavy smoker you will have to cut out cigarettes—or cut them radically down. And you may as well face up to the fact that, with occasional lapses, you will stay on this regimen for life.

If you are wise, you "do exactly what your doctor tells you"—and recover completely.

I have been thoroughly inclined to follow my doctor's orders, because I have enormous confidence in him, and not the slightest confidence in my capacity to prescribe for myself, even if I were not in a leaning mood in which I am abnormally inclined to put my troubles off onto others. But those medicines!

Dicumarol, for instance. This is an anticoagulant, designed to prevent clots in the blood stream—the immediate cause of a thrombosis. But it is a tricky drug. If you took enough of it you would, I presume, have a condition similar to hemophilia, in which the blood does not clot at all, and a slight wound can be fatal. The dosage is prescribed only in connection with weekly tests of the blood, each of which determines whether the intake is to be retained as during the previous week or whether it is to be reduced or augmented. Sometimes the dosage is different for alternate days—and I am afraid I will get the days mixed up, a condition of anxiety that I hope will not contribute to another heart attack!

* See Social Science in Medicine, Leo W. Simmons and Harold G. Wolff, Russell Sage Foundation.

There are pills to keep the blood pressure even, pills to cheer me up, pills to strengthen the heart muscle, pills to relax the nerves, and pills to help me sleep. All my life I have been antipill, but now my dressing table confronts me with a whole battery of bottles, containing tablets pink and green, and capsules white and gray, and I obediently swallow them.

Meanwhile I feel perfectly well, except for a certain lassitude which I suspect is due, partly at least, to the pills. But although six months have elapsed since the attack that landed me for a month in the hospital and another month in bed most of the time at home, and to diminished social, mental and physical activity still, my heart has not entirely recovered. There are still symptoms of weakness as revealed in cardiograms, now rather infrequently taken. The pills—or some of them—are therefore indicated for some time to come, and as far as I can extract any definite information, the Dicumarol, as a deterrent, indefinitely—and therefore the blood tests.

There is no reason why this should interest anyone except prospective heart patients. It is well, however, to know in advance that one does not fully recover from an acute heart attack quickly. One is not usually "just as well as ever" in six months. It is better to count on taking things for a year rather more easily than one anticipated.

You will be able to accept this long convalescence cheerfully or otherwise, depending on your temperament.

I am the type that suffers from feelings of guilt or frustration if she is not working productively or creatively, and who has always worked best under a degree of tension. But I am not sure that this dependence on tension is not a bad habit induced by years of meeting deadlines three times a week during the long time when I was writing a newspaper column. Writing a book, which I am now trying to do, requires a slower pace and more calm. It might be that an imposed slowness will actually help mellow it—or would, if I could make myself over a little more successfully!

Knowledge comes by taking things apart—analysis. But wisdom comes by putting things together.

TAKEN FROM TEACHER'S TREASURY OF STORIES FOR EVERY OCCASION

All writers have one advantage over others: the capacity to be interested even in their own misfortunes, and to want to record them. The chief effect, therefore, of having had a heart attack has been to make me fascinated by what happened to me. Like so many heart attacks, it came apparently right out of the blue sky. I went to lunch with a friend—on an exceptionally hot July day on which I had been exceptionally physically active—and over a glass of iced coffee suddenly got a rather severe pain in my chest, that traveled up into my jaws and down into my left arm. I complained of it, and he remarked with concern, "It looks like heart." It did indeed. It looked like what had happened to my husband almost exactly a year before and which had ended fatally, but he had had previous warnings and had an excessively high blood pressure, which I did not.

I did not lie down; it subsided, I drove my friend to his home and myself, after several errands, ten miles to my own, and then lay down to rest. Then it came again, this time much worse, and I sent for the doctor. He gave me medicaments, the pain subsided, and following instructions I went to bed. But two days later I had a much worse attack—and this time I felt pretty serious about myself—and was taken in an ambulance to the hospital.

At the time of the first attack I had been very much depressed. To what extent was this emotional upset, compounded of several factors, a contributing cause of the attack? I do not know, and neither did my doctors, but none of those who cared for me in hospital and out of it would dismiss the fact of my emotional condition as irrelevant. The most modern physicians no longer do so.

Psychosomatic knowledge is at least one hundred years old. It fell into disrepute with the immense advance in biophysical knowledge and the phenomenal cures brought about by the application of the physical sciences—biology, physics and chemistry. But in the last ten years it has again become recognized that the whole person, not just one of his organs, is involved in an illness; that the human person is not just a chemical compound but a social and psychological organism that is somehow all of a piece. Shocks, griefs, disappointments, frustrations do reflect themselves physically. The heart does skip a beat, the teeth do chatter, the blood does leave the brain and a faint ensue under conditions of exceptional emotional stress.

The language is full of everyday phrases that translate into physical terms emotional states of the heart:

"My heart stood still . . . was in my boots . . . was in my throat . . . turned over . . . jumped . . . sank . . . leaped for joy . . . broke . . . melted . . . was full. Heartsick . . . wring the heart . . . 'the heart bowed down by weight of woe' . . . Richard the Lion-Hearted . . . heavyhearted, hardhearted, softhearted. A heart of stone . . . of lead . . . of ice."

The heart is "the fountain of sweet tears," according to Wordsworth. "Gladness of the heart is the life of man," according to Ecclesiasticus, and the heart can break, "yet brokenly live on," according to Byron. And nothing is more terrifying than a "heartless" person, whom Shakespeare called "a marble-hearted fiend."

And, indeed, without a heart attack we have all had real heartaches, resembling in less acute form the symptoms of a physical attack.

In the last decade an enormous amount of research has been done in the relation of the social sciences and individual psychology to physical disease. Such research may easily pave the way to the next greatest advances in medicine. But it will have its difficulties, for it is much easier to deal with the concrete physical body, subject to measurable tests, than with the mind and soul.

Whatever induces a heart attack, a stay in a good hospital is helpful to both body and soul. I was lucky. The little hospital into which I was delivered largely because it was the nearest to my country home could not have been better. It is an institution with only forty beds, situated in a village but serving an area of half a dozen other villages and farmland. The nurses may not be bachelors of science, but they were warmhearted, cheerful, skillful women, always on hand when one needed them, and seeming to care about my comfort as a mother would care for her child's. The diet food was tastefully cooked and served; the water was always changed in the vases of flowers sent by loving friends; in short, I was extremely pampered, and the pampering helped not only to heal my physical heart but to lift my depression and heal that other heart which is more than a bodily organ!

Incidentally, there was nothing initially wrong with that vigorous muscle the size of your clenched fist, which performs the amazing function of distributing blood and oxygen

The "constipation of womanhood"

Special laxative for women gives gentle relief more naturally

Mrs Kerman Holland
Lexington, Ky.

"All my 26 years," writes Mrs. Holland, "and through two pregnancies, I've had to fight constipation. But no more! With Correctol, I'm 'regular' at the same time daily...and I'm never nauseated or upset as I often was with ordinary laxatives."

Correctol® has been specially developed for a woman's delicate system. It is completely different from harsh, all-purpose laxatives.

Its secret is a non-laxative miracle regulator that simply softens waste. Along with this, Correctol contains just enough mild laxative to give regularity a start.

Working together, these two gentle ingredients make Correctol bring relief more naturally than any ordinary laxative can. Even in pregnancy and following childbirth. In menstrual periods—and after middle age, too!

Do try Correctol soon. 30 tiny pink tablets, $1.00 —at any drug counter.

to every part of the body, with unfailing regularity from the day one is born until one dies. One takes one's heart so much for granted that if it stops for a second or ceases to function properly, the recognition is accompanied by great fear. But the heart, in heart "attacks," is usually an innocent bystander. The culprits are the blood vessels; these may contain "plaques" which narrow the vessels. Or the heart may be affected by high blood pressure, arising from the kidneys or from the central nervous system (again affected by emotions), which requires the heart to pump under a higher head of steam.

A thrombosis is due to a blood clot in a vessel, which shuts blood off from an area of the heart and deprives the muscle of adequate nourishment. A cramping of the heart is due to its being called upon to perform more than it is capable of, due to lack of co-operation from the blood vessels. That condition is called angina pectoris. The symptoms are identical and the treatment the same. If blood is shut off altogether, one dies very quickly. Though there are cases to the contrary, the probability is that if you don't die quickly you will recover.

No human being has ever invented a machine as amazing as the heart. It takes care of every sort of physical emergency; it automatically goes into high gear to increase its pumping of blood in case of hemorrhage; it speeds up against anemia; it is the great compensator.

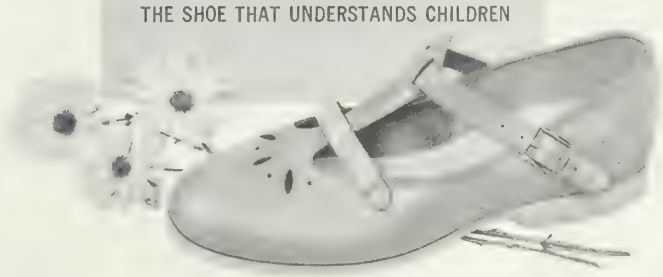
In education we are striving not to teach youth to make a living, but to teach youth to make a life, in the sense that a life is useful happiness and well-spent leisure.

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

But emotional stresses as well as physical causes restrict the blood vessels, and the heart muscle to fulfill its function of keeping you alive from minute to minute, diffusing blood and oxygen, must be strong enough to keep at it. When an attack occurs and the circulation is cut off in part, an intense inflammation sets in and a firm muscle becomes, in the affected area, a soft mass. But the heart, given help, soon starts to heal itself. New fibrous tissue grows to replace the injured area, which in time shrinks below the original muscle size. Meanwhile, new collateral blood vessels are formed—brand-new ones—to take over the interrupted circulation.

While this remarkable process of self-healing is going on, the progress of which can be recorded on the electrocardiograph, it is self-evident that the least possible additional strain should be put upon the organ. The basic cure for all heart attacks is rest. Because the heart is always in there pitching, and the therapy is to require it to pitch as little as possible. If anyone in perfect health runs upstairs or uphill, his pulse will accelerate. When one's heart is in the early stages of healing, one does not even walk upstairs, and until it is quite well one walks, if one must, one slow step at a time. Active use of the arms excites the heart. For weeks I was not allowed to touch a typewriter and all my writing was longhand. I am still not allowed to drive a car.

All the medicines are secondary to rest, for, I repeat, the heart, that doughty little center of life, if not too massively damaged cures itself if it is given a break. Drugs are either preventive, such as Dicumarol, or are for reducing blood pressure and therefore taking some load off the heart. But mental and emotional depression burdens the physical heart too. No one knows why, or exactly how, but experience shows that the phrase "My heart is heavy" is not just a manner of speaking.



Cheerfulness is extremely healthful. But we cannot all be like the colored lady who, when asked how come she looked twenty years younger than her years, said, "When I works I works hard; when I sets I sets loose; and when I worries I goes to sleep." That blessed soul is not likely to have a heart attack. END

Still Too Few

By MARGARET HICKEY

What is a Homemaker? To children whose mother has been taken to the hospital, she is the friendly woman who fixes their lunch, reads a story, and keeps unhappiness and disorder at bay. To an elderly man or woman, she is the visitor whose help with housework and marketing makes the difference between independence and placement in an institution. To a handicapped mother—learning to live with the results of disabling illness—she is the means of holding a family together.

Not nurses, not domestics, these women capably take on the tasks which keep a home running. They are paid—but they are rewarded, too, by their own pleasure in "doing for people," in reducing the stress of family crisis by their practical skills.

Homemaker services are still few throughout the country. Administered by a variety of organizations—social and health agencies, public-welfare departments, private voluntary groups—they are available in only about 150 of the nation's 3100 counties.

How can this down-to-earth, immensely valuable service be brought to more communities?

In New Jersey, citizens' groups have shown what volunteers can do in this field. Community sponsors of the now 16 services, which reach 14 counties, include Junior Leagues (as in this month's story of the Morris County project), Rotary Clubs, Zonta Clubs, councils of Jewish women, medical societies and their women's auxiliaries, and many others. A voluntary Consultant Committee on Visiting Homemaker Services, working with the state health department and local groups, has done much to encourage new programs.

In North Carolina, an experiment in homemaker care for the elderly and disabled is being conducted by the state public-welfare department with $20,000 granted by the Doris Duke Foundation, plus Federal matching funds for public assistance. In three rural and semirural counties, visits by homemakers once or twice weekly are proving the human and practical values of keeping older people living in their homes and communities as independently as possible, as long as possible. A brand-new baby can sometimes manage to turn a home topsy-turvy, but with a Visiting Homemaker on hand to cook, clean, launder and help with the children, the Murray household is running smoothly. Here Mrs. Fern B. Faircloth shows Morgan Murray the right way to pat sister Elizabeth's soft, soft hair.

PRACTICAL HELP WHEN FAMILIES NEED IT

. . . Homemaker Service in Morris County, N. J.

Not long ago in Morris County, New Jersey, tragedy struck when a twenty-four-year-old mother died of a childhood heart condition. She left her husband, only twenty-five himself and a high-school English teacher, and their two sons, aged three and two.

Many people helped. Neighbors took the boys at first, then their maternal grandparents, who lived on Long Island. But their grandfather was suddenly transferred to Florida—departure time within a week. The young father, who had been making trips to see them every Sunday while he tried desperately to plan for the future, had to make all his decisions in a hurry.

He says, "The only thing I was sure of was that the boys and I had to stay together. I thought about moving to Florida, but I loved my job, and I hated the idea of giving up the house that my wife and I had just bought. It was in a good neighborhood abounding with children. But a live-in housekeeper would cost me, with board, about $300 a month. I'm a teacher. I just couldn't afford that."

It wasn't long, however, before two different people told him about the Morris County Visiting Homemaker Service. He reached assistant supervisor Mrs. Mary F. Fletcher by telephone. She was immediately sympathetic. "I'd like to give you our Mrs. Gannon," she told him. "She's particularly wonderful with young children. She has seventeen grandchildren herself."

"Do you think you could get her by next Monday?" asked anxious Mr. Hughes.

"I'll try," said Mrs. Fletcher.

Mr. Hughes says, "Up to the last minute I was afraid something would go wrong. My mother had left her home in Brooklyn and come down to help, but her health had not been good for years, and she couldn't handle two little boys alone. I woke up Monday morning feeling scared. My mother is really quite frail, and whoever came was going to have to take on an awful lot. I'd never even met Mrs. Gannon. I could have—but I'd taken Mrs. Fletcher's word. When she walked in the door on the dot of eight, I had the biggest feeling of relief I'd had in some time! She just looked at the kids and said 'Hi!' Then she started right in talking to them. When I left she was getting ready to do the breakfast dishes, and she said to me, 'You go along now. Everything's going to be just fine!'"

Mrs. Gannon, gray-haired and grandmotherly, took over the household completely on school days from eight to four, when Mr. Hughes got home. She cooked and cleaned and laundered, but she had other more unexpected skills as well. She gave two-year-old Michael, who has bright red hair, trike lessons. She chatted comfortably away with Billy, encouraging him to talk out some of his confusions of the last few weeks. Mr. Hughes says, "There was no question about her giving them love—but with the right kind of discipline too. Billy's table manners even improved."

Within days, the worried look on his face had eased. And down at the headquarters of the Morris County Visiting Homemaker Service, in the charming old Colonial house in Morristown which it shares with the county's Family Service and Visiting Nurse agencies, Mrs. Fletcher listed another case of a home literally held together after a family crisis.

Morris County's Visiting Homemaker Service does not provide baby sitters or extra domestic help. It provides makers of homes—and only families who are in need of all this implies are eligible for its help.

VHS was started in 1955, but its beginnings were tentative. A committee sponsored by the Morris County Community Chest had made a study of the county's needs, had recommended such a service, but the Community Chest's board of directors proposed a two-year trial period at first. Many doctors, nurses and people engaged in social and welfare work had helped the committee make its study, but one agency in particular, the already-existing Family Service of Morris County, was especially keen to see a local homemaker service started. It knew there were times when a family needed something other than intermittent counseling from its own trained social workers, or other than a few hours a week from a visiting nurse.

Family Service agreed to provide direction and sponsorship during those first two years, and the Junior League of Morristown offered further financial support and volunteer aides. A trained social worker was hired as part-time supervisor, the first group of women were screened and trained as "homemakers." Their fee would be $1.25 an hour, payable by the family except in cases of need.

In 1957 the two years of experience were evaluated. Says blue-eyed Mrs. Eugene L. Watkins, present chairman of the Homemaker Committee (its policy-making board), who began her association as a Junior League volunteer, "It was apparent that the homemaker service was bigger than anyone had thought. By our second year, after news of the service had begun to spread by word of mouth, requests doubled. It was obviously meeting a definite community need."

Today Morris County's Homemaker Service has a full-time professional supervisor, Mrs. Margaret Peake, and her assistant, Mrs. Fletcher. Seven volunteers, most of them Junior Leaguers, visit families requesting service, find out what is needed, make recommendations to Mrs. Peake. A corps of between 20 and 30 "homemakers" are on call (VHS has trained in all some 50 women), last year gave more than 20,000 hours of service to over 300 families.

Morris County's is the only homemaker service in New Jersey using volunteers as its investigators, or "case aides," but Mrs. Watkins is sure that this unique local practice helps strengthen community interest. She herself began as a case aide, and although she is the wife of a busy Morristown surgeon, has two school-age children and a host of other activities as well as her chairmanship, she cannot resist giving several hours a week to case-aide work. She says, "It's like anything else—when you love it, you find time for it." Daughter of a physician herself, psychology major and trained nurse's aide during the war, she says, "Of course we aim to keep our volunteer work on a professional level. Case aides are given a course in interviewing, make their first visits with someone experienced. We learn to spot when a family needs referral to a trained counselor on the Family Service staff, or perhaps medical care. We ask for permission to talk to a family's doctor when necessary. We have close ties with all the health and welfare resources of the county; this is what gives us our strength."

But then she quickly adds, "Our real strength is in our homemakers themselves." These women, many of them grandmothers, must satisfy VHS as to their characters and pass a physical exam as well. They take a homemaking course offered by Rutgers' extension department that includes a smattering of everything from nutrition to geriatrics to child psychology. They are then ready to go forth, bringing serenity, courage and skilled hands to a wide range of situations.

Mrs. Peake says, "When we began, most of our cases involved hospitalization of the mother—usually to have a new baby," but VHS offers flexible hours and long-term care, and it now helps meet many of today's most serious social problems. Doctors and other agencies often refer families to VHS, but the majority of people who call or come to the Morristown headquarters do so because they have heard about it from someone else. A married daughter telephones. Her husband is being transferred across the country, but she can't persuade her elderly father to leave the house where he has lived for fifty years. He could manage by himself if a homemaker could drop in for two hours a day. A frantic young husband comes in. His wife has suffered severe anxiety since the birth of their third baby. Yesterday she had a complete breakdown and must go to a mental hospital. Could VHS help—beginning tomorrow at eight o'clock? Families disrupted by mental illness have risen sharply of late in VHS files. The aged, the ill, deserted mothers who must go out to work all help fill the files.

When asked, "Would it be right to repay good for evil?" Confucius replied, "No, for how then would you repay good? Repay good with good, and evil with justice."

VHS homemakers (most of them drive cars) range across Morris County, with its population (and proportionate crises) of a quarter of a million souls. Mrs. Watkins says, "Like most social agencies, we could do even more if we had more money." VHS is now an autonomous agency (no longer under Family Service), and a recipient of county Community Chest funds, but these do not cover all its expenses. The $1.25 an hour (plus carfare) charged families who can afford it covers only the cost of the homemaker. But VHS never turns down a family in need. It must raise homemaker fees for these, plus its own administrative expenses. The Morristown Junior League has given, over a period of five years, over $10,000. Another $10,000 was raised in a community drive. More recently, other agencies such as the county Heart Association or the Association for Mental Health have helped in cases where they had a concern.

Those who are helped, like Mr. Hughes, are usually eager to tell others how much the service has meant. Mrs. Gannon stayed with the Hughes family for close to two months. Since her services cost him $55 a week, he eventually made a happy arrangement with his wife's sister and her husband to share his household with them. Billy and Mike now have their beloved young aunt at home all day, and two first cousins to play with. But Mr. Hughes says, "It was that first period that was the worst. They had been away from home, and now they were back, and this raised all sorts of questions as to where their mother was. Some of their questions were cruelly hard to answer. My wife and I had had happy, well-balanced kids, and I was terribly anxious to keep them that way. Mrs. Gannon answered their questions with wonderful tact, and yet with honesty too. She had a whale of a job, I tell you. But she did it." END talks to teenagers About Horse Sense

Hi there again, friend! If you've got a few minutes, I have an interesting idea for us to toss around a little. One of the most terrific questions that challenged my teenage daydreams was "How to Be a Hero." I haven't made it yet. But I'll clue you. The dreams carry right over into the adult world. We all share visions of what great deeds we'd do if faced with the unexpected—a firing squad, a kid crying in a burning house, an overturned canoe on a moonlit lake. Only rarely does some such excitement come our way. More often we're faced, instead, with less dramatic emergencies—the humdrum problems of daily life which still demand quick thinking and sound reactions.

To be prepared— whether to solve the spectacular challenge or the more ordinary ones that crop up in your letters like "what to do till the doctor comes," or even "what to wear on an Occasion," or "how to organize a successful party"—I know of one common denominator that'll work without fail on 99 per cent of 'em. I can tell you this c.d. in two words. I can't give it to you at all. I only wish I could, 'cause if I could dip my hand into a big jar of it I'd keep a liberal dose for myself! I could use more! But it must be individually learned and earned. The two words that wrap up this magic are Common Sense. Now what, exactly, is that?

Common sense is just good plain, logical thinking—founded on observation, information and/or experience. Take these and add one more quality and you have the brand that originated in America, that makes America and Americans what they are—the greatest. Common sense plus humor equals horse sense. And that's the American heritage and the American ideal! The homespun philosopher, the cracker-barrel wit are uniquely American, dating from the time of our Independence when Benjamin Franklin was writing Poor Richard's Almanac. (Poor Richard anticipated modern rush-rush by announcing, "He who riseth late must trot all day"), down to the man who defines Hoss Sense as "what keeps hosses from betting on people." And right now I'd like to throw my hat in the cracker barrel with my own definition of genius. I've got a hunch genius is just horse sense with wings. And that, my friend, is the monthly pronouncement of the Cooga Mooga Kid, P. Boone, the Teenage's Sage from ol' Kentucky. For a written explanation of this saying, write me at Cooga Mooga; enclose the top of an old car with your request. But the big question is: how is an individual (you) to learn and earn this magic of heroes, soothsayers and geniuses?

Hoss sense comes hard. Without experience we're usually governed by what we want rather that what's good for us. The sages through the ages have warned us that "there's no substitute for experience"—and there isn't. Dad says, "Hortense, if you hang on that clothesline, it'll break and you'll fall." You do. It does. You do. So far, so good. You've gathered some experience. But now horse sense should take over and two things should happen. You don't hang on the clothesline again, which means that you have "profited by the experience." Second, you begin to regard dad in a new light. He's an expert who can prophesy from his own knowledge; and now you begin to "profit by the experience of others"—which will spare you a lot of personal, experimental lumps.

Some develop this horse sense more slowly than others and that's called "learning the hard way." If repeated experiences fail to awaken our common sense, if we go from trouble with our parents to trouble with our teachers to trouble with the law, it's quite likely we'll qualify for the tart label Benjamin Franklin dropped when he said, "Experience keeps a hard school, but fools will learn in no other." How about that now?

So the seed of horse sense doesn't grow until you begin to profit by experience, and it won't branch out into a real hero maker until you can also profit by the experience of others, and until you can evaluate what you learn and observe.

By applying horse sense we can tell when not to repeat an experiment and when to try, try again. We'll refuse to be fools, but we will also refuse to be failures.

A few years back a gallant gal, Florence Chadwick, after successfully swimming the English Channel, became the first woman to attempt to swim the twenty-one miles from Catalina Island to the California coast. Thousands of TV fans watched her battle all night through icy water, fog and schools of sharks, only to be pulled from the water a mile short of her goal, exhausted, humiliated, chilled—in a word, defeated.

Florence, in evaluating her two experiences, remembered that at the point in her English swim when she felt she had gone as far as she could go, she begged to be taken from the water. And right then her father sighted land. "I saw it, too," she recalled, "and that gave me the push I needed to go on and make it. But in my unsuccessful attempt to cross from Catalina fog obscured the land ahead. When they told me it was only a mile away I didn't have the faith to believe

DOMESTIC DIALOGUE

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

Through dinner the most that my lord will mutter
Is, "Huh?" or, "Huh-uh," or,
"Pass the butter."
So long as I'm near, with my ear cocked handy,
He hasn't a needless word to bandy.

But wait till I'm out in the kitchen running
The faucet loudly, or till I'm gunning
The vacuum in the upstairs hall,
And that's when my part-time clam will bawl,
"Whacha goon mobble da porkle ay?"
Or that's what it sounds like, anyway.

And I used to trot for a clear translation.
But now I handle the situation
By sensibly yelling above the racket,
"Goggle da whup in the morpso yacket!"

hat I couldn't see. I had lacked faith, not bility."

Two months later, with renewed faith, Florence Chadwick turned her defeat into victory, became the first woman to swim the Catalina Channel despite recurring fog, and beat the men's record by two hours.

And that, my friend, is how horse sense makes heroes. Now let's get specific.

ENSE AND NONSENSE:

One of the most important things you can now is . . . what you don't know. And one the most sensible things you can do is . . . mit it!

Mark Twain once said, "I was gratified to able to answer promptly, and I did. I said at I didn't know."

Kids who have to give an answer for everyng, right or wrong, who can't bear to cons that there is an area not covered by their rsonal knowledge and experience, are allw-and-no-go, believe me! They can also dangerous as a source of much misinformaon—and that's being polite about the whole ng. In horse-sense lingo it goes like this: ne of the most striking differences between at and a lie is that a cat has only nine es"—while nonsense doubles itself indefiely every time it is spoken into another pair ears.

If you don't know, say so! And then you're in a position to say, "I'll find out." Now if you're a no-nonsense character you'll consider the source and get the best information available. The world is full of experts and specialists who're more than willing that we should profit from their experience.

When I was in high school we had visiting lecturers from the police and fire departments. We had a dentist who told us about teeth. Our teachers and parents taught us things every day. But a good many of us were too lazy to take notice. It's horse sense to pay attention and learn all we can.

Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts usually latch on to quite a bit of potential hero-know-how and I can't recommend too strongly that teenagers, you gals in particular, take advantage of all the first-aid instruction you can get. Kin Hubbard, another famed horse-sense philosopher, held that, "Of all the home remedies, a good wife is the best"—and a good wife and mother needs all the info' possible to be prepared for daily family life.

So now you've learned to profit by and evaluate your personal experience. You've quit guessing, admitted what you know and don't know, and listened to the experts. But you can still goof. One thing more is needful!

When the time comes—when the boat overturns, or the house catches fire (it happened to us the other night), or junior falls and comes in with an arm that zigs where it ought to zag, or even when you're wondering what to wear to a party—you've got to use what you know.

"Keep cool!" say the experts. "Use your head!"

James Thurber advised, "He who hesitates is sometimes saved." And American horse sense shouts: "Before you louse it up—THINK!"

I remember a girl, a very bright, sweet, attractive gal, who became engaged to a buddy of mine in college. He was crazy about her—but she had him worried. Her pattern was, in every crisis, to have hysterics or run away, and her husband-to-be wasn't sure she could be trusted with the responsibilities of married life. She'd get "too shook" under pressure. He tried talking to her about it, but she just shrugged and said, "That's just the way I am. I guess I was born that way."

But this isn't true. Finley Peter Dunne, a Chicago newspaperman, helped the cause of horse sense along by inventing an American philosopher with an Irish accent named Mr. Dooley. Mr. Dooley used to talk over profound problems with his friend, Mr. Hennessy—once this very subject.

"Oh, well," said Mr. Hennessy, "we are as th' Lord made us."

"No," said Mr. Dooley, "lave us be fair. Lave us take some iv th' blame oursilves."

Nobody's "just born that way." It's the pattern he develops and it's always possible to change that pattern. My friend had quite a time convincing his girl that she could consciously choose her reactions until they became dependable and habitual. Finally she began to "get the message." With my friend's help she schooled herself to stop a moment and think, to handle fear and panic and indecision with a determination to be calm and intelligent. Today they're married and she's that "best of all home remedies," a good wife and mother. She's all there in a pinch!

If we begin as teenagers (or even before), we can learn and earn what it takes to meet the unexpected in a truly heroic fashion. We can handle big emergencies or small problems without being thrown off our stride. But we have to stick with it, insist on the common-sense reaction until it becomes a habit.

WINGED HORSE SENSE:

Do you remember an old song called "You'd Be So Nice To Come Home To"? It began to appeal to my vocal cords when I first met Shirley—and since we've been married I've just changed the tense. She is so nice to come home to!

The point is that I got a new slant on it from something Fannie Hurst, the famous novelist, said about her husband. In all the years she'd known him, she said, she couldn't remember his doing a thing she wished he hadn't done. "How come?" she asked him. "How can you be so consistently mindful of others?"

And he said, quite simply, "I suppose because I have to live with myself."

So far we've discussed horse sense as applied to the outside world of people and events. But here, in one sentence, is horse sense with wings—the casual statement of a man who had found the magic for living with himself.

The height of "plain, logical thinking" leads us to the conclusion that, always and always, we're going to come home to us. We can choose where we want to live, and with what partner. But we've got to live with ourselves, take ourselves with us wherever we go, and after every party, after school, after a test or a sports event we've got to come home and be alone with ourselves.

This is true for presidents and milkmen, old and young, poor and rich. In this light we see that outbursts of temper, the temptation to look at someone else's test or homework, the desire to "chop" a friend to be smart, or to belittle someone in order to feel "big-shot" ourselves may hurt the other guy. But if we're honest we'll admit they hurt us more. When we come home to us, when we're alone, we "hate us."

In the New Testament, Jesus, Who knew all this and loved us very much, gave us the very best rules for horse sense with wings. He said, among other things, don't be angry, or call people fools. Make friends with your enemies. Forgive your brother. Give rather than grab. Treat others the way you want to be treated. This is the highest order of horse sense, not only to keep your dealings with others well greased but because it is the best and most practical way for you to like you.

Jesus also said to pray.

It's hard to be heroic, or the kind of people we truly want to be without prayer. In the Boone scrapbook is one prayer that seems to me honestly heroic. It was written by a teenager in the sixteenth century while she waited in the Tower of London for them to cut her head off. The gently reared English princess, Lady Jane Grey, talented, sensitive, devout, probably never dreamed that at sixteen she would be forced to marry against her wishes; made a helpless pawn in a game of king making, with the throne of England as the prize; finally faced with public execution shortly after her seventeenth birthday. But that's what happened to her. Lady Jane Grey met her death unresisting and courageous at just about the age when I was worrying about whom to take to the senior banquet. If we'd changed places, would I have been an empty sack? Would you? Here is her prayer:

"O Merciful God, be Thou now unto me a strong tower of defence, I humbly entreat Thee. Give me grace to await Thy leisure, and patiently to bear what Thou doest unto me; nothing doubting or mistrusting Thy goodness towards me; for Thou knowest what is good for me better than I do. Therefore do with me in all things what Thou wilt; only arm me, I beseech Thee, with Thine armour, that I may stand fast; above all things, taking to me the shield of faith; praying always that I may refer myself wholly to Thy will, abiding Thy pleasure, and comforting myself in those troubles which it shall please Thee to send me, seeing such troubles are profitable for me; and I am assuredly persuaded that all Thou doest cannot but be well; and unto Thee be all honour and glory. Amen."

LOOK AT YOUR HANDS

(He will!)

Are they as pretty as you wish they were? They can be so easily!

By Ruth Miller

He may not remember the color of your eyes. He may not notice the hat you're wearing. But if he's a typical man he likes you to have attractive, well-groomed hands...according to a recent survey. The men (those unobservant creatures!) rated pretty hands as important as a nice smile and pleasant manners. So perhaps this is your cue to start taking inventory.

Is your cuticle rough and ragged? Even when you're wearing a fresh coat of polish, a ragged cuticle can spoil the whole effect! It's a sign your hands aren't getting the attention they deserve. But don't make the mistake of cutting the cuticle. You'll just be encouraging it to grow faster, and you may be inviting infection. Instead, try Cutex Oily Cuticle Remover. It's so safe and gentle!

Use a Cutex genuine Orangewood Stick for your cuticle care. That's one of the jobs it's been designed for. Simply wrap the tip in cotton and moisten with Cutex Oily Cuticle Remover. Then use this to push the cuticle gently back all around. At the same time the Cuticle Remover will safely float away the dead tissue and leave your nails neat and well-groomed.

Are your nails splitting and cracking? Filing them incorrectly may be your trouble. Harsh, metal files roughly sawed across your nail tips may separate the tiny layers of nail and start them splitting. Cutex Emery Boards are much gentler. File carefully from side to tip with the emery board, leaving a sixteenth of an inch at each side for added reinforcement. Flexible Cutex Emery Boards give with the contour of your nails. And there are no rough, sharp edges to cause injury.

Don't try to make your nails too pointed, either. Very pointed nails break more easily and accent stubby fingers. You'll find complete instructions for giving yourself a home manicure in our helpful little booklet, "Beauty Treatment for Your Hands." Now available without charge. Send your name and address to Northam Warren, Dept. C, New York, N. Y.

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

This American fashion for making a clown out of dad has gone so far that even if Junior is getting D's and E's in school he thinks he's smarter than $20,000-a-year pa with a Ph.D.

A stubborn little band of affluent mothers-in-law in our town each threatens fond son-in-law with a reward of $10 or more—if he happens to have a picture of her in his wallet.

When our local nabob married off his daughter recently he had plenty of $30 Russian caviar flown in. But they kept running out of toast and minced onion to go with the caviar.

"After a man leaves college," muses Peter Comfort, burning his fancy New Year's Eve paper hat in the leaf burner, "he surrenders oftener to a piquant facial expression than to a pretty face."

Why did we all think it so funny when we discovered our Cyclone (at three) sitting on the floor with a pile of my favorite long-play records and a hammer? As if he were being brilliant?

Our town's gourmet argues hash is a better test of a restaurant's excellence than ham and eggs. He has eaten hash at Chambord, Colony and Antoine's, and plans to order hash at all New York's "Best Ten" his next visit.

When our youngest is down to one right glove and one left galosh, we know the end of winter is near, and that by June he'll triumphantly find one or the other at a chum's house.

My red-haired daughter has learned how to cook tenderized low-cost beef that tastes better than costly steak. I've nicknamed it "medicated beef" and promised my own Lady Love a golden aluminum swim suit if she learns how.

Our village youngsters who haven't earned or wangled enough money to spend spring vacation in Bermuda or Lauderdale get revenge by bringing four or five chums home from college. For pa and ma it's a delicate choice.

No more gravy for me, my Dream Girl decrees, until after I've dieted off at least fifteen pounds. I can be stoical about this, because luckily I don't like gravy very much.

Our youngsters' tots yank at every knob, switch and handle, as if each were a rightful toy. I'm convinced the ideal toy creation for the little darlings should resemble an airliner's instrument panel.

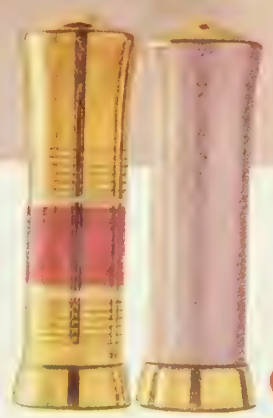
Ah, expert testimony against "exclusive" dating: My favorite Beauty Queen (still a coed) tells me she's dated 102 different boys in college. This, she feels, has been a vital part of her education.

I brought nine pairs of onyx bookends home from my visit to Nogales, Sonora, and now I can scatter batches of books around the house like flowers: a row of war books, a group of biographies, a medley of poetry.

"Homely men are sweeter," reflects Betty Comfort, jumping cautiously on her Trampoline. "They aren't so conceited or egotistical. But they needn't be homely as scarecrows!"

Infallible sign of spring: we can't find our favorite rake or our favorite spade. But whose fancy shrubbery saw is this? We suspect our neighbors; they suspect us.

I've been skeptical about electric blankets, too brave-new-world for me. Yet I like to snuggle under my wife's electric when she has it on! (Only on this has she outmodernized me.)



Maybe our offspring wouldn't drop their clothes on the bedroom floor if their college quarters had Saturday-morning inspection. I hear that in sorority and fraternity bedrooms the clutter approaches squalor.

My notion of a pleasant way to diet isn't to sit at the same table and watch my family bite chunks of fattening delicacies. Maybe I need a separate table in the next room. Or a breakfast of black coffee and juice in bed, far from the ham and eggs.

When Cyclone at three says "Yes, sir!" like a sergeant or airman to a four-star general . . . or Eric at one takes an interest in books by knocking 'em off the lower shelves . . .
and Suzi at three deflates a man with a sweet smile as if she were thirty . . .
or Tracy good-naturedly at one takes a mauling from her brother . . .
and Patrick at five influences his gramp to imitation by exploding.
when he's mistaken, a resentful "I goofed!"
then I glow at a glimpse of more immortality than I deserve.

smart girl can't have too many Cutex lipsticks. Because it takes a heap of stick hues to make a fashion wardrobe! Wear beige...and your lips cry out a zingy color like "Hot Strawberry." Wear the new winey reds and you sim- must have Cutex "Clear Red." Don the new blues and you'll want "Pink m Paris." The new greens and you'll need "Coral Ice." So it goes...with a e when you're sad, an orange when you're glad...a lipstick for your special ods. Before you know it, you'll own all the fashion-fresh Cutex colors!

Married... but following two separate paths

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

DO YOU AGREE?

"I have known Bill four weeks. He wants me to marry him now since he is due to enter service next month, but mother opposes it."

She is right. Wait a year.

ASK YOURSELF:

Will I Be a Happy Wife?

This spring and summer, thousands of girls will be getting engaged and married. Their success and happiness will depend greatly upon the personal traits and attributes that they bring to marriage. Answer the questions below to find out how your qualities compare with those that research has shown to be characteristic of the happy wife.

DO YOU:

1. Prefer homemaking to any other career?
2. Enjoy spending time with children?
3. Really try to get along with other people?
4. Usually look upon life's bright side?
5. Find most persons easy to like?
6. Value their good opinion of you?
7. Manage your temper easily?

ARE YOU:

8. Orderly and systematic in your habits?
9. Confident but not aggressive?
10. Thrifty about money?
11. Co-operative and companionable?
12. Patient and understanding with friends?
13. A warmhearted and understanding person?
14. By your mother's standards, ready for marriage?

Credit yourself with one point for each definite "Yes." Unless your total score is ten or more, there can be serious doubt about your readiness for marriage. Study of your negative answers may help you see the way to greater maturity.

HE WAS AN EASY TARGET FOR ANOTHER WOMAN

Bill was thirty-five, Jean thirty-four; both were college graduates. Married seven years, they had a son, five, and a daughter, three. Bill's automobile agency netted him more than $20.000 a year, while Jean operated a secretarial service she had founded before marriage.

Now they were locked in bitter dispute. Jean wanted to become a working partner in Bill's business, and he refused to consider the arrangement. On this issue the marriage appeared to be breaking up. To understand the immediate crisis, the background must be considered.

When Bill and Jean met, he was an outstanding success as a manufacturer's representative. Though three years elapsed before they were married, they spent little time together, because Bill's job required extensive traveling. Jean refused to marry a "traveling salesman," so Bill gave up his job and bought an automobile agency in her home city. However, she insisted on continuing her business, and Bill reluctantly gave in.

Motherhood was no part of Jean's plans, and she continued to insist on working despite her pregnancies. However, when the second baby was expected, she demanded an elaborate new home as compensation for her "sacrifice." As usual, Bill gave in.

Jean's waking hours were now filled with activities which excluded Bill. A lonely man, he was an easy target for his secretary. But his conscience soon overtook him and he confessed to Jean. Outraged, she insisted on replacing every girl in the office with others of her own choosing. Resentfully, Bill obeyed her orders.

After their daughter was born, Jean's surveillance and interference increased. Worse, she had discussed Bill's affair with relatives, neighbors and even his employees. Despairing, Bill decided to sell out and start over in another state. Jean agreed, but in return demanded sole title to the house and a full partnership in the new agency.

Bill balked on admitting her to the business. It was at this point that they sought counsel.

Bill said, "I think I still love Jean, and I do love and need my children. But there comes a time when a man can no longer give in to his wife. She can run her own business, but she isn't going to ruin mine."

Jean said, "Bill doesn't know the value of a dollar. The only reason we have anything is because of me. If he wants me, we have to be partners in every way. Otherwise, I want a legal separation and half his money, but no divorce. If I can't have him, no other woman will."

Bill rejected the idea of legal separation, but in return for a divorce, would agree to deed her the house and pay her and the children $1000 a month.

Playing for time, to protect Bill's business and to let tempers cool before permanent commitments were made, the counselor suggested a temporary separation. But Jean refused even a short-term truce without elaborate financial guaranties. After fruitless legal skirmishes, she finally agreed to a Nevada divorce, to get her way financially.

Though Jean and Bill are by no means a typical couple, their story reflects principles applicable to many.

Their courtship, though spanning three years, was inadequate. They hadn't enough time together to discover their differences, and either resolve them or end the engagement.

From the beginning, their relationship was distorted to satisfy Jean's demands. Even before the marriage she was setting the terms.

She erred in issuing ultimatums, Bill erred in yielding to them. Neither was fulfilling a partner's responsibility to give and take. If one does all the taking and the other does all the giving, the relationship is not that of partners.

They never developed common goals, but followed their separate paths, which drew farther apart as the years went by.

They postponed counsel until it was too late. With trust and respect gone, with communication destroyed, with each motivated by selfish interests alone, the marriage [illegible] but financially.

At several points along the way, constructive steps might have been taken to help this couple improve their relationship. Neither of them was perceptive enough, or cared enough, to make the effort. Unhappily, the children will suffer most.

"MY DAUGHTER GETS CRUSHES"

Marguerite's mother arranged her first appointment. Mrs. A. wrote that Marguerite, a college student of nineteen, kept getting crushes on men old enough to be her father. The first time, when she was sixteen, the man was a bachelor of thirty-four. Now she was infatuated with a still-older man, a husband and father. "It's heartbreaking, when there are so many nice boys around. I can't talk sense into her head, but I've finally persuaded her to see you."

Marguerite proved to be attractive, self-possessed and civil, but uncommunicative. Though she answered questions, she at first volunteered nothing, but gradually she relaxed and began to talk spontaneously.

Her parents were divorced when she was two, and her mother remarried when Marguerite was twelve. She became very fond of her stepfather. "He's always been good to me. I get along with him better than with my mother. She and I clash about everything. I've never been able to talk to her."

At fourteen she started dating a boy a year older, but broke off because her mother disapproved of his family. "I dated several other boys, but they seemed so awkward and clumsy to mother that I couldn't get interested." Then, when she was fifteen (a year younger than her mother believed!) she started seeing Ralph, the thirty-four-year-old bachelor—"So handsome and polished, and he treated me like an adult." Soon they became intimate. "At first I didn't like that part, but I wanted to please him, and soon it became important to me too. I probably would have married him if he'd asked me."

But he didn't, and when she left for college they broke off. At first she dated other students, but they seemed "dull and silly" after Ralph. Then she met Tom, thirty-eight, married, and the father of two children. "I knew he played around, but that only made it more interesting."

Tom's wife somehow learned of the affair and told Mrs. A. Marguerite was unmoved by her mother's pleading—but for the sake of Tom's home and children, he and Marguerite agreed not to see each other any more. But Marguerite maintained that if she couldn't have Tom, she'd never marry anyone.

When Marguerite returned to college, she was more optimistic and more realistic. Since she wanted to continue therapy (a good sign) I referred her to an able clinician. At last word, she was continuing to progress toward understanding herself and her situation. Her memories of Tom and Ralph no longer prevent responsiveness to men nearer her own age. She is now dating an instructor ten years older than she. There is a vast difference in the relationship possible between a man of thirty and a young woman of twenty, and that of a man of thirty-four and a girl of fifteen.

Marguerite's case is an example of a schoolgirl crush carried to destructive extremes. In adolescence, most girls cherish romantic dreams of some fascinating older man. So long as these attachments remain imaginary, and are not allowed to overshadow reality, they can do little harm.

But for a young girl actually to become romantically involved with a man twenty years her senior is unwise and unwholesome. They are literally a lifetime apart. Her association with him is apt to detach her from her contemporaries, and unfit her for the activities suitable to her age.

As she begins dating, every girl needs understanding and guidance. Marguerite and her mother never achieved a relationship of understanding. It was Mrs. A's scorn that first discouraged Marguerite's interest in boys her own age. Instead of judging every gawky youth who comes to the door as a potential husband, let the mother remember that a variety of dating experience is sound preparation for marriage, and for life.

Tell me, doctor...

There are many questions which women would like to ask a trusted physician, but there is not always the opportunity. In this series, Tell Me, Doctor, Doctor Schauffler will discuss some of the problems which have been sent to him by readers. The situations are all real, but all the names used are fictitious.

"My wife got this sudden, awful pain. I was so scared that all I could think of was to put her in the car and take her to a doctor quick! Did I do right?"

The doctor, using a pause of a half hour or so between patients to amplify his notes, had asked not to be interrupted. So he looked up in some surprise when his secretary opened his office door without knocking and hurried directly to his desk.

"I'm sorry to bother you, Doctor, but a Mrs. Jenkins is here—her husband just brought her in. She's an emergency, I think. She looks ghastly and I'm sure you'll want to see her at once. I've got her on the divan in the outer office."

ABBOT MILLS

Mrs. Jenkins, thirtyish and wearing a house dress, did indeed look very ill. Her face was gray, there were beads of perspiration on her forehead. Her husband, standing beside her, was also in work clothes.

"I don't know whether I did the right thing or not," Mr. Jenkins began apologetically, "coming in without phoning you or anything. But, you see, my wife got this sudden, awful pain. She was lifting a basket of clothes when it hit her. I heard her scream clear out in back where I was working. When I got in the house, she was almost fainting. She's had these pains before, but not so bad. They just make her kind of sick. But this time it was terrible! She's not a woman to make a fuss—she's got grit. I was so scared all I could think of was to put her in the car and get her to a doctor as fast as I could."

"You did exactly right, Mr. Jenkins," the doctor said. "Or you could have rushed her to the nearest hospital. Whichever was quickest." Then to Mrs. Jenkins, who was making a feeble effort to sit up, "Stay right where you are! Just take it easy! Mary Ann, get my blood-pressure apparatus and a hypodermic." Following the nurse into the corridor, he whispered to her, "Call an ambulance at once. And bring a wheel chair!"

He returned to Mrs. Jenkins. "Where is the pain worst?"

"Here!" she said weakly, indicating her lower abdomen. "Low down on the left, right here. I can hardly bear to touch the place. It's awful, Doctor!"

"I know it hurts, Mrs. Jenkins, but you're going to be all right; we'll see to it. Have you had chills—felt feverish, that is?"

"No, but I feel very faint and dizzy. My husband took my temperature when I had the pain before, and it was below normal."

Now Mary Ann reappeared with the blood-pressure apparatus. The doctor took pains not to show his concern as the dial registered so dangerously low as to be almost indiscernible. Deftly he administered the hypodermic.

"What have you had to eat today, Mrs. Jenkins?"

"Just a cup of black coffee. I didn't feel like anything else."

"That's fine! Couldn't be better." He took Mr. Jenkins aside, said in a low voice, "We've got an emergency on our hands. I've sent for an ambulance. There will be a wheel chair here in a minute. I can't say for sure, but your wife is probably going to have to have an operation. It should be a pretty simple one; but if it's what I think it is, we can't waste any time."

"But Doctor ——"

The doctor went right on. "I'll examine your wife further in the hospital. I can't do it here—I'll explain why later." Then, in a louder, cheerful tone, "Well! Here's Mary Ann with a wheel chair! We're going to take you for a little ride, Mrs. Jenkins. And first thing you know, you'll be all shipshape!"

An hour later the doctor stepped from the hospital surgery into the corridor, where Mr. Jenkins was waiting anxiously.

"The operation's over, and your wife came through it beautifully. Her trouble proved to be exactly what I guessed it was—a ruptured tubal pregnancy on the left side. She was hemorrhaging internally, from the ruptured tube. That's what made it necessary for us to work so fast. She could have died if we hadn't been fortunate—and if you hadn't been smart and acted as quickly as you did. But she's all right now. She ought to feel pretty much like her old self in the morning."

Mr. Jenkins gave a great sigh of relief. "She was awfully sick, wasn't she?"

"She certainly was. A ruptured tube is apt to cause more trouble from shock reaction than it does from the actual loss of blood. We've replaced that, by the way. Sorry I can't take time to talk more about it right now, but I've an office full of patients waiting for me. Can you be here tomorrow morning at nine o'clock? Good!"

Mr. Jenkins was already in his wife's hospital room when the doctor came in the next morning.

"She looks fine, doesn't she?" he said to Mr. Jenkins. "I thought she would. It was a simple operation, as operations go. It just required prompt action. That's why we rushed around so. There wasn't time yesterday to go into details. It was a big help, Mr. Jenkins, that you were such a good sport. But now we can explore things a bit. How many attacks like this have you had, Mrs. Jenkins?"

"At least two or three." Mrs. Jenkins' voice was strong, she looked very different from the desperately ill woman of the day before. "I missed my period two months ago. It was after that I had the first attack of pain. I thought maybe I was pregnant, but couldn't be sure because I kept bleeding off and on. It seemed every attack was worse than the one before. Nearly always they came after I had been doing heavy housework."

"Did it ever happen following marital relations?"

"Well, yes, it did," in a low voice.

"You mustn't be embarrassed, Mrs. Jenkins. That is a pretty important indication, medically speaking. Now tell me something else. Have you ever had trouble with your Fallopian tubes? Such as an infection, for instance?"

"Yes, Doctor. We have two little boys. But a year after Mike was born—he's the youngest—I had a spontaneous abortion. I was about two months along, the doctor said. That was two years ago. I had a bad infection. Later the doctor took X rays. He said that only one of my tubes was open, and that one only partly. He said that was why I hadn't become pregnant again. It's always been a little tender there since I had the infection."

"You were pregnant this time, Mrs. Jenkins, but it was what we call an ectopic pregnancy. The baby was growing in the outer part of the left Fallopian tube instead of in the uterus where it belonged."

Mr. Jenkins cleared his throat. "What did you do to her, Doctor?"

"I took out the left tube, containing the ruptured pregnancy, and the left ovary as well. The ovary had been badly damaged too. Not only by the former infection, but by the rupture of the tube and the hemorrhage that followed."

"Does that mean I won't be able to have any more babies?" Mrs. Jenkins asked. "What about the other tube and ovary?"

"This is very interesting. And very fortunate, too, I think; all the more since you have told me about the X rays. I expected the right tube—the opposite one—to be closed. But it wasn't. It only needed a little straightening out. The ovary on the right side is all right too. So with any luck at all, you have a better than fifty per cent chance of having more babies!"

"I'm glad. Sam has always wanted a little girl."

"But I don't want my wife to have another one of those things," Mr. Jenkins declared emphatically. "Is it likely to happen again?"

"I have to say frankly that Mrs. Jenkins has considerably more likelihood of another ectopic than the average woman. But a great many women do have normal pregnancies after an ectopic. The chances would be about even, either way. You folks are veterans now though. You would recognize the first signs of don't despair...

Calgon* rinses gray clothes white and soft again, or double your money back!

Try this prove-it-yourself test: (1) Wash and rinse a load of clothes your usual way—leave in washer. (2) Refill washer with hot water . . . add a cup of Calgon water conditioner . . . then agitate 5 minutes. (3) Surprise! A layer of old, left-in suds and dirt appears! Calgon itself does not make suds. They were embedded in the clothes during previous washings. Calgon rinsed out the suds and dirt.

Calgon is not a soap, detergent, bluing or bleach. In fact, no other washday product does what Calgon does. Remove the gray, restore brightness, keep fabrics naturally soft and new looking by using Calgon regularly.

Guarantee: Use a box of Calgon. If you're not satisfied that Calgon is all that we say it is, send the box top to Calgon, Pittsburgh 30, Pa., and get double your money back! *Reg. T.M.

trouble. Mrs. Jenkins' condition need not become critical again."

"Why did I have a pregnancy like that?" Mrs. Jenkins asked. "What is the reason for them?"

"They come about, really, as a result of Nature's precautions to insure that fertilized ova shall find a firm resting place in the womb; not just pass on through, as happens with unfertilized ones. You probably know that the Fallopian tubes convey the ova to the womb, after they have been released by the ovaries. After an ovum has been fertilized—it turns almost immediately into a raspberrylike object called a conceptus—it develops a stronger and stronger propensity to dig in, attach itself to something, as it moves through the tube.

"It's all carefully and rather wonderfully arranged so that the conceptus will attach itself firmly to the wall of the uterus, once it arrives there. And ordinarily that is the way it happens. But when conception takes place, the ovum normally is met by the sperm at the outer end of the tube, the one nearest the ovary. If something slows it up in its journey through the tube, it may dig in too soon, while it is still in the tube. In that case it becomes what we call an ectopic pregnancy, which simply means a pregnancy outside of its normal place."

"But what could delay the ovum? I thought all that happened automatically!"

"Usually it does, But the female reproductive system is a very delicate and complicated affair and there are various things that can go wrong. Some women are born with defective tubes—partially closed or constricted. These will hold the conceptus back, slow it up. Sometimes there are little blind alleys in the tubes—sort of dead-end branches. A conceptus gets started down one of those by mistake and may stick there; or else not get back to the main stem in time.

"A previous pelvic infection that closes a tube wholly or partly is a frequent cause of delay. That was probably what was responsible in your case. Almost any previous operation in the pelvic region increases the chance of ectopic pregnancy slightly. Other things can cause it too."

"What other things, Doctor? Are any of them the matter with me?"

"No, Mrs. Jenkins. Aside from the loss of an ovary and tube, you are very fit—I checked! Since you ask, though, there is a rather bizarre possibility that I might mention, even though you don't have it. Sometimes one finds in the tubes little islands of tissue identical with those of the lining of the womb. This condition is called endometriosis. Encountering these tissues, the conceptus may think it has reached the womb, and be lured into digging in at the wrong place.

"I have seen reports of cases in which special hormones had been used to overcome sterility. These hormones can act upon the endometriosis cells, make them go through the preparatory changes the womb goes through in getting ready to receive the fertilized ovum. So it is little wonder that the conceptus gets bewildered, attaches itself in the wrong place! Some of us think now that use of hormones in this way may be dangerous; especially the stronger, newer ones—even though they may sometimes assist in bringing about a normal pregnancy."

"Why did I have that horrible pain, Doctor? It was much worse than the pain when my babies were born."

"Pain in a condition like this is almost always due to hemorrhage into the pelvic cavity. The blood connections of a conceptus in the tube are very poor, the blood vessels break easily. If the bleeding is within the tube it swells and forms a tumor, which in some cases may break into the pelvis. We call this a ruptured ectopic pregnancy, and it's what happened to you. It is dreadfully painful. It is also shocking to the delicate pelvic lining, the peritoneum. Tragically so at times. Unquestionably the earlier attacks of pain you had were due to lesser amounts of bleeding."

"How did you know what ailed me? Sam said you promised to explain why you rushed me to the hospital without examining me."

"First, it was because we didn't have a minute to lose. You were hemorrhaging critically at the time. That was indicated by your extremely low blood pressure and state of shock. Second, because an examination in a case like this can easily increase the trouble. We obstetricians have learned never to examine a woman we suspect of having an ectopic, except in a place where immediate emergency surgery is available. The examination itself could cause rupture of the tube. I didn't want you going into complete shock and hemorrhage on my office examining table!"

"Doctor, with all those chances to go wrong that you mentioned, why aren't there more ectopic pregnancies? It seems to me you don't hear of them very often."

"They probably occur much more often than most people realize. The tube, you see, is a very poor place for a conceptus to dig in, establish roots. There are none of the nourishing blood vessels and special tissues there that the uterus provides so amply for a fertilized ovum. It is like a garden with thin, poor soil.

"Hence we doctors believe that the great majority of ectopic pregnancies get into trouble very early, in the first month or so. The conceptus aborts spontaneously and is quietly absorbed. Probably many women never know they have started a pregnancy. The abortion may be passed off simply as a delayed or an unusually painful period

"Of course, when an ectopic ruptures the tube, as yours did, causing hemorrhage within the pelvic cavity, usually people know about it! But we doctors are learning to suspect ectopic pregnancy whenever a married woman in the fertile ages misses a period, bleeds irregularly and then has sudden attacks of pain. In a good many such cases, an ectopic pregnancy is found. The best medical thinking holds that it should be removed at once."

> Were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers, or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter.
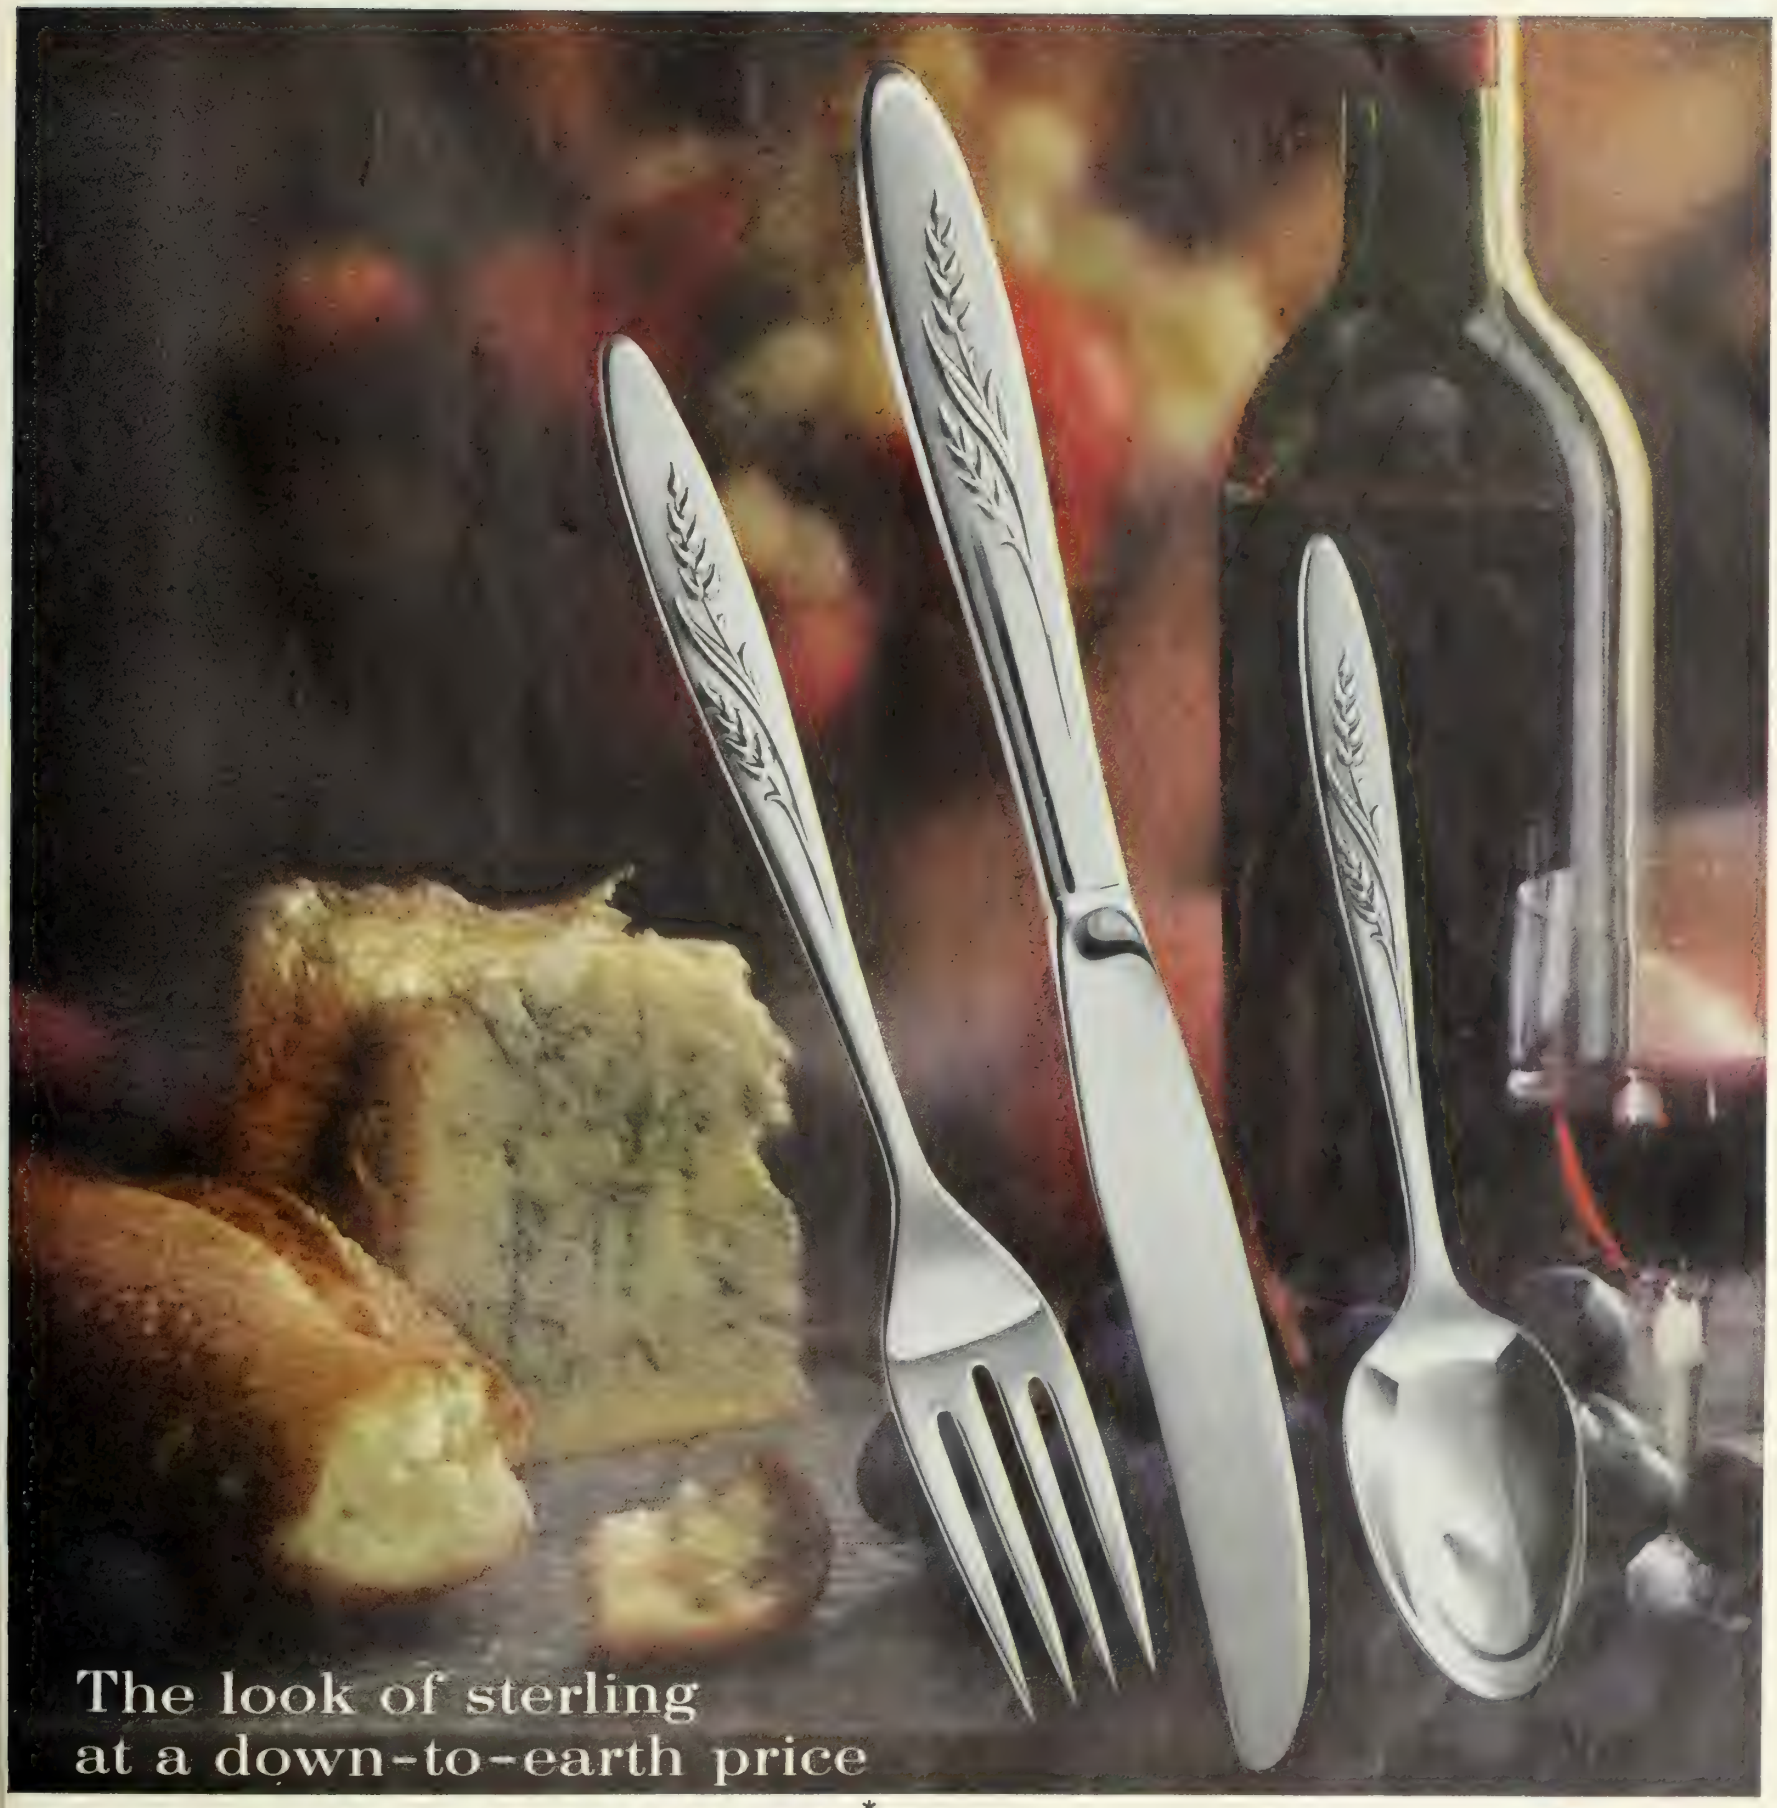
> THOMAS JEFFERSON

"But, Doctor, it seems to me I've read about babies growing outside the womb and living!"

"This does happen. Occasionally the fetus may break out of the tube without causing any serious symptoms and get along somehow in the lower abdomen. It has to be delivered by surgery, naturally. But these cases are decidedly the exception. The risk is so great for both mother and baby in an ectopic that when the condition is diagnosed early, it is considered best to interrupt the pregnancy.

"But look, Mrs. Jenkins, you don't need any more of this theoretical conversation now. I'm afraid we have been thoughtless. Incidentally, though, you'll be sitting up this afternoon, walking around tomorrow, and can go home in a very few days if you want to. You shouldn't have much pain or trouble."



"Just a minute, Doctor, before you go," Mrs. Jenkins said. "I think I'd like to try for another baby. Sam and I know what to do, now, if I get those symptoms again, and I'm not scared. But ought we to wait awhile?"

"Yes, for six months at least. Then let me test to find out whether the remaining tube is still satisfactory. After that you'll have to keep in pretty close touch, much more so than in the usual case, and be extra careful if you do become pregnant. We'll have to be alert. But there's no good reason why you shouldn't try if you wish to."

"Doctor, I just don't know how to thank you."

The doctor put his hand on Mr. Jenkins' shoulder. "This fellow here is the one to thank, Mrs. Jenkins. He probably saved your life by his promptness in getting medical attention. I think he really deserves another chance at having that little girl!"

Next month Dr. Schauffler discusses fibroid tumors of the uterus.

Stewart Alsop admits that his brother John (not Joseph) predicted Rockefeller's withdrawal from the presidential contest. "Don't forget, Stew," he said, "Rockefellers don't make a habit of investing in dry holes." Apparently he didn't take John seriously enough, for NIXON AND ROCKEFELLER (Doubleday) came out just too late.

On the credit side for Russia is the new custom of newlyweds planting a pair of trees in a local park on their wedding day. As the marriage grows, so do the trees—reforestation and divorce taken care of together.

Once I met a man aged 110, who had a neighbor of 125. They lived in Svanetia, a little country tucked away in the high Caucasus mountains of South Russia. It may be the remoteness, or the mountain life. At any rate, I now read that they do even better in Hunza, which is more remote and more mountainous. HUNZA LAND, by Dr. Allen Banik (Whitehorn-Taplinger), tells about this extraordinary country in the center of the Himalayas, where there is no disease, and 120 is not an unusual age. They have no circulatory problems in Hunza, no stomach-aches, no heart attacks. Even though there is not a toothbrush in the country, the Hunzakuts' teeth are near perfect, as are their eyes. (Dr. Banik is an eye specialist.) Men of 80 and 90 carry heavy loads up the mountains and return to the fields to work without resting. They frequently have very young children. There are no insects in Hunza, no dogs, no cats, no chickens. No constipation. The terraced fields and the organic gardening of this unschooled people are models for the world's engineers and agriculturists—a 2000-year-old civilization still going strong.

THE EDGE OF DAY, by Laurie Lee (Morrow) is one of the loveliest books I can remember. The author is a man in his 40's, a poet, who tells about his childhood in an ancient Cotswold village.

Another beautifully written book is Barry Fleming's THE WINTER RIDER (Lippincott). This is a highly dramatic story which takes place in a single day, in a rickety automobile, with the driver, a girl hitchhiker, and a good sound spiritual problem.

"Well, that's the oil business!"

A book to warm the heart is TO SIR, WITH LOVE, by E. R. Braithwaite (Prentice-Hall)—the actual account by a fine young Negro teacher of his experience in the toughest school in the London slums.

Now I am really dealing in superlatives. A DISTANT TRUMPET by Paul Horgan (Farrar, Straus & Cudahy), is topnotch. It's the story of the Apache Indians and a U.S. military outpost in the 1870's—far better than any "western," and one of the finest "historicals" ever written about the Southwest.

When a ham glaze has everything . . . delicious flavor . . . mouth-watering looks . . . and it's still wonderfully different from anything you ever tasted—you can bet that glaze is made with French's Mustard!

Because nothing but the golden touch of French's Mustard can bring you a recipe like this. French's sings with a goodness of not just one, but a combination of seven lively spices—blended to create a golden seasoning treat. That's the reason French's is by far America's best selling mustard.

Let French's add a spicy new lift to your own recipes... in casseroles, stews, meat loaf. And of course, nothing beats the 7-spice goodness of French's Mustard on hot dogs, hamburgers, sandwiches.

Golden Glazed Ham

5–8 pound ready-to-eat half ham
2–3 oranges, sectioned whole cloves
½ cup French's Mustard
½ cup light brown sugar
½ tsp. ground cloves
¼ cup orange juice

Heat ham in preheated oven (350°) for 30 minutes. Score only deep enough to insert orange sections into slits. Secure orange in slits with toothpicks. Insert cloves. Combine French's Mustard, sugar, ground cloves, orange juice. Spoon half the glaze over ham, continue baking 30 minutes. Serves 10 to 14. Enjoy other half of golden glaze recipe as a marvelous "dipping sauce" at your table.

French's PURE PREPARED MUSTARD

Enjoy it! on Food and in Food

7 lively spices in every jar... that's the secret of French's Golden Touch!

What we do Where we go Whom we meet

EDITED BY EILEEN SHARPE

Old friends Dong Kingman and our Ruth Matthews, who met on a How America Lives story, had a reunion this week. Dong was launching a New York exhibit, planning a Paris show, refreshing us all with the whimsey that enhances his art. In one Central Park sketch, a real-life skating rink becomes a lake. "It's more universal and I could fill the boats with anybody I'd like to meet." In another, thinking the East River too sobersided, Dong drew in the Statue of Liberty—sitting down. Why? "An artist has a chance to make life as delightful as it should be—even if it isn't!"

Life as it should be: Dong shows Ruth.

Beauty Editor Dawn Norman gets dozens of etiquette queries ("How many bridesmaids?"), hundreds of product queries ("Please chart my best colors from hair tint to toenail"), now thousands of requests for something she wears. It's our "beauty apron," offered in 1953 as a 25-cent pattern, bought by 40,000 readers so far, still in peak demand. Readers tell Dawn they make it up four or five ways for housework, gardening, parties, even as an evening topper. Helen Olchvary, in our Philadelphia office, looked up from stacks of orders with a guess that could be the answer: "Maybe it has magic beautifying powers."

Editors get strange mail: mildewed rose leaves to Richard Pratt to diagnose, seaweed cookies to Jean Anderson to taste, half an afghan to Cynthia Wheatland to advise on color, a front-porch step to John Brenneman to remedy design. But the strangest pack of all once came to homemaking's Margaret Davidson. A tearful reader sent a whole week's wash. Query: "What did I do wrong?" Answer: She overloaded and—— but we mailed her a chin-up primer on how to start over—plus the wash.

Salty and outspoken Vice Admiral Hyman Rickover is a man of whom Ed Murrow has said: "He will occasionally admit that he is pleased . . . has never confessed to being satisfied." When editor Bruce Gould heard that the terrible-tempered Admiral—who fathered the atomic sub and authored the book Education and Freedom—had dropped in unexpectedly to see him, he braced. His visitor strode in, held out a hand: "I'm pleased to say the* JOURNAL *has done more to further education than any magazine I know—I came to congratulate you!"

When Louella Shouer bought some cooking ideas from minister's wife Elizabeth McCuaig, she urged her to publish all. Now Lovers of Hospitality is coming out. The Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church here hailed it with a supper based on JOURNAL pages. A delighted chairman told Louella: "Big hit—maybe first time a hundred women reviewed a book by eating it!"

DI PIETRO

Pattern's O'Leary and Rockettes

Who would think our sewing room and the Rockettes' had the same goal—to make a man's eyes light up? Up in the JOURNAL's dressmaking workshop we whir at spring fashions. Downstairs 20 machines hum away to garb 78 famed dancers and ballerinas in gold or silver lamé, feathers, organdies, ribbon, sequins. "In some acts," Nora O'Leary told us after shop talk with the dancers, "they sew light bulbs into costumes!" Nora doesn't do that, but her skills (page 78) will win you just as much applause. Sparkling too—April's movie at the Music Hall is "Please Don't Eat the Daisies" from the book by JOURNAL author Jean Kerr, and will light anybody's eyes.

The MISTRESS of MELLYN

BY VICTORIA HOLT

The MISTRESS of MELLYN

BY VICTORIA HOLT

"My heart was beating fast and my color was heightened. I knocked at the door. . . ."

You too—with Martha Leigh, copper-haired, twenty-four-year-old governess—stand on the threshold of heart-quickening adventure, a duel of good and evil, and impetuous romance. A novel you will want to keep.

Save this issue and your next four for reading and rereading pleasure.

"There are two courses open to a gentlewoman in penurious circumstances," my Aunt Adelaide had said. "One is to marry, and the other to find a post in keeping with her gentility."

As the train carried me through wooded hills and past green meadows, I was taking this second course; partly, I suppose, because I had never had an opportunity of trying the former. I pictured myself as I must appear to my fellow travelers if they were to bother to glance my way, which was not very likely: a young woman of medium height, already past her first youth, being twenty-four years old, in a brown merino dress with cream lace collar and little tufts of lace at the cuffs. (Cream being so much more serviceable than white, as Aunt Adelaide told me.) My brown velvet bonnet, tied under my chin, was of the sort which was so becoming to feminine people like my sister Phillida but, I always felt, sat a little incongruously on heads like mine.

My hair was thick with a coppery tinge, parted in the center, brought down at the sides of my too-long face, and made into a cumbersome knot. My eyes were large, in some lights the color of amber, and were my best feature, but they were too bold—so said Aunt Adelaide; which meant that they had learned none of the feminine graces which were so becoming to a woman. My nose was too short, my mouth too wide. In fact, I thought, nothing seemed to fit; and I must resign myself to journeys such as this, since it is necessary for me to earn a living, and I shall never achieve the first of those alternatives: a husband.

We had passed through the green meadows of Somerset and were now deep in the moorland and wooded hills of Devon. I had been told to take a good note of that masterpiece of bridge building, Mr. Brunel's bridge, which spanned the Tamar at Saltash, and after crossing which I should have left England behind and have passed into the Duchy of Cornwall.

I was becoming rather ridiculously excited about crossing the bridge. I was not a fanciful woman at this time—perhaps I changed later, but then a stay in a house like Mount Mellyn was enough to make the most practical of people fanciful—so I could not understand why I should feel this extraordinary excitement.

It was absurd, I told myself. Mount Mellyn may be a magnificent mansion; Connan TreMellyn may be as romantic as his name sounds; but that will be no concern of yours. You will be confined to belowstairs, or perhaps to the attics abovestairs, concerned only with the care of little Alvean.

What strange names these people had! This family to which I was going was Cornish, and the Cornish had a language of their own. Perhaps my own name, Martha Leigh, would sound odd to them. Martha! It always gave me a shock when I heard it. Aunt Adelaide always used it, but at home when my father had been alive he and Phillida never thought of calling me Martha. I was always Marty. In my new post I should be Miss Leigh, I supposed; perhaps shortened to Miss, or—more undignified still—Leigh.

© 1960 by Doubleday & Co., Inc.

One of Aunt Adelaide's numerous friends had heard of "Connan TreMellyn's predicament." He needed the right person to help him out of his difficulties. She must be patient enough to care for his daughter, sufficiently educated to teach her, and genteel enough for the child not to suffer through the proximity of someone who was not quite of her own class. Obviously what Connan TreMellyn needed was an impoverished gentlewoman. Aunt Adelaide decided that I filled the bill.

When our father, who had been vicar of a country parsonage, had died, Aunt Adelaide had swooped upon us and taken us to London. There should be a season, she told us, for twenty-year-old Martha and eighteen-year-old Phillida. Phillida had married at the end of that season; but after four years of living with Aunt Adelaide, I had not. So there came a day when she pointed out the two courses to me.

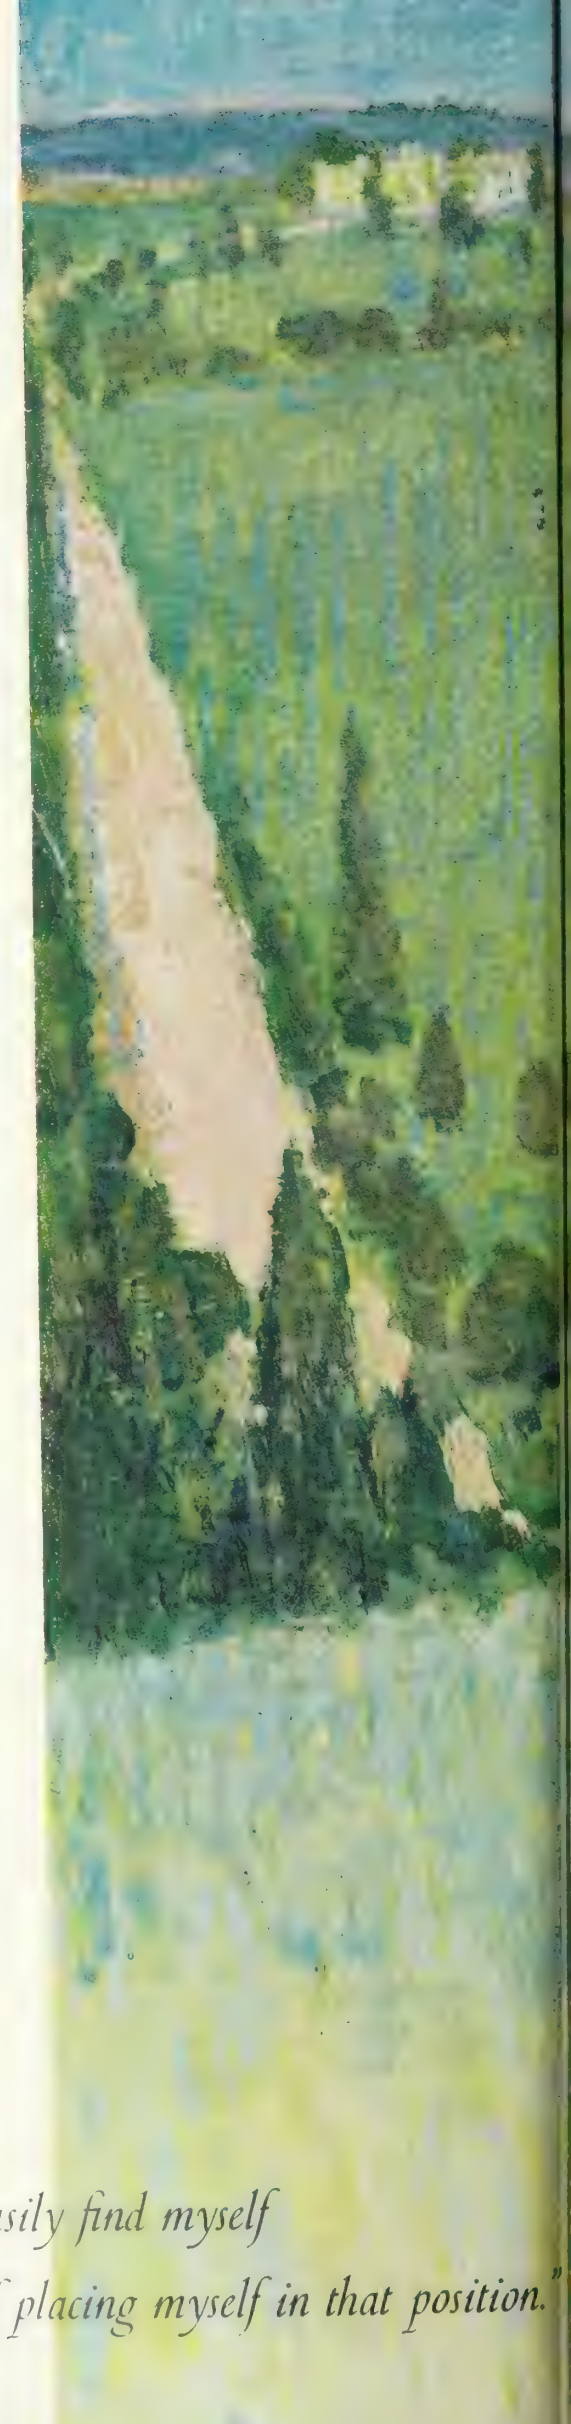
I glanced out the window. We were drawing into Plymouth. My fellow passengers had alighted and I sat back in my seat watching the activities on the platform.

As the guard was blowing his whistle and we were about to move on, the door of the carriage opened and a man came in. He looked at me with an apologetic smile as though he was hinting that he hoped I did not mind sharing the compartment with him, but I averted my eyes.

When we had left Plymouth and were approaching the bridge, he said, "You like our bridge, eh?"

I turned and looked at him. I saw a man, a little under thirty, well dressed, but in the manner of the country gentleman. His tail coat was dark blue, his trousers gray; and his hat was what in London we called a "pot hat." I thought him somewhat dissipated, with brown eyes that twinkled ironically as though he were fully aware of the warnings I must have received about the inadvisability of entering into conversation with strange men.

I answered, "Yes, indeed, I think it is a very fine piece of workmanship."



He smiled. We had crossed the bridge and entered Cornwall.

His brown eyes surveyed me and I thought, He is interested in me only because there is no one else to claim his attention. I remembered then that Phillida had once said that I put people off by presuming, when they showed interest. that I believed it was because no one else was available.

"Traveling far?" he asked.

"I believe I have now only a short distance to go. I leave the train at Liskeard."

"I realized I was stimulated by Peter Nansellock, could very easily find myself looking forward to his visits. . . . I had no intention of placing myself in that position."

Pete boarded the ship to recuperate, and succumbed to the oldest disease known to man.

By GEORGE BRADSHAW

To: Joseph Stewart,
c/o U. S. Embassy,
Geneva, Switzerland. Hamlet, Connecticut, June 18

Dear Joe: This is to alert you that I finally this morning put our baby brother on a ship. Really, you know, he is exasperating. Last night at dinner he pretended to have a relapse and said, "There's nothing I can do in Europe that I can't do in Connecticut," and when I looked at him he said, "Well, nothing vital."

The lug. Don't think I am being unsisterly, but he must see a little of the world. He's all over that jaundice—he must be; Monday he played four sets of tennis—but he'll use it as an excuse for the next ten years not to move. All he wants to do is go into Charlie's office—he passed the bar examinations in a breeze—and stay here with those bloody Weimaraners of his and stagnate.

We are responsible for him. We did so many things. I refuse to let him settle down to being a nine-o'clock boy in a nine-o'clock town, if for no other reason than it makes for such boring conversation.

Poor little Pete. He's six feet two; be prepared. But the moaning and groaning when I pushed him on the boat! I gave him a cuff and a bottle of champagne and a good talking to.

He must have a good time. You must see to it. Force him. He'll get off the boat in Genoa and go right up to you and Eleanor. So you two have plenty of things planned.

Charlie sends his love. Maybe we can get over for a couple of weeks in September. We're thinking about it, or rather I am. Charlie says impossible. Love to El.

Dear Pop: Thank you, thank you, thank you. For all the presents, all the good cheer, all the bravery. You treated me as if I were grown up, a fact you have long overlooked. I appreciate it.

The boat is wonderful, you were right. I'll never take an airplane again unless I have to get somewhere. And I have followed your instructions; I have been kind to several old ladies, and not talked to any strange men.

Of course I have met some men. I sit at the first officer's table—he's a kind, portly Italian with a wife and five children—and there are a Mr. Savage, an architect who's on his way to study in Rome, but he's sixty, I'm afraid, and an odd one called Pete Stewart, who said when I met him that he was recovering from jaundice, but it doesn't take you long to recover apparently, because with one day's sun and sea he's in elegant shape. He's more my age—a month older. We push around all over the ship and have a wonderful time. The nooks and crannies there are on a boat—I had no idea.

WHITE ROSES—VINCENT VAN GOGH 1853–1890

Before 1880, when he first turned to painting, Van Gogh had worked in an art gallery, taught, and done missionary work. Quite suddenly he decided to go to Paris, where he met, besides the leading Impressionists, Gauguin. Paris proved wonderful to him until the third winter; then he went to Arles. There he painted over two hundred and fifteen pictures in the space of fifteen months. But with the arrival of Gauguin, his situation began to deteriorate. He quarreled with Gauguin, then frenziedly cut off part of his own ear. For almost a year he lived at an asylum at Saint-Remy, then he settled in Auvers. An intolerable sadness weighed on him, and a few days after painting a golden wheat field with a sky flecked with ominous black crows, he went into the same field and shot himself. During his lifetime he sold only one picture . . . White Roses was painted only two months before the artist's death. With a noble simplicity which is reminiscent of his early flower paintings, it seems the lovely token of an untroubled day.

A Wedding to Remember

By HARRIET VAN HORNE

COURTESY OF THE COOPER UNION MUSEUM

On your wedding day your mind will naturally turn to all the blessed days to be. But because a good marriage is a lifelong miracle, you truly cannot envision how blessed. That men share this feeling is evident in the poet Lyttelton's line, "How much the wife is dearer than the bride." With all its sweetness and excitement, it's a day of solemn promise.

The words of Jonathan Swift come rolling back across the years:

> "Let none but Him who rules the thunder > Put this man and woman asunder."

A wedding today is an essentially feminine rite. Costuming the bride and her attendants can stir wild and tearful debates. ("Clarissa says she won't wear green!") Receptions start with a few cousins and aunts and sometimes turn into champagne suppers costing as much as a vine-covered cottage. To a prudent bride, all this must seem a wanton waste.

In olden times, weddings had a storybook quality. The ceremony was performed with devout simplicity. And the ensuing festivities had the earthy gladness of a Maypole dance. An account of a wedding in the year 1570 tells us that the bride, "her hair as yellow as gold, hanging down behind her" was led to church "between two sweet boys with bride's lace and rosemary tied about their silken sleeves."

The wedding to remember set forth in the following pages is equally captivating in its storybook charm. Here fantasy, beauty and simplicity are woven into a garland of ideas that bespeak love rather than ostentation, intimacy rather than carnival.

What could become the bride and her maids more enchantingly than bouffant dotted Swiss, bride's white with blue dots and bridesmaids' in a rainbow of pastel shades? Or for the more romantically dignified bride, a gown of white damask as chaste and flowing as a medieval lady's? What flowers more lovely than May baskets filled with mixed spring blossoms—a yellow medley of daisies, daffodils, tulips, snapdragons; or a pink and blue profusion of tulips, snapdragons, delphinium and cornflowers. Spring blossoms also will decorate the church with little bouquets tied on each pew. Down to the tips of your toes delightful ideas are here, ideas costing next to nothing, to be carried out in your own special way. Delicious food for the good friends gathered in the bride's own home after the wedding ceremony, and a fairy-tale cake, a tower of dreams for gay unwed girls at the wedding.

Life, we are told, holds in perfection but a few precious moments. Your wedding day deserves to be among them.

Beauty to Have and

"Where beauty is, there will be love."—ROBERT HEITH

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN BEAUTY EDITOR

The saying "Every girl looks beautiful on her wedding day" is a true and delightful one. Starry-eyed in luminous white, tingling with the excitement of loving and being loved, she feels beautiful—and in her magic moment she becomes a truly radiant being.

For many, such radiance enriches itself as the years go by on the charming conviction that woman's beauty is a deliciously essential part of life itself.

The girl who stays lovely learns early that beauty is many-faceted, and she continuously uses this knowledge to bring joy into her own and other people's lives.

She surrounds herself in beauty, discovering that even the littlest touches can reflect her most appealing self. She takes five minutes each morning to put on her "You'd-be-so-nice-to-come-home-to" look—the cheerful face, the well-brushed hair, the fresh gingham brunch coat in a color her husband loves.

As the song goes, she enjoys being a girl—and she uses the passing of time to improve, not excuse, her appearance. In her by-myself moments each day (grabbed when the grabbing's best) she does cream her face, put up her hair, do her nails or try a new exercise to whittle her waist.

As homemaker, wife and mother she depends on imaginative simplicity—in taste and action—to take her as easily as possible through her jam-packed days. Then, with gay appreciation for life's lighter touches, she puts aside the workaday atmosphere in favor of candlelight and music, heady perfume and some outrageously becoming dress.

It is her feminine response to something-new-and-wonderful, not a liking for artificiality itself, that stirs her to try the violet eye shadow, the fake eyelashes, the sable rinse in her hair.

She is no paragon, nor would she dream of pretending to be. On the contrary, she recognizes her unavoidable shortcomings, overlooks them, and turns her talents to making the most of her assets. Despite having her share of worries and upsets, she refuses to let life's little setbacks etch permanent frown lines in her face. With gaiety born of wisdom she shakes off negatives, and quickly becomes her sunny self again.

When necessary, beauty is her badge of courage, her "brave front." And whether she ties a colorful ribbon in her hair, or pins a fresh pink carnation on the ancient suit, she tries some trick to make her world seem bright again.

Instinctively she looks for beauty in the people around her, and this generous gesture reflects favorably in her face. For love of others she communicates in beauty, using her lilting laugh to cheer a heart, her soothing words to heal a hurt, or just warm conversation to seal a friendship.

All told, she works at beauty, reaping rich rewards as each day goes by. And through her own efforts she becomes the kind of girl any man would be happy to have and to hold forever!

Wedding Feasts

"The guests are met, the feast is set." . . . But first, a toast to the bride! Let them drink your health with our Ruby Punch. Its hue is rosy, its taste ambrosial, delicious with grape juice (or with a good dry wine if you prefer!). A silver "wedding ring" of ice floats ceremoniously in the bowl, jewelled with fruit.

If the day be fine, with the sun shining its blessings on the bride, an alfresco feast will be your wedding's final, crowning touch. It warmly repays any extra labor involved.

First, a tray of festive little sandwiches to nibble as the punch cups are passed. Fill them with avocado and water cress, with salmon and capers and delicious deviled ham.

To accompany the wedding cake—which can be a towering, trellised structure from a caterer or a simple, graceful layer cake made by loving hands at home—there must be ice cream. We chose pistachio and vanilla, which composed itself into an exquisitely tinted mound.

If your reception is held indoors, a more elaborate feast is in order. "Blessed those feasts with simple plenty crowned"—and simple plenty, festively arranged, can make your bridal meal memorable.

A buffet for fifty can be managed beautifully in most households.

Our menu is balanced, and beautiful to the eye. A chicken mousse, chaste and elegant on its bed of greenery. A piping-hot sea-food dish, every flavor rendered better by a dash of good sherry.

Cook the green beans with marjoram and they'll come to the bridal table tasting young and wild and fresh-picked. Serve them with shredded almonds and a light cheese sauce (or just melted sweet butter).

A salad of escarole and artichoke hearts, so crisp it crackles. A perfect complement to the sea food, with its heady flavors.

To conclude, a pink valentine heart of strawberry sherbet, the wedding cake, and more punch for a final toast.
With a maximum of love and a minimum of expense you have had a wedding day, precious beyond price, a jewel in your memory.

STUART-FOWLER

Garden wedding reception (opposite) for fifty people is budgeted to include five tea sandwiches per person, four gallons of bridal punch, plus ice cream and wedding cake. Bread for sandwiches may be sliced and cut into fancy shapes several days before wedding, wrapped tightly and frozen. (If you have a favorite storekeeper, why not ask him to slice the bread thin on his slicing machine?)

Indoor wedding breakfast (right) for fifty people is planned to include a delicious cold chicken mousse with green sauce that may be made the day ahead, if you like. Our creamy wedding sea food could also be made well ahead of The Day, and frozen. The wedding cake was purchased from a bakery, topped with full-blown white roses dipped in warm paraffin.

Two Wedding Feasts

Fifty People: Garden Reception Outdoors

RUBY PUNCH: Early in the day mix 2⅔ cups lemon juice and ½ cup sugar. Refrigerate. Chill (but don't add to the lemon juice yet) 6 quarts white grape juice (or, if you like, 8 quarts dry champagne), 6 quarts ginger ale, 3 quarts cranberry juice (and 2 cups brandy, if you like). Mix all together just before serving. Float ice ring on top, and add a few thin lemon slices. Makes about 3¾ gallons.

ORANGE-BLOSSOM WEDDING CAKE: Grease bottom and sides of one 14", one 10" and one 7" cake pan (2½" deep) heavily. Flour well. Sift together, twice, 7½ cups cake flour, 5 teaspoons baking powder and 1¼ teaspoons salt. Cream together 2½ cups butter and 5 cups sugar until light and fluffy. Add 15 egg yolks one at a time, beating after each addition. Add 2½ teaspoons orange flavoring and 5 tablespoons grated orange rind. Add alternately dry ingredients and 2½ cups milk a little at a time, beating after each addition. Beat 10 egg whites until stiff but not dry. Fold whites into cake batter. Half fill cake pans with batter. Cover largest pan and refrigerate until other 2 cakes are baked. Bake in a slow oven, 300° F., for about 1 hour and 20 minutes, or until a cake tester comes out clean. Turn out onto a wire cake rack. Cool thoroughly and cut in half horizontally. Bake the large cake in the same way, allowing about 1 hour and 30 minutes. Have ready 2 racks big enough to hold this layer.

ALMOND-CREAM FILLING: Make up 4 cups of your favorite butter-cream icing (unflavored). Mix in 2 cups very finely chopped blanched almonds, 1½ teaspoons almond flavoring and 4 tablespoons light cream. Spread cut surfaces with filling. Put together. Assemble cakes with some filling, one on top of the other. Frost with butter-cream icing and decorate, or buy decorations from your local confectioner.

AVOCADO-AND-WATER-CRESS SANDWICHES: All sandwiches made several hours in advance should be covered with a damp cloth and refrigerated. Ask your grocer to slice the sandwich bread very thin on his slicing machine. Peel and remove the pits from 2 medium-size ripe avocados. Mash until very smooth. Add ½ cup soft butter, 4 teaspoons lemon juice, 1 teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon white pepper. Mix well. Add ⅔ cup finely chopped water-cress leaves; mix lightly. Cover tightly and chill. Spread sandwiches with this mixture. Makes about 3¼ cups filling, 50 sandwiches.

CREAM-CHEESE-AND-RIPE-OLIVE SANDWICHES: Allow 1¾ pounds cream cheese to soften at room temperature. Add 3½ tablespoons heavy cream and mix until smooth. Add 7 teaspoons grated onion, 1½ teaspoons salt and a scant ¼ teaspoon pepper. Mix well. Add 3½ cups chopped pitted ripe olives; mix lightly. Spread 50 thin slices whole-wheat bread and roll diagonally.

SALMON-PATE SANDWICHES: Remove bones and skin from three 1-pound cans red salmon. Mash. Add 9 tablespoons mayonnaise, ¼ cup tarragon vinegar and 1 tablespoon caper liquid. Mix well. Add ¼ cup finely chopped capers or ¼ cup chopped chives; mix lightly. Chill. Use thinly sliced white bread for these sandwiches. Makes about 4½ cups filling, 50 sandwiches.

HAM-AND-ASPARAGUS ROLLS: Cook four 10-ounce packages frozen asparagus spears. Drain well and chill. Mix together 4½ cups canned deviled ham, 8 teaspoons Worcestershire sauce, 4 teaspoons prepared mustard and 2 teaspoons each prepared horse-radish and paprika. Chill. Cut 13 very thin slices from an unsliced white sandwich loaf. Cut into 52 2¼" squares. You should get 4 squares from each slice. Spread with the mixture. Put one asparagus spear diagonally across the square. Roll up. Place on a tray and cover with a clean damp cloth. Refrigerate till serving time. Makes 5 cups filling, 52 sandwiches.

Fifty People: Indoor Wedding Breakfast

WEDDING SEA FOOD: Cut 4 pounds cooked, cleaned shrimp and 2 pounds cooked lobster meat into bite-sized pieces. Simmer 4 pounds raw scallops in 4 cups water, seasoned with 2 teaspoons onion salt, until tender. Drain and reserve liquid. Measure amount of liquid and add enough light cream to make 3 quarts. In a large heavy kettle sauté 4 cups sliced mushrooms in 1 cup butter for 5 minutes. Do not brown. Add 2 cups flour and the scallop-cream liquid to make a cream sauce. Add 8 chicken-bouillon cubes, 8 tablespoons tomato paste, 10 teaspoons grated onion, 5 teaspoons paprika, 2 teaspoons Worcestershire sauce, 1 teaspoon nutmeg and a scant ¼ teaspoon liquid pepper seasoning. Cook and stir until bouillon cubes dissolve. Add sea food and mix well. Cool, cover and refrigerate overnight. Reheat over low heat in a kettle, allowing about 35–45 minutes. About 10 minutes before serving, add a scant cup chicken broth (or dry sherry, if you like). Serve with toast points. Makes 25 servings. Double recipe to serve 50.

CHICKEN MOUSSE: Make the day before the wedding. Poach two 4-pound chickens. Reserve broth and strain. Measure broth and increase to 2½ quarts by adding canned chicken broth. Heat 2 quarts broth with 10 chicken-bouillon cubes in a 3-quart double boiler over just-simmering water, or divide between 2 smaller pans. Add 15 slightly beaten egg yolks, 5 tablespoons grated onion, 6¼ teaspoons salt, 1¾ teaspoons powdered rosemary, a rounded ½ teaspoon white pepper, ¼ teaspoon cayenne and 7 to 8 drops liquid pepper seasoning. Cook and stir until thickened. Add 5 cups chicken meat, chopped medium fine. Cool. Heat the remaining ½ quart broth with 8 envelopes unflavored gelatin until latter dissolves. Cool. Add gelatin mixture and 5 tablespoons lemon juice to chicken-sauce mixture. Mix well. Chill until thick. Add 2½ cups finely chopped celery and 1¼ cups chopped water chestnuts. Whip 5 cups heavy cream until thick and shiny. Fold the cream into the chicken mixture. Spoon into two 3-quart molds. Chill overnight. Unmold and serve with Green Sauce. Makes 25 servings. Double recipe to serve 50.

GREEN SAUCE: Make a cream sauce with ½ cup each butter and flour and 5 cups milk. Season with 1 tablespoon salt and ¼ teaspoon white pepper. Cool. Mix together 2 cups water-cress leaves, ⅓ cup each parsley and coarsely chopped scallions, and ¼ cup cut fresh dill. Buzz in a blender with 1 cup cold water, or put through a food mill adding 1 cup cold water and letting stand 1 hour. Strain through cheesecloth; squeeze to extract all liquid. Add 1 cup of this liquid to cream sauce, also ¾ cup mayonnaise, 7 tablespoons lemon juice, 2½ teaspoons sugar, 1½ teaspoons prepared mustard and ⅛ teaspoon liquid pepper seasoning. Beat until smooth. Chill. Serve sprinkled with a few chopped water-cress leaves. Makes about 6 cups sauce, about 25 servings. Double recipe to serve 50.

GREEN BEANS AU GRATIN: Heat three 10½-ounce cans cream-of-celery soup. Add 5 cups grated Cheddar cheese, 1 teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Cook and stir until cheese melts. One hour before serving time, reheat sauce over low heat. Also cook 10 packages frozen French green beans, using the following method: Into each of 2 saucepans put 1½ cups water, 2 teaspoons salt and a rounded ¼ teaspoon marjoram. Heat to boiling. Add 2 packages beans to each pan. Cook until just crisp-tender. Drain thoroughly. Repeat, until all are cooked. Add ½ cup soft butter, 2 teaspoons celery seed and the hot sauce to the beans. Mix well. Transfer to two 1½-quart shallow casseroles. Sprinkle each with ½ cup toasted, slivered almonds. Cover tightly. Bake in a slow oven, 300° F., for ½ hour. Makes 25 servings. Double recipe to serve 50.

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

TELEVISION. RADIO. COMICS AND MOVIES

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

DI PIETRO

For a long time there's been controversy about the effects on children of television and radio programs, comics and movies. Recent revelations about the television industry, and the ending of advance censorship of movies, have intensified the discussion. The chief concern has been about the influence of so much violence, crime and sex. There have also been questions about the effect on schoolwork, homework and the reading of good books.

Let's try to tackle violence and crime first. A certain number of judges, prosecutors and psychiatrists have been impressed with the frequency with which a severe delinquent, asked in court where he ever got the idea for his crime, has promptly answered, "In a comic book," or, "On a television program." They have taken this as evidence that a child can be seriously corrupted by these means.

Most psychiatrists haven't been willing to go so far. They've admitted that much on the air and in the comics is unwholesome, especially for certain children. They've conceded that a cruel youth might pick up an ingenious or fiendish idea from something he'd seen. But they've denied that a child who was anywhere near normal to start with could be turned into a scoundrel or a thug by any number of hours of viewing or reading. Most parents have felt the same way too. They know

We are missing the main point—and acting too helpless—if we talk about television only from the negative point of view of whether we need to protect our children from certain programs.

It is the law of the United States that the air for broadcasting belongs to the people. Since the channels are limited in number, the Government grants the broadcasting right to stations on the assumption that they will serve the public interest. It is largely left to the Federal Communications Commission to determine whether and how the public interest is to be served. It decides such matters as the distribution of stations, the reliability of corporations which apply for licenses. It could also set broad policies regarding program content and advertising, through its right to issue or withhold licenses. But over the years the commission (whose members are appointed for fixed terms by the President) has preferred to leave such matters largely to the stations and networks. The networks, to a great extent, have turned over the choice of programs to the sponsors who are willing to pay for them.

The sponsors and their advertising agencies are mainly influenced by the popularity rating a show receives. There is a certain democratic justice in this system (if the rating services are a reliable index), since the majority of the people are presumably getting what they like to view. But when Westerns, murder, variety and quiz shows are most popular, then sponsors and networks, in their obsession with high ratings, multiply such programs and ignore the lesser millions of people who would like something different for themselves and for their children.

We are living in a period of history when America's leadership in the world, her way of life, ultimately her existence are being challenged by a rival who is deadly serious about "burying" us (if only figuratively). The Soviet Union sees education as one of her major weapons and is investing a much greater proportion of her effort in it than we are.

Our educators and other leaders keep pointing to the serious gaps in our schools and colleges, and to the fact that hundreds of thousands of our youth who have the mental ability to profit from a college training do not have the motivation to try for it.

Television is potentially the greatest educational force that has appeared since schools and colleges were established and printing was invented. It can go anywhere in the world to find its subject matter. It can provide us with inspired performers, speakers, experts in all fields, and use every dramatic aid. It can deliver the production visually and audibly—and quite personally, too—to every corner of the land.

Children can be fascinated by demonstrations of phenomena in electricity, chemistry, biology, geology. They can respond to inspiring stories from history and literature just as well as to meaningless tales of violence.

Then why are we letting our American children spend so many hours watching rough stuff, clowning and mayhem? The fact that this is the most efficient way to sell cereals doesn't seem a good enough reason.

The suggestion has recently been made, in several quarters, that Congress or the President should appoint a commission of distinguished citizens to review thoughtfully all aspects of broadcasting: its past accomplishments and deficiencies, its economics and regulation. More important would be a fresh estimation of its potential contribution to the nation in the future. The commission would be concerned not only with increasing the enjoyment of all kinds of people in the riches of music, drama, humor, literature, but also in broadening our understanding of our world with the help of the scientist, the engineer, the historian, the political commentator, the traveler.

Whether such a proposal for a review commission ever receives consideration will depend on whether there are parents who think it is important and will write their senators or the President.

A SHOCKING STORY

AS SUCH CRIMES INCREASE

We tell here the horrifying personal experience of a mature woman, of complete integrity, well known to the editors of this magazine. The editors wondered whether the JOURNAL should publish this. We felt, unless its publication could lead to further protection from irresponsibly released inmates of mental institutions, it were better not published. In our dilemma, we laid the matter before Mrs. Caroline K. Simon, Secretary of State for the state of New York, one of the country's most prominent woman lawyers, who has worked for many years in causes dedicated to the welfare of women and children. She wrote us:

"This story should be printed.

"But the blame does not rest entirely with the authorities. We citizens permit these things to go on. It isn't just that the authorities don't care enough. It's we, the public, who don't care enough either.

"I worked with a group of women who finally succeeded, after great effort, in getting a mental-health program adopted. Guidance clinics were set up. Children and adolescents who showed early signs of mental disturbance or antisocial behavior received treatment at a time when these conditions could be cured. But every year I have been pained to see the budget for too many mental-health departments set lower and lower.

"It may be too late to save the Jack Smith of this particular story. But there are many others who can be saved—and little girls can be saved, too, and women victims of criminal assaults, whom you at the JOURNAL, and I, as a woman, a mother and a grandmother, have so heavily on our minds."

FBI Reports Sound the Alarm

FBI Uniform Crime Reports, based on country-wide statistics, tell the tragic rise in forcible rape of 13 per cent in 1958 over 1957, bringing the total to 14,560 cases. For the first nine months of 1959, the Reports show an increase of 5 per cent over the figure for the same period in 1958. In 73 per cent of the forcible-rape cases reported in 1958, an arrest was made, and 45 per cent of the persons charged were found guilty.

Sixty-five per cent of all sex crimes reported to the police are rape, according to the FBI, and 65 per cent of the rapists are under twenty-one years of age. These figures do not take into account, however, the large number who plead a less serious offense such as assault or contempt of court rather than submit to a psychiatric examination. What is even more serious is the number of cases obscured as minor or first offenses, and thus treated casually or lightly, though we know that the sex offender is distinct from other types of first offenders. Only by expert psychiatric examination and treatment can a sex deviate's type and degree of disturbance, with its resulting menace to society, be determined. It is imperative, therefore, that he be spotted as early as possible.

Too often only a particularly terrifying sex crime will galvanize a community into action. But hysteria-induced measures often prove ineffective, or so ill-advised as to aggravate rather than help. The problem requires basically sound, stubbornly pursued community planning. Full co-operation of local and state departments of correction, courts, bar associations, judges, clergy, schools, medical specialists is needed.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

Facts are hard to come by, but are essential as a working guide. You can study the report and arrest figures from your local police department; become acquainted with the file of known sex offenders precinct by precinct—so as to publicize the danger zones; examine the prosecutor's records showing convictions and disposition of convicted offenders.

Study state sex-offender laws. Do they need overhauling? Are they widely disregarded? How do they provide for the sex deviate, the borderline psychotic who cannot be classified as "legally insane" and may be freed after a short sentence to commit further criminal acts?

Help young offenders. Begin with the Juvenile Bureau of the police department, seeing that it has sufficient trained personnel; work for a fully staffed psychiatric service in the Juvenile Court for early spotting of the potential—as well as help for the actual—sex offender, the latter to include probation and parole supervision.

Facilities for diagnosis and treatment. For defective delinquents of intellectual deficiency or known sadistic behavior, Maryland state law provides special institutions, thereby preventing their release on short sentences while still clearly dangerous.

In New Jersey, all convicted sex offenders are given psychiatric examination and treatment at the State Diagnostic Center at Menlo Park. This service is available also on a voluntary basis to community agencies and individuals.

Family-life and mental-health education. More help is needed for youngsters lacking good home care and exposed to disorganizing emotional experiences. Most effective in giving sex education and helping the sexually aberrant youngster can be teamwork of home, church and school.

Precautionary measures. Insist on bright lighting and adequate police patrols in public places. Call public attention to unprotected areas, such as large housing developments, not patrolled by municipal police. Work for the installation of alarm bells in self-service elevators, and attendants on duty in basement laundries, which should be locked at night.

Keep away from isolated or unsavory neighborhoods even during the day, and do not hesitate to call for help. "It is far better to scream than to run from the danger of being attacked," says New York Police Commissioner Kennedy. "A woman or girl alone on a dark street, especially late at night, is a natural prey for the degenerate, despite patrols and special attention. Policemen cannot be in all places at all times. And the sex criminal strikes without warning." MARGARET HICKEY.

The Story Begins Here

The first intimation I had that someone was in my house was the clicking of the latch on the door of my first-floor bedroom. I am a professional woman, in my late fifties. My house is in a rural section, and, my children all happily married, I live alone. There are neighbors not too far away, none within the sound of my voice, none in a position to see or take alarm at any unusual happenings in my house. In our quiet little community, several of us widowed women live alone in houses out of sight and sound of neighbors. We had not considered that we were living in danger.

This night, sometime after I turned out my light at 10:30, I thought I heard movement outside, something sounded as if it had brushed against the house. I raised myself in bed and looked out the window nearest me. I saw nothing except my car, sitting by the house in the bright moonlight, and lay down again. I was not alarmed. I even heard the dull, booming sound my ancient, heavy, outside cellar door makes when it is opened. I listened intently then. But I heard nothing afterward so I was still not alarmed. Deer come up to my very door. Dogs and raccoons investigate my garbage can. Trees and old houses produce strange sounds of their own, especially on a winter night. I finally attributed this sound, too, to some innocent cause, or to my imagination.

It was perhaps twenty minutes after that, still with no further sound, not even the creak of a floor board, when the latch rattled on my bedroom door. I think it must have been around midnight.

That sound could not have been made by the wind or an animal. I rose up out of my bed by reflex action and started toward the door, calling out, "Who is it? Who is there?"

The latch clicked more decisively. There was no attempt at secrecy now. I was more than halfway across the room when the door was thrown open boldly.

A man entered, half crouching. A man in shirt sleeves, young, and completely strange to me. It was as

THE TRAP OF SOLID GOLD

If Ben and Ginny Weldon had only had the time to sit down quietly and think things through, they might have seen just how they were heading for a time of crisis. More than crisis, in fact. "Disaster" is not too mild a word, not when all the hope and promise is so great. By careful prediction they could have guessed that the early months of 1959 would be the time of ultimate trial, but of course they had no time to sit down and think. They would have admitted a growing uneasiness, small forewarnings of doom which were briskly poked back down into the subconscious whenever they became aware of them.

Marriage is a small brave ship, and embarkation is valiant and hopeful. But the channel is narrow, the set of the tide tricky, and the buoys and markers forever shrouded in mist. They had set out in a tighter ship than most, which is a matter of luck, a factor for which you can be grateful without ever making the mistake of believing you have earned it. They were whole people, with the capacity to give and receive love in equal measure, with humor to give them that special balance of objectivity, with good looks, health, education, ability and uncontrived charm. These factors are luck. You have to earn all the rest of it.

And so it was a special shock to realize that by 1959, after ten years of marriage, the copilots had lost the channel, the wind was rising, and the thunderous reefs were sickeningly close.

Marriage courts and counselors relate that the one most prevalent cause of marital difficulty is money. This seems a small, mean, shabby thing, with no dignity in its connotation of bickering. But money is a strange poison. It is an index of security, and when it becomes a problem it has a nasty tendency to tinge those other less tangible aspects of security with despair.

In view of Ben Weldon's position and his ability, it is both ludicrous and tragic that money should have been the hidden rock that cracked the hull of the stout little ship. By 1959 there were five in the boat.

Chris, at eight, was a small boy full of areas of a deadly earnestness, but with such a brimming joy in being alive that he was afflicted with frequent seizures of a wild and manic glee which would take him whooping to the top of a tall tree in a startlingly few moments.

The Two Women IN WINSTON CHURCHILL'S LIFE

"We were married and lived happily ever after."

Behind Winston Leonard Spencer Churchill, the greatest Englishman of the century, there have been two great women: his Brooklyn-born mother, Jennie Jerome, whose forebears fought under George Washington; and his wife, Clementine Hozier, a granddaughter of the seventh Earl of Airlie, the ancient Scots family whose motto is "To the end." "Father of the American Turf" and builder of Jerome Avenue in the Bronx, Leonard Jerome was a self-made Wall Street millionaire and owner of The New York Times, who at 72 accepted the challenge of a circus strong man and knocked him senseless. His daughter Jennie, a great beauty endowed with extraordinary vitality and a first-rate intelligence, took London by storm at the end of the nineteenth century. On November 30, 1874, when Winston was born to Jennie and Lord Randolph Churchill, third son of the Duke of Marlborough, a racing friend of her family wrote: "Interesting breeding. Stamina always goes through the dam, and pace through the sire." Jennie had stamina to spare. When Lord Randolph died, a victim of political disappointment and delicate health, she guided their son Winston along the path that would one day lead him to his date with destiny. Winston, always a poor student, failed at school again and again. When he finally graduated from Sandhurst, England's West Point, and was assigned as a young subaltern to India, she sent him good books to read during his long off-duty hours. Among these was Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, which helped to form his own literary style and from which he can still quote whole pages from memory. When he first stood for Parliament, his mother advised and counseled him as she had his father before him. After she died he paid her this tribute: "My mother always seemed to me a fairy princess; a radiant being possessed of limitless riches and power." Long years later when, as Prime Minister of England in her darkest hour, he first addressed a joint session of the Congress of the United States of America, he added: "I wish indeed that my mother, whose memory I cherish across the veil of years, could have been here to see me."

The second handmaiden to Churchill's greatness is "Clemmie," or—to use his favorite term of endearment—"Dear Cat." Still straight, slim and tall at 74, the former Clementine Hozier has finely cut features, gray-green eyes and silvery hair. She has had the stamina and strength to match—and, more important, to protect—his own. Living always under the pressures of public office, she has made her husband's career her chief concern; as wife, mother and grandmother, she has managed as well to make a happy home. Gay and gracious, with a will as strong as her husband's, Lady Churchill knows how to plan a good, solid English dinner around a joint of beef, with all the right wines and liquors. Sir Winston once described his marriage as "the most fortunate and joyous event which happened to me in the whole of my life. For what can be more glorious than to be united in one's walk through life with a being incapable of an ignoble thought?"

Jennie, by a torrent of tears, and Lord Randolph, by declaring that he "loved her more than life," finally overcame the strenuous objections of the doughty old Duke of Marlborough and hotheaded Leonard Jerome. The Anglo-American marriage was arranged, and the union blessed by two sons: John, the younger; and Winston, whom his mother called "the naughtiest small boy in the world." Jennie Jerome dearly loved her son Winston, though, and devoted herself to guiding him and curbing the headlong and un-English drive which he had inherited from his Yankee grandfather. Above all she believed in him, and her belief was a beacon light that never failed this young-man-in-a-hurry who said when he was 21, "I am getting absurdly old." He admired his mother's amazing vigor and vitality—which she bequeathed to him. "While I had been busy in South Africa," wrote Winston, recalling his experiences as a correspondent in the Boer War, in which he had been captured and had escaped, "my mother had not been idle at home. She had raised a fund, captivated an American millionaire, obtained a ship, equipped it with a full staff of nurses and every comfort. After a stormy voyage she had arrived at Durban and eagerly awaited a consignment of wounded. She received her younger son as the very first casualty treated on board the hospital ship Maine. I took a few days' leave to go and see her. . . . Captain Percy Scott, commander of the armoured cruiser Terrible . . . named the 4.7-inch gun that he had mounted on a railway truck after my mother and even eventually organized a visit for her to the front to see it fired." Later when Winston entered politics she campaigned for him and gained many votes for his cause by her charm and wit. To further his career she pulled many a silken string with royalty and the Cabinet, and, while she lived, listened to every one of his parliamentary addresses from the distinguished visitors' gallery of the House. Many years earlier, when Lord Randolph ended his political career by resigning as Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had broken with tradition by refusing to pass his robes on to his successor. His widow, in a mother's belief that Winston would one day wear his father's robes, saved them in an old tin box. She died three years before this premonition was proved true.

His Marriage:

One family friend predicted it would not last a month.

When Winston Churchill proposed to Clementine Hozier she was called "the loveliest woman in all England," and he was known as "an impossible young upstart." Thirty-four, with bright red hair and blazing blue eyes, he was on the crest of the wave as a writer, and headed for political heights as the youngest member of the cabinet. As he put it bluntly at the time, "Sometimes I think I could carry the whole world on my shoulders." Clementine came from a good family, had been well educated, and was poor—something of a sin in that money-conscious period. Her father, Col. Sir Henry Hozier, had served before his death in China, Abyssinia and India with the 3rd Dragoons; for many years Clementine had lived with her widowed mother in Dieppe. There the young woman had gained a perfect knowledge of French, and on returning to England gave French lessons and acted as companion to an old lady to make ends meet. When she accepted Winston's proposal, Clementine said, "Now I have got you, the trouble will be to keep you." To which he replied, "You will find that no trouble, my dear." Lady Randolph Churchill, who had known Clementine since she was a baby, highly approved of the match. Their wedding, the social event of that London season, took place at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on September 12, 1908. The bride wore a princess-style white-ivory satin dress, a coronet of orange blossoms, and a lovely veil of point de Venise lace which Lady Randolph had worn at her own wedding. The Churchills received presents from the king and the queen and the cabinet, and, like all young married couples, many duplicate presents including: 25 candlesticks, 21 inkstands, 20 silver bowls, 15 vases, 14 silver trays, 8 sets of salt cellars and 10 cigarette cases. Lord Reading, who attended the wedding, looked at the handsome young couple and said: "There are two lively chips. The marriage will not last a month." The noble prophet has so far been off the mark by 51 years, several months and a few days. There have been only two important women in Churchill's life: his mother and his wife.

"Never has one great man owed so much to a great woman."

WIDE WORLD

Sir Winston's own favorite painting of a tapestry at Blenheim Castle. "It was at Blenheim," he has said, "that I made the two most important decisions of my life. One was to be born there and the other was to be married." (Churchill proposed in a pavilion by the lake near the castle.) "I have never had cause to regret either decision."

"The woman behind a man of genius must have a gentle genius herself. There could be no better exponent of this art than Lady Churchill." For over fifty years Lady Churchill has been the partner of a great man. While living nearly always in the limelight, she has managed to provide a rich and rewarding home life. Like Jennie Jerome, she has a great love of life and a limitless loyalty to Winston Churchill. Wise, witty and warmhearted, she can bank the fierce blaze of his fiery temperament and turn it into a glow. She has shared his defeats and disappointments, sorrows and successes, and has learned to protect him from the world and from himself. She has had five children: Randolph, Diana, Sarah, Mary, and Marigold Frances (who died in her third year): and now there are nine grandchildren. She has campaigned with Winston, acted as his secretary, listened to his speeches when he was preparing them, helped him build his brick wall at Chartwell in Kent, made him take his daily nap and wear a hat in rainy weather, filled his long life with love, and served as his "compass bearing."

"If there is a decision to be made," said Phyllis Moir, his former private secretary, "Mrs. Churchill is invariably consulted. Working with Mr. Churchill, I soon grew accustomed to the cry 'Clemmie, Clemmie' which seemed to ring along the apartment all day long. I never heard the Churchills argue or quarrel."

For his part, he has always considered his wife first, insisting that his "Dear Cat" be given the premier place of importance by his side. Before making an address in the House of Commons, he always nodded as a gesture of respect to his wife, seated in the Distinguished Visitors' Gallery his American mother had once graced. Once at Chartwell, while playing tennis, "Clemmie" slipped and fell on the court. Churchill, then well along in years, dashed down from his study and, brushing everyone aside, picked her up in his arms and carried her to her room. She is the one person to whom he has always listened. As one friend put it, "She knows how to manage Winnie."

Lady Churchill's philosophy on how to live with a genius and love it is best summed up in a speech she made shortly after the end of World War II: "If you find yourself in conflict with men, never become aggressive in your rivalry," Lady Clementine advised. "She who forces her point may well lose her advantage. You will gain far more by quietly holding to your convictions. But even this must be with art, and above all with a sense of humor."

Luck of the draw

by Dorothy Black

I had always wanted to be a writer, and Aunt Ruth, who brought me up, said I might as well try. "For if your face is to be your fortune, Liz," she said, "you'll certainly go hungry." Like most girls, I longed to be beautiful, but I knew I wasn't, and I was so shy I'd go miles rather than meet someone I knew in the street and have to talk to him.

And from around fourteen onward I was always in love.

I started with a sheep I'd brought up as a lamb, on a bottle. I idolized it. I had a sort of notion that with patience I could teach it to talk. Kids get crazy ideas. Then we went away for the holidays and when we got back Aunt Ruth told me it had been sent to the butcher, and I wanted to die.

I went down and asked the butcher if it was true, and he said it was. Consumed a fortnight previously, he said. He was sorry I was so sorry about it, and he was a gentle, handsome man, so I fell in love there and then with him. He was married with a grown-up child, but that is the beauty of falling in love at fourteen. Little things like that make no difference whatever.

After that it was the vicar. After that the doctor. Then some young men who came to the village for holidays. None of them ever returned my passion. I got quite accustomed to worshiping from afar.

I was just as hopeless when I was seventeen. I did not know how to dress, or do my hair, and as by then Aunt Ruth had died, and I looked after Uncle Jack and did the housekeeping myself, there was no one to tell me. I concentrated on my book, for if I could not be beautiful there was still a chance I might be famous.

I never got asked to any parties. It was a part of the country where people changed a good bit, and after Aunt Ruth died we never seemed to get to know the new ones. And in any case, if I'd gone to the dances I would have had no one to dance with.

Sometimes Uncle Jack looked at me anxiously. "You ought to go out more, my dear. You ought to get around. If your dear aunt was

ADLAI STEVENSON

By MARGARET PARTON

One Democrat never talks about Stevenson for President: the two-time candidate himself. While others fight in the primaries, Stevenson, somewhat above the din of partisan battle, works hard, lives pleasantly, occasionally—and usually brilliantly—speaks his mind to a world grown accustomed to listen to the wisdom of his words.

When Adlai Stevenson visited Poland in 1958 he was asked the inevitable question: did he intend to run for the presidency of the United States for a third time? "No," he answered briskly. "Do you know that a candidate has a hard life? He is obliged to shave twice daily, and that is not for me."

With varying degrees of levity or seriousness, he has answered the same question in the same way dozens of times since then. He resists having his name entered in primaries. He refuses to give interviews if the interviewer proposes to treat him like a candidate. He rather conspicuously ignores scuffles between Democratic hopefuls, and at a time this spring when the infighting was promising to become severe he planned to be off on a six-week tour of South America. "I've done what I've been called upon to do to the best of my ability," he says with a philosophical shrug. "Now I'm beginning to slow down a little and enjoy life."

Yet despite the disclaimers, the ghost of the twice-defeated candidate continues to remain a ruddy and vigorous specter on the political scene. This winter a New York newspaper printed a cartoon showing a watchful and beady-eyed Adlai seated at the top of a flight of stairs, and a most uncomfortable-looking Senator John F. Kennedy crouching near the bottom. Senator Kennedy, whose presidential ambitions are not entirely unknown, was muttering to himself the familiar lines: "Yesterday upon the stair, I saw a man who was not there. He was not there again today. Oh dear, I wish he'd go away!"

Whether or not Mr. Stevenson wishes to haunt the stairs leading to the political arena, that is where he remains, unable to retire to the upper reaches of private life for the simple reason that a great many Democrats still think he's their best man. CONTINUED ON PAGE 174

An eminent obstetrician says that hospitals must provide the sympathetic, understanding care every mother needs when she gives birth. Good doctors are admitting to one another that maternity care is suffering from short-cut methods. Can extra hands be trained to help, within the limits of good medical practice? A growing number of physicians believe they can.

THE CHALLENGE TO AMERICAN OBSTETRICS

By Dr. HERBERT THOMS, with BRUCE BLIVEN, Jr.

A pregnant woman's psychological well-being is as important as her physical health. This fact, sometimes overlooked, calls for improvement in our methods of maternity care, many of which are out-of-date.

The urgent question is whether we, as obstetricians, are treating mothers in a manner that is psychologically appropriate to the real quality of the experience of pregnancy and childbirth. In too many instances, the answer is no.

Our record of safe deliveries of living babies is as good as it is because all but a small percentage of American babies now are born in hospitals. But, desirable as hospitalization is from a safety standpoint, it is no excuse for routine, inflexible, assembly-line obstetrics. The woman in the hospital waiting to have a baby is not a "patient" in the ordinary sense of the word. On the contrary, she is undergoing an experience as unlike illness as is imaginable. Her whole being—her emotions as well as her body—is engaged in a wonderfully subtle, creative endeavor. She is in the midst of the greatest moments of her life. She deserves to be treated accordingly.

The practical problems of running a hospital must not take precedence over the mother's emotional needs. If they do so, it is poor obstetrics. Most maternity hospitals (and most maternity units of general hospitals) need a brand-new atmosphere. I know of no reason why all the intimacy of the home should be lost in the hospital. It should be clear that the mother—not her doctor, nor the hospital—has the starring role. She is entitled to feel a sense of accomplishment.

Hospital techniques and hospital attitudes can be changed. And hospital buildings can be remodeled. They can be made to fit whatever scheme we, as physicians, insist upon. We should demand nothing less than the best possible maternal care. For childbirth is, as Helene Deutsch, a foremost authority, has said, "the greatest and most gratifying experience of women, perhaps of human beings."

I am not talking about obstetrics in a dream world. Here at New Haven, at the Yale Medical Center, we have a maternity program which embraces most of the things I have mentioned. It proves that what I am urging is both desirable and possible. It is called the Preparation for Childbirth Program, and its director is Prof. C. Lee Buxton, my successor as head of Yale's Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology. I consider myself fortunate in having been associated, from its beginning thirteen years ago, with this effort to find—and to provide facilities for—an ideal way of having a baby. The future of American obstetrical practice, I'm convinced, lies in the direction this program has taken. Thanks to it, we can now envision in some detail the kind of maternity care that should be available, as a matter of course, everywhere in the country.

DOCTORS CAN'T DO IT ALONE

By THE EDITORS

"Is the mere fact of survival of mother and child all there is to this business of maternity care? When we discharge from the hospital a living mother with physical and mental scars from a highly traumatic experience, and a child living but brain-damaged because no one was around to recognize early signs of the baby-in-utero being in distress, is that a job well done?"

So asked a distinguished physician, on the obstetrical staff of one of the greatest teaching hospitals in the world, of a professional gathering. His remarks were typical of a new note of self-criticism which is spreading throughout the obstetrical profession today.

The tremendous growth of hospital care in this country within a single generation (in 1935 only 37 per cent of live births took place in hospitals; today the figure is 96 per cent), together with steadily dwindling maternal- and infant-mortality rates, has long been a justifiable source of pride. Yet today an ugly fact must be faced: for the last two years the incomplete figures for infant deaths have shown a slight rise (although the United States is still among the safest places in the world in which to be delivered of a baby). Hospitals and clinics have become notoriously overcrowded and understaffed. Obstetrical leaders—teaching doctors, chiefs of famous metropolitan hospitals, officers of professional associations—are telling their colleagues with growing urgency that today's routine maternity care, though good, is not good enough.

The doctors' criticisms have been many, but most of them come from a growing recognition that present hospital routines do not take into account the psychological well-being and satisfaction of a healthy, normal mother. One of the greatest names in American obstetrics wrote in an article for the U.S. Children's Bureau, "The most prevalent criticism . . . [leveled] at American maternity care is our assembly-line method of managing patients, especially the fact that they are often left alone throughout most of labor. . . . There can be no question about the general validity of this criticism."

"Assembly-line methods" come from a shortage of trained personnel, lack of time on the part of overworked practitioners. The results are felt in almost every phase of childbirth, beginning with prenatal care. Good doctors are agreed that the greatest single factor enabling a mother to approach childbirth with confidence and courage is an understanding of what is about to happen to her. Physiologic—or natural—childbirth, a president of an obstetrical association reminded his membership, is "nurtured by proper instruction to the mother as to what to expect and how to participate," and he pointed out that this instruction is the obstetrician's job. Yet most women in America are delivered by busy general practitioners. How many of them have time to sit down and teach the mother what she needs to know? How many small hospitals offer prenatal classes not only in baby care, but in the process of having a baby?

Good Cooking and Common Sense

By JOHN PRINCE

We have all heard, and we have heard it all our lives, that French cooking is the finest in the world. Indeed, we have heard it so often that some of us are ever so faintly tired of hearing it. The joke of this is that a Frenchman would agree with us. We are right to be tired, he'd say—granted the strange notions of French cooking which some of us have.

Generally speaking, our Frenchman would say, French cooking is divided into two kinds, "high cooking" and "home cooking."

"High cooking" is reserved for certain right lofty places and times—like high dressmaking and high mathematics. Relatively few French people come into contact with it very often. It is the abuse, or fake presentation, of this sort of cooking which gives us our false notions of all French cooking; and the abuse occurs, of course, in expensive restaurants set up as traps for tourists—or for the get-rich-quicks who are as funny at table as they are in their hats.

Meanwhile, with certain reservations, "home cooking" in France means just what it means here. And even the great chef, who would think nothing of carving angels in butter as a centerpiece, would agree that the truest French cooking is "home cooking." I can give you an amusing proof of this.

Once, when I was a student at the Cordon Bleu School of Cooking in Paris, our class was set the problem of decorating a poached capon. We were CONTINUED ON PAGE 122

The American Institute of Family Relations has just completed its thirtieth year of public education directed toward strengthening marriage and family life thoughout the continent. It has counseled more than 100,000 persons at its headquarters (5287 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles, California), and has also helped a vastly greater number through its publications, motion pictures, radio and television programs, lectures and correspondence. One of the interesting findings from this unique experience is the importance of shared recreation and social life. When two persons have entirely different points of view on this subject, as did Letty and Greg in the case here described, their relationship is likely to be injured in many other ways. If they can agree on some things that they would enjoy doing together, and give some time to these activities in common, their whole partnership is likely to be improved. If a couple feel that their marriage needs some improvement, this is an easy way to start! . . . The counselor in this case was Mrs. Ruth Michaelson.

PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

Can This Marriage be Saved?

DON ORNITZ

"Greg's buddies came home with us on our wedding night and made our living room their hangout. We were never alone."

She: "Greg has no need of a wife, and cares nothing about a husband's responsibilities. Our marriage was an afterthought with him."

He: "Frankly, I wasn't ready to be tied down, but Letty hounded me until I married her. Now she should accept my friends and the way we live."

Letty tells her side: "Greg seems to think I married him and all his male friends," said big-eyed, twenty-four-year-old Letty, torn between tears and indignation. "On our wedding day two years ago his whole gang trooped home from the church with us. Greg's living quarters—a ramshackle converted garage—turned out to be their favorite hangout. When Greg and I retired to the bedroom, the gang stayed. They drank beer, they cracked jokes, they sang close harmony at the top of their lungs. Next morning three fellows were still on the premises, one sound asleep on the beat-up sofa, two others on the floor.

"I had dreamed of quite a different bridal night. Greg couldn't understand why I was disappointed and angry. First he laughed at me and then he began to talk. Talk is a specialty with Greg. He is the original charm boy. While Greg is talking he can convince you that black is white, a horse is a cow. One time I saw him convince a traffic cop that he hadn't jumped a light. Well, anyway, as a one-day bride, I apologized to Greg for my unkind remarks about his friends.

"That evening when I got home from my nine-to-five secretarial job I found Greg surrounded again. One of his pals had bought a stove-in boat which was set up in our yard and everybody was busy with the repairs. Greg refused to interrupt his work on the boat long enough to eat the food I'd bought for our dinner. Hours later he and his gang and I ate at a junky neighborhood tavern. Two of the fellows picked up girls there, not very nice girls. The fellows expected me to talk to the girls while they ignored us, discussed hunting, fishing, skin diving, water skiing—sports I know nothing about—and wasted their money on the pinball machines.

"It was past midnight when we left the tavern. The two fellows with dates disappeared. Greg issued a blanket invitation to everybody else to spend the rest of the night with us. One man had the nerve to accept. In the morning I was so exhausted I could scarcely drag myself from the bed. I had to dress without the use of the bathroom—it opens off the so-called living room—because of the fellow on the sofa. When I did step out he was taking a shower. I brushed my teeth at my office.

"That evening was the same thing all over again: the gang working on the boat, dinner at the tavern. By the end of the week I was desperate for privacy, frantic for sleep. Greg held a part-time job and could lie abed until noon, but I had to get up. One evening I refused to go to the tavern. Greg cheerfully went off with his friends and let me eat by myself. In the middle of the night he flopped into our bed, smelling like a brewery. I got up and moved to the sofa. It was the first time in our two weeks of marriage the sofa had been unoccupied. Next morning I discovered that Greg's shirt, which he had dropped on the floor, was smeared with lipstick. I woke him and asked for an explanation. He told me that some totally strange girl had barged over to their table at the tavern and draped

Lucille, age six, was known only as Ladybug. She wore seven different personalities a day, from imprisoned princess to aging ballerina, combining an appetite for conspiracy with a thespian lust for costume.

Penny was a three-year-old chunk of round, warm appetite and placid insistence upon being hugged frequently, a goal consistently achieved despite a chronic condition of stickiness.

This is the Weldon family, whose combined ages total 79, who live at 88 Ridge Road in Lawton, New York, a one-hour-and-seventeen-minute commutation from the city.

The view of an outsider was perfectly expressed when they had, as a weekend house guest, a man they had not seen since college, a man doubly precious to them because it was he who had first introduced them. Just before he left, as they stood by the drive, Ben's arm around Ginny's slender waist, the friend said, with a fondness spiced with a dab of envy, "You kids have really got it made."

One would have thought so.

Take a look at one target of this odd disaster, Benjamin Dale Weldon, age 32. By profession, he is an executive, one of the rare good young ones, employed by National Directions, Inc., as Assistant to the Vice President in Charge of Unit Control. Weldon is a tall man with a dark semi-crew cut, glasses with thick black frames, and the kind of rugged-wry asymmetric face women have the tiresome habit of calling "interesting." In his first years with National he gave a deceptive impression of low-pressure amiability which obscured his special talents, but now they are thoroughly known and appreciated. Under pressure, he can plow through jungles of intricate work. He can properly delegate authority, backstop his superiors, make effective presentations, keep his temper, side-step company politics, resolve controversy, and make the people working for him feel as if they are a part of a special team.

All this is, of course, a description of a splendid No. 2 man. But Weldon has that additional gift of being able to come up with the important and unusual idea at the right time, and the willingness to fight for his idea to the extent of laying his career on the line. This makes him a potential No. 1 man, and the company is totally aware of his present and his future value.

For his abilities they pay him $23,500 a year. In return for this salary he is expected not only to function adequately in his job but to dress conservatively and well, comport himself with traditional National Directions dignity, live in a house and a neighborhood suitable to his position, entertain properly, take first-rate care of his family and their future, and take a hand in civic affairs.

The executives of National Directions, and in particular the president, Brendan Mallory, see in Ben Weldon a pleasing prototype of the young National executive, a sort of ambassador at large. They are gratified that he had the good luck and the good sense to marry a girl who is and will continue to be of great help to him.

Brendan Mallory has a private timetable in his mind whereby Benjamin Weldon will assume the presidency at age 55. At that point Weldon will not only be receiving one of the more substantial salaries, but he will have additional income through the bonus and stock-option plan. But this to Brendan Mallory, is of secondary importance. The man who heads the firm must, first of all, have respect for the obligations and responsibilities of the position, realizing that his decisions can have an effect on the national economy.

Brendan Mallory realizes that it is a most delicate problem, to nurture the growth of the young executive. He must be taught to understand the blessings of and the reasons for conformity without deadening that creative individualism which the No. 1 man must have if the company is to remain competitively strong.

Virginia, wife of Benjamin, is lovelier at 30 than at 20, an outgoing blue-eyed blonde, who wears her multiple emotions close to the surface, who has pride and the gift of laughter. She is loving, rewarding and incurably absent-minded. She fills with a violent indignation at any injustice. Her energies inspire awe. Toward her children she is scrupulously, unpermissively fair, whacking them soundly when they need it. As a consequence there is order in their small world, and they feel secure, well loved, and feel no urge to express themselves through tantrum or bratty whining.

So here is paradise on Ridge Road. Strength, love, ambition and a future. Nice people too. No sleazy little cocktail-party flirtations. No amorous discontent.

At the end of 1958, if you had asked them if paradise hadn't become just a little conditional, they would have stared at you, and then defended themselves with great indignation. And that could have been the clue—the little excess of indignation.

If they had had the time to sit down quietly ——

But there were the commuting to the city, and the job itself, and the increasing frequency of the field trips, and the two kinds of entertaining—business and friendship—and the Lawton Country Club (as a result of Mallory's hint that he should belong), and the sitter problem and the Cub Scouts and the P.T.A. and the Community Chest and the Red Cross and the Civic Betterment Committee and the Ridge Road Association and, of course, five birthdays and holidays and church and anniversaries, and correspondence with friends and relatives, and television and shopping and essential do-it-yourself projects and office work brought home and that essential reading which must be done to keep up with the world's swift pace.

> It is a very unhealthy frame of mind to get into to be always reproaching oneself for one's peccadilloes. I am sure the most cheerful people are those who confine their censures almost entirely to the lapses of their neighbors.

> D. APPLETON & CO.

So if there was a rare chance to sit down quietly, they took it. And spent the time making up little mental lists of the things undone. They no longer had time to talk to each other in any leisurely, thoughtful way, and so they were losing one of the best parts of a good marriage—and making it not quite as good as it should have been.

It should have been more of a clue to Ben and Ginny that, all that year, whenever they did have a chance to talk, they talked about money. Oh, it was reasonably amiable, with an infrequent edge of rancor showing only briefly. They tried to make a kind of joke out of it. And why shouldn't it be a joke? When you're making $23,500 a year, money problems are a joke, aren't they?

Ben paid the bills, so the true nature of their situation was trying to intrude itself on his awareness long before Ginny became aware of the growing tensions. Let it be said firmly and finally right here that these were not two silly, improvident people, whimsically tossing money left and right. Ben had paid a good share of his own way through school. Ginny had been on a tiny allowance. They had started marriage with debts, not riches, and had lived to a rigid budget, and paid their way. Ginny knew every rice dish in the book.

Perhaps the first intimation of what would eventually and incomprehensively turn into disaster was the Incident of the Cigarettes.

In January—right after New Year's, in fact—when the checking account needed very dexterous juggling, Ben Weldon switched from cigarettes to a pipe. He told himself it would be good for him. Ginny had always wanted him to smoke a pipe. He told himself that it was purely secondary that cigarettes, at a pack and a half a day, were costing him $164.25 a year. He wondered why he had bothered to figure it up.

He struggled with the pipe problem until he had mastered the techniques. His birthday was in April. He got home from the city later than he wanted to, because he knew Ginny would keep the kids up so they could give him their presents, but it was one of those unavoidable things.

He sat in the living room, and the cake was brought to him so the kids could see him blow out the candles, and the song was sung, and the kids gave him the presents, the littlest one first, as was the household custom. He lifted himself out of his weariness to make those exclamations that would satisfy them, and those jokes that would delight them.

The present from Ginny was the last one he opened. It was a pipe in a fitted case, with a beautiful grain in the wood. He remembered the brand name and the model name from the day when he had selected a pipe. And he certainly remembered the price. He had told the clerk that he didn't feel like paying $25 plus tax for a pipe.

He looked at the beautiful thing, and he felt a resentment so sharp, so bitter that it shocked him. In one gesture she had cut the heart out of his campaign of frugality. He looked at her and saw her smile which anticipated his pleasure in the gift, and in that instant he wanted to smash it to the floor in its fitted case.

Her smile faded and she said, "Don't you like it? I thought it ——"

He caught himself quickly and said, "It's beautiful, honey. It really is. And the style is just perfect."

So the kids had to see the ceremony of the first lighting of the new pipe, and then Ginny permitted them one small piece of birthday cake each, and shooed them off to bed.

After she came back to the living room she said, "Is anything wrong?"

"What could be wrong on my birthday, blondie? Bring me a kiss."

The unexpected, irrational force of his anger over such a simple thing should have prepared him better for subsequent developments.

On an evening in early May, Ben got out the checkbook and paid the bills. This necessary ceremony was something that he had begun, not exactly to dread but to feel increasingly irritable about. He sorted them and paid all the little ones first—fuel oil, dentist, doctor, phone, light, gas, water, car repairs and so on. He totaled them and deducted the total from his balance. Next he looked over the big ones and paid the ones which had to be paid. Every month it seemed as though an unexpected big one would come along. This time there were two discouragingly fat ones, the fire insurance on the house (paid annually and not included in the mortgage payments) for $208.20, and a life-insurance premium of $442.50. They had to be paid. And a final check for $400 had to be drawn to Ginny's order, for deposit in her checking account to take care of the household expenses. He tried not to think too much about the balance left: $41.14. He had his commutation ticket for the month and a little over $20 in cash. Light lunches in the city this month.

Ginny came in just then and as she walked by she patted him on the shoulder, and sat in the chair near the desk.

"Made out my check yet, financier?"

"Are you that hungry for it?"

"No. I think I've got to hit you for a raise, boss."

"What?"

"Four fifty anyway, but five hundred would take some of the strain off."

He glared at her and said, more loudly than he intended, "Just what do you do with all of it?"

She looked startled, then indignant. "What did you think I did with it? I buy groceries for five. I buy clothes for me and three children. Gas and oil for the car. A one-afternoon-a-week cleaning woman. Sitters. A yardman once in a while now that you don't have as much time as you used to have. Dry cleaning. Toys. Movie money. Sometimes I even buy myself a dollar lunch. Prices are going up, darling. Up and up and up, and I'm asking for a cost-of-living adjustment. What's the matter with you lately?"

Some things you should know about . . .

Excessive Drinking

MOST AMERICANS either leave alcoholic beverages alone entirely—or they drink moderately and sensibly, mainly for social and special occasions.

Unfortunately, however, there are 5 million men and women in our country who cannot control their drinking—and most of them break down socially, emotionally and physically. Inevitably, they also damage the lives of their families and other people . . . sometimes tragically.

Since alcoholism is among our most important health problems, it deserves our attention. These questions and answers may give you a better understanding of it.

Why do people become alcoholics?

Medical science does not yet know the precise cause or causes of alcoholism. Authorities agree, however, that emotional difficulties—tension, worry, guilt, inferiority and other dreaded feelings—are certainly connected with alcoholism. The alcoholic drinks to escape his inner conflicts. And he becomes so dependent on alcohol that he cannot face life without it.

What are the warning signs of alcoholism?

When a person starts "gulping" alcohol to "fortify" himself, trying to hide from others how much and how often he drinks, drinking alone or in the morning, giving strange excuses for his behavior, having trouble on the job or at home . . . addiction to alcohol may be in the offing. It may develop quickly—within a few months—or slowly over a period of years.

Can an alcoholic recover?

Recovery depends on the alcoholic's own fundamental desire to stop drinking—and, having stopped, never to drink alcohol in any form again.

Medical treatment is becoming increasingly important in furthering recovery. New drugs help ease the alcoholic's discomfort. Psychotherapy helps him recognize his problems and enables him to deal with them without alcohol.

What should you do to help an alcoholic?

Face the problem without embarrassment . . . just as you would any other serious threat to your home and your family.

The family—especially those members closest to the alcoholic—should seek help from someone who knows the problem. The family doctor, or a clergyman, or a social worker, or a friend may be able to advise you about the best course to take.

Alcoholics Anonymous helps many people conquer their compulson to drink. The only requirement for AA membership is an honest desire to give up liquor. There are no dues or fees for its services.

When given the help they need, many alcoholics can recover and make a fresh start in the world.

She got up and stared at the figure and then sat down again rather heavily. "But you need more than that for the month!"

"I'll get along. I can draw trip expenses in advance for the Toledo thing."

"I'm not . . . foolish with money, Ben."

"I know that."

"But where on earth does it all go?"

"Good question."

"You're making good money. Don't we owe the bank something on that open note?"

"Oh, I've whittled that down to just twelve hundred."

"Will it be better when that's paid off?"

"It might be. A little."

She straightened her shoulders. "Well, I can certainly get along on the four hundred, Ben. If I'd known, I certainly wouldn't have ——"

"I didn't mean to bark."

"Golly, I don't blame you. We'll just have to live . . . simpler."

"Where? How?"

"Those are good questions, too, aren't they?"

And it was turned into a joke, but the strain was there, the tinge of poison. And all the affirmations of love could not make it go away entirely.

It was, Ben thought, as the lean month went by, just a case of holding on, cutting corners until income jumped again. It made him feel guilty, however. It was a shameful situation to be unable to live without strain on an income which, ten years ago, he would have considered wildly affluent. It was best not to think of what might happen should some emergency situation come up.

And so in June, of course, which had promised to be a better month, Chris nearly lost his right hand. He was in a school bus on the way to a picnic, sitting by the window on the right side of the bus, his right arm out the window. As they were making a turn at low speed on a gravel road the right front tire blew. The bus skidded, went through a shallow ditch and into a stand of small trees. Chris said later that he had tried to pull his arm in, but the motion of the bus had jammed everybody against him. At first it was believed that no one had been hurt. The sound Chris made was lost in the general turmoil. But then he fainted.

When Ben got to the hospital at four o'clock they had been working on the hand—pulped between tree and bus body—for over an hour. Ginny was very white and very still, and her eyes were huge.

They did the basic structural repairs in the first operation. The third day following there were evidences of infection. In spite of the sulfas and antibiotics, his fever went up to dangerous levels, there were consultations and tentative recommendations for amputation. It was a nightmare time, with the hospital the center of all thoughts and schedules. The child was so stolidly brave about it, so uncomplainingly courageous and gallant that it seemed to make the whole thing more pointlessly tragic.

Almost during the last hour of decision, the infection began to respond. There was a second operation in July, very delicate and intricate, close work with muscles, tendons, nerves, to achieve optimum functioning of the hand. He healed with such miraculous speed—a facility reserved to small healthy boys—that he was able to go back to the hospital for the final operation in late August, a relatively minor one to readjust repairs previously made in the index finger and thumb.

By the time he started school in the fall, the bandages were off. The hand was slightly but not obviously misshapen. The orthopedic surgeon was quietly proud of his work, of the restoration of an estimated 60 per cent of function. But Chris often wept with frustration at the hand that would not follow the commands of the mind and, when it did so, was so girlishly weak. He had a series of exercises which he tended to overdo. "By the time he is twelve he will have eighty per cent function," the doctor said. "Perhaps later it will become more. He will adjust, and never notice it."

When your only son is injured, it is degrading to think of money. You get the money, somewhere, and you don't think about it, at least very much. The hospitalization covered a small part of the expense. Ben had the optimistic feeling that he could recover the rest of it from the Department of Public Instruction. He had a local lawyer, Harold Crady, look into it.

Crady finally reported back. "I've been around and around on this thing, Ben. The insurance company takes the stand that their coverage does not extend past taking the kids to and from school, or on special instructional field trips. This was a picnic, not authorized by the company, and the bus was not being driven by a regular driver."

"Who was driving it then?"

"The brother of Chris' teacher. The Public Instruction people take the stand the bus was 'borrowed' without sufficient authorization. The driver has no personal liability coverage, and he hasn't got dime one, Ben."

"Then what do I do?"

Crady shrugged. "You could file suit against the Public Instruction Department and the insurance company and the driver."

"You don't sound enthusiastic."

"Because I don't think you'd get anywhere. You'd just be making a bad risk of more money, Ben. Take your loss. That's the best thing you can do."

THE LONG HAUL

By D. A. RAYNER

Complete in the May JOURNAL, condensed from the novel soon to be published by McGraw-Hill Book Company.

Hospital, surgery, anesthesia, nurses, operating room and outpatient care came to $3006.65. Hospitalization covered $401.20 of this total. It was particularly ironic that Harold Crady's bill for legal services in the amount of $100 had to be considered a part of the expense of the accident. Ben Weldon raised the $2700. He cashed the last few Government bonds. He had been trying to forget that he owned them, so that he would leave them alone. He got a little over $900 for them. He borrowed against the cash value of his insurance, a final $1000, bringing his insurance borrowings to an even $4000, on which interest at 6 per cent was piling up, and leaving him a cash-value equity of a little over $100. He went down to the Lawton National Bank. His 180-day note had been whittled down to $1100. He paid the interest to date and had it rewritten for $2200, with the overage deposited in his checking account. Mr. Lathrop Hyde, the vice president, was cordial enough, but Ben Weldon thought he detected a certain reluctance, an almost imperceptible reserve and skepticism. There had been Hydes in Lawton Valley back when New York had been a full day's trip away by carriage. He never could feel entirely at ease with what Ginny in her more irritable moments called the aborigines. They all seemed to have an emotional resentment toward the new people which was at odds with their pleasure in making money out of the explosive growth of the area.

On leaving the bank Ben was uncomfortably aware that interest alone on his debts was costing him a little over a dollar a day, and all reserves were gone.

That night he and Ginny had to drive into the city to attend a theater party which was a professional obligation. Three couples from National Directions, with Ben the junior in rank, and the president of a client firm in Dallas and his wife, a Mr. and Mrs. Blessing.

Sometimes such evenings turned out to be fun, and Ginny had enjoyed many of them. But this night Mrs. Blessing relayed her apologies through her husband to the people she had never met. She was confined to her hotel bed. Something had upset her, possibly the New York City water. Mr. Blessing stated that Myrna was very sensitive about water. He was to go right ahead without her, and, clearly, he had been going ahead very effectively at the hotel bar.

Ben had been in conference with the man, and had admired the agility of Hank Blessing's business brain. He was a big freckled man with a fringe of gray-red hair, small pale-gray eyes. In the present negotiations with National he was in the dealer's chair, and was capable of squeezing every last advantage out of it.

It astonished Ben that a man so coldly shrewd in conference could be such a total after-hours boor. Service at dinner before the theater was infuriatingly slow, providing a chance for Hank Blessing to proceed further with his self-inflicted paralysis of the cerebral cortex. He dominated the table with increasingly coarse tales of his homespun beginnings, while the three National executives and their wives sat with glazed smiles inadequately concealing acute distress. A man alcoholically convinced of his own irresistibility and charm will nearly always focus all of it on the nearest beautiful blonde. Ginny became Hank's rebellious target.

They were late to the theater. Hank made a horrible racket in the aisle as they were finding their seats. He managed to plant himself beside Ginny and mumbled further exploits to her, ignoring the shushings, until he went soundly asleep. The play could have been excellent. The leading lady was sick. Her understudy ran through the part as though anxious to make a late date, drowning out her cue lines, yelling the tenderest passages.

Hank came up out of sleep at the final curtain, refreshed and ready to go. Ben was able to beg off, using the sitter as an excuse.

As they drove north on the parkway, Ben became aware of Ginny's ominous silence. There had been other horrible evenings, to be sure, but they had always been able to make jokes on the way home.

"Charming guy, that Hank Blessing," he said at last.

"Utterly."

"We've been going around in a tight little circle with that guy. We ought to get it all locked up tomorrow."

"And I went around in a tight little circle, too, darling," she said hotly. "Two drinks he spilled on me. And I'm so tired of being pawed I could scream."

"Come now, honey. You weren't ——"

She whirled in the seat to face him. "How could you keep track of what was going on? You were too busy thinking about how you're going to . . . lock it all up tomorrow."

"Honey, really now ——"

"Don't you really-now me, Ben Weldon. We used to go out together, a million years ago. Now when we go out, there's an angle. I get dragged to town to prove that the young executive gets married just like ordinary people do. And I'm told that it's my job. I'm helping you get ahead, or something. Well, I'll keep right on doing it, because I suppose it's part of the bargain, but you might as well know I consider it cynical and degrading, and I hate every minute of it!"

She flounced around and began to stare out her window at the night, as far from him as she could get.

"I wasn't aware of the fact I was torturing you," he said stiffly.

"What did that evening cost?" she asked in a small voice.

"What do you mean?"

"What did it cost? Total. Is that a hard question?"

"Tickets, dinner, drinks. Oh, I'd say about two twenty-five. But it's a legitimate expense which can be deduc——"

"When do you have to go to Dallas?"

"It's set up for next Tuesday."

"First-class air out and back? The very best hotel? Room service? Bonded bourbon and steaks two inches thick and the biggest rental car on the lot ——"

"It's always that way. We can't afford to give the impression of cutting corners. Actually it's a public-relations and promotion expenditure, and I'm not exactly loafing, you know."

"This dress," she said in a dreary voice. "I've put the hem up and down so many times I feel like I'm wearing an elevator. And we decided it would be so jolly and unusual to just stay home for our vacation this summer. All I had to do was cook for five and keep house. No more cleaning woman one half day a week. I wonder how scraggly I dare let the lawn get before I hire Gus to cut it. You come home so bushed, I haven't the heart to ask you. We can't afford to entertain the people we really like very often, so we have to turn down invitations, which at least saves sitter money." She sighed heavily. "It's a double standard, that it is. You take trips and live like Aly Khan and then you come back to your well-mortgaged home and listen to your wife whine."

The best sort of revenge is not to be like him who did the injury.

MARCUS AURELIUS

"Ginny ——"

"It must bore you stiff."

"We have to hang on. That's all. This is a bad time. We just have to get through it."

She turned back toward him, this time with earnestness. "But don't you see, darling, that there should be more to life than just 'getting through it'? These are supposed to be the good years. We don't have any fun. Neither of us sees enough of the kids in the right way. Oh, I know. You're the fair-haired boy, and things will get fat in the future, but what if we're so beat down by the time things do get good that it won't mean much?"

"Should I quit?" he snapped.

"Typical," she said in anger. "Typical! You get all defensive and won't even talk about it."

"I'll talk about anything constructive you care to bring up."

He knew he was driving a little too fast, and dared her mentally to make any comment about it. The grim silence threatened to continue all the way to the house, but a mile after they had made the turnoff toward Lawton, the motor began to make an odd sound, a combination of grinding and clanking. He slowed down quickly.

"Is that little red light supposed to be on?" she asked.

The very moment he noticed it was the oil-pressure light, the car acted as though he had stepped on the brake. He put it in neutral and used what was left of the momentum to coast onto the wide shoulder. The motor was dead. He tried the starter and the starter would not turn it over.

"What is it?" Ginny asked.

"No oil, I'd guess. I wasn't watching the heat."

He got out and opened the hood. The heat that came off the block felt much like that of an open fire.

"Do we have to get oil?" she asked.

"No, we do not get oil."

"Don't bite my head off. I just don't understand these ——"

"The moving parts were operating without oil. Friction created great heat. The moving parts expanded and that increased the heat. The main bearings were the last thing to go, and they didn't go quick enough so I ran it too long and it heated up beyond the melting point of the moving parts, and now the motor is frozen."

He looked at her face in the pale moonlight and the reflected glow of the headlights. She looked puzzled and blank.

"Frozen?" she asked. "But you can feel the heat coming off it!"

And that was the very end. He whooped and gasped and staggered, and the tears ran out of his eyes. After baffled moments she joined in. They clung to each other.

the paste with the Sunny Italian Flavor

Hunt...for the best

RECIPE FOR PIZZA

"To make a good pizza you need a very hot oven and a really rich tomato filling. That's why I use Hunt's Tomato Paste in my recipe. Hunt's tomato flavor is simply delicious. I've tried them all, and Hunt's Tomato Paste is the real thing, just like home. Mamma Mia!...I hope you and your family will enjoy it soon."

PIZZA DOUGH

1 pkg. active dry yeast
1¼ cups warm water
2 tablesp. pure vegetable oil, such as Wesson Oil
4 cups flour • 1 teasp. salt

Dissolve yeast in water. Stir in oil. Sift flour and salt together; stir into oil-water mixture. Knead vigorously on cloth or board until smooth and elastic, about 15 minutes. Shape into ball; place in greased bowl; brush with oil; cover with damp cloth. Let rise until double in bulk, about 2 hours. Form again into ball. Makes enough dough for 4 pizzas.

PIZZA FILLING

1 recipe Pizza Dough
1 6-oz. can Hunt's Tomato Paste*
½ cup hot water • 1 teasp. salt
½ teasp. oregano • ⅛ teasp. black pepper
1 lb. Mozzarella cheese, sliced thin

Cut dough into four pieces. Roll each into 9-10" circle; fit into 4 pie tins; brush with cooking oil. Mix all ingredients except cheese together and spread over dough. Top with cheese. Bake in very hot oven, 550°F., 12-15 minutes or until dough is brown and crisp. Makes 4 pizzas. Other toppings: anchovies, mushrooms, onion or Italian sausage.

*Hunt's Tomato Paste is pure tomato, concentrated to a thick paste. Use in any recipe for true tomato flavor, a spoonful to a can full, depending on the recipe. Generally, mix it with the water or liquid in the recipe.

When he could catch his breath he said, "Ruined! Got to buy a new motor!"

"Luck of the Weldons," she gasped, and they were off again.

While they were still fighting for control, a police car stopped and Ben arranged for them to send a tow truck back. The disabled car was given a $25 tow into Lawton, three miles away. They left it in the agency parking lot and took a taxi home, and sent the sitter home in the same taxi.

Ginny phoned him at the office early the following afternoon. She had been to the agency. They had checked the car. The motor was shot. The estimate for putting in a new one was $770. It seemed that something had bounded up off the road, possibly flipped up by a front wheel, and had with devilish neatness sheared the drain plug off the bottom of the pan.

"They said our insurance couldn't cover a thing like that," she said solemnly.

"No. It wouldn't cover that."

"Billy suggested we trade it, but he said he couldn't give very much, the condition it's in."

"How much?"

"Seven hundred dollars."

"What! That was a thirty-eight-hundred-dollar car eighteen months ago!"

"Well, that's what he told me."

"I better talk to them."

"What am I going to do for a car, Ben? You know I run a taxi service with these kids. I have to have a car. Should I rent one?"

"Can't you borrow one?"

"I asked Billy, but they have a rule. Something about their insurance. I could try Alice, though. Stu is away for the whole month, and she can't use two cars. But I sort of hate to ask her."

"Give it a try, will you, honey?"

"O.K. How did it go with . . . last night's companion?"

"About the way he wanted it to go. I'd hoped he'd be guilty and hung over, but he came out strong."

"I got a call from Saks a little while ago. They were checking the address to mail a gift certificate. They said I've got a two-hundred-dollar credit all of a sudden, and they wouldn't say from whom. So I guess he remembered slopping drinks on my dress. What should I do about it?"

"Honey, you might just as well use it. Get a dress."

"No, sir! I'll use it, all right. I've got uses for it. Bras, slips, nylons, blouses, skirts. Next time you get me next to a tycoon, I'll joggle his elbow, believe me. 'By, darling."

Ginny was able to borrow the neighbor's extra car, and as soon as Ben had a chance he went to the agency. They would not go a penny over $750 unless, of course, he wanted to buy their biggest model, loaded with extras. Then they might go a couple hundred higher. He shopped around briefly, but he was handicapped by not having the car to show. He could only describe it. He had just finished the payments on the disabled car. Without cash, his only option was either to have the car repaired, and then refinance it to pay the bill, or to trade it and finance the new one. Billy pointed out the significant difference in the equity of the two vehicles one year from date. He said they would make a very special deal on a 1958 model.

Ben looked over the stock list and bought the cheapest '58 station wagon in the warehouse. He dispensed with the usual extras—the only one he bought was the heater-defroster. It had been previously serviced and was ready to roll. They pushed the papers through quickly. Ben drove the gray wagon home, any pleasure in the new car well muted by the knowledge of being another $2200 in debt.

The third option, the one he had not let himself think about, was to purchase a good used car, something sturdy and reliable right off Billy's used-car lot, for possibly $1200. It could be one year older than the disabled car. The $500 difference could be financed readily.

But at this station in life he occupied a certain recognized position. All public actions had to be consistent with this position. In so far as vehicles were concerned, he had already taken the risk of a slight inconsistency by owning only one. The house had a two-car garage. The typical Ridge Road family had one reasonably new Detroit product and a second car, usually an import, for the wife. It was not in good taste to have two spanking-new cars. The second car could be bought used, and it had character if it was slightly battered and noisy.

But Benjamin Weldon could not buy a used car as the family's only car. It would indicate either an uninteresting sort of eccentricity, or serious money problems. Either conclusion was unpalatable. Everyone had problems. Everyone managed to get by, somehow, and keep up appearances. It was a test of both management and character, like dressing for dinner in the jungle.

Ben Weldon did not care about the opinions of Lawton. But of the two thousand men in the area who went down to the city every working day, at least fifty not only were in his age group and approximate earnings group, but were employed by organizations operating in the same areas as National Directions. Three men were, in fact, employed by National Directions, two junior to Ben and one senior to him. In any tensely competitive situation, trivia become excruciatingly important.

The fifty of the two thousand men who rode down to the towers of the city each day were blandly cordial to one another. And without being able to state precisely why, they watched one another with minute care. They learned to read the small signs. They could pick out the overconfident ones who, through talking too loosely and readily, were slamming doors they might have entered. They saw the first signs of decay in the man who would be felled by liquor. They detected evidences of the marital rift or the destructive affair long before the gossip became public property. And they could tell, with an uncanny, unerring accuracy, the ones who were on their way up and out of this narrow routine.

It was all casual, with the desperation carefully hidden away, but each year a few dropped off, and newcomers closed the ranks. They went down or up, and in either case their houses went on the market, and they rode those trains no longer. And at the lunches in the city, and in the idle moments before meetings were called to order, the smallest departures from standard behavior were discussed.

"What's with Weldon, buying a used car? I thought he was crown prince over there. They cut his pay?"

"Maybe he's just smarter than you and me."

"Maybe. Seems funny, though."

"Maybe he guessed the market wrong, or he's playing the horses."

Ben Weldon knew exactly how the system worked. Yet he guessed that if he had less at stake, he would have gone ahead and bought the used car. But when you're playing the game for the house limit, it is stupid to go around handing the world any kind of club to beat you with. It would not be a crime to buy a used car. The crime would be in giving the men who control your destiny any personal questions to ask about you which do not have obvious and reasonable answers.

"If he can't manage on what we're paying him, how could he hope to run this outfit someday?"

Ben Weldon drove home in his brand-new car, and took his family for a short ride at dusk, wondering if he had been intelligent—or just scared.

October was a thin month. November was a little better, but it made Ben feel defeated to think of the onrush of the Christmas season. He made up budget after budget, and tore them up. No matter how he strained over the figures, he could see that, with luck, they could reduce the indebtedness each month, but by such a discouragingly tiny figure that it seemed to stretch endlessly into the bleak future.

When you have a chronic toothache, you eventually end up in the dentist chair. Ben had heard of a C.P.A. in Manhattan who had reputedly done wonders in straightening out the tangled personal finances of some of his friends.

He made one appointment and had to break it, and kept the second one, appearing with all his books and records and copies of his state and Federal tax returns, and his operating budget.

The wonder-worker was J. J. Semmins, with an office on West 43rd Street. He was a small fat man with a permanent scowl of impatience, an unlit cigar, a diamond ring and audible asthmatic breathing. He had a huge bare desk in a very small office off the anteroom where several people were working. He spread Ben's papers all over the top of the desk and growled at Ben to have a seat and be patient. He went through the papers so fast that Ben could not believe he was absorbing what he was reading. From time to time he would scribble a note on a scratch pad. He reassembled the papers, plunked them on the corner of the desk and leaned back.

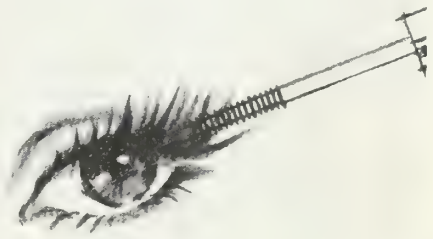
"Weldon, you keep good records. You should see some of the stuff comes in here. It looks like you're even using your head here and there, but that isn't helping you a bit, is it?"

"That's why I'm here."

"Twenty-three five, you make. And right off the top, for Uncle and the governor and other payroll deductions and that co-operative pension plan comes seventy-one, and none of that can you change, so we're talking about sixteen four. Right? So twenty-six hundred goes into life insurance. It's a little over ten per cent of total income, but with three small kids it isn't out of line. Can you juggle the policies around and get the same coverage for less money?"

"I tried that. I've got a good agent. He couldn't come up with a thing."

"And you're borrowed to the hilt on it. Now we're talking about thirteen eight. Give



OBSTETRICIAN'S PRAYER

By H. P. DUNN, M.D.

With faintly beating fetal cord entwined, prolapsed within my hand,
I search in warm maternal darkness
Where only touch can understand, Seeking a tiny foot with which to draw forth gasping, sobbing life,
I groan with pain and weariness, the fight with Death, the ceaseless strife;
Fear breathes in acrid fumes of gas and antisepsis.
Keep calm, breathe silent prayer:
"Divine Physician, inspire, protect us!"

When I am dead, O God, do
You, I pray, Thrust Your loving hand within the dark womb
Of the anteroom of hell, and from that eternal tomb
Pluck forth my soul before it burns away.
Breathe life into Your child,
Creator blest,
Transfuse me with Your precious blood,
See only how I tried at Your behest
To dam of human pain the endless flood.

me the story on this two hundred a month to your mother."

"She's quite old, seventy-four. She had her children late, and my father's been dead thirty years No Social Security to help out. She's out in Columbus, Indiana, living in the house I was born in. We've tried to get her to come live with us, but all her friends are there. She seems to get along on two hundred. I'd send more if I could."

"Any other children helping out?"

"I'm the only one living."

"The house out there is in her name?"

"Yes, but ——"

"Worth anything?"

"I don't know what it would bring. It's not big. A frame house in an old part of town, but she still likes it there. She has a woman come in and help her. The same woman for years and years."

"If she signed it over, you could sell it and rent a nice little apartment for her. Put the money on these debts and cut your debt service."

"I just couldn't do that. It's a matter of pride to her. I've heard her say a hundred times that the house is 'free and clear.' That means a lot to her."

J. J. Semmins sighed. "So we're talking about eleven four. If your house was free and clear, it would make the difference. Two ten a month on the mortgage and nearly six hundred a year town and county taxes. That's a load, those taxes."

"They've been going up ever since I bought the place four years ago. National brought me in from the Cleveland office then. Lawton is growing so fast they've had to spend a lot of money to take care of the services, schools and so on."

J. J. Semmins scribbled for a moment and then leaned back. "Take the mortgage payments, taxes, and call it one fifty a month for heat, light, phone, electric and water and so on, call it five a year goes into that place. It's a lot of house."

"We hunted a long time before we located it, Mr. Semmins. And it scared us a little, even though I knew we bought it right. I can get seven more than I paid for it right now." He paused and looked down at his fist for a moment, searching for the right words. "The firm I work for, Mr. Semmins, takes . . . a special interest in me. When I was brought into the home office, there was a certain amount of . . . gentle pressure brought to bear. They wanted me to live up to a certain standard, and the house and its location are part of that."

"So now we're talking about sixty-four hundred which is what you got left after the house, and your wife takes forty-eight hundred of that. Right? So here's sixteen hundred for car, clothing for you, entertainment, club dues, recreation, commutation expenses and, theoretically, interest and principal payments on your loans, plus medical, dental, personal legal . . . and you come to me with this impossible situation and say that there's nothing you can change and I'm supposed to make up a miracle for you? You're brighter than that!"

"I thought a fresh viewpoint might ——"

"I'm sorry. What good is it yelling at you? You're the man in the trap. Can you knock off at least the club?"

"We use it as little as possible, but they come up from New York and they expect ——"

"O.K., O.K. How about this money you've been paying into the pension plan? Can you get your hands on it?"

"Theoretically I could borrow what I've donated at no interest. If I left the firm, it would be turned over to me, the exact amount I've put in."

"How much is the total?"

"About nine thousand now."

"Could you borrow it?"

Ben studied his fist again. "I have the right to. But if I exercised that right, it would have to be because of some . . . very obviously expensive and disastrous thing, such as a child in an iron lung or something. If I just borrowed it, it would be evidence that I can't live on my salary."

WHAT My Son TAUGHT Me

By MAYBELLE WILKES

He never spoke a word in his life, yet he taught me more than all the books I ever read.

He never walked a step, yet he led me to heights I never could have climbed alone.

He lived only a few short years, yet he lives forever in all the children I meet.

Who can say he was a burden when he made me so rich?

That long-ago morning I waited tensely for the famous child specialist to report on the exhaustive tests of my year-old son, Robert. He took my hands in his kind ones and spoke slowly: "Mrs. Wilkes, these are the things we dread to tell mothers. I wish I could give you a different verdict. Robert has cerebral palsy; the brain injury is intense; coordination very poor. He will have little use of himself, his digestion is faulty, he may suffer much pain."

I gasped, "He's intelligent. He smiles at me. He must be normal. . . . He's all I have; I couldn't bear it." I sobbed wildly. "He's just tired—tired—tired ——" My hysteria rose.

The doctor put his arm around my shoulder, and his voice was compassionate. "He was born intelligent, but please don't count on recovery. Try not to tear yourself apart. My advice would be to put your son in an institution where he can have good care."

But I took my son home, and began the long, hard task of caring for a helpless, afflicted child. I was a young widow and could afford no help.

At first I wouldn't admit my handsome son was different. I beat my heart out against the bars of my rebellion.

Then began the lessons he taught me—the long, long lessons.

After the pain-filled nights, spent and heartsick, I would look at my son, and over his weary little face would come his radiant smile. If he could smile, I thought, so could I. It was so little to give when it was his whole world. So we smiled together—my first lesson.

Then I found he responded to a happy voice. I read him gay stories, and talked of the birds, and brought him little live things to see and try to handle. And he loved color. We laughed together, bitterness faded, and life was better.

I had at first, from shock and pride, kept away from people. But though my young pleasure-loving friends shied away, I found we attracted people with discerning hearts—whose different look and smile are the signs of those who carry, or have carried, heavy crosses, their banners of courage high.

Doctors were unfailingly kind and helpful, as all dedicated people are. They would carry Robert in their arms, and were so full of love when, with his eyes, he accepted and leaned on their kindness. So I learned to accept and be humble. The lessons went on.

A rector in a small parish, who could never have a larger one because his wife was a hopeless alcoholic, stayed some nights and watched with me. As he saw the anguish he said, "Hell comes in many forms."

Through him we were able to find a small cottage with a yard where I could put Robert in the sun while I worked.

Then I found how he drew people to him. They came softly and seemed to feel his spirit. Although he was weak, he grasped the infinite.

There was a tall, impressive-looking factory owner whose haughtiness as he went through our narrow street I used to resent.

One morning I saw him pause and look at my son. The next day he waved. Robert smiled. They watched for each other. Finally he would tiptoe into our garden and speak to Robert so gently, and smile so tenderly.

Robert would lean his head to him for a pat or a kiss. Who says they don't know? I came out once and the man said to me humbly, "I think he loves me."

And one day he knelt by the child's chair, opened a basket and took out a beautiful white puppy. At the look of ecstasy on Robert's face the man turned tear-filled eyes to me and said, "What would I give if I could help him as he has helped me!"

So I learned not to judge people, but to look into their hearts.

Because Robert loved music, I kept up my practice and played and sang to him. We made friends. Then at last I found God. Closer than my hands. Nearer than my heart. He walked with us through the darkest valleys. We were never alone again.

I learned patience and trust.

The years went by. Robert was six. He began to fail more and was harder to lift and carry; I grew too tired to carry on. The doctor insisted on his going to a hospital. I dreaded making him so unhappy at the end, I dreaded the thought of separation. I asked God not to let us be apart through life. I left it in His hands.

Before hospital arrangements could be completed, God opened the gates to a larger life for my small son.

The lessons were over.

"But you can just barely get by on it right now, man, provided you have no more trouble!"

"I'm supposed to live on it," Ben said miserably.

J. J. Semmins threw his yellow pencil against the far wall. It bounced back and rolled under his desk. "I get so sick of this same deal all the time," he said. "Hundreds of you bright guys are in this trap. The big shots you work for made theirs so long ago that they think they're paying you a king's ransom. They want you to live big on it, advertise how good they are to work for. They'll make certain the guys in the factories take home fat money, because the unions have put the fear of God into them, but the bright guys right under their noses, they'll pay them twenty-five thousand and then put the pressure on so you spend all but a couple dimes paying your taxes and living as fat as they could have lived twenty years ago on the same money. Then, if you crack, it's your fault. If you demand more money, you're unreliable. If you start shopping around for more money you're labeled disloyal. Thirty-five would be about right for you, Weldon. You could reduce those debts down to zero and start a little savings program. Taxes would take a bigger bite, but you'd have about the right amount left. Go ask them for thirty-five. If they won't give it to you, shop for it."

"That's a joke I can't laugh at. Sorry."

"There's another choice. Sell the house. Grab that nine thousand in the retirement fund. Pay your debts, drop your insurance and go to Florida or someplace and buy a gas station. You'll live longer. You'd be surprised to learn how many guys in your shoes have done just that. They'll tell you they got sick of commuting and conforming and so on. They won't admit they got starved out. But they did, and it's a shameful thing. Big business needs the guys they're driving away because they're too chinchy to pay them what they think they're paying them. You're the forgotten man, Weldon. Go anywhere in the country and beef about not being able to live on your salary, and you'd have them rolling in hysterics. Nobody will ever be sorry for you. You'll get all the sympathy of a man with two black eyes. But from where you and I sit, it is a tragic, unnecessary thing, and we both know it. But it's a story that won't sell."

Ben managed to force a smile. "Like the small-town bank clerk back in the 'twenties, trying to act like a substantial citizen on nineteen dollars a week."

"And a lot of those guys took it as long as they could before they grabbed the money and ran."

"I guess I can at least thank you for . . . confirming the situation, Mr. Semmins."

"I won't bill you, buddy. I don't have the heart."

"But ——"

"Let's have no arguments, please. What will you do?"

"Try to squeak by, I guess. Cut every corner we can. Try to hold on. You see, the stakes are big."

"Sure," Semmins said. "You sit in this great big poker game and you've got twelve dollars and you sit there, folding every hand, waiting for a royal flush, and while you're waiting they ante you to death. Isn't there some guy over there who is interested in you enough to sit down and go over these records with you?" He sighed. "I suppose not. All I can say is good luck."

Ben Weldon reported this to Ginny, but he did not let her see the depth of his feeling of helplessness. He made it light, in so far as he was able, and, as Christmas hung over them, an ominous tinsel avalanche, they vowed all manner of economies as though it would be great fun. Economies can be fun for the recently wed: a romantic game, with the long walks to save bus fare, the happy magic of finding a quarter in the gutter, the painstaking budget to squeeze out the $4 a week to put in the savings account—against the future house, car, baby.

For those longer wed, economies can be a game if there is a special goal—the new house or the cruise or the swimming pool. But when it is part of a struggle to survive, and there seems to be no end to it, and you do not know when some small and expensive disaster may wipe out all your efforts—then there is a corrosive and destructive quality to it all. It can be a dreary battle, waged with the presentiment of defeat.

And there is not really too much you can do. You can put an end to the habit of bringing fond and silly gifts to your wife, little things you happened to see in store windows. You can avoid taxis as much as possible, give up the tenth-of-a-cent bridge game on the train, avoid all lunch dates that threaten to be expensive, try to get a little more wear out of the business suits between dry cleanings, give up the relaxing ceremony of the before-dinner drink. And you can begin a practice you have always avoided, the sly and delicate art of fudging the expense account. He found that he could show a small profit on each trip. Twelve dollars, seventeen dollars. It made him feel like a petty thief, but he told himself it was a practice hallowed by tradition.

Yet, with all these practices, he felt as if he were engaged in an exercise in futility. He was the captain at the wheel of the small boat. The sea was rushing into the hold. Every now and then he could rush down and bail for a few moments with a teacup before returning to his duty station.

There was a more serious aspect to it, one that he could not dare admit to himself. He had attempted to build an impenetrable wall between the increasing tensions of his personal life and the demands of his career.

There was an afternoon meeting ten days before Christmas, and as they were waiting for Brendan Mallory, who would conduct it, Ben Weldon heard Charlie McCain, saying, "—— got them to promise to deliver it Christmas morning, a little M.G.A., robin's-egg blue, and Kath's eyes are going to bug like a stomped frog ——"

Midway through the meeting Ben Weldon was staring off into an equitable world where Ginny was driving her brand-new little M.G.A. down a sunny country road, the wind ruffling her blond hair, her eyes adance ——

"Sir?" he said, falling abruptly back into here and now.

Mallory looked at him oddly and sa "You do have the break-even figures on We ern Products, Ben?"

"Right here," he said, flushing, and open the folder to the summary his staff had p pared for him and began to make his repo

As the meeting adjourned, Brendan M lory said, "Spare a few minutes, Ben?"

It was a command. He went with Mall to the office of the president on the te floor. Mallory was a dapper little man wit narrow mustache and a deceptively ineffect look. His voice was unerringly brisk and li and casual. But all the hidden force of man was gathered somewhere and projec through steady bright blue eyes, as intent a merciless as the eyes of a falcon. No man w had endured the special focus of those e tended to underestimate Mr. Mallory.

"Sit down, Ben. We never seem to ge chance to chat lately."

Ben sat in a deep leather chair. Mall perched on the corner of the desk, ar folded, smiling down at him. "All argume and no chat," Ben said, returning the sm feeling inside himself the special alertness c blindfolded man on a tightrope.

"I'm very pleased with what you've b doing, Ben."

"Thank you, sir."

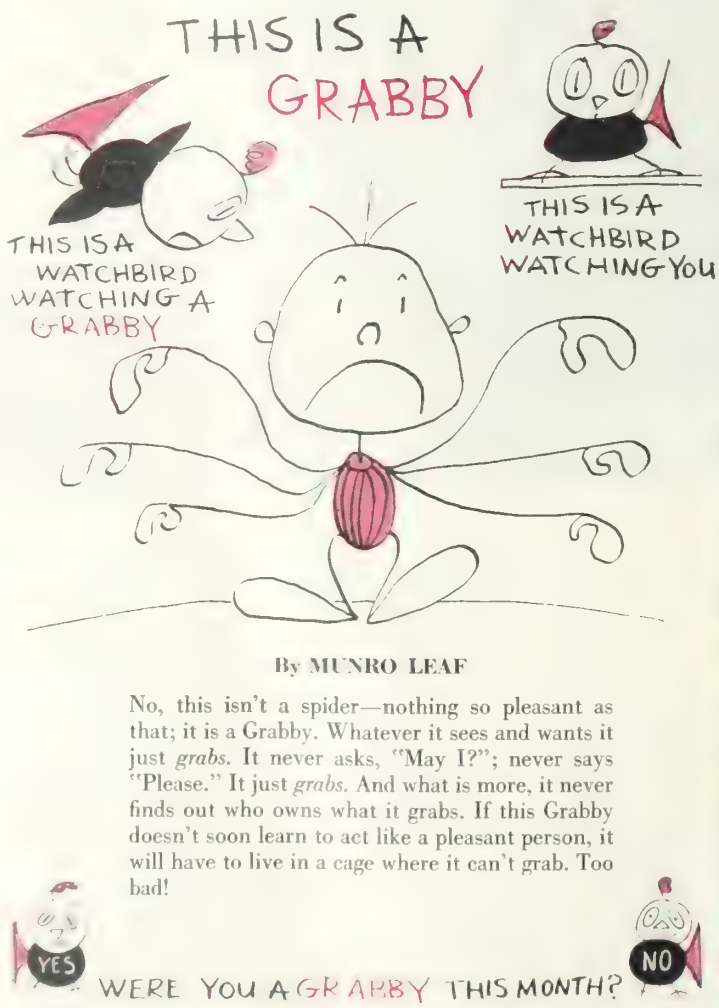
"I discussed it with Ed and he agreed should bring you into the bonus setup, st ing this January."

"I'm very grateful, Mr. Mallory."

"I wonder if you aren't pushing yourse little too hard."

This, Ben knew, was a direct result of woolgathering in the special meeting. He c fully broadened his smile, and said, "I d feel oppressed, sir. As a matter of fact, I th I do better the heavier the work load is."

"Everything outside the office is fine?"



"Yes, sir," Ben said heartily.

"Give my regards to the lovely Virgi please. Tell her you two are coming for dir after the holidays. Alice adores you both.

"We'll both be looking forward to it, Mallory."

"I thought you might be pushing yours little too eagerly, because you've seemed a l

No, this isn't a spider—nothing so pleasant as that; it is a Grabby. Whatever it sees and wants it just grabs. It never asks, "May I?"; never says "Please." It just grabs. And what is more, it never finds out who owns what it grabs. If this Grabby doesn't soon learn to act like a pleasant person, it will have to live in a cage where it can't grab. Too bad!

From Dairyland, U.S.A.—a panorama of fine foods for Foodarama Living

You may have your Foodarama in Buttercup Yellow, Bermuda Pink, Surf Turquoise, Aztec Copper or Classic White.

Only Kelvinator gives you this 12 cu. ft. deluxe refrigerator and 6 cu. ft. upright freezer, all in one cabinet only 41 inches wide . . .

Fabulous Foodarama by Kelvinator

Here's a happy new way to get more pleasure from the bounty of America's fertile farms . . . to eat better meals the year round . . . to entertain royally without rush or fuss . . . to save money and save time. It's Foodarama Living!

Foodarama's huge capacity puts an abundance of foods at your finger tips. You shop less but have more on hand. There's always room for supermarket bargains and low-price seasonal specials. And what a joy to have the convenience of ample freezer space right in your kitchen!

You never defrost either refrigerator or freezer. Foodarama's safer "No-Frost" system makes frost a total stranger . . . and does it so much more economically than other systems that you enjoy important savings every year. And you never fuss with ice trays because a remarkable new ice dispenser makes and stores ice cubes for you automatically . . . just reach in and take one or several as you need them!

Even with all this, Foodarama actually costs you less to buy and operate than a separate refrigerator and freezer.

Foodarama is a stunning example of the wonderful plus you'll find only in the kitchen and laundry appliances made by the Kelvinator Division of American Motors Corporation, Detroit 32, Michigan. Make it yours! Fabulous Foodarama!

drawn and . . . remote lately, Ben. This has bearing on your efficiency, but you don't em to have the—ah—lift you used to have. at light touch of yours that can take the sion out of sticky situations. And I do be- ve you've become a little less gregarious. I ow that lunch with the people you work th all day can be monotonous, but some- es things are resolved in little unexpected ys."

Is there anything the little devil doesn't see? n asked himself.

"Maybe I've been getting self-important," n said with what he hoped was precisely the ht amount of lightness.

"Not you, Ben! That's a vice you'll never ve. I'm glad things are going well, and it's en nice to have this little talk."

"I do appreciate the bonus deal, sir," he d, getting up.

Mallory shrugged as he led him to the door. e assured you earned it, Ben. And because unexpected money, spend it foolishly. It ll do you and Ginny good. Sometimes I nder if you young people aren't too re- ble."

He gave Ben a parting touch on the shoul- r. Not a pat or a slap, but a barely percepti- touch, a curious gesture of reassurance.

Ben decided not to tell Ginny of the bonus. d he been told the figure, he would have d her. He spent the entire train ride home ing to guess what it would be. He told him- f that it would be a glorious $10,000 that uld get him even with the board, with some spare. But that was ridiculously optimistic. knew the bonus scale of past years, and he ew corporate earnings, and he finally set- l on $3500 as being a conservative and sonable guess.

That evening he went over his financial ac- nts and saw that his most intelligent use the money would be to reduce the bank n by $1500, pay another $1500 on the in- ance loan, and leave $500 in the checking ount for emergencies.

Had they not previously made an agreement the cost of the Christmas gifts they would e each other, Ben, in view of the bonus to ne, might have refused to set such a small ire—no more than $5, and no cheating, ase. After all, they told each other, Christ- s is for the kids. And it isn't the value of the anyway. It's the act of giving.

Something that left a wound deeper than had any right to expect happened to Ginny ldon five days before Christmas. She had to find the proper $5 gift for Ben and she l begun to feel dismayed at her lack of cess.

he was in a gift-shop area, bent on a spe- errand, when she happened to notice in a dow a beautiful English croquet set in a fitted hardwood box. She walked by the window, stopped abruptly and turned back Ben had admired Stan Sheridan's layout the summer before. They had played a few times at Sheridan's at afternoon parties on weekends, and Ben had been quite good at it. Afterward he had paced off their back yard and had told her that if they transplanted a few shrubs, there was plenty of room. He had mentioned getting a set quite a few times, saying it would be fun for them and for the kids. But he had never done anything about it.

Ginny knew that this was the perfect present, in spite of the fact that the season was wrong. It was the unusual sort of thing, the fun thing she always tried to find for him. It would be especially for him, but it would be a present for the whole family too. She was filled with a warm glow of excitement and anticipation, and a delight at having found the perfect thing so accidentally. The mallets, balls and posts were varnished and striped with bright pure colors in holiday mood.

Her happy sense of the rightness of the gift carried her into the shop and into the hands of a supercilious little clerk who called her "modom" and handed her a mallet from the set on display inside the store. As she held it, smiling with the thought of Ben's surprise and pleasure, he told her the set was $124.95.

The blunt figures burst the dream. She handed the mallet back to the clerk, said something about thinking it over and saw him shrug in a slightly patronizing way as he put the mallet back in the open hardwood case.

She walked out, and it took her a few moments to remember the small errand two blocks away. She squared her shoulders as she walked. This year five dollars is the limit. Stick to it, girl. You promised. Don't cheat, because he won't. And stop feeling so dreary about it. It isn't that important.

He had stopped talking about croquet and there was, she knew, a whole list of things he had stopped talking about. As she walked she could see the cumulative weariness of her man, in his face and his posture. And it struck her, a sick blow at the heart, a twist of anguish so intense she was not prepared for it. He doesn't have any fun, she thought. He is so good and I love him so much, and he doesn't have any fun any more. Nobody does.

The sound, inadvertent, moved up through her throat, half sob and half cry of protest, and in the instant she realized other people were staring at her with startled curiosity, she felt the tickling run of tears on her face. She turned from them and stood facing a wall of decorative tile that was part of a store front—stood a few inches from it.

There was an insistent tugging at the sleeve of her coat and she looked down into the tear-blurred face, the soft, concerned, gentle face of a small round woman in a derelict fur coat.

"You all right, dearie? Anything I can do, dearie?"

"I'm . . . all right. Thanks."

"Sometimes they die around Christmastime, dearie, and it's God's will. They wouldn't do it if they could help it, poor things, but when the next Christmas comes around, it's dreadful hard. Just get through it, dearie, best you can, and next year won't be so terrible bad as this one. I know."

And the woman was gone. Ginny got tissue out of her purse and wiped her eyes. In all the ways of pride she pulled herself together. And she went on with Christmas. She could tell herself over and over that it was too like a petulant child to whine about being unable to afford big glossy presents. But the wound had been inflicted, deep enough so that it could not ever heal perfectly.

In the last moments of shopping she found a walnut pipe rack and humidor thing for Ben for which she paid $4.98. In the shop she had been pleased by the way it looked, but when she unwrapped it to gift-wrap it herself, the finish had that shiny look of cheapness. After she had worked on it a long time, cutting the gloss by carefully rubbing it with steel wool, it was much more handsome.

Ben's present to her was a small antique vase he found in a shop on Second Avenue. She could only guess the amount of stolen time used in finding something so lovely that was within the limit they had set.

The kids had prepared long and discouragingly expensive lists. Ben and Ginny had budgeted $100 for them, and due to the increased pressure of work because of the end of the year, Ben had been unable to help her but, as he told her later, she had performed a vast miracle of judgment and selection.

The bonus came through on January tenth. It was for $1500. Ben managed, for Ginny's sake, to conceal his disappointment. He knew it was a bit churlish of him to feel disappointment. There could easily have been no bonus at all. But he had so carefully worked out just how he would disburse the anticipated $3500, and had dwelt upon how much that amount would ease the endless tension ——

Ginny, thinking it came as a surprise to him, too, was delighted. And it seemed to dilute some of her growing resentment toward National. He said nothing to decrease her pleasure. He did not tell her that, because it was considered 1959 income, a tiny additional tax nip would be taken out of each monthly check for the rest of the year.

He paid $600 on his $2200 note at the Lawton National Bank, reduced the insurance loan by $400, and left $500 in the checking account for emergencies.

And then began the time of waiting. The winter was exceptionally severe again, the fuel bills high. The reserve shrank to $300. The house thermostat stopped working and had to be replaced. Ladybug had flu for a week, and in spite of Ginny's precautions she gave it to Chris, and the prescribed antibiotics were $14 a patient. Ben, returning late from a stormy meeting of the Civic Betterment Committee (men who work for National take an active interest in the affairs of their home communities), took to the deep snowy ditch to avoid a skidding drunk, and the tow-truck fee was $15. The water company, with the approval of all agencies concerned, slapped a special $20 assessment on all users.

These were the small things. A very special guest, a member of the board of directors of National, drops a handsome Danish cocktail glass on the hearth. Once there were a dozen. Now there are seven. So for any special entertaining for more than seven in the future, a new set must be purchased. Little things. Like being pecked to death by sparrows.

So the little things make you irritable with each other. But it is not only the little things which corrode dispositions. It is the unspoken awareness, always just around a dark corner of the mind, that big things can happen, and do happen, and the process of life is in part the knowledge that they will happen and in being prepared for them. They lived with the knowledge of their defenselessness. In a primitive culture, they would have worn charms to ward off evil, and had they been able to believe in the efficiency of the charms, they would have felt secure.

But in suburbia there are no magic things you can wear suspended from a string hung around your neck. You pray for breathing space, for time to plant your feet.

Love was there, in abundance. But an endless worry about money is an astringent that sucks the juice from love, renders it wan and slow-moving. And penury is, perhaps, more endurable in matching surroundings. It becomes grotesque in a $40,000 house.

The stress of enduring an unfair situation makes people seek outlets for their irritability. Ben and Ginny were handy targets for each other. The apologies, in time, became more a matter of protocol than of guilt. And each of them built up a distorted picture of what the other one thought. Ben taught himself to believe Ginny thought him a spineless conformist who dared not complain for fear of upsetting plans so far in the golden future they were meaningless. Ginny grew to believe that Ben considered her spoiled and petulant, unwilling to endure all this for his sake, thinking only of pleasures she was missing. And, in the perversity of all mortals, they made more effort to fit the mistaken conception than to correct it. Some of the warmth went out of the house, and a lot of the closeness went out of the marriage during the cold months, and the children felt it and were troubled by it, and acted in ways unlike themselves without knowing why—knowing only that they more frequently deserved punishment, and taking a curious satisfaction in receiving it.

There was no snow in Columbus, Indiana, on the morning of the third day of March, and the temperature was in the low twenties, and dropping steadily. It had been above freezing during the night, and there had been a hard driving rain which had frozen in a cellophane skim over everything the rain had touched.

Martha Weldon had got up early, as was her habit, and had the coffee on before Geraldine Davis came down, smiling, yawning, to the kitchen. Martha was a tall, heavy woman with an air of pious thoughtfulness, an authoritative, rather ponderous presence. Geraldine was also a widow, and she was four years younger than Martha. Geraldine had begun to "help out" at Martha's house seven years ago. She was a small, lean, tireless woman of good spirits but with a talent for malice. Her life income from her husband's insurance was too tiny to support her. She made ends meet by helping Martha and two other elderly women. She had the knack of keeping it on the basis of a friendship between equals, so that the necessary matter of slipping money to her had to be done with greatest delicacy.

Martha also had a small income. It had been larger quite a few years ago, and it was fortunate that, as it dwindled, her only living son, Ben, had been able to contribute to her support.

Three years ago one of the women Geraldine helped had died and the other had gone to Oklahoma to live with a daughter. Geraldine told her problems to Martha. As a result, Martha suggested she give up her miniature apartment and move in with her. There was more than enough room. They would be good company for each other. It seemed an excellent arrangement.

After breakfast on that cool, bright morning Martha sat at the desk in the living room and wrote to Ben and Ginny. She knew that Geraldine knew what she was doing, and she also knew that it would give Geraldine her usual opportunity to make overly casual comments about how long it had been since Martha had seen her grandchildren, and how young people these days lacked consideration, and how you'd think a boy doing as well as Martha kept telling her he was doing, making all that money and all, could afford to send more. Maybe he just never thought of it. Young people were certainly thoughtless.

It was a few minutes after nine when Martha stepped out the front door to put the letter in the mailbox attached to the post at the head of the porch steps. The board floor of the porch was painted a dark green. She took two heavy steps on the dry wood, and a third step onto the slick, transparent, invisible ice. She struck the edge of the top step with a terrible force, felt her thigh snap, and tumbled in a white roaring spin of pain to the cement sidewalk, down the four shallow steps of the porch, and lay there moaning, rolling her head from side to side. She was half aware that Geraldine had come to her, that Geraldine was in great panic. And when Geraldine made a stupid futile effort to pull at her, as though to drag her into the house, Martha screamed once, with the strength of a young woman, and fainted.

Ginny phoned the office at 12:40 and caught Ben just as he was leaving for lunch. Geraldine had not been very coherent. Martha had had a bad fall, and was in the hospital, and Ben should come at once. He told Ginny he would leave right away. He kept a small travel case with the essentials at the office for emergency business trips. His secretary had not left yet. He had her check flights for him and make a reservation. He could use his air-travel card and reimburse the company. The other men were out to lunch. He left it to her to tell them the situation, and he dictated a hasty memo which made staff assignments of the work he was handling, and told her to reshuffle his appointments as best she could.

When he saw his mother in the hospital that evening, he was deeply shocked at the way she looked, and at the uncontrolled trembling of her hands. He stayed in the house. Mrs. Geraldine Davis made up a bed there for him with what he thought was an unwarranted surliness.

He had a long talk with the doctor the next day. Due to the nature of the fracture, they had had to set it immediately. Splintered bones had had to be pinned. Her heart had stood up well under the general anesthetic, but they had had to give her plasma for shock. The doctor would not commit himself on whether she would be able to walk again, but he was ready to admit that she would be bedridden for quite a long time. Ben signed a hospital form accepting financial responsibility. He stayed that day and the next, spending as much time with her as he could, but he was never alone with her. Geraldine Davis was there the entire time. The women were obviously close.

He flew back the morning of the third day, told Ginny the details he had not told her over the phone, and that evening they phoned Martha at the hospital. Ben had arranged for a phone to be put by her bed. Ginny and the three children talked to her. Ben dived back into a brute load of work, work so heavy and demanding that he had no time to think of the extra financial burden her fall had entailed.

Six days later, at midnight, the doctor in Columbus phoned and woke him from a sound sleep to tell him that his mother had contracted pneumonia and she was not responding to medication. She was in an oxygen tent, and it was perhaps best that he come as soon as possible. Ginny packed his things and drove him to the airport.

Air connections were bad. He did not arrive at the small hospital until quarter after ten the next morning. She had been dead for not quite an hour. He made arrangements for the funeral service and the burial with the same firm which had buried his father so long ago. He phoned Ginny and she said she would make arrangements about the children and arrive the next day. He said he saw no reason for it. It was just an added expense, and it could not possibly do any good. She seemed hurt at his attitude.

But he was delighted to see her when she arrived. He had seldom felt as lonely, and the town where he had been brought up had never looked so strange to him.

Greatest dishwashing discovery since detergents

NEW FORMULA ELECTRASOL® RESTORES DISHWASHERS TO 100% EFFICIENCY

Eliminates FOOD PROTEIN FOAM that Reduces Dishwasher Action As Much As 90% . . . to Cause Spots, Streaks, Film.

MAKE SIMPLE EGG FOAM TEST! COMPARE YOUR PRESENT DETERGENT WITH NEW FOAM-CONTROL ELECTRASOL

OLD-STYLE DETERGENTS CAN'T CONTROL PROTEIN FOAM

Drop pinch of dishwasher detergent you use now into yolk-soiled egg cup. Fill with hot water. Stir vigorously. Note protein foam that can reduce dishwasher action almost to zero.

NEW FORMULA ELECTRASOL STOPS FOAM FORMATION

Now drop pinch of new Electrasol into equally soiled egg cup. Note freedom from protein foam. This means 100% efficient dishwasher performance. No spots! No streaks! No film!

Foam Control Means Spot-Free Glasses

Economics Laboratory, leader in dishwasher detergent research, has proved what scientists have long suspected; that food proteins (egg yolk, milk, grease, gravy, meat, potatoes, etc.) create foam that slows down washing action almost to zero; that ordinary detergents can't control this foam; that spots, streaks and film result; that new formula Electrasol eliminates foam, restores washing action to 100% efficiency.

Result? Spotless glassware! Streak-free dishes! Film-free silver! Get new formula, foam-control Electrasol, America's most economical dishwasher detergent, today! It's enthusiastically endorsed by leading dishwasher manufacturers!

And he was glad to hold his wife in his arms for a long reassuring moment because he was ashamed of himself. It had happened the night of the day she had died. He had awakened in the night and he had been unable to go back to sleep. Suddenly, in the darkness, there had come to him a sudden tingle of excitement and pleasure and relief as he realized he could now sell the house, and even in a hasty sale it would bring far more than the hospital and the burial expenses. It was a sound house, and the location was convenient to the downtown area. He would come out of it with a profit, and it would no longer be necessary for him to send the $2400 a year to her. It was a despicable and degraded rejoicing that made him feel soiled, but he could not help himself. He mourned her. But mourning was stained by his awareness of being freed by her death from the nagging trap he was in.

Ginny had met Geraldine Davis on previous visits, and it seemed to Ben that Geraldine seemed more friendly toward Ginny than toward him. But when Ben and Ginny were alone later, Ginny said, "I don't think we're the most popular people who ever stayed here, darling."

"I was born in this house and I swear she makes me feel like an interloper."

"The poor thing is probably worried sick about what she'll do now. You can't blame her, you know."

"That must be it," he said.

The service at the church was well attended. The Weldons were an old family. The great majority of the people at the church were elderly. There was the traditional ceremony at the grave, and then Ben and Ginny rode back into town in the limousine provided by the funeral director. There were no words with which Ben could tell Ginny how necessary it was to have her beside him.

They were back in town at two o'clock, and Ben had the driver let them out in front of the old office building that housed the offices of Gebbert and Malone. Old Willis Gebbert had been a friend of his father, and had handled what small legal business the family had had for sixty years. He had made the appointment earlier. Judge Gebbert had been at the church, and Ben had pointed him out to Ginny. "Must be ninety and still practicing," he whispered.

The old-fashioned office was full of dark, heavy furniture and it smelled like dust and medicine.

Ben introduced Ginny to the judge and he was courtly with her. His hair was wispy white, his blue eyes watery, his head in a constant visible tremor, brown spots on the backs of his large white hands. But his voice had not lost its deepness and resonance.

"A sad thing," Judge Gebbert said. "She was a wonderful woman. She made Sam Weldon a wonderful wife, Benjamin."

"I appreciate your saying that, sir. We're going to have to leave today and get back to the children and the job. I was wondering if you'd take on a last chore for the Weldon clan. I'd like to give you a power of attorney to sell that house for me and pay off the medical and funeral expenses—I can have the bills sent directly here—and remit the balance to me."

Judge Gebbert coughed in a slightly artificial way and stared out the window for a few moments, then sighed and said, "Nobody can say Martha wasn't in her right mind, and nobody can say her mind wasn't made up. She came in here almost two years ago, son, and I made up a will for her. Geraldine Davis gets the house and furniture and the money in her savings account, and you get the right to go over the house and take any personal stuff you might want to keep. Want to look at my copy of it, Benjamin? I can get it in no time at all."

"No. Don't bother. I'm sure it's just as you describe it, judge." His mouth felt dry and he felt far away, as though he were dreaming all this.

"She said to me you were doing so good you wouldn't need it, and if anything happened to her, Geraldine'd have no place to lay her head, no kin and no money, and by making out the will that way, she could stop fretting about it. It was going to be a secret, but she told Geraldine about it all later on so Geraldine wouldn't worry either—you know the way your mother was, son."

"Judge, how about the . . . bills?"

Judge Gebbert looked at him with a slight frown. "I guess you can do that much, can't you? I don't know who else would be responsible."

"Thank you for your time, judge," he said, getting up.

"Geraldine talked to me on the phone just before you came here. Seemed to know you were coming. Asked me about occupancy. I told her she's in her legal rights to stay right here, and it'll go through Probate Court with no trouble at all." He gave an astonishingly vital baritone laugh. "If after all these years I can't draw a will, I better get out of the law business."

They walked the six blocks to the house. There was a faint rumor of spring in the air. Ginny held his arm.

"Darling," she said gently, "we're jinxed. If molten gold was coming down, we'd be out there with sieves, wouldn't we?"

"Don't make with the gallant little jokes. Not now, please."

And at the tone of his voice she took her hand away and walked beside him, half looking away, tears standing bright on her lower lids.

They were on the porch of the house before Ben noticed the new sign in the window. Room for Rent. The door was locked. As he got out the spare key the door swung open and Geraldine stuck her hand out, palm up, and said, "I'll take that key!"

He put it on the narrow wrinkled palm and stared at her. She stared back with a satisfied malevolence. "You don't have to come in further than this front hall either. This place is mine, all legal, and you aren't welcome here, you nor your blond wife either, Ben Weldon."

"What's the matter with you, Mrs. Davis?" Ginny demanded.

"Right here is your suitcases, all packed neat. And here's this big wood crate with everything personal packed right in it, so you don't have to go through my house poking around. I saved you the trouble, I did."

"Why are you acting like this?" Ben demanded.

"Martha—God rest her soul—loved you, but I certainly got no call to. You'd go flying all over the country like a king, and you wouldn't come near her. She wouldn't see her grandchildren from one year to the next. Oh, I know how lonely she was. But you didn't care, neither one of you. Send a little money, that's all you had to do. So little you didn't miss it at all, and you thought you were doing something big. I've been waiting years to tell you off, Ben Weldon. And right now you can get out of this hall and off my land. What do you want done with the box of stuff?"

"You don't understand ——" Ginny said.

But Ben said. "Never mind, honey. Send the box railway express."

"Collect," Geraldine said firmly.

"Collect," Ben said and picked up the suitcases. They walked out onto the porch and she slammed the door.

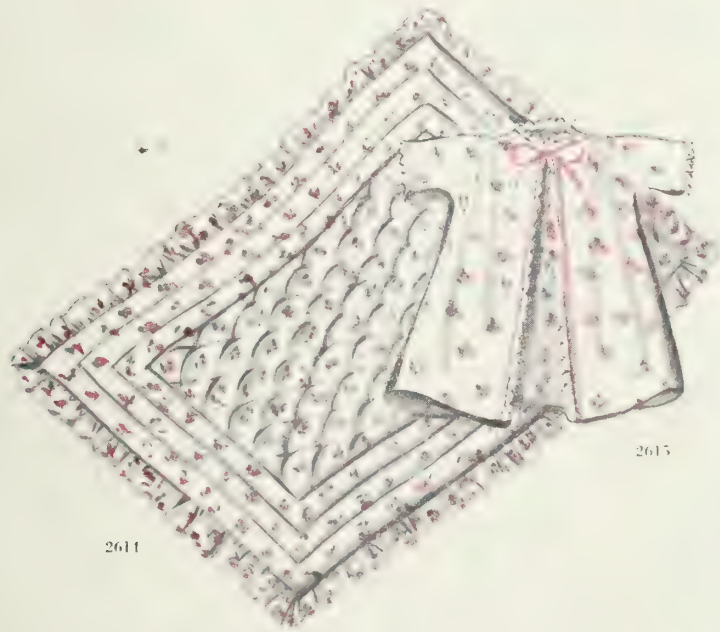
As they walked down the street Ginny looked back and saw her peering at them from the living-room window. She seemed to be grinning, but she was behind the curtains and Ginny could not be certain.

When all the bills were in, Ben totaled them. They came to $3212.50. There was no hospitalization. The expenses of death are not deductible items for tax purposes. He would be able to claim her as a dependent for the year, and that was all.

This was the final rock that stove the hull of the small boat. He phoned the Lawton National Bank from his office and got Mr. Lathrop Hyde on the line. After he had identified himself, he said he could arrange to come in Monday morning at ten when the bank opened and discuss his note. Hyde had him hold the line while the folder was brought to him

"Right now, Mr. Weldon it's sixteen hundred balance due on a hundred-and-eighty-day note, and the due date is—h'm-m-m-m—next Wednesday. Now I wouldn't want to have to tell my loan committee I'd put through another extension on this note, Mr. Weldon."

"I could pay it off with the proceeds of a new note, couldn't I?"



"Well now, we'd have to see about that."

"That's what I want to discuss with you on Monday, Mr. Hyde."

"Tell you what. You bring in an up-to-date personal balance sheet, Mr. Weldon. And bring your wife along."

"It hasn't been necessary in the past to ——"

"But I've always taken the notes and she's signed them at ——"

"You just bring her along, and I'll be looking for you at ten o'clock sharp, Mr. Weldon."

When Ben and Ginny entered the bank on Monday morning, Ben had with him a personal balance sheet on which he had expended great care. It expressed his equity in the house based on current values, and his equity in the car based on purchase price. It included the $9000 in the retirement account. It assigned what he hoped was not too florid an evaluation of household furnishings and equipment. He had managed to squeeze out a net worth of $26,000 before current debts, and it gave him a certain amount of dubious assurance.

Mr. Lathrop Hyde's desk was planted out in the open, against the back wall of the upholstered bullpen adjoining the customer floor of the building. Mr. Hyde greeted them and seated them courteously enough. He was perhaps sixty, long and solid in the torso, with gray hair worn long on one side so that it could be combed across the bald area and pasted in place. He had a long, square-cornered, fleshy face, with odd spots of high color on the cheekbones, pebbly brown eyes and a very wide mouth with thin colorless lips. His habit of dress was incongruously tweedy and informal. He took an active, leadership interest in community affairs. He and Ben had served on quite a few of the same committees.

As Ben handed the balance sheet over, he noticed a folder with his name on the tab centered in the middle of Lathrop Hyde's blotter.

"Let's see what we have here, folks," Mr. Hyde said.

He studied each item on the brief statement with great care, checked the margin beside each one with a very small check made with a very hard pencil. He put it aside and let the silence grow until Ben had to say something and said, "Is that what you wanted from me?"

"I hoped it would look a little better, Mr. Weldon. You'd have a long wait getting that much for the house. Used furniture and equipment—especially in a house where there's children—isn't worth listing. And if you check the blue book, you'll find you have no equity in that car at all. There isn't enough equity in the house to allow a sound second mortgage. I guess I didn't find what I was looking for."

"What were you looking for, Mr. Hyde?" Ginny asked sweetly.

"Security, Mrs. Weldon. Security."

"So are we," she said.

"What? Oh, I mean ample legal security on which we can loan money, Mrs. Weldon. There's no fat left in those insurance policies. You own no securities. And you certainly have a substantial amount of current bills to pay."

"Nearly all of that is because of my mother's recent death," Ben said.

"I heard about that. May I extend my sympathies."

"Thanks. If I can't renew my note when it comes due day after tomorrow, Mr. Hyde, I'd like to borrow five thousand. I'd use sixteen hundred to retire the note, and pay off the balance of those bills."

"A hundred-and-eighty-day note?" Hyde asked mildly.

"Yes."

"And how would you expect to pay it back?"

"I've been sending my mother two hundred dollars a month, Mr. Hyde. That will no longer be necessary. I can pay the two hundred on the note instead."

"Which in one hundred eighty days would be twelve hundred dollars. It is against the law, Mr. Weldon, for us to loan money on an open note when we see little expectation of its being paid back within the stated time. A fully secured note is a different thing, of course. I'm sorry, Mr. Weldon."

"Do you think I'm a bad risk?"

Mr. Hyde frowned slightly. "That's an unfortunate expression, but since you used it, I'll answer you frankly. Yes."

"But ——"

"Just a moment, Mr. Weldon. We are tightening our policy as far as you people are concerned. You bright young men who work in the city are very persuasive, you know. And we—uh—less sophisticated types are apt to be a little too awed by the salaries you are paid. And so, without realizing it until recently, we've let ourselves get into an unhealthy position on open notes to you brisk, successful young gentlemen. You make big incomes, but you live up to them and beyond them. Thrift seems to have become a dirty word nowadays. Personally, I am inclined to think of all this, on old-fashioned grounds, as a lack of character."

Ben glanced at Ginny and saw she was white with anger.

"Mr. Hyde," he said, "you seem to be moralizing."

"Perhaps I am. You people dismay me in a way. You're all house-poor, car-poor, club-poor, party-poor. You seem to try to be proving to each other that you can live on one and a half times your income. At our expense. We have too many renewals. We've been loaning money on promises too slender. One little recession, Mr. Weldon, would shake most of you out of the fragile limbs of your tall trees, and the Lawton National Bank would be holding the bag. And all of you would be without assets or resources. We owe our own shareholders better judgment in these matters." He smiled broadly for the first time. "It would be such a shame if the party suddenly ended for all of you."

"I resent being classified as having . . . this lack of character you mention," Ben said thickly.

Hyde tapped the balance sheet lightly. "Haven't you done the classifying yourself, my dear boy? Right here. You make nearly twenty-five thousand a year and, except for this retirement-account money, which was taken apparently before you could see it, you haven't a dime. What am I supposed to think?"

Ben controlled himself with an effort. "I respect your obligation to your stockholders in the bank. But please don't moralize about situations you don't understand."

"Oh, but I have an intimate understanding of them, Mr. Weldon. Through supplicants such as yourself."

"What can you do for me?"

"I can give you a ninety-day extension on this outstanding balance, and I must ask you to pay the interest up to date on the due date. I can assure you that there will not be another renewal. Why don't you borrow from your retirement account, Mr. Weldon? Isn't that permitted? It usually is in most companies."

"That's my problem," Ben said, standing. "Mail me the renewal agreement. Come on, Ginny."

"Your attitude isn't going to make future relationships any easier, Mr. Weldon."

"It is my deepest wish, Mr. Hyde, that there will be no future relationships of any kind."

Hyde smiled once more. "It's perhaps for the best. After all, you could have the sincerest desire in the world to pay us that . . . unobligated two hundred a month, but you people have so many unexpected social obligations."

Ginny was standing. She leaned toward the desk. "They keep saying banks are friendly. They keep saying bankers are nice. You're a monster, Mr. Hyde. It's not what you do, it's the way you do it."

Hyde chuckled, almost fondly, as they left his desk. They could not reach him. Nothing could reach him, nothing they could do.

Ginny was crying by the time they reached the car. He drove to the station. As he got out she was snuffling, but trying to smile. "I guess we know what we are now," she said.

"He made me bring you along so he could sink the knife a little deeper. That's the thing I resent most."

"But what are we going to do, Ben?"

"I'll talk to you tonight."

By the time he got home he had worked out a program for handling this new problem. It seemed to be the only answer, but it depressed him to think about it. It wasn't brought up until Ginny had finished the dinner dishes and the kids were in bed.

Ginny came into the living room and sat in the corner of the couch and pulled her legs up. The floor lamp behind her made her fair hair luminous and left her face in partial shadow.

She faced Ben, who sat making a protective ceremony of stoking his pipe, lighting it evenly.

There was a quality of expectancy in the silence between them, the product of their separate awareness that this was, at long last, the time of showdown, the obligatory scene that was a product of far too many months of this big, abundant and wretched life.

"What are you going to do, Ben?" she asked.

He noticed it was "you," not "we." He said, "There aren't any miracles, honey."

"But we have to do something!"

"I know that. Two round trips to Indiana. That's top priority. When the air-travel bill comes in, I have to come up with the money fast I'll guess between five and six hundred. We haven't got it. There's nobody I dare borrow from. But I did some very discreet checking, and I'm pretty sure I can get six hundred from a loan company They'll take a chattel mortgage on the furniture, and they'll do no checking on me that will be so obvious anybody will be able to guess. With their service charges, it will come to about thirteen per cent interest. I can get it right after the first of the month, so the twelve payments of fifty-something a month will start the first of May."

"And we'll just owe more money," she said in a dead voice.

"We'll have the two hundred I won't be sending mother starting April first. I'll write the hospital and the doctor and the funeral home and send them each a small payment out of that two hundred as a gesture of good faith, and explain that I'll have to pay them off that way, a certain amount each month. And I'll make a payment on the bank loan out of that two hundred too. I don't think those people in Columbus will raise a fuss. They must be used to this sort of thing."

"So it's your idea to do it all out of the two hundred each month. So we shall be living exactly the same as if we were sending it to your mother. How long will it take? Just tell me how long it will take if nothing happens."

"Including the bank loan, and interest and all . . . call it two years. A little over."

"Two delicious years if nothing happens. And something will, so it'll be longer. Believe me, it will be longer. I wanted a miracle, Ben. I didn't want more of the same. You know the miracle I wanted? I wanted you to march up to whoever you march up to down there and draw out that whole nine thousand dollars sitting there, and tell them you were taking it because you need it. But that's too big a miracle to hope for."

"You don't under——"

"When will you get a raise, darling?"

"I've told you how ——"

"Tell me again. I want to hear it again."

"There's practically no chance of a raise until Bartlett retires. Where I am, the money goes with the job. I'm slated to take over Bartlett's slot. There'll probably be small upward adjustments, but nothing to get healthy on. He's fifty-eight. He's got seven years."

"And what will you get when you take his job, darling?"

"I believe he gets about fifty-five, with a bonus between fifteen and twenty, and a small share in the stock-option plan. I expect I'd get fifty and a bonus of twelve to fifteen, assuming we're running as far in the black as we are now."

"Fifty thousand dollars," she said with a quiet bitterness. "Oh, whee, oh, joy. You're going to be so terrifyingly important, and yet you can't borrow nine thousand dollars of your own money. Why is it? Just why? Explain it to me."

He rose and took slow steps toward the fireplace and turned and stared at her for a thoughtful moment, planning his words. "I'll have to say this, Ginny, with no concession to modesty. I'm surprisingly good at what I'm doing. We deal with a lot of other corporations. I meet a lot of people. I'd say, and this is a pretentious thing for a man to say about himself, that there probably aren't over a hundred guys in my age range with the same potential I have in the whole country."

"Then why aren't we ——"

"Let me finish the explanation. It's what you asked for. Some of those guys have landed, by bad luck, in the wrong slots. Some of them have changed jobs too many times, always pressing for the immediate salary bump. And I don't think there are more than three or four in the whole batch who wouldn't change with me in one minute, salary and all."

She stared at him. "What!"

"I'm in the big big league, Ginny. And it's exactly where I should be. I'm watched every minute, because there's so much potential power at stake. It isn't just the officers and directors of National, honey. At the top of the pyramid in big business there's a group of men who know each other. It's become pretty well known that I'm the heir apparent. It'll be years before I'm in the kingbird's seat, but they know of me, and they're watching, too, and if there was any kind of shake-up at National that threatened to sidetrack me, they'd come in with the right offer."

"Why don't they now?"

"Because the kind of fool who would take it they don't want."

"So you can't take out the nine thousand that belongs to you and put it back later when you're making all this big money?"

He suddenly felt inexpressibly weary. He went back to his chair and sat down and said, "Just why do you think I can't ask for it?"

"Because you're supposed to be infallible about everything or they'll think you're not good enough for the top of their pyramid."

"I couldn't have said it more accurately. Apparently you do understand."

"I've listened. You listen."

"Of course, honey."

"I'm proud of you. Keep that in mind. I know you can do what they think you can. I can see how it can be pride with you too. But a woman has a different slant. I know you can do it. You know you can do it. So what are we proving and who are we proving it to by standing around in this . . . thin air?"

"What do you mean?"

"You seem to work harder all the time, and you get less kick out of it. You never come home any more just busting with triumph, Ben. The things we do together are all . . . obligations, carefully planned, never on impulse. I claw you for no reason. You snarl for no good reason. We live with these two kinds of pressure every waking minute—your job pressure, and this stupid, ludicrous thing of just barely being able to make ends meet on a salary most people in the country would consider real wealth."

From you my heart expects, each time his whistle blows.
I can't ignore him though I try.
Hope will not die

Because one day . . . who knows?

My good sense says you will not

Although my claim upon you is my own fidelity
And nothing more. Letters come daily to the door. . . .
But not for me.

bout it he glows like a lantern when he talks bout it."

"I should go to night school and learn how o fix refrigerators."

"Stop that, Ben. Please. All this is hurting ur marriage. You're honest enough to see hat. It's hurting the kids, this atmosphere of ontinual tension. I'm in favor of vast success nd golden years, I guess. But not at this price. mean that. Not at this price."

He looked at her for one long moment. Just what are you saying, Ginny? It has the ound of an ultimatum."

"What good is the golden future if you ruin e good things while waiting for it?"

"Other people are able to ——"

"This isn't other people. This is me. I can't ford the big leagues, Ben. Emotionally, I n't afford them. I'm sorry."

"What do you plan to do?"

"I don't want to hang around and watch hat we have left go the same way the rest of went. I better ask you the same thing. What you plan to do?"

"Live up to . . . my maximum potential."

"When every morsel of joy has gone out of and all you have left is pride? Is that ough?"

"It looks like it will have to be, honey."

"And you won't take the slightest risk of setting their . . . big fat opinion of the crown nce?"

"Not the slightest."

There was destruction in the long silence, d they looked away from each other. When e is twisted, a marriage can end, even ough love is still there. It needs only the rds of ultimatum to be said, and then the adful effects of pride.

The words were there, waiting to be said. Each of them believed the other one to be blindly selfish, and wondered that it had not been more evident up until now.

"We're both tired right now," Ben said gently, and so the words were not said. But the narrowness of it had frightened them both.

Ben Weldon could not sleep that night. He left the bedroom at two in the morning, so quietly that Ginny did not awaken. He made coffee, and he sat at the kitchen table. He went to the drawer where Ginny kept the cigarettes for their entertaining and opened a fresh pack. At dawn his mouth had a bitter taste, and half the pack was gone. He located the budget summary he had prepared for the interview with Semmins, and a copy of the balance sheet he had prepared for his meeting with Hyde.

He thought of many things, and he made a decision, but it gave him no feeling of relief. He sneaked back into bed a half hour before the alarm went off. When he came out to breakfast Ginny stared curiously at him and said, "You were up in the night?"

"For a little while."

"What did you do, smoke five cigarettes at a time?"

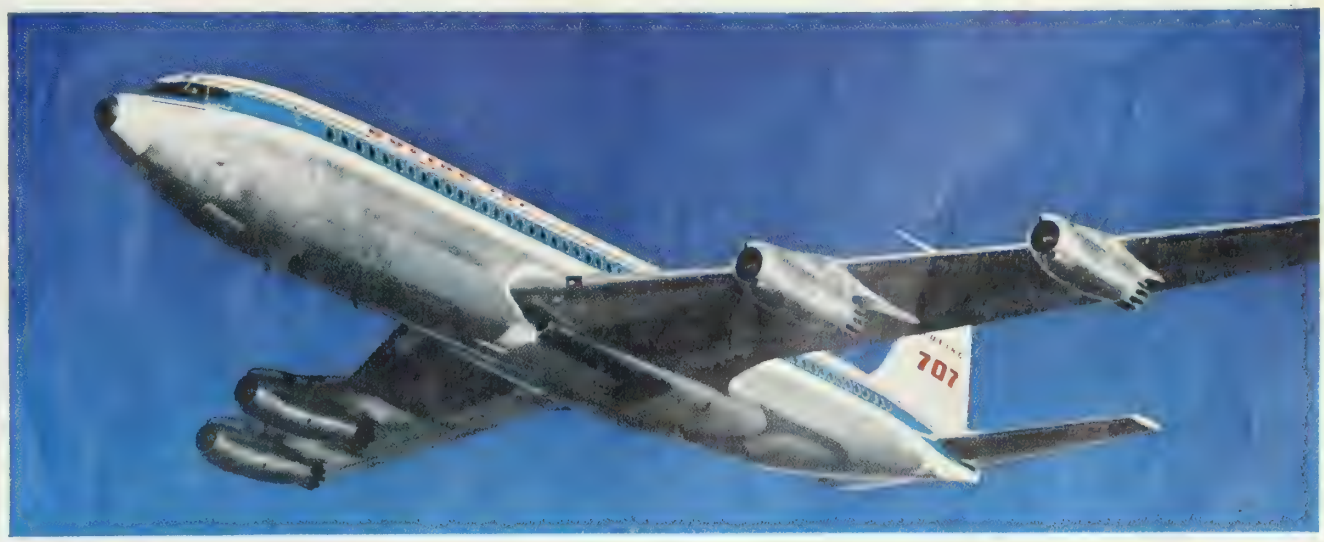
"Like a candelabra."

When she drove him down to the station they sat in the car waiting for the train to come into view up the tracks.

"It will rain later on," she said.

"I've got that other raincoat in the office."

"Ben . . . about last night."



"Yes, honey."

"You should know this. Even if you were willing to do it my way, it wouldn't be easy—I mean I'd always be wondering if you were thinking I'd . . . held you back." She gave a dry little laugh, and he saw where the morning light touched the little network of weather inkles at the corner of her blue blue eyes. Nothing is easy any more, I guess," she said. "Don't fret about it," he said. "Here comes d Unreliable." He kissed her and got on the in and rode down toward the cold arena.

Brendan Mallory had flown back from Lon- n the previous day, and so his schedule was l. But his secretary was able to give Ben an pointment at 4:40. It was a dreamlike day Ben Weldon. All day he had the feeling was standing a half step behind himself d off to one side, watching himself go rough the routines as one would watch a anger.

All day he kept thinking of alternative pos- ilities, some of them logical, some of them surd.

In his favorite alternative, Brendan Mallory uld look up from his study of the figures, eyes vivid with shock and concern, and , "Why, I had no idea we'd been forcing u into such a ghastly position, Ben! Why sn't somebody brought this to my atten- n before? This is absurdly unfair! It shall corrected immediately. A man carrying e load you're carrying these days shouldn't forced to endure this kind of personal xiety!"

In another scene, he had filled a gas tank d wiped the windshield and he was taking e money from the customer when the man oked at him intently and said, "Say, aren't u the Ben Weldon that used to be with ational?"

There was, of course, a background of hot n and sandy beach, and his brown children aying on the beach, with Ginny near them, refoot and splendid, and a boat anchored a dock.

"You're right, friend," he would say, "but got out of that ulcer trap. We didn't know at real living was until we came down here, end."

There was another that kept slipping into mind, making his stomach feel hollow. The rd would be passed around in some mys- ious way, and he would spend the sour, eated weeks and months sitting in waiting oms, filling out forms that would be filed ay and forgotten, and the men he talked to uld treat him with a brusque courtesy that not quite conceal their contempt for the t of man who would quit the team just ore the Series.

"Sit down, Ben. Sit down," Brendan Mal- y said in his light and casual voice. "Some- ng that has to come directly to the top, eh?" Ben knew that when Mallory learned of the uest for the appointment he would have cked with Bartlett, who would be just as ch in the dark as Mallory. So he was out- normal channels, and in National, when bypassed your immediate superior, you to be sure of your ground. He sensed ariness in Mallory. This was it, and it made he day's conjectures seem silly. It was an rt to grope for and remember his planned ning.

"This is a personal thing, Mr. Mallory. ess it's a request for advice."

"You know I'm ready to help in any way n, Ben."

"Before I ask for advice, I'd like to make general point, sir In many ways I've been o believe that I'm considered a valuable . It may be bad taste to bring it up this but can we assume it's true?"

"It's definitely true. Bringing you into the s picture was a pretty good clue as to we all think of you Ben."

"So if I am valuable, can I make the er assumption than an extra effort would ade to keep me happy, Mr. Mallory?"

Mallory reached for the small gold model of itary jet on his desk and gave it a quarter before answering. "That's such a hypo- al question, I can only give a hypotheti- nswer, Ben. We will do our best to treat fairly. Isn't it time we came to specifics?"

"Of course. I've come directly to you be- I know this is a policy question. It may d petty, but I'm asking you to look at the l implications of why I have to bring it can't live and support my family on what you're paying me. We have no other source of income. I have here our budget figures, and a personal balance sheet. We're in debt, with more probability of going further in debt than paying it off. I'd like you to look these over and ——"

Mallory, with a slightly pained expression, raised his hand and said, "Please, Ben. I don't want to pry into the personal details of your life. Statistically you're in the top five per cent incomewise."

"That's no comfort if it doesn't work out, sir."

"I don't want to bore you with reminis- cences, Ben, but Alice and I didn't have an easy time of it, believe me." He chuckled and shook his head. "The macaroni years, that's what Alice calls them. We had to watch every last penny, and sometimes it was a wearisome thing, but I can't say that it did us any harm. I think it did us a lot of good, as a matter of fact. It doesn't hurt anyone's character to be careful, Ben." He smiled and his voice became more confidential. "We both know it's harder on our wives than on us, those lean years. And sometimes a woman can force a man to make . . . a small error in judgment. You can tell Virginia that you made the old school try, and the man said not yet. And we'll both for- get this little chat."

"I can't let it drop, Mr. Mallory. That's the point I'm trying to make. If you'd look at the figures I ——"

"This isn't like you, Ben. It can't possibly be so serious. You have a beautiful home, handsome healthy children, a lovely wife. I can get a little angry when I think of the way you live now compared with the way Alice and I lived during the lean years. It's a sign of our times, I guess."

"What do you mean by that, Mr. Mallory?"

"Nobody is willing to wait any more. They have to have it now. You people all seem to want to live the abundant life before you earn the right to it."

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

It's spring; and fashionwise Mollie Farnham, our Barbara J., is ready for it! Not including her seasonless black-and-white silk dress from January, she counts up her investments as follows: From February, she has her polka-dot jacket dress—perfect for daytime or an informal evening ($24.95). By BET HART

To wear over everything— rain or shine— her bright blue jersey coat ($25.00).

In March she made a beige dress to wear for everyday ($4.60). The total in $'s is 54.55. The total in fashion is a wardrobe complete, with one exception—a special dress for:

For a light cover-up, Mollie wears her white sweater trimmed with turquoise (from December). She adds a turquoise belt for a change.

It's the kind of abundant life I'm living that I don't want. And I'm not scrimping for a cabin cruiser or a mink coat for Ginny or an airplane of my own, Mr. Mallory. I want to get out of debt because I feel degraded by being in debt when I make so much. But too much of what I make goes to keeping up the front you people demand of me. Let me unload that house and stop being a clubman and stop doing semibusiness entertaining I can't write off, and I can get out of the swamp."

"We pay you as much as we do, Weldon, because we expect you to live in that style."

"Then it isn't enough. Somebody should make a study of the suburban budget, Mr. Mallory. Too many of us are trapped."

"Trapped? By a need for economy? What kind of a trap is that?"

"We're not communicating, Mr. Mallory. I wouldn't have taken up your time if it wasn't important. I hoped this talk would go better than it's going. I've got to have thirty-five."

"You've got to have thirty-five thousand dollars a year!"

"If I'm to go on in the same job, and live on the same scale. I got that figure from an expert who did study my figures Mr. Mallory. The tax bite will be much larger, of course. But the difference will be enough for me to get out of hock and begin to save a little, build up an emergency fund, lay money away for the education of my kids."

"Ben, how many people are on your approximate level of pay in this building, in this home office?"

"As a quick guess, fifteen."

"Closer to twenty, I'm afraid. Though salaries are not supposed to be public knowledge, quite a few people work on payroll and on overhead-expense data. An eleven-thousand-five-hundred-dollar raise would not pass unnoticed. And it would be a source of discontent."

"Why should it be? If I am slated for bigger things, as you have hinted, why wouldn't it be considered merely a confirmation of those plans?"

"Traditionally the salary is matched to the job, not the man, until you become one of the top officers of the corporation. But is that all we're here for, Ben? Is that all National is—a money cow to be milked as often and strenuously as possible?"

"On the other hand, Mr. Mallory, should National have an irresponsible attitude toward the personal problems of its junior executives?"

"That's a rather large word, Ben."

"It wasn't said hastily. To maintain the façade of my existence I'll have to get that thirty-five, sir. Somewhere."

It was that final deadly word, with its implications of disloyalty, that immediately changed the atmosphere in Mallory's office. Ben had vowed not to bring that factor into the discussion. It would be there but only by implication. But he had been pushed into the position of saying it, and things would not be the same again.

Mallory studied him for a moment. Ben had the feeling that Mallory had put a small strong hand against Ben's chest and walked him backward and, with a final push, had then slammed and bolted a big door, and now looked at him through an armored peephole.

Or, in a more fitting analogy, two ships had hove to, side by side, exchanging cautious messages, until suddenly one had run up its battle flags opened the gun ports and cleared the decks for action.

"We certainly don't want to lose you, Ben," Mallory said heartily. "You belong in the National family." He had watched Mallory in action too many times not to see that this was the Mallory attitude toward all outsiders. Cordial almost to the point of being effusive, the eyes clear and friendly, the smile correct to the final millimeter of spread.

"Thank you, sir."

Mallory came around the desk as Ben stood up. He put his hand out and Ben took it. "I recognize your problem, Ben, and I'm glad you brought it to me, and you can be assured I'll do my very best to find a solution. I'll be in touch with you as soon as we can come up with something."

"Thank you, Mr. Mallory."

There was no escort to the office door, no light touch on the shoulder. Ben went back down to his floor, his office, his desk. He sat down and looked out the glass wall at the beginning of the rain. Everything is so gentle and serene here, he thought. They don't ride you, would Mr. Mallory and give you a swing and boom! you're out on Lexington Avenue. But somehow it isn't exactly the same.

A few moments later he called Gearling, the treasurer, and asked to borrow the balance in his retirement account.

"You . . . want to take it out, Ben?" Gearling asked.

"It's permitted, isn't it?"

"Of course! Of course! The—uh—whole amount?"

"Yes."

"How soon do you want it?"

"As soon as you can get it, Edward."

"It has to clear through the trust account that handles the retirement fund, Ben. Three days?"

"That'll be fine. Thanks."

"When will you—uh—put it back in, Ben?"

"Sometime before I retire, Edward. I guess I'd have to, or it would mess up my retirement, wouldn't it?"

SONNET FOR A RELUCTANT SUITOR

By BARBARA SHOOK HAZEN

He will not be too deep in love;
no fears.
No fretting will disturb his sleeping hours.
His dreams will be as tuneless as the spheres.
Nor will he weep for bright but bended flowers.
He will not walk too careless,
will not care
For fallen leaves, for frail and fragile things.
He will not brave the burning summer air.
He will not know the anguished burst of wings.

But oh, he must beware,
beneath soft suns
And silken ways the sudden tiger runs.
Deeply in the forests of the night,
He moves on pads of silence and delight
To shatter with one glance the darkling dove
Who was afraid to be too deep in love.

Gearling suspected that Ben was making a joke, so he laughed in a slightly hollow and uncomfortable way.

That evening Ben told Ginny what he had done. He wanted to see her happy. He wanted to see her eyes shine. He wanted to get at least that much out of it, the way they give the big loser a free taxi ride home. But she stared at him, her eyes round in shock, and then her face came apart like a small child readying itself for tears, and she fled to the bedroom.

Ten days later Bartlett phoned and asked Ben to come to his office. It had been a curious ten days. There had been a subtle yet obvious change in attitude toward him. He learned indirectly of a policy memo that had not been routed to his desk, and suspected there had been others. Men who had been stiff and rather formal with him in the past were now relaxed and quite friendly in his presence. Those who had sought him out now seemed to avoid him. Bartlett was taking an unusual interest in the details of matters he had previously left entirely up to Ben.

When he walked into Bartlett's office he was not surprised to see Brendan Mallory there, or see his open friendly smile.

"Sit down, Ben. Sit down," Mallory said. "Ed and I have been up one side of this and down the other, and I think we've come up with something that will solve your special problem." There was an ironic emphasis on the world "special."

"I'm glad to hear that sir."

"You're too good a man to lose, Ben. We're quick to admit that, believe me. Gil Walker sent in a formal request for early retirement for reasons of health, and we've been sitting on it, wondering who to put in out there. That's Southwest District, out of Denver, you know."

"Yes, I know."

"With all respect to Gil Walker, Ben, that district does need the kind of talent you can bring to the job. It's a good place to live, I hear. And, traditionally, the district managers do better, salarywise, than a lot of us slaves in the home office."

"I've heard about that, sir."

"From the way it looks, Ben, you ought to make about thirty-two or thirty-three at the beginning, and if you can build it up as I'm sure you can, it could peak at forty in a very short time. So it's quite a handsome promotion, and it seems to Ed and me to be a good solution all around. And it certainly won't hurt your future value to the corporation to have a few years of running a district on your record."

It's so neat, Ben thought admiringly. You bring the outstanding young men out of the districts into the home office, the way you brought me in, but you never, never bring a district manager to New York. There's good reason. He's acquired an incurably regional point of view. The pay is good because it has to be good, because it is just as high and far as the man can go with National. So you sit out there and you do one gutsy job of following the instructions from the home office, and it is, in a sense, a demanding job, but you never get your fingers into policy. It's a handsome promotion if you think just about the money. But all of a sudden they've dropped the barricade across your highway, and you know just how long the road is. You can move to a bigger district—at their request—and that is all. You'll be the youngest district manager in National. And ten years from now you'll be of average age for district managers, and eventually you'll retire to a little better than reasonable comfort. You can do the job. It's no snap job. It'll take diligence and concentration and good judgment. But there will be no opportunity to exercise that rare executive muscle which creates brand-new plans, programs, policies and attitudes. It will use all the rest of you, but not that.

So look at us as we sit here, full of face-saving devices and fabrications. Theirs is a salvage operation. They have decided they were wrong in believing they had a machine which would push new roads through the wilderness. But the same machine can be very useful keeping old roads in repair. It is uneconomic to scrap it. So grease it well and put it to work.

The other choice is to resign here and now and get into another outfit where the road to the top level will not be so neatly blocked. But would not that run us into the same thing?

He realized they were looking at him and had been for a few moments too long, but they both wore expressions of polite attentiveness, and the pleased look of men who have found a way to do a seemingly generous thing. They had beribboned the gift with the fictitious hint that he could and would return here after running a district. It could not happen.

"I'm pleased you think I can handle the job, sir." We all know very damn well I can handle it, don't we?

"Done and done," Mallory said with satisfaction, moving in quickly for the handshake. "I can speak for Ed, too, when I say we're both very pleased at the way we've been able to work this thing out."

"Now it's decided, Ben," Ed Bartlett said, "there's no point in dragging our feet. Suppose you get cleaned up here by the end of the week and report out there Monday."

"For a quick look," Mallory said hastily, "then fly on back and take care of personal matters and then take your time driving your family out there. See something of the country. I'm sure that will be all right with Gil."

The three men were standing. They smiled at one another. They were all members of the National family, and when these little family problems came up, you made a practice of handling them in a warm, human, co-operative way.

Ben Weldon spent a week in Denver. Gil Walker was delighted that Ben was taking over the district. Gil talked a great deal about the benefits of being a district manager, of being the top dog in the area. He was proud of his staff of sixty-two. The staff seemed competent, pleasant, and as wary of Ben as he expected them to be.

Gil steered Ben to a good real-estate agent who found a house that seemed nearly perfect, at less than he had expected to pay. He told Ginny all about it over the phone. She sounded ecstatic at the description, and told him to nail it down fast—the same advice given him by the agent.

He made the deposit. He was taking an evening flight back, leaving at ten o'clock, Friday night. He had checked out of the hotel. After dinner alone he had time to kill, and so he drove the rental car out to the house where they would live.

It was a very cold night, and the stars were vivid. He parked in the driveway and walked slowly around to the back of the house and sat on the low wall that enclosed the open patio. He smoked the cigarettes that he could afford, and he wore a new sports jacket, new flannel slacks, a new topcoat. He looked at the long slant of the land he would own, and he wondered if he had done it all as well as he could do it. He knew it was a question that could not be resolved, one that he would ask himself, probably, for the rest of his life.

On the evening of the day he had accepted the new job, he had gone home with two bottles of champagne. He beamed at his Ginny and presented her with the champagne. She stared at him in blank confusion. He took the champagne out of her hands and kissed her with splendid emphasis and resounding duration.

When he released her, gasping, she said, "What is this all about?"

"It is because you are a woman of rare perception and intelligence. And if I have your solemn promise never to gloat, I'll tell you it is because you were entirely right, and I was dead wrong, darling."

"About the job?"

"What else, pray? I just got bumped ten thousand, baby."

"Ben! I don't know what to say! How incredibly wonderful!"

"And we're going to live one mile in the air, woman. You are standing in the presence of the brand-new district manager, Southwest District, headquarters in Denver." Even as he beamed at her proudly, he was watching her closely. It was the critical moment.

He saw the doubts go out of her eyes. "Then champagne is exactly the right thing, isn't it?" she said.

"Please chill it immediately. And jump when I give an order. I expect more respect around here from now on."

Woman is wanted to be soft and to represent the soft side of life, but softness is part of the formlessness for which she is blamed. She cannot well be one without the other. She has needed to be excessively adaptable so that wherever her husband went she could happily follow; yet she could not possibly do this if she were not somewhat formless. She is told what her role is by nature and society, and then she is belittled if this role necessitates her having certain qualities.

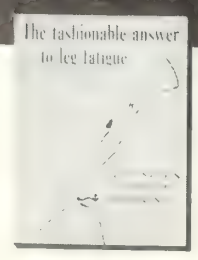
"Lord and master," she said, smiling, and came into his arms again.

He held the flame of his lighter to read his watch. Another ten minutes and it would be time to start to the airport. You did what you felt you had to do, and when it was done, you lived with it.

They could be content here, secure and happy. Things might become as good as they had once been, before insecurity began to corrode their contentment.



But he knew, and he would always know, that he had once climbed to a high and lonely place, that with the climbing irons and the ropes he had reached the last sheer drop before the summit. He had swung there in the frosty gale until finally, too numbed to make the final effort, he had climbed back down the way he had come, back down to a niche where he could be warm and safe and out of the wind.

He knew he would read and hear about the ones who made it all the way to the high peaks. The lower slopes of the mountains were warm and easy, and the trails were marked. The high places were dangerous. He knew how close he had come, and he could read about the others who had made it. Their powers and their decisions would affect him. And all his life he would wonder just how it felt to be up there.

He stood up and snapped his cigarette into the night and walked back to the car. As he got behind the wheel he found himself wondering if it was a happy ending. He smiled with derision at himself as that ancient phrase came into his mind. Happy endings were reserved for stories for children. An adult concerned himself with feasible endings. And the one was feasible as an ending or as a beginning. You had to put your own puzzle together, and nobody would ever come along to tell you how well or how poorly you had done.

LUCK OF THE DRAW

still with us she would look after you better than I can."

I knew if my dear aunt had been still with us she would have said, "If your face is your fortune, my poor Liz——"

Uncle Jack was always very kind. "Poor kid, I'm afraid you've had bad luck," he said.

Looking back on it, I have often thought how queer it is the way all my good luck came from shocking bad luck.

Uncle Jack said at breakfast one day, "Some new people are coming, I hear, to Copse Cottage." And that very afternoon, when I was gardening, and looking a pretty mess because it's a clay soil, a taxi stopped and a long thin man got out and asked me the way there.

"That would be the Wilberforces," said Uncle Jack afterward. "There are three of them. Major Wilberforce and his wife, and a brother. They have had appalling bad luck. They had a beautiful farm in Kenya, but their servants turned out to be scoundrels and attacked them. Major Wilberforce got stabbed with a panga and badly hurt."

They had sold out and come to England, with very little money. Major Wilberforce had got over his panga wound quite nicely. "Though it didn't exactly do him any good," said Mrs. Wilberforce. They were the gayest couple I had ever met, in spite of their misfortunes. Copse Cottage had very little to recommend it and no modern conveniences, but Lorna Wilberforce just laughed about them. You never remembered if she was plain or pretty, or what age she was. When you were with her, you just had fun and a good time.

Major Wilberforce was a large man, the kind who throws a lot of shadow. He mostly just sat and twiddled his thumbs. He didn't say very much, but what he did say was always kind of amusing and interesting, though I never did know when he was serious or when he was pulling my leg.

I had my eighteenth birthday, and Uncle Jack bought a secondhand car. "It will be an economy in the long run," he said. "You can drive me to and from the station and save taxi hire. And it will get you out and about a bit. You sit at home too much."

I hadn't talked to anyone about my book, but I found myself telling Lorna. She was a person you did tell things to. She was delighted and said, "How splendid. I would love to have been a writer, only I never could think of anything to say. You may make a great deal of money, dear."

"The worse you write, the more you'll make," said Major Wilberforce. "Look at poor Tony. He's a writer, but his books are so intelligent no one can understand them. What's your subject?"

I said, "Well, it's love."

Major Wilberforce nodded solemnly. "You're on a good wicket," he said. "Love never fails."

Lorna was going through a pile of letters on her desk.

"Sad," she said. "Mrs. Chessington has asked us to lunch, but we'll have to refuse. It's too far to walk. I must say I miss our car, though it's heaven having no petrol bills to pay."

I had just passed my test. I said, "I'd love to drive you—if you'd risk it?"

"My dear, how delightful. Could you? The three of us? How nice that you are going too."

I said, "Well, I'm not asked to lunch, but I'd love to take you there."

That night Mrs. Chessington rang me up on the telephone. "I wonder if you are free, and could lunch with us on Thursday," she said. I was free Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday—but I did not tell her that. I said I would love to.

"And I hear you will very kindly pick up the Wilberforces."

When I picked them up, I discovered the tall thin man who had asked me the way was Major Wilberforce's brother Tony.

"Meet Liz," said Lorna gaily. "She's writing a book too."

Tony, I thought, looked depressed.

I sat next him at lunch, which was wonderful—eggs in little pots, and casserole, and the most beautiful ice cream. On my other side was a terribly handsome young man. As Tony talked all the time to the girl on his other side, a lovely blonde, I had to talk to the other young man.

"I'm afraid you have got rather a dull partner," I told him, "because I do not lunch out much."

He narrowed his eyes and looked at me. He had rather long hair which he kept sweeping back with his hand.

"I'm shy," I said, "and I don't get asked."

"You don't make the most of yourself," he said. "You are beautiful in a contemporary fashion. The rather wide mouth and wide-spaced eyes. And all the right proportions."

I said, astonished, "Me?"

"That hairdo of course does nothing for you. All those ragged ends. Terrible. You should sweep it back and brush it till it shines. Then tie it back very neat and sleek. A pony tail if you have to, but personally I would prefer a bun."

"Are you . . . a hairdresser?"

He laughed very loud. "No. I'm an artist. I am painting Mrs. Chessington's portrait, but I could do a much better one of you. Use a little eye shadow and a good strong lipstick. Emphasize good points and forget the rest."

"Uncle Jack would have a fit!"

"Nonsense. He will never notice. Your uncle is a solicitor. He will have other matters on his mind. I hope we shall meet again."

"Oh, I don't think we shall," I said. "I only got asked here today to give a lift to the Wilberforces. They haven't a car."

"Splendid—that solves my problem. Lunch with me at my studio next Thursday. It's the windmill up on the hill. And bring the Wilberforces, who are coming also."

Just before the end of lunch Tony turned and said I had been neglecting him. He asked about my book and what it was about, so I said, "Love."

He grinned and said, "Fine. Something you know nothing whatever about, so it will have a fresh and enchanting charm all its own."

"You are quite wrong saying I know nothing about it," I told him. For some reason, perhaps because we were both writers, I wasn't shy with him. "I have been in love with someone or other ever since I was fourteen."

He looked startled.

"It started," I told him, "with a sheep and went on to various sorts of people."

He said solemnly, "I shall certainly buy your book, if you'll promise to buy mine."

"What is yours about?" I asked him.

"The secrets of outer space," he said.

"So that's why you are rather gloomy," I said, sorry for him. It sounded a subject bound not to sell very well.

"Am I gloomy?"

"You aren't as cheerful as your brother."

"No one is as cheerful as my brother, but then I haven't had his advantages. I am not married to Lorna. And I never got stabbed in the middle by a panga."

I said, "Lorna is the most wonderful person I have ever met."

Everybody else thought so too. That was what started me off on my successful social life. Everybody wanted Lorna and the ma at their parties. I had to buy an engagem book and jot down dates. I got asked to to dinners and lunches, and cocktail part mostly by telephone, and it always ended same way:

"Would you mind picking up the Wilt forces?"

It was the most wonderful summer I e had.

I did what Graham Prince told me to bought some lipstick, and brushed my h back and really, once I got used to the sho I had to admit I did not look any worse.

"When I've finished Mrs. Chessington, going to paint you," Graham told me.

His lunch party was wonderful. We smoked salmon—I thought at first it was tasting a bit fishy—and then we had bi meat and mushrooms and things stuck skewers and grilled, and then we had cream. I tried the meat on skewers on U Jack next day, but he said, "No, thank y None of this fancywork for me. I like to what I'm eating," which explains why Eng cooking is so dull.

One day Uncle Jack said suddenly at bre fast, "I like that chap Tony. He's a good low. Moreover, I hear he's one of our n brilliant scientists. Pity that blond wor Mrs. Babbington is making such a dead at him."

I had noticed that she had taken to con along with us quite a bit, but it hadn't str me until that moment just why it might b

Uncle Jack said morosely, "Widows artful, and men are fools." And as he solicitor I expect he knows. He looked at over his paper. "You need some new clot Liz. Here, take this, and buy yourself so thing pretty and not too serviceable." seemed about to say more, but changed mind, and gave me twenty pounds and parted. Up till that time I don't think I ever had twenty shillings that wasn't hea earmarked for something absolutely essen

Graham rang me next morning. "W about dine and dance at the Golden H phin?"

It was the most glamorous place we and I said I'd love to. "And what time sh pick up the Wilberforces?"

"You won't," he said. "It's thee and r

The dinner was beautiful. I had soup, something or other, and an ice, and ther danced. I wished I could do it like Mrs. bington. I wondered they had managed to get there without give them a lift, and why Lorna and the m hadn't come too.

Graham said, "Let's go. It's a lovely n I'll tool you round a bit."

Well, me being the sort of dancer I a was not surprised. He put down the to his car, and we drove through the lanes i moonlight, which was nice, but then, denly, he stopped.

"Really," I said.

But instead of being put in his place, he me at me again. This time I turned enough o I could still breathe out of one side of my se. "I want to go home," I said.

"Do you want to drive a man mad?"

I said no, I only wanted to drive him off. He felt for a cigarette and I took advantage that free moment to jump and run for it. I eard him fumbling round among the bushes oking for me, and mercifully the moon was n my side for a moment and went indoors ehind a cloud.

suddenly wanted to cry. It had been a astly evening from start to finish.

When a car drove up and stopped so did my art. I was about to run when a man called y name, and I found it was Tony Wilberrce. The relief was so awful I did begin cry.

"What the ——" he said, and jumped out d came round to me. "What on earth are u doing out alone at this time of night?"

"Never mind," I gulped. "I want to go me."

"Home you shall go." He gave me one long k and packed me in the front seat. "There's nankie in my left pocket if you need one. dn't you have a nice party?"

I said, "No. I had a beastly party. I don't e going to places without the Wilberforces."

He said gloomily, "I had a beastly party ."

"He wanted to teach me about love," I said, d it came out with one of those awful snorts t sometimes get the better of one, "and I n't want to learn."

"Good for you," he said. "Stick to the lberforces."

I nodded. "I will."

I quite forgot to ask him what he had done h Mrs. Babbington. Perhaps he had offered each her about love, and somewhere in the l moonlight she, too, was walking home.

Graham let his windmill rather suddenly, way artists do things, to a man who ted to learn the bagpipes and felt he had do it far from home. Lorna and Major berforce now had an enormous circle of nds stretching over two counties, for everyone who met them thought they must meet n again. I did not expect to get asked to thing while they were away staying with na's mother in Chester, but I found I was usy as ever, because Tony had remained nd, and was always needing a lift.

We were passing Graham's windmill one on our way back from a positively smashlunch—oysters, and something done in y, and ice cream—and I said thankfully: sn't it nice that he doesn't live there any er?"

"At one time I thought you liked him. I thought he was your serious beau."

"I'd never seen him before that first lunch party I drove you all to, though of course I am grateful to him for telling me about lipstick and how to do my hair. Nobody ever looked at me twice before that."

"I looked at you. That first day when I asked you the way to the cottage. You were gardening. Clay on your nose and your hair hanging over your eyes like a darling little Shetland pony. Do you know what I said to myself?"

I didn't, though I could think of several things he might have said and hoped he hadn't. No girl looks her best gardening in clay soil.

"I said, 'That's my girl.' I fell in love with you there and then, but you seemed so young—and I'm so much older and rather a dry stick, but I am sure I could do as well as that sheep. Oh, Liz, darling, are you too young?"

"No," I said and it seemed to me to come out very loud.

"Let's write a book together, instead of two separate ones. I shall never write a love story if you don't help me, but if you will—who knows?—I might even get a bit of romance into outer space."

And then he said, "Darling, darling," and kissed me, and I made the truly remarkable discovery that one man's meat is another man's poison, because when Graham did it I hated it, but with Tony it was quite the contrary.

After that our conversation became completely disjointed. I remember saying suddenly, "What did you do with Mrs. Babbington?" and he said, "I haven't a clue what happened to her, have you? I don't know—maybe she went to Jamaica." And I remember saying, "Oh, I am glad the Wilberforces didn't have a car," but I don't think he ever did have any idea what I meant. END

Here is the way this ideal begins to look. It is a system, first of all, that should be flexible enough to be adjusted to the individual needs of the individual mother.

Its pervasive spirit should be cheerful and sympathetic—and this is more important, by far, than any specific detail.

But, speaking specifically, the ideal certainly includes prematernity classes for both prospective mothers and fathers.

There is no sensible reason why modern young Americans should approach childbirth with any of the fear that ignorance invariably breeds.

As it has worked out at Yale, for instance, two separate courses are given. One, for mothers alone, consists of five weekly daytime classes in such matters as muscle-control and relaxation techniques to make delivery easier; plus a guided tour of the maternity floor of Grace-New Haven Hospital, including the delivery room; plus special classes, for those interested, in breast feeding and in baby care.

The second course, for wives and husbands together, is given in the evening, on four consecutive Wednesday nights. Two talks are by obstetricians, one by a pediatrician and one by a psychiatrist. The parents-to-be learn in considerable detail about human reproduction, childbirth, the newborn, and the intriguing subject of parenthood in the large. The couples who have attended (usually from twenty to thirty at a time) have been wonderfully eager and receptive, and a pleasure to teach. They are hungry for accurate, detailed information. They want to know just about everything we teachers have to tell them—as, indeed, they are entitled to.

As a result, by the time she goes into labor a mother has learned how she can help herself, and just what she can expect in the way of help from those of us who are attending her. "Support" is the word we use to describe what her doctor, her nurses and her husband can do to assist. It covers many things. As one of our nurses once described it, "Support can be warming a cold bedpan, or bringing a cup of tea. It can be helping a mother use the things she has learned in class. It may be difficult to define, exactly, but we nurses can feel how much it helps." The idea that every mother should be provided with all possible support during labor—and psychological support, especially—is of the utmost importance.

Each mother should have a private labor room throughout the period of her labor. Her husband shou'd be allowed to stay with her, if she wishes, right up to the moment she goes to the delivery room. Psychologically speaking, the old-fashioned general labor room has been an abomination—a horror in the memories of many mothers. Grace-New Haven's private labor rooms are small but attractive. There are curtains at the windows. There is an easy chair, right beside the bed, for the husband.

It is amazing how much good prematernity instruction and good support are able to achieve. The delivery-room equipment holds no terrors for mothers who have been on our guided tour. It's a familiar place. They have been shown all around it, and they understand what everything is for.

As in every other detail, the Yale program is permissive about pain-relieving drugs and anesthetics. The mother can have exactly what she'd like—within the limits of good medicine, of course. On the other hand, since she is well informed about the advantages of using a minimum of such aid, her preference is likely to be sensible.

Time and time again, the mothers who have participated in the program have required nothing more than the local anesthetic usually used at the time of the actual birth. Most of our mothers, entirely by their own preference, have been completely conscious at the time of delivery.

Not only have they been aware of what was happening, but they have co-operated in the process. Though we have no scale on which the psychological advantage of this can be measured, we know it is very great.

Grace-New Haven's regulations allow the mother, if she feels like it, to come out of the delivery room holding her baby in her arms. She can be wheeled back into her private labor room, and there she and her husband may have about an hour alone together with their newborn. They are completely uninhibited about handling the baby—and spared a long, sometimes anxious wait to inspect the new arrival.

We believe that a mother should be able to have her baby by her side, during her waking hours, just as much as she likes. In other words, the ideal includes the "rooming-in plan," an arrangement that allows the mother and her baby to be cared for within one small unit of hospital space, and prevents their ever being separated by more than the few feet between her bed and a very small nursery in the adjoining room. Most mothers are unhappy at the thought of their babies off somewhere, down the hall, in a twenty- or thirty-bed general nursery.

Rooming-in has a host of other advantages. It gives the mother a chance to watch the nurse taking care of the baby—an extension course added to her prematernity classwork. It permits her, when she feels up to it, to practice under the nurse's supervision. It even provides an opportunity for the father, properly scrubbed and masked, to hold his child without feeling that he is throwing the entire hospital out of gear. And rooming-in is especially well suited to breast feeding when the mother has decided that she wants to nurse her baby—a matter, once again, for individual choice.

I think that every community should feel dissatisfied with itself until it can at least match what has been achieved at New Haven. The Preparation for Childbirth Program has been a remarkable success. The statistical proofs of its validity have been recorded, at considerable length, in the various medical journals. But its truest value cannot be counted up, or be expressed in percentages. That ultimate proof is the personal satisfactions of the many mothers and fathers who have taken part in it.

No one is more familiar than I with the long list of excuses used to defend an out-of-date, inadequate maternity hospital. Remodeling of facilities, along the lines I've indicated, is indeed a large undertaking.

But modernization is less difficult now than it was a dozen years ago, if only because Yale, among other institutions, has explored these ideas. A great many minds have contributed to the methods I've discussed. It was Dr. J.W. Ballantyne, of Edinburgh, who, as long ago as 1906, suggested prematernity classes in which "mothercraft"—a delightful word!—could be taught.

Dr. Edmund Jacobson, of Chicago, wrote the pioneer book, Progressive Relaxation, published in 1929, which inspired the late Dr. Grantly Dick-Read, of London, and the English physiotherapist, Mrs. Helen Heardman, to apply Dr. Jacobson's principles to obstetrics. Mrs. Heardman served as a volunteer worker in the Yale Obstetrical Clinic, and it was after she had demonstrated her methods in our delivery rooms that the program began. That was in 1947. The Yale Medical Center and the Maternity Center Association of New York were the co-sponsors.

I do not suggest that any community should copy the Yale program exactly, down to its last detail. Lots of good work along these same lines is being done elsewhere. I am particularly interested in the progress other countries are making, especially England, France, Japan and Russia. But I do like to think that the Preparation for Childbirth Program can serve as a standard—a measuring rod, if you prefer—that will be useful until it has been improved upon.

All the excuses for not doing at least this well are, in my opinion, inadequate. The main requirement—an exceptional degree of elasticity in the maternity hospital's routines—calls for a good many additional skilled hands. The shortage of such capable, trained persons may be more of a stumbling block than the perennial scarcity of money for additional salaries and to build hospital rooming-in facilities. (The nation is considerably short of the number of obstetricians needed to deliver this year's expected crop of more than five million babies.) But, in the long run, the manpower problem has a solution: trained women.

The Yale program has depended upon a remarkable group of nurse-midwives—trained nurses who have taken graduate instruction in midwifery. They have assisted in every phase of the work, with one exception. They have not delivered any babies. (Although, had there ever been an emergency, they could have done so perfectly well.) The Yale School of Nursing now gives a course in nurse-midwifery. Despite that term's misleadingly old-fashioned sound, nurse-midwives and obstetrical nurses are destined to become infinitely more important in the scheme of obstetrical practice. Their hands, as well as their hearts, will make great improvements possible.

I foresee the enlargement of this country's schools for training such women. I have no doubt that careers in obstetrical nursing, with its multitude of extraordinary satisfactions, are likely to become more and more appealing to the graduates of our nursing schools.

We have a long way to go. I am impatient with what sometimes strikes me as inexcusable complacence about our standards of maternal care. At the same time, I find myself truly optimistic.

We already have had a glimpse of what having a baby should be like. I count on my fellow obstetricians, co-operating with the parents of the United States, to insist that this view of an ideal be translated into the commonplace reality. END

Under Dr. Herbert Thoms' guidance, Yale University and the Maternity Center Association, beginning in 1947, sponsored a two-year study of natural-childbirth methods. Yale's Preparation for Childbirth Program and the School of Nursing's graduate program for nurse-midwives have followed. Labor-room practices are coming in for the heaviest criticism of all. A mother's need for psychological support—for even simple companionship during labor—is now accepted so generally that it is no longer a fighting issue in the medical journals. Gradually the practice of allowing husbands to be with their wives during labor (provided the couple wish it) is growing, endorsed by both doctors and enthusiastic mothers. Still, the inertia of many hospital administrations and medical staffs, plus the expense of redesigning labor rooms, makes it often "routine" for husbands to be barred.

Most husbands, however, even if present, are not medical doctors. The responsibility for the safety of mother and child during labor—for recognizing the signs of a baby-in-utero's being in distress—rests with the physician. It does not even rest with the labor-room nurse, who typically has several patients under her care and is not trained in the skills and techniques necessary to spot abnormalities early, or even to do the best possible job of following normal labor. If she picks up these skills through long years of experience, she is still technically forbidden to use them. This is not true around the world. Only in the United States and Canada does the physician assume exclusive responsibility for the progress of a normal maternity patient. According to our standard hospital regulations, there is only one rule when an emergency arises in the labor room: Call the doctor.

Yet the doctor may be twenty minutes or more away. Obstetrical leadership is admitting with greater and greater candor that it has become physically impossible for most doctors to be in attendance during the long hours of labor. The director of obstetrics of a great medical school told a medical congress (in words that cannot be quoted directly, because he feels "the layman" might "misunderstand" his clear and understandable words) that "in all honesty we must admit" that most obstetrics in this country is what he ironically called "perineal" obstetrics. This he described as the arrival of the obstetrician at about the time the baby's head first shows, just as the mother is being taken into the delivery room. He delivers baby and placenta, changes into street clothes, looks in once more on mother and baby, and goes home, leaving the patient to the care of "whomever was taking care of her before he got there." He added, "It certainly isn't the general practitioner's fault. He's got all he can do—and more."

Almost every doctor who delivers babies in anything smaller than a large metropolitan hospital will admit in private that he relies until he gets there on the experience and common sense of the nurses on duty in the labor room. Often he relies on the nurses to tell him when to get there. Yet the chief of staff of a small hospital who besought his hospital-accreditation committee for permission for his nurses to do sterile vaginal examinations (the most accurate way to gauge how far along a baby is) reported that his petition was denied, and as a result mothers were having their babies in bed. It is a credit to our nurses and to many hard-working doctors that our system works as well as it does, but the possibility exists for the system to break down, and there are times when it does. Wrote one doctor in a sympathetic paper addressed to nurses, "Who manages the first stage of labor in the great majority of hospitals? Is it not the nurse? If this be true, should not the nurse receive special training for that function? In our small rural hospitals, without house staff, who performs the deliveries? Most of them, it is true, are performed by doctors, mostly general practitioners. However, I have evidence (which I cannot, however, document or prove) that in such hospitals as many as 20 per cent of the deliveries are performed not by doctors, nor by midwives, nor by graduate nurses, but by practical nurses or aides. Doctors, of course, ultimately sign the birth certificates, so that our national statistics indicate that all hospital births are attended by doctors. But in respect to the small rural hospitals, I am certain that these statistics are misleading."

As for the delivery room, wise doctors are conceding that, even with the recent advances in anesthetic procedure, there is still a way to go to the ideal. Mothers have been so enthusiastic about being conscious during deliveries that more and more doctors and hospitals are making this possible for those who wish it, using whiffs of gas or the "saddle block" (spinal anesthesia). Yet one great teaching doctor reminded an assembly of specialists that saddle-block anesthesia is still a "major anesthetic procedure," enabling doctors to use the short cut of routine forceps delivery. Delivering a child while still conscious under anesthesia is not the same as natural childbirth, and only a very few doctors and medical centers are making continuous efforts to encourage natural childbirth among their maternity patients. Yet the doctor above pointed out, "Left to herself, the average patient reveals a remarkable propensity for spontaneous delivery. Experience with a variety of races and individuals indicates that approximately 85 per cent are subjects for physiologic or normal childbirth. To the observing eye, nothing seems too wrong with Nature's mechanism of birth."

The one thing that natural childbirth takes is time—time to prepare the mother with prenatal classes, someone's uninterrupted time to give her confidence and support during labor, time for the birth process itself, unhurried by instruments. Not enough doctors and hospital staffs have such time. The use of forceps is so routine to this day that the Joint Commission for the Accreditation of Hospitals sets no standards of justification at all, as they do, for example, for Caesarean sections. Yet the teaching doctor reminded his listeners that nothing in medical literature to date has proved that low-forceps deliveries are safer than properly attended spontaneous deliveries with carefully controlled analgesia. As he put it, admitting that his remarks were controversial, even "unacceptable" to some doctors, "It is a vanity of man to assume that he can beneficially alter the course of normally progressing labor. . . . Thus far in the entire history of the human race no one has been able to improve on, or safely and permanently substitute for, the physiologic mechanisms of the human body."

These are some of the things doctors are saying to one another. Others are calling for more rooming-in facilities for babies in hospitals, better follow-up care for mother and child at home. Every suggestion comes down to a need for more skilled hands with more time to give. Yet the doctors' most urgent words of all are those reminding the profession that the hands threaten to become fewer, not more numerous. "The greatest problem which maternity care will face in the next decade," wrote one well-known doctor, "is personnel. . . . In the last thirty years the output of physicians has merely kept pace with the growth in population. Meantime, the demands for medical services have soared."

In 1957 four million babies were born under the management of already overburdened physicians; five million babies annually are predicted by 1965, six million by 1970. At the most recent meeting of the American Association of Obstetrics and Gynecology, one doctor expressed real fears that this 50-per-cent increase will be "beyond the ability of our physician population to cope with," for the estimated increase in physicians, judging by present enrollments, will be by the same year only 14 per cent. Any increase in those delivering babies will be entirely among general practitioners, for the number of obstetrical specialists is already showing a decline, as fewer and fewer men are attracted to so arduous a field of specialization. Over the last six years the number of such specialists certified annually has dropped 30 per cent. A doctor who has been in the forefront of those sounding warnings has written, "Those of us who have given our lives to obstetrics and who list it high on the roster of essential medical services will admit with reluctance that it is not a popular specialty. But this is the truth."

Is there any answer to this growing problem of personnel? A handful of doctors, most of them connected with teaching centers, believe they have found one in proposing that specially trained obstetrical nurses take over some of the duties that now burden obstetricians. Most Americans are unaware that trained midwives, working under medical direction, are a commonplace in every Western country except our own and Canada; these women perform many of the duties surrounding childbirth that our physicians hold only themselves responsible for. These duties include prenatal education, many of the routine prenatal examinations, psychological support, and constant, expert care during labor. In many countries midwives actually conduct normal deliveries. There is already a nucleus of such women in the United States, calling themselves nurse-midwives. The high standards already set for them include a nursing degree, postgraduate experience and as much as a year and a half of theoretical and clinical experience in obstetrics.

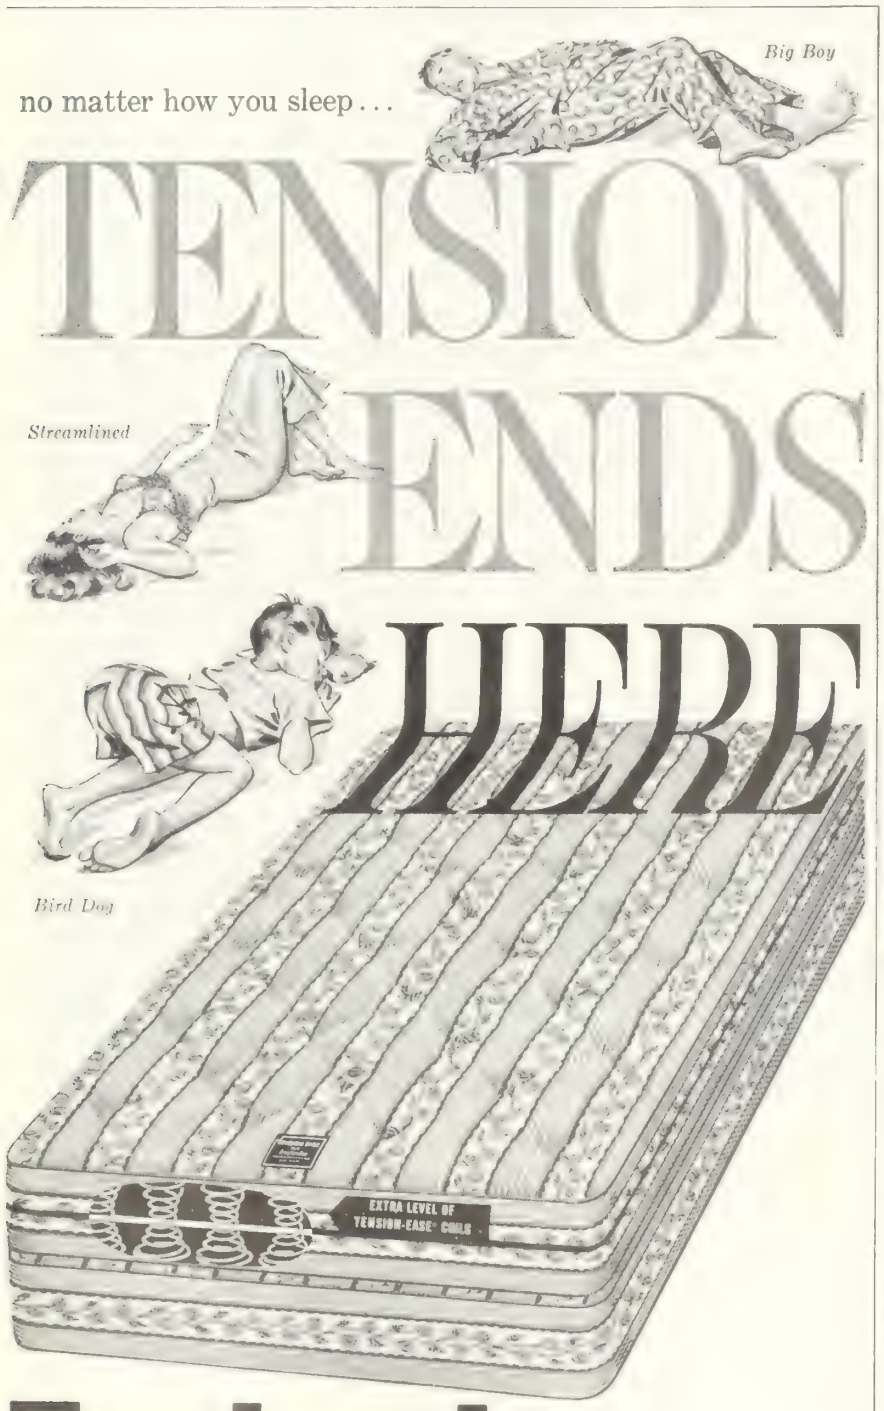
Yet because they are a new feature in American medicine, their growth in numbers has been slow. Doctors who remember the long medical struggle against the horrors of much old-fashioned midwifery regard them with suspicion, although a doctor who has helped train them has pointed out that the vast difference between an old-time midwife and today's trained nurse-midwife is "greater than that between a first-year medical student and a Board-certified specialist." Then, too, many doctors are extremely wary of sharing any of their medical skills. The trained nurse-midwife, it is true, has the competence to impinge on medical territory; her value is precisely that she is equipped to find emergencies and act upon them if necessary. One doctor entered into the debate on nurse-midwives, in a medical journal, to state angrily that a busy obstetrician should hire as his assistant never a nurse-midwife, but a younger obstetrician. This was his solution to the doctor shortage!

So great has been the medical resistance to nurse-midwives that it has been difficult to find hospitals willing to co-operate in training them. The number of accredited general hospitals providing clinical experience for student nurse-midwives can be counted on the fingers of one hand (with fingers to spare)—yet these hospitals are among the finest and most distinguished in the land, all teaching centers headed by farsighted obstetrical directors. Those doctors who have actually worked with nurse-midwives have sung their praises in medical journals. Wrote one, "I would rather see a medical student witness his first normal labor and delivery under the management of a well-trained nurse-midwife than under that of a verdant intern in the first part of his hospital training. I would be assured that the student would be impressed with the perfection of her experience and the confidence and dignity which she would bring to the occasion."



Yet it is a fact that, except for these teaching hospitals, not a single orthodox voluntary hospital in this country has a place for a nurse-midwife as such on its staff. Many American nurse-midwives seek posts abroad, where they are sought after as teachers, supervisors and administrators, and do much to further good maternal care. But the ranks of doctors who advocate training enough nurse-midwives to use in direct patient care are growing only very slowly. Such women would not practice independently, say these doctors, they would not do deliveries (except in emergencies), they would work under medical direction at all times. But they would be the extra hands needed to improve the quality and thoroughness of prenatal care, provide truly expert assistance during labor (support during labor is the cornerstone of nurse-midwifery), bring to new mothers the warm hearts, the extra time, the regard for emotional well-being that they so need.

Last year members of the American Association of Obstetrics and Gynecology heard their president say, "I have known . . . men who delivered between 50 and 100 women each month throughout the year. Instead of sympathizing with the 'dear overworked doctor' I am appalled at the harm he does to obstetrics in general. . . . I don't believe that any physician can give adequate maternity care to more than 200 women a year. Multiply 200 by ten or twelve prenatal office visits by the number of hours required to attend each woman in labor and by the necessary puerperal care, and the truth of this statement becomes crystal clear."

The medical profession is one of the most honored in America, and rightly so. It has continually set itself ever-higher standards of care. The doctors' quotes cited above, although intended for professional colleagues and not for the public, are proof that medical leaders today do not intend to see these standards lowered. Eventually the profession will respond and meet the challenge, as it has always done. But it must have an enlightened public, and the help of the women in the nursing profession, to do so. Is it not time to start preparing them now? END at their own children have been exposed to a od deal of storied villainy without changing aracter.

A child acquires his basic standards from s parents. If they are decent people and love m, he loves them deeply, too, and patterns mself after them. In this way he acquires a nscience which will not let him get into seri- s trouble later.

To be sure, a child's standards are affected a lesser degree by a variety of other influ- ces, as he grows gradually away from his rly dependence on parents: the attitudes of hool and Sunday-school teachers, of his assmates, his friends, and friends' parents. can still remember, as a strictly brought up ild, being quite impressed at eight or ten by me of the things that parents of my friends rmitted.) But even an adolescent's standards e not markedly changed by his contempo- ries' (though his urge to conform to them is eat at this age), because he instinctively lim- his friends to those brought up much like mself.

It has often been pointed out, as a reason r not worrying too much about the effects of olence in television programs and comic ooks, that children of earlier generations lis- ned to fairy tales that were every bit as cruel. m not sure, though, that a couple of hours of ese fairy stories every night of the week ould have been harmless for young children. nsitive individuals certainly got nightmares om them.

Most important, perhaps, is the fact that a ory read by your mother had a different im- ct from that which comes from seeing live ople apparently involved in brutality, night er night. During storytelling, the pictures u formed in your imagination were pretty ll limited by your experiences. Your moth- s voice and explanations were a constant re- urance that this was make-believe. Her com- nts reminded you that she and you abhorred acts of the villains. On the television screen prevalence of real-looking cruelty must give child the impression that it is widespread, l that it is taken for granted in the outside rld. A nursery-school teacher recently told that since the advent of a popular program ich is loaded with slapstick violence, the ldren have been casually bopping one an- er with great frequency. When she objects, y explain that this is the way it's done on program. So, though I don't for a minute im that good children are being turned into l by such a diet, I think that it may lower ir standards somewhat, and give them a r impression of humanity.

he attitude the parents take in regard to ious programs and comics will make some erence in the effect these will have on a d's own ideals. If the parents are keeping k of what is being viewed, and show their cern by ruling out certain programs and ps, the child will be reminded of what dards he is expected to have, even if he tinues to peek at them. If the parents show disapproval, he will feel none either.

is true that psychologists and doctors luding myself) have been pointing out for s that even the best of children have ag- sive feelings in them which can find healthy ression in playing games of mock violence, hearing stories and seeing shows that in- ve a certain amount and kind of hostility. question of what amount and what kind portant. A cartoon of a mouse punching on in the snoot makes children chuckle satisfaction. A little fellow is getting back big bully. But a man's real face being ered by the fist of a snarling criminal is e a different dose to swallow.

lot of parents have been dissatisfied with e of the programs their children are view- But every time they've tried to rule out a in one, or to put a limit on the total view- time per day, their children have argued gnantly: It's the best program of all; all friends are allowed to see it; the other kids can watch as much as they want to; why do their parents have to be the only mean ones? Strong-minded mothers and fathers are able to stand up to this kind of pressure and make their rules stick. Others have wilted under the heat of their children's reproaches. They've given in right away; or they've relaxed their vigilance after a couple of nights, half suspected that the forbidden program was being viewed again, but done nothing about it. They've had the same uncertainty about how strict to be about comic books and movie shows. I think all this illustrates the point that parents have relatively little trouble laying down the law in matters about which there were definite rules in their own childhoods: bedtime, table manners, lies, bad language. But when new activities for children develop—like television, or car driving in adolescence—parents have no traditions or convictions to guide them. They get conflicting reports about what other parents are doing. They have opinions, but they don't feel sure. They try to make reasonable rules. Then when their children protest violently, the parents vacillate. The children sense the parents' uncertainty and redouble their arguments.

Parents' confidence in their ability to make correct rules has been lowered by other developments of this century too. There has been the entrance into the child-rearing field of the psychologists, psychiatrists, educators, pediatricians, who have written and lectured about the needs and the problems of children. The unfortunate effect on some parents—especially the most conscientious ones—has been to make them conclude that parents are just as apt to do wrong as right.

Another unsettling factor has been the rapid rise in the standard of living of so many families, especially since the end of the war. We think of this as fortunate, and in most ways it is. On the other hand, the histories of many lands show that when the circumstances of life change suddenly it disturbs the stability of the family and weakens parental discipline. And, strangely enough, unusual prosperity is more upsetting than depression or even war. It's apt to produce increases, for instance, in delinquency, crime and suicide. When parents can provide their child with an environment quite different from that in which they themselves grew up, they have fewer reliable guideposts to go by. They have to grope for more of the answers.

Since the beginnings of children's movies, radio and television, doctors have heard from mothers about the problems of the unusually sensitive small boys and girls who are frightened by what they hear or see. They cry, or they're afraid to go to bed, or they have nightmares. A few of these children have enough sense to refuse to have anything more to do with such programs. Unfortunately, a majority of them, being as illogical as other human beings, keep going back for more of the stuff they can't stand. Clearly it's up to the parents to be more sensible than their small fry, and see to it that no more harm is done.

The fact should be faced that a good proportion of children under six years of age fall into the sensitive category. I say this from personal experience years ago in taking my own and other young children, on a very few occasions, to movie houses that were showing cartoons just for children. Adults and older children were laughing happily, but a lot of the young ones were cringing. We have to be reminded by such episodes that wild animals and cruel stepmothers in cartoons are as horrible to three- and four-year-olds as real ones would be.

So far I've been discussing the effects of violence and frightfulness. This leaves the problem of sex. It comes up more commonly nowadays in regard to movies. I realized this recently when we went to a neighborhood theater to see one foreign picture and were given a bonus of a sneak preview of another. The first was excellent. But the second would never have passed a board of review and was so crude—by American taste—that there was a lot of embarrassed giggling in the audience.

All children seek knowledge of the facts of life, not just on a few occasions but bit by bit at each succeeding stage of development. They come to their parents if the parents make this easy. In any case, they ask questions or pick up ideas from older brothers and sisters and from friends. They learn some aspects in school. As they get into the teens they begin to search privately for revealing books. They draw conclusions from movies, television and magazine articles. There is great variation in the rate of romantic and sexual maturity. Some children are much more precocious than average. Others are very shy; they don't want to know much for a long time and so they protect themselves if they can.

More significant than the facts which a child acquires is the emotional or spiritual atmosphere in which the learning takes place. A loving parent, in explaining the facts of life, adjusts the amount of information to the child's readiness and speaks in terms which are in harmony with the family's ideals. A schoolteacher starts with the biological facts and usually does not get so close as parents to the personal and emotional aspects, unless the children draw the discussion in this direction. By contrast, the knowledge (or misinformation) that a more worldly child insists on imparting to a shier one may be shocking rather than enlightening. The same thing applies to a motion picture that is not appropriate for a child. It may confront him with aspects of sex which he is quite unready to accept comfortably. It is more apt than not to present these with characters and with a view of life which are disturbingly different from what he has known.

On the question of the effect of television on schoolwork, homework and reading habits, the studies made have been inconclusive in their results. In most American schools, homework in the elementary grades is omitted or held to a small amount, because educational research has shown that homework does not contribute to performance in school. So television viewing, at this age when it is most absorbing, does not usually interfere with schooling. In the high-school years, when homework is assigned primarily to develop the habit of individual study, most pupils have enough self-discipline to put study first; besides, some of the infatuation with viewing has worn off. At any age—in childhood or adulthood—there are individuals who are sometimes putting off unpleasant work by taking refuge in the television set, but it's not fair to blame the latter for this.

One of the most hopeful aspects of television is that thoughtful educators believe that, despite its drawbacks, it has been beneficial. They are convinced that the programs which have told about something real have, over the years, broadened the horizons of children and kindled their enthusiasm to learn more.

The fear that comic books will debase a child's reading tastes has been strong among parents who themselves read and enjoyed good books in their own childhood. I know this from talking with many of them. But time has proved that their children, after fairly wallowing in comic books for years, outgrow them in adolescence and go on to books that are appropriate to the family's intellectual level. On the other hand, the reading matter that absorbed a majority of G.I.'s during the war was the comics. But I doubt if most of these would have been reading Dickens, even if there had never been a comic book. In other words, the main thing that determines the eventual level of a person's reading in adulthood is not the books he read at nine, but the atmosphere in which he grew up.

When it appears that so little is known for sure about the subtle effects of broadcasting, movies and comics, what line are parents to take? Obviously different ones will take different courses, just as they have always done in past generations. That's one reason why children turn out differently in different families and different neighborhoods. Some parents have always had high aspirations about the tastes and ideals they want their children to develop. Others have been quite willing to let nature take its course. I think the main way I can be helpful is to encourage those who are dissatisfied with some of the fare offered in broadcasting, movies and comics to stick by their guns, not let themselves be bullied by their children or by neighborhood opinion.

It is always interesting, in the case of a great man, to know how he affected the women of his acquaintance.
JOHN MORLEY

One method for improving the quality of children's movies and television programs is for parents to communicate directly with the neighborhood-theater manager, the local-station manager, the network, the sponsor. This is a privilege of citizenship that's usually neglected by all but a few cranky souls. Yet the evidence is clear that a relatively small number of sincere letters or calls make a strong impression on an official.

When children are planning to see a movie, I think it's the job of sensible parents to find out whether it's suitable, by checking reviews in the papers, or in parents' and religious publications, or by calling the theater manager—just as they keep an eye on their children's companions and haunts.

In the same way, they need to keep track of what their children are viewing on television and in comic books. They shouldn't feel hesitant in forbidding programs or books which they consider definitely incompatible with the family's ideals.

But in regard to television it seems to me shortsighted to consider only the influence that individual parents may be able to exert on their children or on the industry. There may never again be the opportunity that exists today for all of us who are concerned to ask for a review commission, which will take a fresh look at all aspects of broadcasting and make recommendations.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

to coat the bird with a thick sort of white sauce that would "set" cold, leaving it like a piece of sculpture. Then we were to give it a comb of red pimiento, and a beak, eyes and wing tips of black slivered truffles. The chef-professor was over us constantly, with helps and warnings; but all the time that we worked on this rather clammy masterpiece, which was to be our own lunch, we were tantalized by the homey smell of a pot roast—which he was keeping on the back of the stove for himself.

Such a man, if you asked where to learn day-in-and-day-out French cooking, would send you off to his sister in the country—or possibly to his uncle, because in France the art of cooking is not thought too difficult for men.

Well then, you may ask, if real French cooking is home cooking, and if we've got home cooking, too, whatever is the fuss about?

Volumes have been written to answer that question. All I am concerned with here is the Frenchwoman's willingness to use her intelligence upon very simple dishes, and her humility—or her common sense. What is funny about turnips, even for company? she would ask. Why is cabbage necessarily in poor taste? Tell her that. And why should anybody laugh when you mention such a thing as sauerkraut?

Following her attitude of mind (not her recipes), and keeping to foods available in this country, I suggest to you the following:

MENU I

Only two dishes of this meal take much "doing" and they may both be done early in the day and put aside. These are:

EGGPLANT CASSEROLE

This is a suave and courteous companion to lamb—which is, as you know, a meat that needs something, but not something that will eclipse it. Also, for people-who-think-they-don't-like-eggplant, the casserole is beautifully disguised. (Just don't tell 'em what it is.)

Peel 1 large eggplant down through the greenish underskin and cut into 1" cubes. Slice 2 peeled medium-sized onions paper-thin. Boil both together gently, in water only halfway to cover, until both are soft. Drain them very patiently and, if you like, whip them to a pulp. Drain again. You should have about 4 cups cooked eggplant.

Now make a cream sauce using 6 tablespoons melted butter blended with 6 tablespoons flour. Add, say, 1½ cups light cream and 1½ cups rich milk. For seasoning, add 1½ teaspoons salt, ½ teaspoon pepper and several generous squirts liquid pepper seasoning. Heat and mix well until thickened. Combine the sauce and the eggplant, pulp or cubes as you like, and pour into a baking dish suitable for the table. Sprinkle the top liberally with about ¾ cup dry French bread crumbs that have been tossed with 2 to 3 tablespoons melted butter.

This may stand for hours if you wish. Thirty minutes before the lamb is done, run the casserole into the oven. In this time it will cook through and the crumbs will become golden brown.

APPLE-PECAN DESSERT

Beat 2 eggs until they are very thick and lemon-colored. Fold in the following in the order given: 1½ cups sugar, 6 tablespoons flour, 2½ teaspoons baking powder, 1 teaspoon vanilla, a pinch of salt, 1 cup tart apples, peeled, cored and finely chopped, and 1 of broken pecan meats. Mix thoroughly and pour into a well-buttered 8"x8"x2" pan. Bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for 45 minutes, or until the top is browned and crusty.

This also may be put aside for hours. When it is wanted, heat gently, cut into squares and serve with whipped cream. Sprinkle more broken pecan meats on top. The rest of the meal is routine.

ROAST LAMB

Have your butcher oven-prepare your leg of lamb—that is, remove the shank bone, trim the fat and tie it up. Season it with salt, ground pepper and powdered rosemary and, unless you like a kiss without a squeeze, insert little slivers of garlic here and there. Garlic with lamb, if it is properly used, will do its good work without calling attention to itself. Roast in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 1 to 1½ hours if the roast is small, longer if not. Use a meat thermometer to be safe. . . . And if you are like me (I'm ashamed of myself, but I'm rather fainthearted about mint sauce with lamb), try currant jelly.

PEAR-SHAPED TOMATOES

Now, nothing could be simpler than the tomatoes. Any stewed tomatoes would do, if you don't make them too sweet. However, I do recommend the small pear-shaped kinds sold in cans and often labeled "Peeled Italian Type." These tomatoes keep their shape like so many little fish with neat little bodies, and so also serve as decoration. Simply open and drain two large cans. Heat them through, butter them a bit and sprinkle chopped parsley on top.

BELGIAN ENDIVE SALAD

For the final embellishment and the last thing to do before serving, tear up three large heads of endive which have been washed and crisped. Toss with your own favorite French dressing.

MENU II

This dinner (for four persons) has, besides its modest price, this clinching advantage: the whole meal, including the dessert, is done in the oven and, once done, may be left there for a long time. You will not have to fret if you receive the message (or worse, don't even get it) that one of the children has had a flat tire three miles out of town.

Meanwhile, if your eyebrows go up at the idea of serving "kraut and ribs" at your table, I urge you to get your eyebrows back down. This dish, properly prepared, is neither coarse nor heavy. Far from being indigestible, it is often a rather sprightly cure for certain ailments of the sedentary. As for kraut being fashionable: if anyone should bring that up, I could furnish a list of excellent restaurants—French as well as Alsatian and German—where kraut is an honored dish. You will like it, I think, and I'm positive the men will. This last ought to count. What's the good of using your brains at your range if you haven't an audience to admit you've gone and done it?

For this dish you will want:

2 small sides of spareribs, each cut in half
2 quarts sauerkraut
4 medium-sized onions
8 apples
8 medium-sized potatoes

SPARERIB-AND-SAUERKRAUT CASSEROLE

Buy the kraut fresh out of the barrel if you are where you can, or choose the type which many markets now sell in plastic containers; otherwise you will find it in cans.

Cut the onions, peeled, in half. Place them in a casserole later to be brought to the table. Drain the kraut and tuck it around and over them. On top of all this lay the ribs—which you will have salted, peppered and rubbed with sage (fresh or powdered). Run your casserole into a very hot oven, 500° F. When the ribs have browned on one side, turn them to brown on the other.

Now cover the entire dish tight. Reduce the heat to 450° F. and bake for at least 1½ to 2 hours. It's the baking which turns the trick here; therefore, if for some reason you wish to hold things back, lower the temperature and leave for an extra half hour or so. Won't hurt a thing.

The trimmings are simple!

Little Boiled Potatoes. Peel and boil the potatoes—just that. If you had a chef in a white hat and presumed to ask what to have ith this, he'd say, "Nice, dry, mealy boiled otatoes; they're the perfect foil."

Sautéed Apple Sections. The apples you ill not peel, but core and quarter and cook 1 tablespoon bacon drippings—sprinkling em with a little cinnamon and turning em until they are soft through but keep eir shape.

Put both potatoes and apples aside where ey will stay warm. And now the dessert:

HOT FRUIT DESSERT

You will need:

1 can halved peaches
1 can red plums
1 can halved apricots
1 can pitted Bing cherries

Use a 1-pound-1-ounce can of each. Drain these well, reserving the syrups. Pit the ums carefully, so that you leave them intact. Arrange the fruits in a casserole, beginning the bottom in the order named and in equal vers. Pour on enough of the mixed syrups to ich just about the top, and add a lump of tter the size of an egg.

Now, though you may skip it, if you have it d about 2 ounces kirschwasser. This will ng out the natural flavors of the fruits, but dish is equally good without it.

Put this dessert, so prepared, aside until out 20 minutes before you take your main h in. Then cover the casserole tightly and ve it in the oven at such a temperature as l bring it out hot through at the time you'll nt it. Pass around with it, separately, a ce which you'll have made like this: Pour int commercial sour cream into a bowl and inkle generously with dark brown sugar.

MENU III

SOUTHERN FRIED FISH

the fish, if you are so lucky as to have at nd in your part of the country any such ll fresh fish as spot or channel cat or terfish (not to mention such sporting ndfalls as trout or bass), you will of course these: otherwise, frozen fillets will do. htly dredge about two pounds fish in a e seasoned flour and fry—just through—both sides. You could also use corn meal ead of the flour, if you like.

BUTTERED BABY CABBAGE

the nearest thing to young garden-fresh bage. Shred it medium fine, using some he good green leaves. Drop it into boiling ed water to cover. Bring it back to a boil continue 5 to 7 minutes only. Drain it oughly, douse it with butter and add e fresh-ground pepper. If, after a test, ems a bit raw for your taste, turn it with rk for a few minutes over a low heat. This hod is a revelation to people who have tly been revolted by what is usually ed "boiled cabbage."

BATTER BREAD

erfect complement for fish. This is my dmother's recipe, got from heaven knows how long a line of women behind her. It was usually cooked for me in my Virginia childhood by "Aunt Martha"—a colored woman so beloved that tears come to my eyes when I think of her. I shall leave the tears out of the recipe, but I do have two notes, both got from "Aunt Martha": a—we use only the white water-ground corn meal for this dish (if you prefer yellow or can't get white, I have nothing to say); b—the shortening, if you fancy the pioneer taste, ought to be lard. Take:

1 cup white corn meal
2½ cups milk
¾–1 teaspoon salt
3 eggs
2 teaspoons baking powder
2–3 tablespoons lard or other shortening

Put the lard in a 6-cup casserole and set in a 400° F. oven to melt and get the dish piping hot. Sift the corn meal and salt into a heavy saucepan. Add the milk, heat and stir until the mixture is very thick. Take from the heat and stir in, one at a time, the eggs and then the baking powder. Pour the mixture into the sizzling casserole and bake for 30–35 minutes until the bread is puffed and golden in color.

Batter bread should be served immediately. Therefore it would be a good idea to time your meal so that all other dishes are on the table when you bring this one in.

EASY STRAWBERRY ICE CREAM

The dessert may be made hours (or a day) ahead of the time it's wanted. It is surely the best and easiest substitute for old-fashioned strawberry ice cream—the kind made on the back porch of a Sunday morning before church, with a vast mess of ice and salt and little boys squabbling about whose turn it was to crank the handle. These scenes are dear to the memory—still, it's nice to make the same dessert in 10 minutes and with no mess at all. You will need only this:

1 10-ounce package sliced frozen strawberries
1 cup sugar
1 pint commercial sour cream

Defrost the berries until they are mushy. Add the sugar and the sour cream—which is of course not really sour, but simply a bit tart. It is the slight tartness which "does" this dish.

Stir the mixture well and put it into a refrigerator tray and freeze. At three intervals of 25 minutes each, stir again, to prevent the formation of crystals. Then forget it until you need it.

There now. I think my late chef-professor and his sister in the country would wipe their hands on their aprons and tell us we've done pretty well. "Don't spend a cent if you don't have to; use your brains on what's at hand"—this is the message of these good people, if I got it correctly.

MV Salerno, at sea, June 21

ar Jan: Here I am, three days at sea a week ago I was safe at home. I think I figured out why I didn't want to come. ou know this is the first time I have ever let loose in my life. Always before it's school or the Air Force or college: life has neatly chopped up into days and hours, and vacations, duties and leaves; I feel nfortably lost.

Figure this: all my life there has hung over me that slight, almost unfelt fear of being late or unprepared—which is only consciousness of authority, of course, but it gives form to existence. Now that is suddenly removed. I am for the first time on my own.

This happens to everybody, of course. What do they do? Not just sit around the house, I realize that now. I have been pondering the question and I think I have come up with the answer.

They get married.

But my word, Jan, isn't that a rather chaotic way of putting form into existence?

You were right to make me take the boat: I am recuperating fast. There's an excessively good-looking girl on board called Polly MacMillan who is helping me get my strength back.

She's an odd one and I think that in real life she would drive me crazy. Her father is MacMillan Incorporated; you know, the importer and manufacturer of perfume—I think I've seen the shop on 56th Street—and Polly has persuaded him to let her open a boutique in it. (A boutique is a place where everything is extremely expensive and extremely useless.) So Poll is on her way to Italy to buy the necessary stuff.

Why such a pretty girl should want to live in New York when she could live in the country, I can't think. She's nuts, I guess. She wants to be Elizabeth Arden and Helena Rubinstein, only better.

She's serious, but in this limbo of mid-ocean she's also a lot of fun. I haven't been around with a pretty girl since Kay Rogers married that fathead, and I like it.

Well, I'll mail this in Lisbon. Lisbon. What am I doing in Lisbon?

MORE TO: EDWARD MACMILLAN

. . . oh, pop, a ship is an odd place. I've been on this one five days, which on land would mean nothing. But on this . . . this well-run Utopia, time has a way of behaving as Bergson said it does; that is, collapsing at the inessentials and expanding at the moments of importance. (At least I think that's what Bergson said.) There's a strange vacuum of safety on a ship, and maybe it's that—that time-stands-still feeling—that accounts for the swiftness of friendships that occur. Or maybe what I mean Politeness is like lighting another man's candle by yours.

But for instance, today we passed the Azores. ete Stewart and I were standing at the rail vatching, when suddenly we both began to ecite Tennyson's "At Florés in the Azores ir Richard Grenville lay ——"

I didn't think anyone remembered that oem except me. But suddenly those lines, n this ship, made me feel I had known Pete orever. A very strange experience. Of course hen we arrive in Genoa and get on dry land, will never think of him again. But these are noments ——

I am fine. I am healthy. Don't worry. Will ail this tomorrow in Lisbon. Love,

O: JANET LEGENDRE

MV Salerno, at sea, June 26

Dear Jan: I know now what I was doing in isbon. I was going shopping with Polly Mac-illan. She had a dozen addresses for places hich sell cloth and handbags and such junk nd I went with her while she looked.

I like Lisbon, although it surprised me a ttle. Here we were, just off a boat the whole ay from America, and everybody was uncon-rned at our arrival. We might have come om just around the corner.

Have you ever been here? It's a deter-inedly neat city, lots of flowers and gardens. nd they sprinkle the streets with water, hich gives you the impression it's a well-run lace. But why weren't they expecting one?

Polly says I'm crazy. She may be right. I ust say she stands up very well on land, I as glad to find out. In fact, I would be pre-ared to like her quite a lot if it weren't for this reer business—carrying on the family name nd all that stuff.

What do you think? Would any sensible girl ant to run a boutique if she could get married nd live in the country? It doesn't sound logi-l to me. But Polly says, "Who wants to live the country?"

I say, who wants to live in the city? Is e out of her skin?

Advise. Yrs. perplexed,

PETE.

TO: EDWARD MACMILLAN

MV Salerno, at sea, June 28

Dear Pop: Well. Pretty good news. Enclosed are pictures and drawings of the things I found in Lisbon, and I bought samples and obtained all the necessary data on ordering and shipping. I didn't actually buy. I want to compare in Spain and Italy. But I'm encouraged. It's not going to be impossible to find extraordinary goods.

Today we had a confounding experience at Gibraltar, hardly what I expected.

Pete and I—I mentioned him, didn't I? anyway, he's a fellow on the boat—took a carriage around the Rock, but that's really a short spin, so before noon we found ourselves sitting outdoors at a café. Well, after a while a wildly unlikely character appeared at our table, but he had clinging to his arm the sweetest spider monkey you ever saw.

He said to Pete, "Would you want to buy a monkey?"

Pete said, "I hadn't thought about it."

The man said, "A very agreeable companion."

Pete said, "How much?"

The man said, "Ten pounds."

Pete said,"I'll give you three."

The man said, "Sold!"

Well this, as you can imagine, created quite a commotion because, as Pete kept pointing out to me, a monkey would be a considerable inconvenience traipsing around Europe, but an offer had been made and accepted, and we were on foreign soil and obviously in the wrong, so it all ended by Pete's owning a monkey.

Very slyly, of course, he tried to present it to me—"The real, correct thing for a boutique," he kept saying—but yr. daughter was not born yesterday. So that didn't work.

So we went to a store and bought two cans of monkey food—monkeys are a thing at Gib, did you know?—and then, in a daze, we took Helen back to the ship. Helen is the monkey.

She is shy, poor baby, and probably frightened, so we have to spend most of our time comforting her. Really, the things you get into! Love,

POLLY.

TO: JOSEPH STEWART

MV Salerno, at sea

Dear Joe: Did anyone tell you I am on my way to visit you and Eleanor? Jan said she would, but did she? I will send this by air from Barcelona, so you will have a couple of days' notice. I get off this tub in Genoa and will come right up. I'll telegraph from there.

By the way, I fell into some luck in Gibraltar. I was able to buy a spider monkey very reasonably. I've always wanted one, and now I've got it. Her name's Helen, and I know you'll both be as crazy about her as I am. I may even leave her with you for a time while I push around sight-seeing.

Well. See you. Love to Eleanor. PETE.

TO: PETE STEWART

Now listen—I am going to spend the day in Barcelona with Mr. Savage. I want to. I am not serious about you. Get that straight. I have had to do some careful thinking about this because otherwise what was I doing up on that boat deck with you last night? But I have done some careful thinking and I am not serious and I am going to spend the day in Barcelona with Mr. Savage. POLLY.

Barcelona, June 29

Dear Pop: Isn't this view of Barcelona lovely? Spent a wonderfully instructive day here with old Mr. Savage, the architect. Still love boats, but I think you can get enough of them. So looking forward to Rome. Love,

POL.

TO: JANET LEGENDRE

Geneva, June 30

Dear Janet: Joe has asked me to write you. He doesn't, he says, trust himself. You see, we have heard from Pete and he says he is arriving tomorrow with a monkey named Helen.

Well, you know Joe. I adore him, of course, but there are moments when he can become stuffy. This mission he is part of takes itself, I am afraid, very seriously and he says he doesn't want any fool brother of his around with a monkey on a string, only Joe used quite different words.

This is just to reassure you. I told Joe I would rather have dinner with a monkey than most of the jokes we do have dinner with, upon which there was a good deal of door slamming (Swiss doors are solid, kid) but everything will work out all right. So.

I do wish you and Charlie would come over. Europe is all right, of course, but it does bring out the chauvinism in one. We're here at least till November. Love to Charles. ELEANOR.

Geneva, July 2

Dearest Pete: Joe and I were so sorry you and Helen didn't come straight here to us. You know how anxious we are to see you. Do make it soon.

I must say I had a strange letter from Janet this morning. In it she said to advise you to get rid of a girl who can't live in the country. I presume she means Helen. Why would Janet think that monkeys have to live in cities? I'm sure if you made proper arrangements Helen would be perfectly happy in Connecticut. Of course I will admit that in all photographs you see of them they're either painting pictures—sometimes quite good ones—or else sitting at little tables in dresses having tea and sandwiches, and that might be hard for a bachelor like you to arrange. By the way, what kind of dresses does Helen wear? I have a divine little French seamstress here in Geneva who is very good and not expensive.

Well, we'll talk about all this when you come. Love from us both,

Dear Ellie: You must be out of your head. Custom-made clothes aren't necessary for Helen. In the first place, she doesn't wear clothes, she eats them, so something ready-made is quite all right for the purpose.

I'll let you know, as soon as I have any plans. PETE

To: EDWARD MACMILLAN

Rome, July 7

My dear Eddie: Let me say quickly: Put away your fears. Polly brought her young man around to see me, and while I liked him enormously, he is no threat.

Pete Stewart is what must be a vanishing American type—he is a country boy. I don't mean at all the bashful, gauche, toe-in-the-mud sort of fellow; no, he's quite as intelligent as necessary, a lawyer in fact: he is just someone who does not like the city. He is not afraid of the city even, or the competition (actually I think it's harder to be a success in the country, where everybody knows you, where you cannot hide behind any kind of front or anonymity), he prefers the country—the trees, the hills, the animals, the weather, the quiet.

This country quality gives him, too, a kind of toughness that I don't often find in the young men I meet these days. I mustn't make him sound a bore—he is amiable and even witty—but . . . well, last night I took him and Polly to a gala Roman party; a lot of quite nice people were there as well as the inevitable floating trash you always find in Rome, and I saw him yawning in the faces of three duchesses—oh, not literally, but he was yawning. The odd thing about it was that he made me look around and wonder if I were really having a good time, or whether this was just a lot of nonsense. Me, old partygoing me! In any case, we all left soon afterward, and I was content. And all this morning I kept thinking "I really must go back home, for a while at least." I felt I was missing something.

Well, enough. That was this morning. Now it is evening. I have recovered.

Here's the point: this strong, quiet fellow is excellent as a change, a sort of vacation from the life we know, that Polly knows. That's what makes him attractive.

But you can't make your whole life a vacation, can you? I have nothing against a tree, you understand, and I say good luck to anyone who adores them, but there is a certain sameness about trees, isn't there?

I think Polly realizes this, and that is why I say put away your fears. She's had a good month with Pete, but now time's up, and she is back in the world of people and interests and ideas. She's safe!

So there's your police report, dear Edward. Why don't you come over anyway, just for fun? Best love,

BETTINA

To: JANET LEGENDRE

Rome, July 1

Dear Jan: Well. Here's my news. Tomorrow I am leaving this Old Homestead of Western Culture, this Attic of the Arts, this Eternal City and Cocktail Bar (combined) and going north. In other words, I'm leaving Rome and heading for Geneva. I should have done it long ago.

I don't see how anyone can live in this city. It is a city of only one color and that color is noise. You cannot sleep here, or think; you live in a bath of noise.

And you cannot move. The only way to get from one side of the street to the other is to wait for a bevy of nuns to come along and then conceal yourself in the middle of it. Sometimes that way you can get across, but only sometimes.

Oh, it is no good. I never should have come. I do not like the place or the people or the way they live. I never should have let you push me on that boat. It was all a mistake. If only I had stayed at home this never would have happened.

I would come right back, but I suppose since I am this near I will have to see Joe and Ell.

To: EDWARD MACMILLAN

Rome, July 12

Dear Pop: I am writing this under difficulties, but I hope I will be able to make myself clear.

Pete left yesterday afternoon. You evidently know more about him than I thought, for Bettina told me of your letter. But whatever she wrote to you, understand this: she just couldn't know all his good qualities, because Bettina is forty, even if she doesn't look it, and that's just too old to know. You have to be young to perceive and explore the qualities of another person. After thirty you get callous, you just don't care.

Anyway, Pete left. That's the big statement. He took a train because the airlines wouldn't let him take Helen in the seat with him. I went to the station with them.

I'm trying to remember my feelings as we stood on the platform beside that wagon-lit. I think they were, to a large extent, feelings of relief.

I would now be able to do exactly as I pleased, get on with my work, not have to bother about anyone else.

I know that when the train left I turned quickly to walk through that beautiful station

Who recalls when folks used to git along without somethin' if it cost too much?

KIN HUBBARD

and get a taxi. But I fell. I had on a pair of those really awful heels, and one must have caught in something. I wasn't hurt, don't think that.

But my bag spilled all over everywhere, you can imagine, and I felt silly. However, kind hands pulled me up and restored all the junk to my bag and in just another minute I was in the taxi.

But this happened. When I got back to our hotel, I looked in the bag for my purse, and it was gone. There wasn't much in it, not more than ten dollars, but it was gone.

Dear pop, that did it. I can't explain, even to myself, what happened, but I broke up. I have never felt so alone in my life.

The concierge paid the taxi, and somehow, I don't know how, I got up to my room.

Oh, pop, I know this isn't going to sound right to you. I still had you, I still had all my friends, I still had everything I had had just a half an hour before. But I was now alone, alone, alone.

It was the worst time I have ever had in my life. I took off my shoes and walked, up and down, up and down in my room.

I thought of the future, all those endless years stretching ahead. What would happen to me?

Would I be like Bettina? She's been through three husbands and has nothing left but a trunkful of Chanel clothes. And no memories, except an address book. (Oh, you be careful of her, pop. She asked me many too many questions about you.)

I don't know how long this would have gone on, but suddenly there was a knock on the door. It was the little maid from the floor above, where Pete and Helen had lived. In her hands she had the can of Helen's food. Pete had forgot it.

Pop, have you ever had a revelation? Well, I had one that moment. I knew exactly what I was going to do.

I kissed the maid and gave her much too big a tip, and then I ran to my cupboard, pulled out all my suitcases and began packing. If the sun had been shining before I hadn't noticed, but suddenly my whole room was filled with brilliant light.

Well, pop, I said at the beginning I was writing under difficulties, and you can see I am. I do not know what is going to happen, but it is tomorrow now, and I am sitting in the lobby waiting for a taxi to take me to the airport. I am going to Geneva.

As soon as I know anything I will let you hear. Love, love,

POLLY.

To: JANET LEGENDRE

Geneva, July 14

Well, My Dear: The things that have been going on in this house. First of all, Pete arrived, and in the most filthy humor I have ever seen. Even Joe noticed it, and as you know, Joe never notices anything. I have had to put up with a great deal from your family, but this was the worst. If it hadn't been for that enchanting Helen I couldn't have stood it. With me, Helen is in.

And then that afternoon as we were having a cocktail, a perfectly strange girl arrived carrying a can of monkey food. Believe it or not, dear, that made all the difference.

Pete says you know everything about this, so I will assume you do. The only thing I can add is that Polly seems essentially quite a nice girl, for which thank heaven, as I have a feeling we're going to see a lot of her in future.

But right now her conversation is downright dull because all she talks about is that she and Pete are going to live in the country. And Pete says they're going to live in the city. In the country, in the city. In the country, in the city. Really. You'd think it mattered.

Oh, well, poor kids. I suppose it has got to happen to you once, at least.

But did I—you tell me the truth—did I ever look at Joe in the appalling, unashamed way that this girl looks at Pete? Did I?

I can't remember.

So—love from us all,

ELEANOR.

He stretched his legs and turned his gaze from me to the tips of his boots. "You have come from London?"

"Yes," I answered.

"You'll miss the gaiety of the big city."

"I once lived in the country, so I know what to expect."

"Are you staying in Liskeard?"

I was not sure that I liked this catechism, but I remembered Phillida again: "You're far too gruff, Marty, with the opposite sex. You scare them off."

I decided I could at least be civil, so I answered, "No, not in Liskeard. I'm going to a little village on the coast called Mellyn."

"I see." His next words startled me. "I suppose a sensible young lady like you would not believe in second sight, and that sort of thing?"

"Why," I replied, "what an extraordinary question!"

"May I look at your palm?"

I hesitated. Could I offer my hand to a stranger in this way? Aunt Adelaide would suspect that some nefarious advances were about to be made.

He smiled. "I assure you that my only desire is to look into the future."

"But I don't believe in such things."

"Let me look anyway." He leaned forward and with a swift movement secured my hand, contemplating it with his head on one side. "I see," he said, "that you have come to a turning point in your life. You are moving into a strange new world which you will find entirely different from anything you have known before."

I smiled cynically. "You see me taking a journey. What would you say if I told you I was visiting relatives and could not possibly be moving into your strange new world?"

"I should say you were not a very truthful young lady." His smile was puckish. I could not help feeling a little liking for him. "No," he went on, "you are traveling to a new life, a new post. There's no mistake about that. You are going to a strange house, a house full of shadows. You will have to walk warily in that house, Miss—er ——" He waited, but I did not supply what he was asking for, and he went on: "I see a child there, and a man—perhaps it is the child's father. They are wrapped in shadows. There is someone else there . . . but perhaps she is already dead."

It was the deep sepulchral note in his voice rather than the words which momentarily unnerved me. I snatched my hand away. "What nonsense!" I said.

He ignored me and half closed his eyes. Then he went on: "You will need to watch little Alice, and your duties will extend beyond the care of her. You must most certainly beware of Alice."

I felt a faint tingling which began at the base of my spine and seemed to creep up to my neck. This, I supposed, was what is known as making one's flesh creep.

Little Alice! But her name was not Alice. It was Alvean. It had unnerved me for the moment because it had sounded similar. Then I felt irritated and a little angry. Was he laughing at me? He lay back against the upholstery of the carriage, his eyes still closed. I looked out the window as though he and his ridiculous fortunetelling were of not the slightest interest to me.

He opened his eyes then and took out his watch. He studied it gravely.

"In four minutes' time," he said briskly, "we shall pull into Liskeard. Allow me to assist you with your bags."

He took them down from the rack. "Miss Martha Leigh," was clearly written on the labels, "Mount Mellyn, Mellyn, Cornwall."

He did not appear to glance at these labels and I felt that he had lost interest in me.

When we came into the station, he alighted and set my bags on the platform. Then, with a deep bow, he left me.

While I was murmuring my thanks I saw an elderly man coming toward me, calling, "Miss Leigh! Be you Miss Leigh then?" and for the moment I forgot about my traveling companion.

I was facing a merry little man with a brown, wrinkled face and eyes of reddish brown; he wore a corduroy jacket and a sugar-loaf hat pushed to the back of his head. Ginger hair sprouted from under this, and his brows and mustache were of the same gingery color.

"Well, Miss," he said, "so I picked ye out then. Be these your bags? Give them to me.

John Wesley never rode in a railway train, never boarded a steamboat, never rode a bicycle, never used a typewriter, never saw a sewing machine, never used a fountain pen, never preached by electricity, never sent a telegram, never read a penny newspaper, never spoke through a telephone, and yet lived a fuller, richer life than thousands of people in these modern days.

You and me and old Cherry Pie 'ull soon be on our ways to home."

He took my bags and I walked behind him; but he soon fell into step beside me.

"Is the house far from here?" I asked.

"Old Cherry Pie'll carry us there all in good time," he answered as he loaded my bags into the trap and I climbed in beside him.

He seemed to be a garrulous man and I could not resist the temptation of trying to discover something about the people among whom I was going to live.

I said, "This house, Mount Mellyn, it sounds as though it is on a hill."

"Well, 'tis built on a cliff top, facing the sea. Mount Mellyn and Mount Widden are like twins. Two houses, standing defiant like, daring the sea to come and take 'em. But they'm built on firm rock."

"So there are two houses," I said. "We have near neighbors."

"In a manner of speaking. Nansellocks, who are at Mount Widden, have been there these last two hundred years. They be separated from us by more than a mile, and there's Mellyn Cove in between. The families have always been good neighbors until ——"

He stopped, and I prompted: "Until?"

"You'll hear fast enough."

I thought it was beneath my dignity to probe into such matters, so I changed the subject. "Do they keep many servants?" I asked.

"There be me and Mrs. Tapperty and my girls, Daisy and Kitty. We live in the rooms over the stables. In the house there's Mrs. Polgrey and Tom Polgrey and young Gilly. Not that you'd call her a servant. But they have her there and she passes for such."

"Gilly! That's an unusual name."

"Gillyflower. Reckon Jennifer Polgrey was a bit daft to give her a name like that. No wonder the child is what she is."

"Jennifer? Is that Mrs. Polgrey?"

"Nay! Jennifer was Mrs. Polgrey's girl. Great dark eyes and the littlest waist you ever saw. Kept herself to herself until one day she goes lying in the hay—or maybe the gillyflowers—with someone. Then before we know where we are, little Gilly's arrived; and Jennifer—her just walked into the sea one morning. We reckoned there wasn't much doubt who Gilly's father was."

I said nothing and, disappointed at my apparent lack of interest, he went on: "She wasn't the first. We knowed her wouldn't be the last. Geoffrey Nansellock left a trail of bastards wherever he went." He laughed and looked sideways at me. "No need for you to look so prim, Miss. Ghosts can't hurt a young lady, and that's all Master Geoffrey Nansellock is now—nothing more than a ghost."

"So he's dead too. He didn't . . . walk into the sea after Jennifer?"

That made Tapperty chuckle. "Not him! He was killed in a train accident. You must ve heard of that accident. It was just as the ain was running out of Plymouth. It ran off e lines and over a bank. The slaughter was rrible. Mr. Geoff, he were on that train, and to no good on it either. But that was the d of him."

"Well, I shall not meet him, but I shall meet llyflower, I suppose. And is that all the rvants?"

"There be odd boys and girls—some for the rdens, some for the stables, some in the use. But it ain't what it was. Things changed ce the mistress died."

Mr. TreMellyn is a very sad man, I supse."

Tapperty lifted his shoulders.

"How long is it since she died?" I asked.

"It would be a little more than a year, I ckon."

"And he has only just decided that he needs governess for little Miss Alvean?"

"There have been three governesses so far. ou be the fourth. They don't stay, none of em. Miss Bray and Miss Garrett, they said e place was too quiet. There was Miss nsen—a real pretty creature. But she was nt away. Took what didn't belong to her. was a pity. We all liked her. She seemed to ok on it as a privilege to live in Mount ellyn. Old houses were her hobby, she used tell us. Well, it seemed she had other hobes besides, so out she went."

I turned my attention to the countryside. It as late August, and as we passed through nes with banks on either side I caught occaonal glimpses of fields of corn among which ppies and pimpernels grew; now and then e passed a cottage of gray Cornish stone nich looked grim, I thought, and lonely.

I had my first glimpse of the sea through a ld in the hills, and I felt my spirits lifted. It emed that the nature of the landscape anged. Flowers seemed to grow more plenully on the banks; I could smell the scent of ne trees; and fuchsias grew by the roadside, eir blossoms bigger than any we had ever en able to cultivate in our vicarage garden.

We turned off the road from a steep hill and went down and down nearer the sea. I saw that we were on a cliff road. Before us stretched a scene of breath-taking beauty. The cliff rose steep and straight from the sea on that indented coast; grasses and flowers grew there, and I saw sea pinks and red and white valerian mingling with the heather—rich, deep, purple heather.

At length we came to the house. It was like a castle, I thought, standing there on the cliff plateau—built of granite like many houses I had seen in these parts, but grand and noble—a house which had stood for several hundred years, and would stand for several hundred more.

"All this land belongs to the master," said Tapperty with pride. "And if you look across the cove, you'll see Mount Widden."

I did look, and saw the house. Like Mount Mellyn, it was built of gray stone. It was smaller in every way and of a later period. I did not give it much attention because now we were approaching Mount Mellyn, and that was obviously the house which was more interesting to me.

We had climbed to the plateau and a pair of intricately wrought-iron gates confronted us.

"Open up there!" shouted Tapperty.

There was a small lodge beside the gates, and at the door sat a woman knitting.

"Now, Gilly girl," she said, "you go and open the gates and save me poor old legs."

Then I saw the child who had been sitting at the old woman's feet. She rose obediently and came to the gate. She was an extraordinary-looking girl with long straight hair almost white in color, and wide blue eyes.

"Thanks, Gilly girl," said Tapperty as Cherry Pie went happily through the gates. "This be Miss, who's come to live here and take care of Miss Alvean."

I looked into a pair of blank blue eyes which stared at me with an expression impossible to fathom. The old woman came up to the gate and Tapperty said, "This be Mrs. Soady."

"Good day to you," said Mrs. Soady. "I hope you'll be happy here along of us."

"Thank you," I answered, forcing my gaze away from the woman to the child. "I hope so."

"Well, I do hope so," added Mrs. Soady. Then she shook her head as though she feared her hopes were somewhat futile.

I turned to look at the child, but she had disappeared. I wondered where she had gone, and the only place I could imagine was behind the bushes of hydrangeas which were bigger than any hydrangeas I had ever seen, and of deep blue, almost the color of the sea on this day.

"The child didn't speak," I observed as we went on up the drive.

"No. Her don't talk much. Sing, her do. Wander about on her own. But talk—not much."

The drive was about half a mile in length and on either side of it the hydrangeas bloomed. Fuchsias mingled with them, and I caught glimpses of the sea between the pine trees. Then I saw the house. Before it was a wide lawn, and on this two peacocks strutted before a peahen, their almost incredibly lovely tails fanned out behind them. Another sat perched on a stone wall; and there were two palm trees, tall and straight, one on either side of the porch.

The house was larger than I had thought when I had seen it from the cliff path. It was of three stories, but long and built in an L shape. The sun caught the glass of the mullioned windows and I immediately had the impression that I was being watched.

Tapperty took the gravel approach to the front porch, and when we reached it the door opened and I saw a woman standing there. She wore a white cap on her gray hair; she was tall, with a hooked nose, and as she had an obviously dominating manner, I did not need to be told that she was Mrs. Polgrey.

"I trust you've had a good journey, Miss Leigh," she said.

"Very good, thank you," I told her.

"And worn out and needing a rest, I'll be bound. Come along in. You shall have a nice cup of tea in my room. Leave your bags. I'll have them taken up."

I felt relieved. This woman dispelled the eerie feeling which had begun, I realized, since my encounter with the man in the train. Joe Tapperty had done little to disperse it, with his tales of death and suicide. But Mrs. Polgrey was a woman who would stand no nonsense, I was sure of that. She seemed to emit common sense, and perhaps because I was fatigued by the long journey I was pleased about this.

I thanked her and said I would greatly enjoy having a cup of tea, and she led the way into the house.

We were in an enormous hall which in the past must have been used as a banqueting room. The floor was of flagged stone, and the timbered roof was so lofty that I felt it must extend to the top of the house. The beams were beautifully carved. At one end of the hall was a dais, and at the back of this a great open fireplace.

"It's magnificent," I said involuntarily; and Mrs. Polgrey was pleased.

"I superintend all the polishing of the furniture myself," she told me. "Beeswax and turpentine, that's the mixture, and nothing like it. All made by myself."

"It certainly does you credit," I complimented her.

I followed her to the end of the hall where there was a door. She opened this and a short flight of some half dozen steps confronted us. To the left was a door which she indicated and, after a moment's hesitation, opened.

"The chapel," she said, and I caught a glimpse of blue slate flagstones, an altar and a few pews. There was a smell of dampness about the place. She shut the door quickly. "We don't use it nowadays," she said. "We go to the Mellyn church in the village, just beyond Mount Widden."

We went up the stairs and into a room which I saw was a dining room. It was vast and the walls were hung with tapestry. Through the enormous windows I saw a walled courtyard.

"This is not your part of the house," Mrs. Polgrey told me, "but I thought I would take you round the front of the house to my room. It's as well you know the lay of the land, as they say."

I thanked her, understanding that this was a tactful way of telling me that as a governess I would not be expected to mingle with the family.

We passed through the dining room to yet another flight of stairs and, mounting these, came to what seemed like a more intimate sitting room. I could see that the furniture was mostly antique and that it all gleamed with beeswax and turpentine and Mrs. Polgrey's loving care.

"This is the punch room," she said. "It has always been called so because it is here that the family retires to take punch. We follow the old customs still in this house."

At the end of this room was another flight of stairs; there was no door leading to them, merely a heavy brocade curtain which Mrs. Polgrey drew aside. When we had mounted these stairs we were in a gallery, the walls of which were lined with portraits.

There were several doors leading from the gallery, but we went quickly along it to one of those at the far end. As we passed through it, I saw that we were in a different wing of the house—the servants' quarters, I imagined, because the spaciousness was missing.

"This," said Mrs. Polgrey, "will be your part of the house. You will find a staircase at the end of this corridor which leads to the nurseries. Your room is up there. But first come to my sitting room and we'll have tea."

"I fear it will take some time to learn my way about the house," I said.

"You'll know it in next to no time. But when you go out you won't go the way I brought you up. You'll use one of the other doors; when you've unpacked and rested awhile, I'll show you."

"You're very kind."

"Well, I do want to make you happy here with us. Miss Alvean needs discipline. If you show us that you can look after the child, you'll be more than welcome here."

"I gather I have had several predecessors." She looked a trifle blank and I went on quickly: "There have been other governesses."

"Oh, yes. Not much good, any of them. Miss Jansen was the best, but it seemed she had habits. You could have knocked me down with a feather. Well, I suppose appearances are deceptive, as they say. Miss Celestine was real upset when it came out."

"Miss Celestine?"

"The young lady at Widden. Miss Celestine Nansellock. She's often here. A quiet young lady, and she loves the place. If I as much as move a piece of furniture she knows it. That's why she and Miss Jansen seemed to get on. Both interested in old houses, you see. You'll meet her. Scarcely a day passes when she's not here. There's some of us that think —— Oh, my, I'm letting my tongue run away with me, and you longing for that cup of tea."

She threw open the door of the room and it was like stepping into another world. There were antimacassars on the chairs. There was a whatnot in the corner, filled with china ornaments, including a glass slipper, a gold pig and a cup with "A present from Weston" inscribed on it. It seemed almost impossible to move in a room so crammed with furniture.

Mrs. Polgrey looked at the main table and tutted in exasperation; then she went to the bell rope and pulled it. It was only a few minutes later when a black-haired girl with saucy eyes appeared carrying a tray on which were a silver teapot, a spirit lamp, cups and saucers, milk and sugar.

"And about time, too," said Mrs. Polgrey. "Put it here, Daisy."

Daisy gave me a look which almost amounted to a wink. I did not wish to offend Mrs. Polgrey, so I pretended not to notice.

Then Mrs. Polgrey said, "This is Daisy, Miss. You can tell her if you find anything is not to your liking."

"Thank you, Mrs. Polgrey, and thank you, Daisy."

They both looked somewhat startled and Daisy dropped a little curtsy, of which she seemed half ashamed, and went out.

"Nowadays ——" murmured Mrs. Polgrey, and lighted the spirit lamp.

I watched her unlock the cabinet and take out the tea canister, which she set on the tray.

"Dinner," she went on, "is served at eight. Yours will be brought to your room. But I thought you would be needing a little reviver. So when you've had this and seen your room, I'll introduce you to Miss Alvean."

"What would she be doing at this time of day?"

Mrs. Polgrey frowned. "She'll be off somewhere by herself. Master don't like it. That's why 'e be anxious for her to have a governess."

Mrs. Polgrey measured the tea into the pot. "So much depends on whether she takes a fancy to you or not. She's unaccountable."

She stirred the tea in the pot, put on the tea cozy and asked, "Cream? Sugar?"

"Yes, please," I said.

"I always do say," she remarked, as though she thought I needed some consolation, "there ain't nothing like a good cup of tea."

We ate tea biscuits with the tea, and these Mrs. Polgrey took from a tin which she kept in her cabinet. I gathered, as we sat together, that Connan TreMellyn, the master, was away.

"He has an estate farther west," Mrs. Polgrey told me. "Penzance way. Left him by his wife, it were. Now she was one of the Pendletons."

"When does he return?" I asked.

She looked faintly shocked, and I knew that I had offended because she said in a somewhat haughty way, "He will come back in his own time."

Presumably it was not good form for a governess to ask questions about the master of the house. It was all very well for Mrs. Polgrey to speak of him; she was a privileged person. I could see that I must hastily adjust myself to my new position.

Very soon after that she took me up to my room. It was large, with big windows equipped with window seats from which there was a good view of the front lawn. My bed was a four-poster. There were rugs on the floor, the boards of which were so highly polished that the rugs looked somewhat dangerous. There were a tallboy and a chest of drawers; and I noticed that there was a door in addition to the one by which I had entered.

Mrs. Polgrey followed my gaze. "The schoolroom," she said. "And beyond that is Miss Alvean's room."

Looking round the room, I saw that there was a screen in one corner, and as I approached this I noticed that it shielded a hip bath.

"If you want hot water at any time," she said, "ring the bell and Daisy or Kitty will bring it to you."

"Thank you." I looked at the open fireplace and pictured a roaring fire there on winter days. "I can see I'm going to be very comfortable here."

"It's a pleasant room. You'll be the first governess to have it. The other governesses used to sleep in a room on the other side of Miss Alvean's room. It was Miss Celestine who thought this would be better. It's a more pleasant room, I must say."

"Then I owe thanks to Miss Celestine."

"A very pleasant lady. She thinks the world of Miss Alvean." Mrs. Polgrey shook her head significantly and I wondered whether she was thinking that it was only a year since the master's wife had died, and that perhaps one day he would marry again. Who more suitable to be his wife than this neighbor who was so fond of Miss Alvean?

"Would you like to wash your hands and unpack? But perhaps first you would like to take a look at the schoolroom."

"Thank you, Mrs. Polgrey," I said, "but I think I'll wash and unpack first."

"Very well. And perhaps you'd like a little rest. Traveling is so fatiguing. Well, I'll be leaving you. If you cared for a stroll in the grounds before dinner you could take it. Ring for Daisy or Kitty and whoever is free will show you the stairs you will use in future. It will take you down to the kitchen garden, but you can easily get from there to wherever you want to go. Don't 'ee forget, though—dinner at eight."

As soon as she had gone, the strangeness of the house seemed to envelop me. I was aware of silence—the eerie silence of an ancient house.

I went to the window and looked out. It seemed a long time ago that I had driven up to the house with Tapperty. I looked at the watch pinned to my blouse and saw that it was just past six o'clock. Two hours to dinner. I wondered whether to ring for Daisy or Kitty and ask for hot water; but I found my eyes turning to the other door in my room, the one which led to the schoolroom.

The schoolroom was, after all, my domain, and I had a right to inspect it, so I opened the door. The room was larger than my bedroom, but it had the same type of windows, all fitted with window seats on which were red plush cushions. There was a table in the center of the room. I went over to it and saw that there were scratches on it, and splashes of ink, so I guessed that this was the table where generations of TreMellyns had learned their lessons.

A few books lay on the table. I examined them. They were children's readers, containing the sort of stories and articles which looked as if they were of an uplifting nature. There was an exercise book on which was scrawled "Alvean TreMellyn. Arithmetic." I opened it and saw several sums, to most of which had been given the wrong answers. Idly turning the pages, I came to a sketch of a girl, and immediately I recognized Gilly, the child whom I had seen at the lodge gates.

"Not bad," I muttered. "So our Alvean is an artist. That's something."

I closed the book. I had the strange feeling, which I had had as soon as I entered the grounds, that I was being watched.

IT WILL BE BEST

By BETTY JANE BALCH

I shall not welcome April any longer
As once I did, nor shall I take our walk,
Up the tall cobbled hill on windy evenings,
For surely I would hear you laugh and talk.
It will be best avoiding all such places:
There would be you, and more
you, everywhere,
I should but see you kneeling to feed pigeons
And see the star-dust halo on your hair;
And yet, my dear, with all this careful scheming,
I had forgotten that there still is dreaming.

"Alvean!" I called on impulse. "Are you there, Alvean? Alvean, where are you hiding?"

There was no answer and I flushed with embarrassment, feeling rather absurd in the silence.

Abruptly I turned and went back to my room. I rang the bell, and when Daisy appeared I asked her for hot water.

By the time I had unpacked my bags and hung up my things it was approaching eight o'clock and precisely as the stable clock finished striking the hour Kitty appeared at the door with my tray. On it were a leg of roast chicken with vegetables and, under a pewter cover, an egg custard.

Daisy said, "Are you having it in here, Miss, or in the schoolroom?"

I decided against sitting in that room where I felt I was overlooked.

"Here, please, Daisy," I answered. Then, because Daisy looked the sort of person who wanted to talk, I added, "Where is Miss Alvean? It seems strange that I have not seen her yet."

"She's a bad 'un," cried Daisy. "Her heard new Miss was coming, and so off her goes. Master be away and we don't know where her be until the houseboy comes over from Mount Widden to tell we that she be over there—calling on Miss Celestine and Master Peter, if you do please."

"I see. A sort of protest at having a new governess."

Daisy came near and nudged me. "Miss Celestine do spoil the child. Dotes on her so's you'd think she was her own daughter. Listen! That do sound like the carriage." Daisy was at the window, beckoning to me.

I felt I ought not to stand at the window with a servant, spying on what was happening below, but the temptation was too strong. So I stood beside Daisy and saw them getting out of the carriage—a young woman whom I judged to be of my own age, and a child. I scarcely looked at the woman; my attention was all on the child. This was Alvean, on whom my success depended.

From what I could see, she looked ordinary enough. She was somewhat tall for her eight years; her light brown hair had been plaited and wound round her head. She was wearing a dress of brown gingham with white stockings and black shoes with ankle straps. She looked like a miniature woman, and for some vague reason my spirits fell.

Oddly enough, she seemed to be conscious that she was being watched, and glanced upward. Involuntarily I stepped back, but I was sure she had seen the movement. I felt at a disadvantage before we had met.

I went to the table and, sitting down, began to eat my dinner. Daisy was about to go when there was a knock on the door and Kitty entered.

She grimaced at her sister and grinned rather familiarly at me. "Oh, Miss," she said, "Mrs. Polgrey says that when you'm finished will you go down to the punch room. Miss Nansellock be there and her would like to see you. Miss Alvean have come home."

"I will come when I have finished my dinner," I said.

I rose and went to the mirror which stood on my dressing table. I saw that I was unusually flushed and that this suited me; it made my eyes look decidedly the color of amber. It was fifteen minutes since Daisy and Kitty had left and I imagined that Mrs. Polgrey, Alvean and Miss Nansellock would be impatiently awaiting my coming. But I had no intention of becoming the poor little drudge that so many governesses were. If Alvean were what I believed her to be, she needed to be shown, at the start, that I was in charge and must be treated with respect.

I rang the bell and Daisy appeared. She led the way to the punch room through which I had passed with Mrs. Polgrey on my way to my own quarters. She drew aside the curtains and, with a dramatic gesture, cried, "Here be Miss!"

Mrs. Polgrey was seated in one of the tapestry-backed chairs, and Celestine Nansellock was in another. Alvean was standing. She looked, I thought, dangerously demure.

"Ah," said Mrs. Polgrey, rising, "here is Miss Leigh. Miss Nansellock have been waiting to see you." There was a faint reproach in her voice. I knew what it meant. I, a mere governess, had kept a lady waiting.

"How do you do?" I asked.

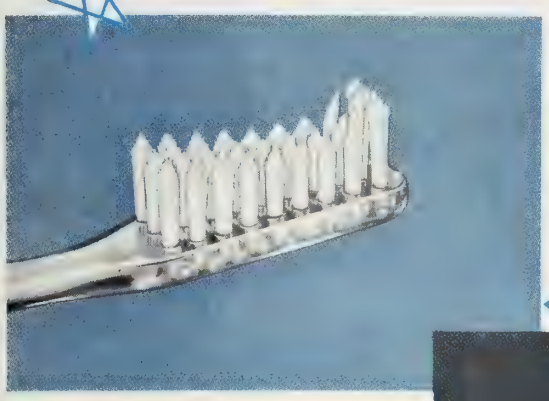
They looked surprised. I suppose I should have curtsied or made some gesture to show that I was conscious of my menial position. I was aware of the blue eyes of the child fixed upon me; indeed, I was aware of little but Alvean in those first few moments. Her eyes were startlingly blue. I thought, She will be a beauty when she grows up.

Celestine Nansellock was standing by Alvean, and she laid a hand on her shoulder. "Miss Alvean came over to see us," she said. "We're great friends. I'm Miss Nansellock of Mount Widden. You may have seen the house."

"I did so on my journey from the station."

"I trust you will not be cross with Alvean."

Alvean bristled and her eyes glinted.



I answered, looking straight into those defiant blue eyes, "I could hardly scold for what happened before my arrival, could I?"

For the first time I gave my attention solely to Celestine Nansellock. She was taller than I, but by no standards a beauty. Her hair was of a nondescript brown and her eyes were hazel. There was little color in her face and I decided she had little personality, but perhaps she was overshadowed by the defiance of Alvean and the conventional dignity of Mrs. Polgrey.

"I do hope," she said, "that if you need my advice about anything, Miss Leigh, you won't hesitate to call on me. You see, I am quite a near neighbor, and I think I am looked on here as one of the family."

"You are very kind. I suppose the first thing to do is to get Alvean to bed. It must be past her bedtime."

Celestine smiled. "Indeed it is. She usually has her milk and biscuits in the schoolroom at half past seven. It is now well past eight. But tonight I will look after her. I suggest that you return to your room, Miss Leigh. You must be weary after your journey."

Before I could speak Alvean cried out, "No, Celestine. I want her to. She's my governess. She should, shouldn't she?"

A hurt look appeared in Celestine's face, and Alvean could not repress the triumph in hers. I felt I understood. The child wanted to feel her own power; she wanted to prevent Celestine from superintending her retirement simply because Celestine wished so much to do it.

"Oh, very well," said Celestine. "Then there's no further need for me to stay."

She was looking at Alvean as though she wanted her to beg her to stay, but Alvean's curious gaze was all for me.

"Good night," she said flippantly. And to me: "Come on. I'm hungry."

"You've forgotten to thank Miss Nansellock for bringing you back," I told her.

"I didn't forget," she retorted. "I never forget anything."

"Then your memory is a great deal better than your manners," I said.

They were astonished—all of them. Perhaps I was a little astonished myself. But I knew that if I were going to assume control of this child I should have to be firm.

Her face flushed and her eyes grew hard. She was about to retort, but, not knowing how to do so, she ran out of the room.

"Miss Leigh," said Celestine earnestly, "it will be necessary for you to go carefully with that child. She has lost her mother . . . quite recently." Celestine's lips trembled. She smiled at me. "It is such a short time ago and the tragedy seems near. She was a dear friend of mine."

"I understand," I replied. "I shall not be harsh with the child, but I can see she needs discipline."

"Be careful, Miss Leigh." Celestine had taken a step closer and laid a hand on my arm. "Children are delicate creatures."

"I shall do my best for Alvean," I answered.

"I wish you good luck." She smiled and then turned to Mrs. Polgrey. "I'll be going now. I want to get back before dark."

Mrs. Polgrey rang the bell and Daisy appeared.

"Take Miss to her room, Daisy," she commanded. "And has Miss Alvean got her milk and biscuits?"

"Yes, ma'am," was the answer.

I said good night to Celestine Nansellock. Then I left with Daisy.

I went into the schoolroom where Alvean sat at a table drinking milk and eating biscuits. She deliberately ignored me as I went to the table and sat beside her.

"Alvean," I said, "if we're going to get along together, we'd better come to an understanding. We shall all be happier if we do."

Alvean shrugged her shoulders. "If we don't," she told me brusquely, "you'll have to go. I'll have another governess. It's of no account to me."

Her eyes were malicious and I wanted to slap her. "It should be of the greatest account," I answered, "because it is far more pleasant to live in harmony than in discord with those about us."

"What does it matter, if they're not about us—if we can have them sent away?"

"Kindness matters more than anything in the world."

She smiled into her milk and finished it.

"Now," I said, "to bed."

I rose with her and she said, "I go to bed by myself. I am not a baby, you know."

"Perhaps I thought you were younger than you are because you have so much to learn."

She considered that. Then she gave that shrug of her shoulders which I was to discover was characteristic.

"Good night," she said, dismissing me.

"I'll come and say good night when you are in bed."

"There's no need."

"Nevertheless, I'll come."

She opened the door which led to her room. I turned and went into mine.

I felt depressed because I was realizing the size of the problem before me. I had no experience of handling children and not until I had come face to face with Alvean had I realized that I might not succeed with this job. I tried not to look down the years ahead when I might slip from one post to another, never giving satisfaction. What happened to women like myself, women who, without those attractions which were so important, were forced to battle against the world for a chance to live?

I walked up and down, trying to control my emotions. I went to the window and looked out across the lawns. I could see Mount Widden across the cove. Two houses standing there over many years; generations of Nansellocks, generations of TreMellyns and their lives intermingled so that it could well be that the story of one house was the story of the other.

"We're getting up a petition asking parents in the neighborhood to raise their sons' allowances."

I turned from the window and went through the schoolroom to Alvean's room.

"Alvean," I whispered. There was no answer. But she lay there in the bed, her eyes tightly shut, too tightly. I bent over her. "Good night, Alvean. We're going to be friends, you know," I murmured.

There was no answer. She was pretending to be asleep.

Exhausted as I was, my rest was broken that night. I would fall into sleep and then awake startled. I repeated this several times until I was fully awake.

I lay in bed and looked about my room in which the furniture showed up in intermittent moonlight like dim figures. I had a feeling that I was not alone; that there were whispering voices about me. I had an impression that there had been tragedy in this house which still hung over it.

I determined to discover the reason for Alvean's demeanor. I determined to make her a happy, normal child.

It was light before sleep came; the coming of day comforted me because I was afraid of the darkness in this house. It was childish, but it was true.

I had breakfast in the schoolroom with Alvean, who told me, with pride, that when her father was at home she had breakfast with him.

Later we settled to work, and I discovered that she was an intelligent child; she had read more than most children of her age and her eyes would light up with interest in her lessons almost in spite of her determination to preserve a lack of harmony between us. My spirits began to rise.

Luncheon consisted of boiled fish and rice pudding, and afterward when Alvean volunteered to take me for a walk, I felt I was getting on better with her.

There were woods on the estate, and she said she wished to show them to me. I was delighted and gladly followed her through the trees.

"Look," she cried, picking a crimson flower and holding it out to me. "Do you know what this is?"

"It's betony, I believe."

She nodded. "You should pick some and keep it in your room, Miss. It keeps evil away."

I laughed. "That's an old superstition. Why should I want to keep evil away?"

"Everybody should." She was placing the flower in the buttonhole of my coat. I was rather touched. Her face looked gentle and I had a notion that she felt a sudden protective feeling toward me.

"Thank you, Alvean," I said gently.

She looked at me and all the softness vanished from her face. It was defiant and full of mischief.

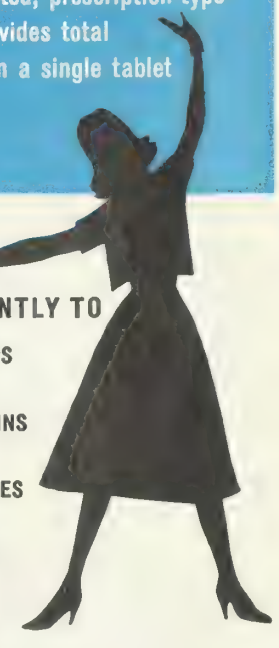
"You can't catch me," she cried; and off she ran.

I did not attempt to do so. I called, "Alvean, come here." But she disappeared through the trees and I heard her mocking laughter in the distance.

I decided to return to the house, but the wood was thick, and I was not sure of my direction.

I walked back a little way, but it seemed to me that it was not the direction from which we had come. A panic seized me, but I told myself this was absurd. It was a sunny afternoon and I could not be half an hour's walk from the house.

Then I heard singing; it was a strange voice, slightly off key, and the fact that the song was one of those which were being sung in drawing rooms all over the country did nothing to reassure me.



"Alice, where art thou?
One year back this even
And thou wert by my side,
Vowing to love me,
Alice, what e'er may betide ——"

"Who is there?" I called.

There was no answer, but in the distance I caught a glimpse of a child with lint-white hair, and I knew that it was only little Gilly, who had stared at me from the hydrangea bushes by the lodge gates.

THROUGH RESEARCH . . . A BETTER PRODUCT

I walked swiftly on and after a while the trees grew less dense and through them I saw the road. I came out into this and realized that I was on the slope which led up to the plateau and the lodge gates.

Mrs. Soady was sitting at the door of the lodge as she had been when I arrived, her knitting in her hands.

"Why, Miss," she called, "so you've been out walking then?"

"I went for a walk with Miss Alvean. We lost each other in the woods."

"Ah, yes. So her run away, did her." Mrs. Soady shook her head, as she came to the gate trailing her ball of wool behind her.

"I expect she'll find her way home," I said, hopefully.

"My dear life, yes. There ain't an inch of them woods Miss Alvean don't know. Oh, I see you've got yourself a piece of betony. Like as not 'tis as well."

"Miss Alvean picked it and insisted on putting it in my buttonhole."

"There now! You be friends already."

"I heard the little girl Gilly, singing in the woods," I said.

"I don't doubt 'ee. Her's always singing in the woods."

"I called to her, but she didn't come."

"Timid as a doe, she be."

"Well, I think I'll be getting along. Good-by, Mrs. Soady."

"Good day to 'ee, Miss."

I was hot and tired when I reached the house. I went straight up to my room and rang for water, and when I had washed and brushed my hair went into the schoolroom where tea was waiting for me.

Alvean sat at the table; she looked demure and made no reference to our afternoon's adventure, nor did I.

After tea I said to her, "I don't know what rules your other governesses made, but I propose we do our lessons in the morning, have a break between luncheon and tea, and then start again from five o'clock until six, when we will read together."

Alvean did not answer; she was studying me intently.

Then suddenly she said, "Miss, do you like my name? Have you ever known anyone else called Alvean?"

I said I liked the name and had never heard it before.

"It's Cornish. Do you know what it means?"

"I have no idea."

"Then I will tell you. My father can speak and write Cornish." She looked wistful when she spoke of her father, and I thought, He at least is one person she admires and for whose approval she is eager. She went on: "In Cornish, Alvean means Little Alice."

"Oh!" I said, and my voice shook a little.

She came to me and placed her hands on my knees; she looked up into my face and said solemnly, "You see, Miss, my mother was Alice. She isn't here any more. But I was called after her. That's why I am Little Alice."

I stood up because I could no longer bear the scrutiny of the child. I went to the window. I was remembering the mocking eyes of the man on the train, the man who had warned me that I should have to beware of Alice.

Three days after my arrival at Mount Mellyn, the master of the house returned.

I had slipped into a routine as far as my duties were concerned. Alvean and I did lessons each morning after breakfast, and I found her a good pupil. It was not that she meant to please me; it was merely that her desire for knowledge was so acute that she could not deny it. I believe that there was some idea in her head that if she could learn all I knew she could then confront her father with the question: Since there is no more Miss can teach me, is there any point in her remaining here?

I often thought of tales I had heard of governesses whose declining years were made happy by those whom they had taught as children. No such happy fate would be mine—at least as far as Alvean was concerned.

I had been shocked when I first heard the name of Alice mentioned, and after the daylight had passed I would consequently feel that the house was full of eerie shadows. That was pure fancy, of course. It had been a bad beginning, meeting that man in the train with his talk of second sight.

I did wonder, when I was alone in my room and the house was quiet, of what Alice had died. She must have been quite a young woman. It was, I told myself, because she was so recently dead—for after all, a year is not a very long time—that her presence seemed to haunt the place.

> Bad will be the day for every man when he becomes absolutely contented with the life that he is living, with the thoughts that he is thinking, with the deeds that he is doing, when there is not forever beating at the doors of his soul some great desire to do something larger, which he knows that he was meant and made to do because he is still, in spite of all, the child of God.
> PHILLIPS BROOKS

I would wake in the night to hear what I thought were voices, and they seemed to be moaning: "Alice. Alice. Where is Alice?"

I went to my window and listened, and the whispering voices seemed to be carried on the air.

This was the state of affairs when Conan TreMellyn returned to Mount Mellyn.

It was afternoon when he arrived. Alvean had gone off by herself and I had sent for hot water to wash before I went for a stroll. Kitty brought it and I noticed the difference in her from the moment she entered the room. Her black eyes gleamed.

"Master be home," she said.

I tried not to show that I was faintly disturbed; and at that moment Daisy put her head round the door. The sisters looked very much alike just then. They changed subtly when they were in the presence of the opposite sex and I understood what that meant. Their excitement over the return of the master, of whom I gathered everyone was in awe, led me to one conclusion, and I felt faintly disgusted, not only with them but with myself for entertaining such thoughts.

Is he that sort of man, then? I was asking myself.

"He came in half an hour ago," said Kitty.

They were studying me speculatively and once more I thought I read their thoughts.

I said coolly, "Well, I'll wash my hands and then I am going for a walk."

I put on my hat, and even as I went out quickly by way of the back stairs I sensed the change. Mr. Polgrey was busy in the garden, and the two boys who came in from the village were working as though their lives depended on it. Tapperty was cleaning out the stables, so intent on his work that he did not notice me. There was no doubt that the whole household was in awe of the master.

At half past three I went back to the house, and as I was mounting the back stairs to my quarters Daisy came running after me.

"Master have been asking for you, Miss. He do wish to see you. He be waiting in the punch room."

I inclined my head and said, "I will take off my things and then go to the punch room."

In my room I took off my hat and smoothed my hair. My eyes were certainly amber today. They were resentful, which seemed ridiculous before I had met the man. I told myself as I went down that I had built up a picture of him because of certain looks I had seen in the faces of those two flighty girls. I had already assured myself that poor Alice had died of a broken heart because she had found herself married to a philanderer.

I knocked at the door.

"Come in." His voice was strong—arrogant, I called it.

He was standing with his back to the fireplace and I was immediately conscious of hi at height; he was well over six feet tall, and fact that he was so thin—one could almost gaunt—accentuated this. His hair was ck, but his eyes were light. His hands were ust into the pockets of his riding breeches he wore a dark blue coat with a white vat. There was an air of careless elegance ut him as though he cared nothing for his hes but could not help looking well in n.

Ie gave an impression of both strength and elly. There was sensuality in that face, I ided, but there was much else which was den.

So, Miss Leigh, at last we meet."

Ie did not advance to greet me, and his nner seemed insolent as though he were inding me that I was only a governess.

It does not seem a long time," I answered, r I have been in your house only a few s."

Well, let us not dwell on the time it has en us to get together. Now you are here, hat suffice."

Iis light eyes surveyed me mockingly, so I felt awkward and unattractive. "Mrs. grey gives me good reports of you."

That is kind of her."

Why should it be kind of her to tell me truth? I expect that from my employees."

I meant that she has been kind to me and has helped to make this good report sible."

I see that you are a woman who does not the ordinary clichés of conversation, but ns what she says."

I hope so."

Good. I have a feeling that we shall get on together."

Iis eyes were taking in each detail of my earance, I knew. "Tell me," he said, "how you find my daughter? Backward?"

course she is intelligent!" Celestine indignantly. "I hope Miss Leigh is not planning to be too harsh with her. Alvean is a good child."

Connan TreMellyn threw an amused glance in my direction. "I don't think Miss Leigh entirely agrees with that," he said.

"Perhaps I am overfond ——"

"Would you like me to leave now?" I suggested, for I had a great desire to get away from them.

"But I am interrupting," cried Celestine.

"No," I assured her. "We had finished our talk, I believe."

Connan TreMellyn looked in some amusement from her to me. It occurred to me that he probably found us equally unattractive. I was sure that neither of us was the least like the woman he would admire.

"Let us say it is to be continued," he said lightly. "I fancy, Miss Leigh, that you and I will have a great deal more to discuss, regarding my daughter."

I bowed my head and left them together.

In the schoolroom tea was ready for me. I felt too excited to eat, and when Alvean did not appear I thought that in all probability she was with her father.

At five o'clock she still had not put in an appearance, so I summoned Daisy and sent her to find the child and to remind her that from five to six we had work to do.

I waited. I was not surprised, because I had expected Alvean to rebel. Her father had arrived and she preferred to be with him rather than come to me for the hour of our reading.

I heard footsteps on the stairs. The door of Alvean's room which led into the schoolroom was opened, and there stood Connan Tre Mellyn holding Alvean by the arm.

Alvean's expression astonished me. She looked so unhappy that I found myself feeling sorry for her. In the background was Celestine.

"Here she is," announced Connan Tre-Mellyn. "Duty is duty, my daughter," he said to Alvean. "And when your governess summons you to your lessons, you must obey."

Alvean muttered and I could see that she was hard put to it to restrain her sobs.

"Connan," Celestine said quietly, "it is your first day back, you know, and Alvean so looked forward to your coming."

He smiled, but I thought how grim his mouth was. "Discipline," he murmured. "That, Celeste, is of the utmost importance. Come, we will leave Alvean with her governess."

He inclined his head in my direction, while Alvean threw a pleading glance at him which he ignored. The door shut, leaving me alone with my pupil.

That incident had taught me a great deal. Alvean adored her father and he was indifferent to her. My anger against him increased as my pity for the child grew. Small wonder that she was a difficult child. I would have liked Connan TreMellyn better, I told myself, if he had decided to forget discipline on his first day back, and devote a little time to his daughter's company.

Alvean was rebellious all that evening, but I insisted on her going to bed at her usual time. She told me she hated me, though there was no need for her to have mentioned a fact which was apparent.

I felt so disturbed when she was in her bed that I slipped out of the house and went into the woods, where I sat on a fallen tree trunk, brooding.

I wondered whether I was going to keep this job. It was not easy to say at this stage, and I was not sure whether I wanted to go or stay.

There were so many things to keep me. There was, for one thing, my interest in Gillyflower; there was my desire to wipe the rebellion from Alvean's heart. But I felt less eagerness for these tasks now that I had seen the master.

I was a little afraid of the man, although I could not say why. I was certain that he would leave me alone, but there was something magnetic about him, some quality which made it difficult for me to put him out of my mind. I thought more of dead Alice than I had before because I could not stop myself wondering what sort of person she could have been.

As I sat there I heard the sound of footsteps coming through the wood and I hesitated, wondering whether to wait there or go back to the house. A man was coming toward me, and there was something familiar about him which made my heart beat faster.

He started when he saw me; then he began to smile and I recognized him as the man I had met on the train.

"So we meet," he said. "I knew our reunion would not be long delayed. Why, you look as though you have seen a ghost. Has your stay at Mount Mellyn made you look for ghosts?"

"Who are you?" I asked.

"My name is Peter Nansellock. I have to confess to a little deception."

"You're Miss Celestine's brother?"

He nodded. "I knew who you were when we met in the train. I saw you sitting there, looking the part, and your name on the labels of your baggage confirmed my guess. I knew that they were expecting Miss Martha Leigh at Mount Mellyn."

"I am comforted to learn that my looks conform with the part I have been called upon to play in life."

"You really are a most untruthful young lady. You are in fact quite discomfited to learn that you were taken for a governess."

I felt myself grow pink with indignation. "Because I am a governess is no reason why I should be forced to accept insults from strangers."

I rose from the tree trunk, but he laid a hand on my arm. "Please let us talk awhile. There is much I have to say to you. There are things you should know."

My curiosity overcame my dignity and I sat down.

"That's better, Miss Leigh. You see, I remember your name."

"How extraordinary that you should notice a mere governess' name and then keep it in your memory."

"You are like a hedgehog," he retorted. "One only has to mention the word 'governess' and up come your spines. You will have to learn resignation. Aren't we taught that we must be content in that station of life to which we have been called?"

"Since I resemble a hedgehog, at least I am not spineless."

He laughed and then was immediately sober. "I do not possess second sight, Miss Leigh." he said quietly. "I know nothing of palmistry. I deceived you."

"Do you think I was deceived for a moment?"

"For many moments. Until this one, in fact, you have thought of me with wonder."

"Indeed, I have not thought of you at all."

"More untruths! I wonder if a young lady with such little regard for veracity is worthy to teach our little Alvean."

"Since you are a friend of the family, your best policy would be to warn them at once."

"But if Connan dismissed his daughter's governess, how sad that would be! I should wander through these woods without hope of meeting her."

"I see you are a frivolous person."

"It's true." He looked grave. "My brother was frivolous. My sister is the only commendable member of the family."

"I have already met her."

"Naturally. She is a constant visitor to Mount Mellyn. She dotes on Alvean."

I turned to him abruptly and said, "You told me to beware of Alice. What did you mean by that?"

"So you did remember?"

"It seemed such a strange thing to say."

"Alice is dead," he said, "but somehow she remains. That's what I always feel at Mount Mellyn. Nothing was the same after the day she . . . went."

"How did she die?"

"You have not heard the story yet?"

"No."

"I should have thought Mrs. Polgrey or one of those girls would have told you. But they haven't, eh? It's a very simple one—the sort of thing which must happen in many a home. A wife finds life with her husband intolerab She walks out . . . with another man. O Alice's story had a different ending." looked at the tips of his boots. "The man the case was my brother," he went on.

"Geoffrey Nansellock!" I cried.

"So you have heard of him!"

I thought of Gillyflower, whose birth h so distressed her mother that she had walk into the sea. "Yes," I said, "I've heard Geoffrey Nansellock. He was evidently philanderer."

"It sounds a harsh word to apply to po old Geoff. He had charm—all the charm the family, some say." He smiled. "He w not a bad sort. I was fond of old Geoff. H great weakness was women. He found the irresistible. And women love men who lo them. How can they help it? I mean, it is su a compliment. One by one they fell victim his charm."

"He did not hesitate to include other me wives among his victims."

"Spoken like a true governess! Alas, dear Miss Leigh, it appeared he did not since Alice was among them. It is true that was not well at Mount Mellyn. Alice w afraid of Connan. Before she married him s had known my brother. She and Geoffi were on the train—running away togethe

"I see." I drew myself away from him b cause I felt it was undignified to be talking past scandals in this way.

"They identified Geoffrey, although he w badly smashed up. There was a woman badly burned that it was impossible to rec nize her as Alice. But a locket she was wear was one she was known to possess. That w how she was identified—and of course th was the fact that Alice had disappeared."

"How dreadful to die in such a way!"

"The prim governess is shocked beca poor Alice died in the act of forming a gu partnership with my charming but err brother."

"Was she so unhappy at Mount Mellyn

"You have met Connan. Remember, knew that she had once been in love w

"Well, it was very tragic," I said briskly. 'But it is over. Why did you say, 'Beware of Alice,' as though she were still there?"

"Are you fey, Miss Leigh? No, of course ou are not. You are a governess with more han your fair share of common sense. You ould not be influenced by fantastic tales."

"What fantastic tales?"

He grinned at me, coming even closer, and realized that in a very short time it would be ark. I was anxious to get back to the house, nd my expression, I know, became a little mpatient.

"They recognized her locket. There are ome who think that it was not Alice who was illed on the train."

"Then if it was not, where is she?"

"That is what some people ask themselves. hat is why there are long shadows at Mount Mellyn."

I stood up. "I must get back. It will soon be ark."

He was standing beside me—a little taller han I—and our eyes met. "I thought you hould know these things," he said almost ently.

I began walking in the direction from which had come. "My duties are with the child," answered somewhat brusquely. "I am not ere for any other purpose."

"But how can even a governess, overburdened with common sense though she may be, now to what purposes fate will put her?"

"I think I know what is expected of me." was alarmed because he walked beside me. There is no need for you to escort me back o the house."

"I am forced to contradict you. There is very reason."

"Do you think I am incapable of looking fter myself?"

"I think none more capable of doing that han yourself. But, as it happens, I was on my ay to call and this is the most direct way to he house."

I was silent until we came to Mount Mellyn.

Connan TreMellyn was coming from the stables.

"Hello there, Con!" cried Peter Nansellock.

Connan TreMellyn looked at us in mild surprise which I suppose was due to the fact that we were together. I hurried round to the back of the house.

In the morning the fancies of the previous night seemed foolish. I asked myself why so many people—including myself—wanted to make a mystery of what had happened in this house. It was an ordinary enough story.

My room was filled with sunshine and I felt exhilarated. I knew why. It was due to that man, Connan TreMellyn. Not that I liked him—quite the reverse; but it was as though he had issued a challenge. I was going to make a success of this job. I was going to make of Alvean not only a model pupil but a charming, unaffected, normal little girl.

I heard the sound of a horse's hoofs and went to the window to look out. No one was visible. The lawns looked fresh and lovely with the early-morning dew on them. It was one of those mornings when there was every promise of a beautiful day.

I threw open my window and leaned out, my coppery plaits, the ends tied with pieces of blue ribbon for bedtime, swinging out with me.

Connan TreMellyn emerged from the stables. He saw me before I was able to draw back, and I felt myself grow scarlet with embarrassment to be seen with my hair down and in my nightgown thus.

He called jauntily, "Good morning, Miss Leigh."

In that moment I said to myself, So it was his horse I heard. Has he been riding in the early morning, or out all night? I imagined his visiting one of the gay ladies of the neighborhood.

"Good morning," I said, and my voice sounded curt.

He was coming swiftly across the lawn. "A beautiful morning," he cried.

"Extremely so," I answered.

I withdrew into my room as I heard him shout, "Hello, Alvean! So you're up too."

I was standing well back from the window now and I heard Alvean cry, "Hello, papa!" Her voice was soft and gentle with that wistful note which I had detected when she spoke of him on the previous day. I knew that she was delighted to have seen him, that it would make her extremely happy if he stopped awhile and chatted with her.

He did no such thing. He went into the house.

I put on my dressing gown and, on impulse, crossed the schoolroom to Alvean's room. I opened the door and went in. She was sitting astride a chair and talking to herself.

There is no one but yourself who knows whether you are cowardly or cruel, or loyal and devout. Others do not see you, they guess at you by uncertain conjectures; they see not so much your nature as your art. Therefore, do not cling to their judgment; cling to your own. MONTAIGNE

"There's nothing to be afraid of really. All you have to do is hold tight and not be afraid . . . and you won't fall off."

She was so intent on what she was doing that she had not heard the door open, and I stood for a few seconds, watching her.

I learned a great deal in that moment. He was a great horseman, this father of hers. He wanted his daughter to be a good horsewoman, too, but Alvean, although she desperately wanted to win his approval, was afraid of horses.

I quietly shut the door and went back to my room. I looked at the sunshine on the carpet and my elation returned. I was going to make a success of this job. I was going to fight Connan TreMellyn, if he wanted it that way. I was going to make him proud of his daughter.

Lessons were trying that morning. Alvean was late, having breakfasted with her father in accordance with the custom of the family. I had to send for her, and that she deeply resented.

I tried to make lessons as interesting as I could, and I must have succeeded for, in spite of her resentment toward me, she could not hide her interest in the history and geography lessons which I set for that morning.

She took luncheon with her father while I ate alone in the schoolroom, and after that I decided to approach Connan TreMellyn.

I saw him leave the house and go across to the stables. I immediately followed him and, when I arrived at the stables, heard him giving orders to Billy Trehay to saddle Royal Russet.

He looked surprised to see me. "I had hoped to have a few words with you," I said primly. "Perhaps this is an inconvenient time."

"That depends," he said, "on how many words you wish us to exchange." He took out his watch and looked at it. "I can give you five minutes, Miss Leigh."

"In my youth," I said, "I was constantly in the saddle. I believe Alvean wishes to learn to ride. I am asking your permission to teach her."

"You have my permission to try."

"You sound as though you doubt my ability to succeed."

"I fear I do."

"I don't understand why you should doubt my ability to teach when you have not tested my skill."

"Oh, Miss Leigh," he said almost mockingly, "it is not your ability to teach that I doubt. It is Alvean's to learn."

"You mean others have failed to teach her?"

"I have failed. There are some people who can never learn to ride."

Before I could stop myself I burst out, "There are some people who cannot teach."

He stopped to stare at me in astonishment, and I knew that nobody in this house had ever dared to talk to him in such a way.

I thought, This is it. I shall now be told that my services are no longer required, and I may pack my bags and depart.

There was a violent temper there, and I could see that he was fighting to control it. He still looked at me and I could not read the expression in those light eyes. I believed it was contemptuous. "You must excuse me, Miss Leigh," he said; and left me.

I went straight to Alvean. I found her in the schoolroom. There was the sullen, defiant look in her eyes and I believed she had seen me talking to her father. "Your father has said I may give you riding lessons, Alvean. Would you like that?"

I saw the muscles of her face tighten, and my heart sank.

I went on quickly, "When we were your age, my sister and I were keen riders. She was two years younger than I and we used to compete together in the local shows. The exciting days in our lives were those when there was a gymkhana in our village."

"They have them here," she said.

"It's great fun!"

She was silent for a moment; then she said, "I can't do it. I don't like horses."

"You don't like horses!" My voice was shocked. "Why, they're the gentlest creatures in the world."

"They're not. They don't like me. I rode Gray Mare and she ran fast and wouldn't stop, and if Tapperty hadn't caught her rein she would have killed me."

"Gray Mare wasn't the mount for you. You should have a pony to start with."

"Then I had Buttercup. She was as bad in a different way. She wouldn't go when I tried to make her."

I hastened to assure her that was the way horses behaved until they understood you. When they did understand you they loved you as though you were their very dear friend. I saw the wistful look in her eyes and I said, "Look, Alvean, come out with me now. Let's see what we can do together."

She shook her head suspiciously.

"There's one thing to learn before you can begin to ride," I said, "and that is to love your horse. Then you won't be afraid. As soon as you're not afraid, your horse will begin to love you. He'll know you're his master, and he wants a master; but it must be a tender, loving master."

She was giving me her attention now.

"When a horse runs away as Gray Mare did, that means she is frightened. She's as frightened as you are, and her way of showing it is to run. As for Buttercup—she's a mischievous old nag. She's lazy and knows that you can't handle her, so she won't do as she's told. But once you let her know you're the master, she'll obey."

"I didn't know Gray Mare was frightened of me," she said.

"Your father wants you to ride," I told her.

It was the wrong thing to have said: it reminded her of past fears, past humiliations; I saw the stubborn fear return to her eyes.

"Wouldn't it be fun," I said, "to surprise him. I mean . . . suppose you learned and you could jump and gallop, and he didn't know about it—until he saw you do it."

The highest achievements of old age are the married couple who have not quarreled too much, who have produced children and not alienated them, and who have received, as their final reward, the collusion of their grandchildren. The true history of the human race is the history of human affection. In comparison with it all other histories—including economic history—are false. It has never been written down, and owing to its reticent nature it cannot be written, but it has continued from generation to generation ever since the human race became recognizable.

E. M. FORSTER

It hurt me to see the joy in her face and I wondered how any man could be so callous as to deny a child the affection she asked.

"Alvean," I said, "let's try."

"Yes," she said, "let's try. I'll go and change into my things."

I gave a little cry of disappointment, remembering that I had no riding habit with me. Alvean was looking at me and I told her, "I have no riding clothes."

Her face fell and then lit up. "Come with me," she said. She was almost conspiratorial.

We went along the gallery until we were in that part of the house which Mrs. Polgrey had told me was not for me. Alvean paused before a door and I had the impression that she was steeling herself to go in. She at length threw open the door and stood aside for me to enter.

It was a small room which I judged to be a dressing room. In it were a long mirror, a tallboy, a chest of drawers and an oak chest.

"There are lots of clothes here," Alvean said. "In the chests and the tallboy."

She opened the chest. In it were dresses, petticoats, hats and boots. Alvean said quickly, "There are a lot of clothes in the attics. They were grandmamma's and great-grand-mamma's. When there were parties they used to dress up in them and play charades."

I held up a lady's black beaver hat—obviously meant to be worn for riding. I put it on my head and Alvean laughed. That laughter moved me more than anything had done since I had entered this house.

"You look so funny in it, Miss," she said.

I got up and stood before the long mirror. I certainly looked unlike myself. My eyes were brilliant, my hair looked quite copper against the black. I decided that I looked slightly less unattractive than usual, and that was what Alvean meant by "funny."

"Not the least like a governess," she explained. She was pulling out a riding habit ade of black woolen cloth and mmed with braid and ball fringe. It d a blue collar and blue cuffs and was elegantly cut.

I held it up against myself. "I ink," I said, "that this would fit."

"Try it on," said Alvean. Then, No, not here. You take it to your om and put it on." She suddenly emed obsessed by the desire to get t of this room. I thought that she as eager to get started on our les-n, and there was not a great deal of ne if we were to be back for tea at ur.

I picked up the dress and went back my room. She hurried through to rs, and I immediately put on the ling habit.

It was not a perfect fit, but I had ver been used to expensive clothes d was prepared to forget it was a tle tight at the waist, and that the eeves were on the short side, for a w woman looked back at me from y mirror, and when I set the beaver t on my head I was delighted with yself.

I ran along to Alvean's room; she as in her habit, and when she saw e her eyes lit up.

We went down to the stables and I ld Billy Trehay to saddle Buttercup r Alvean and another horse for my-lf, as we were going to have a riding sson.

He looked at me with some aston-nment, but I told him that we had tle time and were impatient to be-n.

When we were ready I put Butter-p on a leading rein and took her th Alvean on her back into the pad-ck.

For nearly an hour we were there d I concentrated on giving her con-ence. I made her grow accustomed sitting her horse, to talking to her rse. I made her lean back full length Buttercup's back and look up at sky; then I made her shut her s. I gave her lessons in mounting d dismounting. Buttercup did no re than walk round that field, but I believe that at the end of the hour I d done a great deal toward making ean lose her fear. That was what I d determined should be the first on.

was astonished to find that it was f past three, and I think Alvean s too.

"We must return to the house at e," I said, "if we are to change in e for tea."

As we came out of the field a figure e from the grass and I saw, to my prise, that it was Peter Nansellock. He clapped his hands as we came ng. "Here endeth the first lesson," cried, "and an excellent one. I did know," he went on, turning to "that equestrian skill was in-led in your accomplishments."

"Were you watching us, Uncle er?" demanded Alvean.

"For the last half hour. My ad-ration for you both is beyond ex-sion."

Alvean smiled slowly. "Did you ly admire us?"

"Much as I could be tempted to pliment two beautiful ladies," he , placing his hand on his heart and ing elegantly, "I could never tell ."

"Until this moment," I said tartly. ur uncle is a joker, Alvean."

"Yes," said Alvean almost sadly. now."

"And," I added, "it is time that we ned for tea."

"I wonder if I might be invited to olroom tea?"

"You are calling to see Mr. Tre-yn?" I asked.

"I am calling to take tea with you ladies."

Alvean laughed suddenly. I could see that she was not unaffected by what I supposed was the charm of this man.

"Mr. TreMellyn left Mount Mellyn early this afternoon," I said. "I have no idea whether or not he has returned. Come along, Alvean."

Peter Nansellock walked behind us, and when we reached the stables I saw him making for the house.

Alvean and I dismounted, handed our horses to two of the stableboys, and hurried up to our rooms.

I got out of the riding habit and into my dress and thought how drab I looked in my gray cotton.

I picked up the riding habit to hang in my cupboard, deciding that I would take the first opportunity of asking Mrs. Polgrey if it was in order for me to use it. I was afraid I had acted on impulse by doing so this afternoon.

As I lifted the habit I saw the name on the waistband. "Alice TreMellyn" was embossed in neat letters on the black satin facings.

Then I understood. That room had been her dressing room. My heart felt as though it were leaping into my throat. This, I said to myself, is absurd. Where else could we have found a modern riding habit?

Boldly I picked up the riding dress and hung it in my cupboard. She would be glad I used her habit, I told myself. Am I not trying to help her daughter?

What had happened to my common sense? Whatever I told myself, I could not hide the fact that I wished the dress had belonged to anyone but Alice.

When I had changed there was a knock on my door and I was relieved to see Mrs. Polgrey standing there.

"Do come in," I said. "I have been giving Miss Alvean a riding lesson. And, as I had no riding habit, she found one for me. I believe it to have been her mother's." I went to my wardrobe and produced it.

Mrs. Polgrey nodded.

"I wore it this once. Perhaps it was wrong of me."

"Did you have the master's permission to give her this riding lesson?"

"Oh, yes. I made sure of that."

"Then there is nothing to worry about. He would have no objection to your wearing the dress. I can see no reason why you should not keep it in your room—providing, of course, you only wear it when giving Miss Alvean her riding lesson."

"Thank you," I said. "You have set my mind at rest."

Mrs. Polgrey bowed her head in approval. "Mr. Peter Nansellock is downstairs."

"Yes, we saw him as we came in."

"The master is not at home," she explained, "and Mr. Peter has asked that you entertain him for tea—you and Miss Alvean."

"Oh, but should we—I mean should I?" I asked.

"Well, yes, Miss, I think it would be in order. I think that is what the master would wish, particularly as Mr. Peter suggests it. Miss Jansen, during the time she was here, often helped to entertain. I have told Mr. Nansellock that tea will be served in the punch room. Will you come down?"

"Yes, I will."

She sailed out and I found myself smiling not without a little complacence. It was turning out to be a most enjoyable day.

When I reached the punch room, Alvean was not there, but Peter Nansellock was sprawling in one of the tapestry-covered chairs. He leaped to his feet.

"But this is delightful."

"Mrs. Polgrey has told me that I am to do the honors in the absence of Mr. TreMellyn."

"How like you to remind me that you are merely the governess!"

"I felt," I replied, "that it was necessary to do so, since you may have forgotten."

"You are a charming hostess! Indeed, I never saw you look less like a governess than when you were giving Alvean her lesson."

"It was my riding habit. Borrowed plumes. A pheasant would look like a peacock if it could acquire the tail."

"My dear Miss Pheasant, I do not agree. 'Manners makyth the man'—or woman—not fine feathers."

This banter was interrupted by the appearance of Alvean.

"Ah, the little lady herself!" cried Peter. "Alvean, how good it is of you and Miss Leigh to allow me to take tea with you."

"I wonder why you want to," replied Alvean. "You never have before—except when Miss Jansen was here."

"Hush, hush! You betray me," he murmured.

Mrs. Polgrey came in with Kitty. The latter set the tray on a table, while Mrs. Polgrey lighted the spirit lamp. Kitty laid a cloth on a small table and brought in cakes and cucumber sandwiches.

"Miss, would you care to make the tea yourself?" asked Mrs. Polgrey.

I said I would do so with pleasure.

Kitty seemed reluctant to leave the room. I believed that Mrs. Polgrey was also to some extent under the spell of the man. It must be, I told myself, because he is such a contrast to the master. Peter had that comforting quality of making any woman in his company feel that she was an attractive one.

I made tea and Alvean handed him bread and butter.

"What luxury!" he cried. "I feel like a sultan with two beautiful ladies to wait on me."

"You're telling lies again," cried Alvean. "We're neither of us ladies, because I'm not grown up and Miss is a governess."

"What sacrilege!" he murmured, and his warm eyes were on me almost caressingly. I felt embarrassed under his scrutiny.

I changed the conversation briskly. "I think Alvean will make a good horsewoman in time," I said. "What was your opinion?"

I saw how eagerly the girl waited on his words.

"She'll be the champion of Cornwall; you see!"

She could not hide her pleasure.

"And"—he lifted a finger and wagged it at her—"don't you forget whom you have to thank for it."

The glance Alvean threw at me was almost shy, and I felt suddenly happy. My resentment against life had never been so far away; I had ceased to envy my charming sister. At that moment there was only one person I wanted to be: Martha Leigh, sitting in the punch room, taking tea with Peter Nansellock and Alvean TreMellyn.

Alvean said, "It's to be a secret for a while."

"Yes, we're going to surprise her father."

"I'll be silent as the grave."

"Why do people say 'silent as the grave'?" asked Alvean.

"Because," put in Peter, "dead men don't talk."

"Sometimes they have ghosts, perhaps," said Alvean, looking over her shoulder.

"What Mr. Nansellock meant," I said quickly, "was that he will keep our little secret. Alvean, I believe Mr. Nansellock would like some more cucumber sandwiches."

She leaped up to offer them to him.

"You have not paid a visit to Mount Widden yet, Miss Leigh," he said. "I'm sure my sister would be delighted if you and Alvean would come over and take tea with us."

"I am not sure ——" I began.

"That it lies within your duties? I'll tell you how we'll arrange it. You shall bring Miss Alvean to take tea at Mount Widden. Bringing her to us and taking her home again, I am sure, would come within the duties of the most meticulous governess."

Enjoy the happy flavor of Prunes

There are all kinds of exciting things you can do with prunes. Wrapped in bacon and strung along with ham and onions, they flavor a delicious barbecue dish. They add color and contrast to gelatin dessert. And prunes are a naturally delightful way to start a happy morning.

At any meal, prunes are both good to eat and very good for you. Plump, tender, tree-ripened California Prunes are chock-full of natural fruit sugar, vitamins and minerals...all the things that make you feel happy and healthy. Treat your family to prunes often. Your grocer has them in cartons, bags, ready-cooked in jars or cans . . . and as appetizing prune juice.

"When shall we come?" asked Alvean.

"This is an open invitation."

I smiled. I knew what that meant. He was again talking for the sake of talking; he had no intention of asking me to tea.

The door opened suddenly and, to my embarrassment—which I hoped I managed to hide—Connan TreMellyn came in.

I rose to my feet, and he gave me a quick smile. "Miss Leigh," he said, "is there a cup of tea for me?"

"Alvean," I said, "ring for another cup, please."

She got up to do so, alert, eager to please her father. It made her somewhat clumsy, and as she rose from her chair she knocked over her cup of tea. She flushed scarlet with mortification.

I said, "Never mind. Ring the bell. Kitty will clear it up."

I knew that Connan TreMellyn was watching with some amusement. If I had known he would return I should have been very reluctant to entertain Peter Nansellock to tea in the punch room.

Kitty came and I indicated the mess of tea and broken china on the carpet. "And please bring another cup for Mr. TreMellyn," I added.

"Had a busy day, Connan?" asked Peter.

Connan TreMellyn began to talk of estate business, which I felt might have been to remind me that my duties consisted of dispensing tea and nothing else. I was not to imagine that I was in truth a hostess. I was there as an upper servant, nothing more.

I felt angry with him for coming in and spoiling my little triumph. I wondered how he would react when I presented him with the good little horsewoman I was determined Alvean was to become. He would probably make some slighting remark and show us such indifference that we should feel our trouble was wasted.

You poor child, I thought, you are trying to win the affections of a man who doesn't know the meaning of affection. Poor Alvean! Poor child!

The cup and saucer was brought and I poured out his tea. He was watching, expecting me to rise and take it to him.

"Alvean," I said, "please pass this to your father."

And she was very eager to do so. He said a brief "Thanks."

I looked at my watch, and said, "I am going to ask you to excuse Alvean and me. It is nearly five o'clock and we have our studies between five and six."

"And we must," said Connan, "on no account interfere with those."

"But surely," cried Peter, "on such an occasion there could be a little relaxation of the rules."

Alvean was looking eager. She was unhappy in her father's presence, but she could not bear to leave it.

"Please, papa ——" she began.

He looked at her sternly. "My dear child, you heard what your governess said."

Alvean blushed and looked uncomfortable, but I was already saying "Good afternoon" to Peter Nansellock and making my way to the door.

That night when Alvean had retired to her room I went for a stroll in the woods. I was beginning to look upon these woods as a place of refuge, a place in which to be quiet and think about my life while I wondered what shape it would take.

The day had been eventful, a pleasant day until Connan TreMellyn had come into it and disturbed the peace. I wondered if his business ever took him away for long periods—really long periods, not merely a matter of a few days. If this were so, I thought, I might have a chance of making Alvean into a happier little girl.

I stayed in the woods until it was almost dusk. Then I made for the house, and I had not been in my room more than a few minutes when Kitty knocked.

"I thought I 'eard 'ee come in, Miss," she said. "Master be asking for 'ee. He be in his library."

"Then you had better take me there," I said, "for it is a room I have never visited."

She led me to a wing of the house more luxurious than any part which I had so far seen.

Kitty opened a door and, with that vacuous smile on her face, announced, "Miss be here, master."

"Thank you, Kitty," he said. And then, "Oh, come along in, Miss Leigh." He was sitting at a table on which were leather-bound books and papers. He said, "Do sit down, Miss Leigh."

I held my head high, even haughtily, waiting.

"I was interested to learn this afternoon," he began, "that you had already made the acquaintance of Mr. Nansellock."

"Really?" The surprise in my voice was not assumed.

"Of course," he went on, "it was inevitable that you would meet him sooner or later. He and his sister are constant visitors at the house, but ——"

"But you feel that it is unnecessary that he should make the acquaintance of your daughter's governess," I said quickly.

"I beg you, Miss Leigh, do not put words into my mouth which I had no intention of uttering. What friends you make must be entirely your own concern. But your aunt, in a manner of speaking, put you under my care when she put you under my roof, and I have asked you to come here that I may offer you a word of advice on a subject which, I fear, you may think a little indelicate."

I was flushing scarlet and my embarrassment was not helped by the fact that this, I was sure, secretly amused him.

"Mr. Nansellock has a reputation for being—how shall I put it?—susceptible to young ladies."

"Oh!" I cried, unable to suppress the exclamation, so great was my discomfort. "Mr. TreMellyn, I do not think I am in need of such a warning."

"He is very handsome," he went on, and the mocking note had come back to his voice. "He has a reputation for being a charming fellow. There was a young lady here before you, a Miss Jansen. He often called to see her. Miss Leigh, I do beg of you not to misunderstand me. Please do not take all that Mr. Nansellock says too seriously."

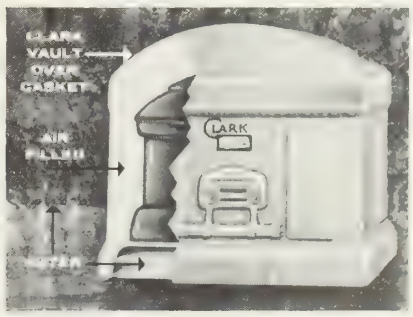
I heard myself say in a voice unlike my habitual tone, "It is extremely kind of you, Mr. TreMellyn, to concern yourself with my welfare."

"But of course I concern myself with your welfare. You are here to look after my daughter. Therefore it is of the utmost importance to me."

He rose, and I did the same. I saw that this was dismissal. He came swiftly to my side and placed his hand on my shoulder.

"Forgive me," he said. "I'm a blunt man. I merely wish to offer you a friendly warning."

For a few seconds I looked into those cool light eyes and thought I had a fleeting glimpse of the man behind the mask. I was sobered suddenly. My feelings in that moment were so mixed that I cannot even at this day define them.



"Thank you," I said; and I escaped from the library back to my room.

Each day Alvean and I went to the field and had an hour's riding. As I watched the little girl on Buttercup I knew that her father must have been extremely impatient with her, for the child, though not a born rider, would soon be giving a good account of herself.

I had discovered that every November a gymkhana was held in Mellyn village, and I had told Alvean that she should certainly enter for one of the events. It was enjoyable planning this, because Connan TreMellyn would be one of the judges.

So every afternoon I would put on Alice's riding habit (I had ceased to care to whom it had previously belonged, for it had become mine now) and we would go to the field and there I would put Alvean through her paces.

On the day we tried her first gallop we were elated.

Afterward we returned to the house together and as I was with her I went in by way of the front entrance, as I had when I had first arrived at the house.

No sooner were we in the hall than Alvean ran from me and left by that door through which Mrs. Polgrey had taken me. I followed her and as I passed out of the hall I noticed a damp, musty smell and I saw that the door leading to the chapel was slightly ajar. Thinking that Alvean had gone in there, I went in. It was cold in the place, and I shivered as I stood on the blue flagstones and gazed at the altar and the pews.

I had taken a few steps inside the room and was standing with my back to the door when I heard a gasp behind me and a quick intake of breath.

"No!" said a voice, so horrified that I did not recognize it.

For some unaccountable reason my whole body seemed to freeze. I turned sharply, but it was only Celestine Nansellock who stood looking at me.

She was so white that I thought she was going to faint—or perhaps it was the dimness of the chapel which made her appear so. I thought I understood. She had seen me in Alice's riding habit and she had believed in that second that I was Alice.

"Miss Nansellock," I said quickly to reassure her, "Alvean and I have been having a riding lesson."

She swayed a little; her face was now a grayish color.

"I'm sorry I startled you," I went on.

"I wondered who was here," she said almost sharply. "Whatever made you come into the chapel?"

"I came in this way with Alvean. She ran off and I thought she might be in here."

"Alvean! Oh, no—no one ever comes in here. It's a gloomy place, don't you think? Let's go."

"You look . . . unwell, Miss Nansellock. Would you like me to ring for some brandy?"

"Oh, no—no. I'm perfectly well."

I said boldly, "You're looking at my clothes. They're . . . borrowed. I have to give Alvean riding lessons and I lacked the suitable clothes. These were . . . her mother's."

"I see."

"I did explain to Mrs. Polgrey, who thought it was quite in order for me to use them."

"Of course. Why not?"

"I'm afraid I startled you."

"Oh, no, you mustn't say that. I'm quite all right. It's the light in the chapel. It makes us all look so ghastly. You yourself look a little pale, Miss Leigh. It's those windows—that particular type of stained glass. It plays havoc with our complexions." She laughed. "Let's get out of here."

We went down the few steps and back to the hall, and then out of the house. I noticed that in these few minutes she had regained her normal color.

She had been shocked to see me. I told myself I knew why. She had seen the back of me in Alice's riding clothes and she had thought for the moment that it was Alice standing there.

"Does Alvean enjoy her riding lessons?" she asked. "Tell me, are you getting along with her better now? I fancied when you arrived there was a little antagonism on her part."

"She is the kind of child who would automatically be antagonistic to authority. Yes, I think we are becoming friends. These riding lessons have helped considerably. By the way, they are a secret from her father."

Celestine Nansellock looked a little shocked, and I hurried on: "Oh, it is only her good progress which is a secret. He knows about the lessons. Naturally I asked his permission first. But he does not realize how well she is coming along. It is to be a surprise."

"I see. Miss Leigh, I do hope she is not overstrained by these lessons."

"Overstrained? But why? She is a normal, healthy child."

"She is highly strung. I wonder whether she is of the temperament to make a rider."

"She is so young that we have a chance of forming her character which will have its effect on her temperament. She is enjoying her lessons and is very eager to surprise her father."

"So she is becoming your friend, Miss Leigh. I am glad of that. Now I must go. I was just on my way out when I passed the chapel and saw the door open."

I said good-by to her and went up to my room by the usual way. I went to a mirror and looked at myself. I'm afraid this was becoming a habit since I had come here. I murmured; "That might be Alice—apart from the face." Then I half closed my eyes and let the face become blurred while I imagined a different face there.

Oh yes, it must have been a shock for Celestine.

I wondered then what Connan TreMellyn would say if he knew that I was going about in his wife's clothes and had frightened practical people like Celestine Nansellock when they saw me in dim places.

I felt he would not wish me to continue to look like Alice.

So since I needed Alice's clothes for my riding lessons with Alvean, and since I was determined that those lessons should continue—that I might have the pleasure of saying, "I told you so!" to Alvean's father—I was as anxious as I was sure Celestine Nansellock was that nothing should be said about our encounter in the chapel.

A week passed and I felt I was slipping into a routine. Lessons in the schoolroom and the riding field progressed favorably. Peter Nansellock came over to the house on two occasions, but I managed to elude him. I faced the fact that I was stimulated by Peter Nansellock and that I could very easily find myself in a state of mind where I was looking forward to his visits. I had no intention of placing myself in that position.

I thought now and then of his brother, Geoffrey, and concluded that Peter must be very like him. When I thought of Geoffrey I thought also of Mrs. Polgrey's daughter of whom she had never spoken.

My interest in Alvean's riding lessons and her father's personality had made me forget little Gillyflower temporarily. The child was so quiet that she was easily forgotten. Occasionally I heard her thin reedy voice, singing out-of-doors or in the house.

I used to say to myself when I heard it, If Gilly can learn songs she can surely learn other things.

I must have been given to daydreams, for side by side with that picture of Connan TreMellyn, handing his daughter the first prize at the November gymkhana and giving me an apologetic and appreciative glance at the same time, there was another picture. This was of Gilly sitting at the schoolroom table side by side with Alvean, while I listened to whispering in the background: "This could never have happened but for Miss Martha Leigh. You see, she is a wonder with the children. Look what she has done for Alvean—and now for Gilly."

But at this time Alvean was still a stubborn child and Gillyflower elusive and, as the Tapperty girls said, "with a tile loose in the upper story."

Then into those more or less peaceful days came two events to disturb me.

The first was of small moment, but I could not get it out of my mind.

I was going through one of Alvean's exercise books, marking her sums, while she was sitting at the table writing an essay. As I turned the pages of the exercise book a piece of paper fell out.

It was covered with drawings. I had already discovered that Alvean had a talent for drawing and, when the opportunity offered, I intended to approach Connan TreMellyn about this. I myself could teach her only the rudiments of the art, but I believed she was worth a qualified drawing teacher.

The drawings were of faces. I recognized one of myself. It was not bad. Did I really look as prim as that? Not always, I hoped. But perhaps that was how she saw me. There was her father—several of him. I turned the page and this was covered with girls' faces. I was not sure who they were meant to be. Herself? No—that was Gilly, surely. And yet it had a look of herself.

I stared at the page. I was so intent that I did not realize she had leaned across the table until she snatched it away.

"That's mine," she said.

"And that," I retaliated, "is extremely bad manners."

"You have no right to pry."

"My dear child, that paper was in your arithmetic book."

"Then it had no right to be there."

"You must take your revenge on the paper," I said lightly. And then more seriously, "I do beg of you not to snatch things in that ill-mannered way."

"I'm sorry," she murmured still defiantly.

I turned back to the sums, to most of which she had given inaccurate answers. Arithmetic was not one of her best subjects.

I said, "Alvean, you will have to work harder at your sums. Now if your arithmetic were half as good as your drawings, I should be very pleased."

Still she did not answer.

"Why did you not wish me to see the faces you had drawn? I thought some of them quite good."

Still no answer.

"Particularly," I went on, "that one of your father."

Even at such a time the mention of his name could bring that tender, wistful curve to her lips.

"And those girls' faces. Do tell me who they were supposed to be—you or Gilly?"

The smile froze on her lips. "Who did you take them for, Miss?"

"Whom," I corrected gently.

"Whom did you take them for, then?"

"Well, let me look at them again."

She hesitated, then she brought out the paper and handed it to me; her eyes were eager.

I studied the faces. I said, "This one could be either you or Gilly."

"You think we're alike, then?"

"N-no. I hadn't thought so until this moment."

"I'm not like her!" she cried passionately. "I'm not like that . . . idiot."

"Alvean, you must not use such a word. Don't you realize that it is extremely unkind?"

"It's true. But I'm not like her. I won't have you say it. If you say it again I'll ask my father to send you away. I only have to ask him and you'll go."

She was shouting, trying to convince herself of two things, I realized: one, that there was not the slightest resemblance between herself and Gilly; and the other, that she only had to ask her father for something and her wishes would be granted.

Why? I asked myself. What was the reason for this vehemence?

I said calmly, looking at the watch pinned to my gray cotton bodice, "You have exactly ten minutes in which to finish your essay."

I drew the arithmetic book toward me and pretended to give it my attention.

The second incident was even more upsetting.

It had been a moderately peaceful day, which meant that lessons had gone well. I had taken my late-evening stroll and when I returned I saw two carriages drawn up in front of the house. One I recognized as from Mount Widden, so I guessed that either Peter or Celestine was visiting. The other carriage I did not know, but I noticed the crest on it. It was a very fine carriage.

I went up the back stairs to my apartment. It was a warm night, and as I sat at my window I heard music coming from another of the open windows. I realized that Connan TreMellyn was entertaining guests.

I recognized the music from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream and felt a sudden longing to be down there among them. I was overcome with curiosity and could not resist the temptation to ring the bell and summon Kitty or Daisy, who always knew what was going on.

It was Daisy who came. She looked excited.

I said, "I want some hot water, Daisy. Could you please bring it for me?"

"Why, yes, Miss."

"There are guests here tonight, I understand."

"Oh, yes, Miss. Though it's nothing to the parties we used to have. I reckon now the year's up, the master will be entertaining more. That's what Mrs. Polgrey says."

"It must have been very quiet during the last year."

"But only right and proper—after a death in the family."

"Of course. Who are the guests tonight?"

"There's Miss Celestine and Mr. Peter, of course. And I'll tell you who else is here: Sir Thomas and Lady Treslyn."

She looked conspiratorial, as though there was something very important about these two.

"Oh?" I said encouragingly.

"Mrs. Polgrey says that Sir Thomas bain't fit to go gallivanting at parties, and should be abed."

"Why, is he ill?"

"Well, he'll never see seventy again and he's got one of those bad hearts. Mrs. Polgrey says you can go off sudden with a heart like that, and don't need no pushing neither. Not that ——" She stopped and twinkled at me. "She's another kettle of fish."

"Who?"

"Why, Lady Treslyn, of course. You ought to see her. She's a real beauty and you can see she's only waiting ——"

"I gather she is not of the same age as her husband."

Daisy giggled. "They say there's nearly forty years' difference and she'd like to pretend it was fifty."

"You don't seem to like her."

"Me? Well, if I don't, some do!" That sent Daisy into hysterical laughter again.

I was ashamed of myself for sharing the gossip of a servant, so I said, "I would like that hot water, Daisy."

Daisy subsided and went off to get it, leaving me with a clearer picture of what was happening in that drawing room.

I was still thinking of that when I had washed my hands and unpinned my hair preparatory to retiring for the night.

The musicians had been playing a Chopin waltz and it had seemed to spirit me away from my governess' bedroom and tantalize me with pleasures outside my reach.

I went to the window. I could smell the sea and hear the gentle rhythm of the waves. The "voices" were starting up in Mellyn Cove.

And then suddenly I saw a light in a dark part of the house and felt the goose pimples rise on my flesh. I knew that window belonged to the room to which Alvean had taken me to choose my riding habit. It was Alice's dressing room.

The blind had been down. I had not noticed that before. Indeed, I was sure it had not been like that earlier in the evening because, since I had known that that was Alice's room, I had made a habit—which I regretted and of which I had tried to cure myself—of glancing at the window whenever I looked out of my own.

The blind was of thin material, for behind it I distinctly saw the light. It was a faint light, but there was no mistaking it. I stood at my window staring out and, as I did so, I saw a shadow on the blind. It was that of a woman.

I heard a voice close to me saying, "It is Alice!" and realized that I had spoken aloud.

Then again I saw the figure silhouetted against the blind.

My hands which gripped the window sill were trembling as I watched that flickering light. I had an impulse to summon Daisy or Kitty, or go to Mrs. Polgrey. I restrained myself, imagining how foolish I should look. So I remained staring at the window.

And after a while all was darkness.

I stood at my window for a long time watching, but I saw nothing more. They were playing another Chopin waltz in the drawing room, and I stood until I was cold even on that warm September night.

Then I went to bed, but I could not sleep for a long time.

At last, when I did sleep, I dreamed that a woman came into my room; she was wearing a riding habit with blue collar and cuffs, trimmed with braid and ball fringe. She said, "I was not on that train, Miss Leigh. You wonder where I was. It is for you to find me."

Through my dreams I heard the whispering of the waves in the caves below; and the first thing I did on rising next morning—which I did as soon as the dawn appeared—was to go to my window and look across at the room which—little more than a year ago—had belonged to Alice.

The blinds were drawn up. I could clearly see the rich blue velvet curtains.

She Speaks to Seven Million Women

TV's "50-50 Club" makes Ruth Lyons both a star and "the Midwest's most influential housewife."

By BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN

HOW AMERICA LIVES

Ruth Lyons is an attractive, vital blonde, with a bad slouch such as teen-agers get lectured for, and a sandpaper voice that gets her the highest TV rating of any daytime performer in the country. Millions can hardly wait for her next appearance. Tickets for her show televised from WLW-T in Cincinnati and fed to Crosley Broadcasting stations WLW-C, WLW-D and WLW-I and broadcast on WLW-Radio, sell as far as five years in advance and are actually squirreled away in family strongboxes along with insurance policies and wills. One couple who moved from Ohio before they could use their tickets drove back from New York—two days back and forth of hard winter driving—to catch the Ruth Lyons show. So devoted are her fans, mostly women and numbering 7,000,000 (comprising her TV and radio audience in Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky and West Virginia) that one woman once turned up at showtime with the charred half of a ticket she had saved from her burning house. Asked to explain her hold over so many women, the star of the "50-50 Club" says, "Because I'm Ruth Lyons." Two million dollars in advertising revenue a year points up the success of her program.

Ever since Ruth Lyons once remarked that she liked to see women wearing white gloves, her studio audience has resembled the cast of a minstrel show. Even girl babies six months old arrive at the studio sporting white gloves.

One day when her housekeeper was ill, Ruth Lyons hauled the damp laundry to WLW and had a row of ironing boards set up in the studio.

She Speaks to Seven Million Women

"Never blasé," Ruth is as excited by trips abroad as are fans who see her off.

Adoring followers took turns pressing her family's personal laundry while Ruth sang and played the organ.

Although one TV columnist asserts that her singing's a joke and her voice cracks on every note, a recent Ruth Lyons' record album sold 50,000 copies in three weeks. A woman fan who didn't even own a phonograph plunked down $3.98 for the album because she admired Ruth Lyons' picture on the cover.

Ruth Lyons performs without script or rehearsals, ad-libbing ninety minutes a day five days a week. She wears a diamond ring extending from knuckle to first joint. Youthful dresses and spike-heeled pumps display slim legs and lovely ankles. Because she is allergic to most forms of wool, Ruth wears very little of it.

In repose, Miss Lyons' face, with its high blunt cheekbones, firm chin, steely blue eyes, is pure American Gothic. She likes to pretend that she resembles Betty Grable. When someone mentioned that she looked more like Ann Sothern, she replied, "I'm not that fat!" A moment later, she kiddingly asked her studio audience of the lucky 150, "Don't you think I'm naturally adorable?" Most of them agreed. She loves to kid about her appearance.

The thing everyone seems to agree upon is that Miss Lyons is a master showman, responsive to every flickering mood of her audience, and equally quick to vary subject and pace.

"Are you going to be one of those dull groups?" she berates an audience whose attention shows the slightest sign of flagging. "Put on your white gloves, sit up, and smile!" Sometimes she considers the singing style of baritone Bob Braun too high-flown. "Don't be so ultra and operatic," she chides him on the air.

She often cries on her program. When Ruth cries, her whole face shines wetly. When the audience starts sobbing, too, she trips among them trailing her flower-decked microphone and letting the fortunate ones sniff her smelling salts.

Ruth's special interests include children—especially hurt, crippled or sick children—dogs and elderly women. "It's their necks that get me," Ruth explains, "little old ladies with narrow shoulders and stringy bent necks—they break me up." When Denise Darcel appeared on her program recently, they got to discussing the zingy French actress' elderly mother in France and ended up sobbing in each other's arms.

Because she is so passionately concerned for children who are ill in hospitals, Ruth Lyons' annual hospital drive raises more money than any other individual's TV charity appeal in the country. Television marathons may produce a lot of pledges, but Ruth Lyons produces hard, cold cash. And not one cent of the money she has collected—over $1,000,000 so far—is deducted for expenses. All of it goes to the hospitals for children.

At home Ruth Lyons raises six or seven Japanese spaniels, all beauties. When one of them gets sick, which is frequently, she sits up rocking the dog in her arms half the night, singing and talking to the animal. (Every room in her house has a rocking chair; there are two in her spacious kitchen.) Sometimes she takes the ailing dog right into bed with her.

According to Miss Lyons, her fans look upon her as an extension of themselves and part of their lives. "If I get a new ring, or a fur coat, they're thrilled. There's never any envy. When I take a trip, they want to know every single detail about it."

When she left on a European trip last year, she happened to mention on the air which train she was taking from Cincinnati. (Neither she nor her husband ever flies anywhere.) When the train carrying Ruth and her husband and daughter pulled into Springfield, Ohio, 500 women were waiting in a pouring rain for a glimpse of their idol. When Ruth finally appeared on the back platform, she was weeping copiously.

"Ruth's so sentimental she cries at the 'coming attractions,'" says a close friend CONTINUED ON PAGE 159

"Life has a Lovely way of Living"

By RUTH LYONS

EDITORS' NOTE: In interviewing busy, interesting people, our editorial staff encounters temperament, lack of time, evasions, and other tricks the inquiring journalist has to experience to believe. To obtain this story of how a famous and well-beloved TV star lives, we met with some of these obstacles.

In Ruth Lyons we discovered, first, a person who was not particularly eager to have an article written about her, even in LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, one of her favorite magazines. But we persisted, thinking so striking a personality ought to be known to the nation as well as to her 7,000,000 followers. We suggested that she write about herself on the basis of her favorite belief that "life has a lovely way of living" (a line from one of her songs) while we assigned Betty Hoffman to write about her career as it looks to the outsider looking on. This is what she wrote about herself.

ME • I am Ruth Lyons Newman, professionally known as Ruth Lyons. I live in Cincinnati, Ohio, and have always lived here.

I have been married for the past seventeen years to Herman Andrew Newman, a professor of English at the University of Cincinnati. He is as handsome as I once thought Clark Gable to be, more intelligent than I will ever give him credit for being, and as stubborn as any descendant of German forebears inevitably would be. I am primarily a homemaker, mother of a fifteen-year-old daughter, Candace, and a devout believer in "living the good life."

"Close to my heart," Ruth Lyons' Christmas Fund for children's hospitals raised $242,662 last year.

"Life has a Lovely way of Living"

My childhood centered around the activities of the Presbyterian church of our neighborhood. I played the piano and later the organ, sang in the junior choir, rehearsed the Christmas pageants, and accompanied my father, two uncles and my grandfather in their vocal quartet. I could play tunes on the piano when I was three years old, could remember melodies after hearing them once, have always had perfect pitch. I studied piano, organ and violin, and learned to play the ukulele by stringing an old tennis racket with four lengths of wrapping cord to simulate the instrument.

My grandfather on my mother's side was a captain on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. Living on the Ohio, I loved its boats and fascinating stories—and still do. My mother was dainty, gay, old-fashioned, delightfully superstitious and gently determined. My father was an expert mathematician, witty, extravagant, and absolute putty in mother's hands.

My paternal grandmother was a delight to my young soul—soft and plump, inflexible in her religious beliefs, energetic, full of fun, and a member of the WCTU. One of her best friends and greatest admirers was the saloonkeeper, who connived with her to keep local millworkers from spending their entire week's wages every Saturday night.

My family's greatest claim to local fame was ownership of the first phonograph in our neighborhood, complete with a large collection of records by Caruso, Melba and, a bit later, the ever-popular John McCormack.

From these beginnings I emerged with two prime interests in life: music, and a profound interest in people.

ME—LATER. In high school, the magic of radio touched my life. I was in constant demand as an accompanist and pianist at the local stations in Cincinnati. And I was completely fascinated by this new enigma. I would rush home after a fifteen-minute session in one of the first velvet-draped isolation booths ever built, to find my mother frantically and vainly still trying to tune me in with a cat whisker tracking over a strange little crystal gadget.

I was a Tri Delt at the University of Cincinnati during the era when "Stardust" first became a hit. In college I was interested in boys, modern music, playing the piano, languages, boys, clothes, eradication of intolerance and class distinction, boys, tennis and boys.

But when I finished at the university, I was asked to take a job as a pianist and organist with a Cincinnati radio station. I couldn't believe radio was here to stay—but a salary of $25 a week wasn't to be ignored, either. So I went to work. Work? Yes, if you call it work having every day come up with something funnier and more hilarious than that which happened the day before. There was no limit to what was done by performers, announcers, even station personnel, during the early days of radio to keep the laughs coming. It became the thing to try to "break up" any performer who seemed to be anxious to maintain any decorum whatsoever.

There was the night a well-known basso profundo was guest singer, and among his selections was the booming "Song of the Volga Boatmen." Just as he launched into the lusty boatman's favorite mood music for "totin' that barge" down the Volga, the studio door opened and in came four of the station personnel, wrapped in overcoats, their heads bound with turbans made of towels from the men's room, dragging, by heavy ropes, in perfect rhythm to the purple-faced boatman's chant, a full-sized gray coffin, in which sat another staff pixy, clutching a bunch of beets and clad in a raccoon coat circa 1930! The basso received the accolade of all concerned—he never missed a beat of that measured dirge of the Muscovites—but he nearly popped a number of blood vessels later in one of the most beautiful tantrums of outraged dignity that it has ever been my pleasure to witness.

Because of the sudden illness one morning of our woman commentator on affairs current and sundry, I was pushed into a studio and told to read a script. I did this for the first few minutes, but the content of the so-called discourse was far too saccharine and trite to make me speak with any credence. So I suddenly started to converse with the stricken announcer across the table from me—and from that day, thirty years ago, until today I haven't finished what I have to say. A disastrous flood in the Ohio Valley, giving me the opportunity to be of service at scenes of disaster, gave a believability to the news I had to put out on the air waves, and from those dark days in 1937 until the present I have tried to keep that believability alive. This has been possible because I am employed by a company that sustains the same policy, and because I take this business of radio and television as a serious and happy obligation!

ME—EVEN LATER

In 1942 I joined the staff of WLW, owned by the Crosley Broadcasting Corporation, an organization which in my opinion has been and continues to be one of the greatest contributors to radio and television development in the entire country. I was asked to create two shows: one, "Morning Matinee," at 8:30 A.M. each day; and a noontime luncheon show.

And in 1942 I married Herman. We were married on a Saturday, drove to Beaumont Inn near Lexington, Kentucky, returned home Sunday evening, and I was back on "Morning Matinee" on Monday. Since then we have had the good fortune to make wonderful trips all over Europe—Scandinavia, Russia, Poland—the Caribbean, Canada, Hawaii and every section of these United States, so Herman's and my honeymoon worked out on a "delayed basis" plan, and our later "honeymoons" were even more delightful in that we shared them with our daughter Candy every time.

In 1944 the most remarkable, completely miraculous event ever recorded occurred: our daughter Candace—Candy for shortness and sweetness—was born. From here on this outline could be devoted to no subject other than the beauty, charm, lovableness and the fascinating development of this one beloved little girl—but every mother would realize, as I do, that whatever I said would be wholly inadequate. Candy is now fifteen, she is an inch taller than I, and every inch she has added is composed of pure delight and beautiful understanding between her and her father and her awe-struck mother. She has been, and always will be, the greatest gift of our lives—and we shall ever remember to give thanks for her being.

MEANWHILE—

While Candy was learning to walk and talk, along came a strange new Circe, activated by a small snap-on switch, full of more wiles and enchantments than any pony-tailed Lorelei. Her name was Television. We were content within the well-organized, lucrative environs of radio. Now we were being ordered by young television producers, from behind their smoked glasses, to stand here—walk there—smile brightly—pick up object with left hand—in other words, to become automatons in a new sphere of entertainment, without the slightest resemblance to our own personalities or ways of doing things. After our first few telecasts, I felt that it was definitely "the end of the road" for me.

However, I still believed that people preferred naturalness, honesty and believability in television as they had so evidenced to me in my many years in radio. And so, in spite of pressure to dye, to toupee, to make up, to walk gracefully, to speak the speech "trippingly on the tongue" and, above all, to keep "moving" on that magic screen, we continued and are still continuing to be ourselves in television. We emerged from sound into sight without conforming to many of the ridiculous, unnatural mandates of this new medium.

Our noonday show we called the "50 Club" because we had fifty women each day for lunch and as participants in the telecast. Members of the audience buy tickets for the luncheon, which is served at the studio before showtime. When the first sale of tickets produced requests which would take nine years to fill, it was apparent that we should increase the studio audience. Thus we became the "50-50 Club"; and later yet, without changing the show title, increased the audience to 150 people each weekday for the hour-and-a-half show.

And what is this show all about? Why does it continue 5 days each week, 7½ hours each week, 52 weeks a year, in living color on television, and on radio as well? I believe it is because, although it is enervating and makes tremendous demands on me, both physically and mentally, it is still not a "job." Rather it is a daily visit with thousands and thousands of people who have the same experiences, problems, pleasures and anxieties that I have. And what is more therapeutic than to sit down with good friends and discuss whatever subject comes to mind? This is exactly what we do day after day.

We are ready to stir up arguments, discuss clothes and our love for them, review last night's network television shows, criticize, praise, argue, laugh, cry and, in truth, experience and express every emotion peculiar to human beings. We are extremely grateful that our eighteen sponsors a day, top quality in every way as people and also as far as their products are concerned, are lenient to the degree that we are given complete freedom in presenting their commercials in whatever way we consider to be most interesting. We use no film, no script; as a matter of fact, I have no doubt that the sponsors sometimes wonder just what it is they are paying for on the "50-50 Club"! But they stay happy, sell their products, and have proved to be really stanch friends.

We are grateful for the opportunity this radio-and-television show affords us to do a vital job each year in the name of humanity. This is our "Ruth Lyons' Christmas Fund." This project is launched each October and is designed to raise, by voluntary contributions, a substantial sum of money to maintain the Ruth Lyons' Christmas Fund in twenty-six children's hospitals throughout our viewing and listening area.

I started this fund nineteen years ago after a visit to our Cincinnati Children's Hospital, when I was made aware of the lack of anything in the hospitals to divert a sick child's mind from his own anxieties and pain. There were no books, no pictures, no toys, no radios—nothing in the way of material things to hasten his tedious recovery. And most unfortunate of all, there was no money available to make these things possible. So, as I always do, I put the problem before my radio audience, primarily to raise a fund to give hospitalized children a truly wonderful Christmas.

The first year the fund raised $1000. This past year, our nineteenth year, our good viewers contributed $242,662.55, every dollar of which is used to maintain a year-round fund in twenty-eight children's hospitals in the area that we reach on our show. The children themselves have an abiding faith in this fund, and there have been hundreds of wonderful stories told to us by nurses and doctors in the hospitals as to what has been accomplished in making these little ones as happy as possible while they are hospitalized.

We raise this money each year by starting Christmas in October. Many Christmas songs I have written over the years, which we released last year in an album "Ten Tunes of Christmas," have played a major part in bringing alive the Christmas spirit of giving in the hearts of our audience. These people know these songs and sing them with us, and play them in their homes, so they tell me, all year long.

FIRST QUARREL

By ANTHONY BAILEY

Nothing quite like it, this row between friends
Who are lovers, moreover, used to the unspoken.
Now he is baffled by silence, nearly broken
When kindness, so he thinks, defeats his ends.
She screams, "Get out!" and when he's gone she cries.
In the next room he takes the yell for token
That love, for her, was mischief in disguise.

Nothing quite like it: you might well suppose
They were the first pair tricked to a cross word,
Or made to think "the whole thing is absurd;
Marriage is silly; we are natural foes."
He sulks and fumes, half wishing he could say
How much he hates her. He would not be heard:
She phones her aunt and throws a dress away.

Nothing quite like it—but that's true as well
Though mischief skips and leaves the ending trite.
No knowing counselor has ever quite Conjured their kisses, or can justly tell
Either their words are old, their thoughts long said.
It is their own: first grief, and first delight
That what they thought had gone had grown instead.

The generosity of our audience is not limited, however, to the Christmas Fund. It is evidenced constantly in many other ways. We maintain a year-round TV Fund from which we have purchased hundreds of radios and television sets for veterans' hospitals, homes for the aged, county hospitals, and schools for the deaf, blind and retarded children. This fund is completely separate from the Christmas Fund, and all contributions are from the same wonderful audience.

Somewhere along the line, I know not where, the nickname "Mother" was bestowed on me. It seems everyone calls me "Mother"—newspaper columnists, truck and taxi drivers, my boss and my co-workers, people I don't even know and most of those I do know call me "Mother."

DAILY

This is my life—busy, frantic, creative, productive, frustrating, delightful, maddening, but never dull. And when the show is over, after a few thousand words with my secretaries Mickey Walker, Rose Lupton and Jean Tellman; conferences with my producer-director George Resing and assistant Elsa Sule; at least one meeting a day with a sponsor or someone from our Sales Department, a reassuring call from my long-suffering boss, Robert E. Dunville, president of Crosley Broadcasting Corporation, to the effect that I am not going to be fired this time, but watch it—then I go home to be Ruth Newman . . .

Wife of an understanding, delightfully argumentative professor of that unintelligible subject, English . . .

Mother to an intriguing, cowboy-enamored daughter of fifteen . . .

Godmother to six Japanese spaniels, one Irish setter, a pale-yellow canary, and a huge Persian cat . . .

Overseer-in-name-only of a ten-room house but in reality slave to Pauline and Callie, our two devoted housekeepers, who tell me what to do . . .

And, most of all—be myself, free to read, watch every television show I can work in, write some new tunes and hope they'll record as well as our last two albums, eat, talk, and talk and talk with Herman and Candy . . . sit quietly by the fire and be thankful that "I has a lovely way of living"—and so to bed.

OH—I FORGOT

I like Early American furniture, old new papers and magazines, chocolate ice crea an open fire, traveling anywhere, playi bridge, perfume, old people, ships, babies, ho est opinions, and like any other woman, m lions of bracelets!

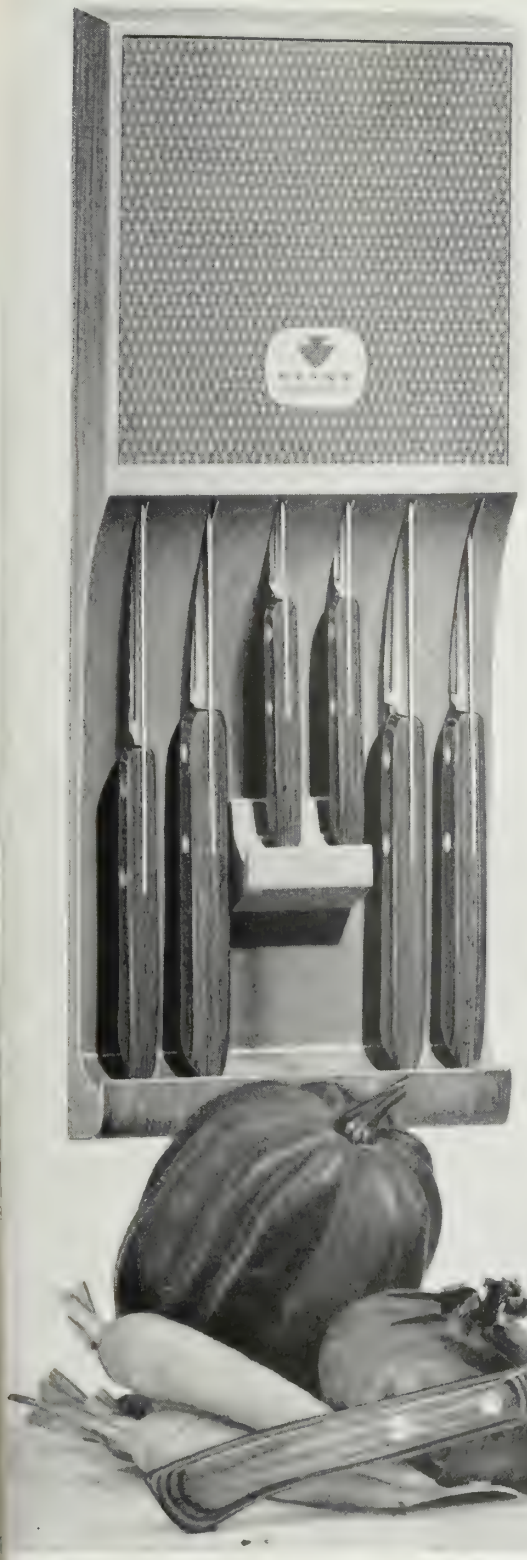
I heartily dislike intolerance, injustice any form, women over eighteen who try to coy, pomposity, discrimination, licorice a mice. I love music by Tchaikovsky, Puccin Bach, Rodgers and Hammerstein (and esp cially the score of The King and I).

I have met and especially liked, among ma other people, the late Gen. George Marsha counted Robert Taft as a warm person friend; enjoyed interviews with Dr. Nels Glueck, writer and explorer and president Cincinnati's Hebrew Union College; Eva G bor; Jack Webb; Roger Smith, star of " Sunset Strip"; Rod Serling, one of my mo successful personal friends; Carol Channin Liberace, Victor Borge, Eydie Gorme a Jack E. Leonard—to mention just a ve few.

I would still most like to meet: Dr. Albe Schweitzer, Joseph Welch, Sir Winst Churchill, Clark Gable, President Dwig Eisenhower and Adlai Stevenson.

I would love best to revisit Paris, Amste dam, New York; Lucerne, Switzerland; H waii and New Orleans, in that order.

I like best the writings of Shakespeare, T stoi, James Michener and Pearl Buck.



My unsatisfied ambitions are to learn to t dance, be a professional photographer, and shoot at least an 80 in golf.

The most exciting experiences I have e joyed were: the day the Christmas Fu reached $242,662.55 last year; being present the coronation of Elizabeth II in Westminst Abbey; being aboard the first cruise ship to g into Russia and Poland since World War I and receiving the wonderful news that a l tle five-year-old girl walked for the first ti in six months, after a serious accident, becau on my show before doing a little "Christm Marching Song" that I wrote, I said, "No everyone, let's get up and march!" . . . sympathetically. "Another thing about Ruth—that clutches her audience's interest: she always feels terrible."

Ruth's constant aches and pains have become a running gag on her show. She is always at death's door, yet never actually sick. "Give me some hearts-and-flowers music," she'll direct her seven-piece band, and then she will enumerate her complaints: "Oh, my back!" and "Oh, my neck!" and so on. Her staff will long remember the time she broke her little toe. It was not only done up in an enormous white bandage, but had a big red bow and a bunch of flowers as well. According to Ruth, the spotlighted toe throbbed unbearably every minute of her ninety-minute show.

"I have miserable elbows," she sometimes moans. "They give me trouble all the time." She may discuss her ideas of how the nation's tax laws should be changed, or advise her listeners, "You know, Cleopatra didn't smell so good." And, "Always buy white cars," she tells them, "nothing but white. It's the only color. And besides, they're safer."

The band on the "50–50 Club," Cliff Lash and his "Uncertain Seven" as Ruth Lyons has dubbed them, and vocalists Marian Spelman, Ruby Wright, Bonnie Lou and Bob Braun rehearse the musical numbers for the show, but more often than not Miss Lyons decides they will rehearse and perform right on the show a number different from that programmed. Or, seated in her rocking chair built for three and covered in gaudy patchwork quilting to show up well on the color telecast, she may take off on a talking jag. Her coworkers Peter Grant, a charming but confirmed bachelor whom she is trying desperately to interest in romance, and Bob Braun, a handsome chap who is the idol of the teenagers, give her plenty of opportunity to start any type of discussion or controversy. She will wave her flower-bedecked microphone (her "trade-mark") in the direction of the audience occasionally, and receive its 100 per cent approbation.

The same band has been with Ruth Lyons' "50–50 Club" for fifteen years, and the vocalists for twelve years. Miss Lyons considers them a vital part of the show, and includes them in her out-of-studio activities as well. She has released several records and albums which have become hits in the WLW area, and has always shared the income from them with the members of the cast of "50–50 Club" who participated in making the records. Her recording sessions, by the way, as well as the rehearsals, are all done outside of the studio, after she's concluded her business of the day—her show, meetings, conferences with clients, and so on.

Although the audience of "50–50 Club," both in the studio and out, is chiefly women, Miss Lyons' mail and telephone calls show an increasing number of men who are show regulars. When there are quite a number of males in the studio audience, she calls on them to do the commercials for her. The late Louis Bromfield was a devoted listener to her show, and wrote her often. Another outstanding male fan is William F. Hopkins, outstanding Cincinnati defense attorney, as are Mayor Donald Clancy, former Gov. C. William O'Neill, and Judge Carl Rich of Common Pleas Court of Cincinnati.

To her audience, Ruth confides, "My husband Herman has terrible taste in clothes. How about your husbands?" Most of the housewives present nod in agreement. Or, "Herman's very hot-blooded." She laughs merrily. "I mean he hates hot rooms and heavy clothing."

Herman is an English professor at the University of Cincinnati, handsome, mild-mannered and, according to his wife, "a free-thinker." He frequently phones while she's on the air to correct her grammar or pronunciation. Ruth picks up the real phone on stage and listens impatiently. "Don't bother me, Herman! Did you remember to carry out the garbage?"

According to a close friend, Ruth is "a very female female" and "a very shrewd businesswoman." As a member of the Management Planning Committee at WLW, she acts as liaison between sales and programming.

"Ruth Lyons is a very dominating kind of woman," a former associate explains. "She's successful and powerful and is free to say exactly what's on her mind. She needles and browbeats the men on her program, and this delights the housewives." They love to hear someone push men around though they wouldn't dare try it themselves.

Ruth Lyons has thirty-seven sponsors happily paying $2,000,000 a year for the privilege of being mentioned on her show. There is a long waiting list of advertisers equally eager to support her. She deals directly with sponsors herself, both local and national. She won't accept a product unless she herself likes it. She refuses to use canned copy, considering most prepared advertising copy not down-to-earth enough for her type of program. "What do those charcoal-gray boys know about the housewife and what she wants and needs?" she asks her listeners in disgust. Once she read aloud a sponsor's ad about fruit juices and then tore it up right on the stage. She ridicules what she thinks is ridiculous and sells products her own way.

Tom and Marian Hutchison had three small children and "there just didn't seem to be enough hours in the day for all that had to be done." Then triplets arrived.

HOW AMERICA LIVES
in the May JOURNAL

Recently she was demonstrating a sponsor's cheese dip with a piece of celery. "Are dips hygienic?" she pondered, pausing in mid-air before her second dip into the cheese.

One day Miss Lyons may spend five minutes discussing the merits of a product and why people should buy it. The next day she may dismiss it in three words: "Buy Blank's meat." No matter what she says, people apparently scramble to buy the product. When she conducted a prize contest for Kroger bread, 165,851 entries poured in. The bakery installed three shifts to meet the demand for its loaves. A line of canned vegetables, after only ten weeks on her show, moved from seventh to first place in three big cities within sound of her insistent voice—Cincinnati, Dayton and Columbus.

On Madison Avenue, Ruth is sometimes referred to as a "fresh new breeze" in broadcasting, but actually she's been in radio and TV for thirty years. Two experiences on a national network were enough for her. She contends that she is a Midwest personality and is content to remain one. "Her roots lie deep in Ohio and most of the appeal of her show is local," explains a staff member.

In 1952, a half hour of the ninety-minute Ruth Lyons show was on the national NBC network for a year. Although the mail count was high, after a year she asked to be released from the seven-year network contract, saying that the loss of her local clients (not acceptable on the national network) did not conform to her show "ideal." And somewhat more than a year ago Miss Lyons appeared for two weeks on the Dave Garroway "Today" show. She enjoyed working with Mr. Garroway, who was wonderful to her, she said, but she prefers the informality and spontaneity of a show such as her own "50–50 Club."

This past January, when WLW-T originated an NBC-network color telecast of a Cincinnati Royals-New York Knickerbockers pro basketball game, Ruth Lyons and members of the "50–50 Club" cast appeared at half time with their spouses to toss baskets for a charity benefit. Following the telecast, Miss Lyons received mail from as far as Texas and Colorado from fans who had seen her during her 1952 and 1958 network appearances and who wrote that they were delighted to see her again.

Today Ruth Lyons is probably the most valuable, most sought-after non-network property in television. When she was shown a script for a national network show in which it was hoped she would be the star, she pointed to a list of a dozen or more people at the top of the first page and asked, "Who are these? The actors?" She was told that they would be the executives on the show. "Nothing doing," she replied. "Right now I have only one boss; and to be truthful, I have trouble enough with him!"

Ruth Lyons is not afraid to enter into controversial or touchy subjects. She cannot stand intolerance. One day recently Miss Lyons and a woman acquaintance were waiting for a cab on a street corner in downtown Cincinnati. When a cab pulled up, her friend opened the door and then slammed it, announcing loudly that she wasn't going to ride with a Negro driver. Miss Lyons got into the cab herself and questioned the driver about how often this happened. "Five or six times every day," the Negro replied. The next day on the air Miss Lyons treated her audience of 7,000,000 to a twenty-minute diatribe against racial prejudice, one of her favorite subjects. Subsequently, the cab company said that her speech had done more to speed the acceptance of Negro drivers than all their efforts over the space of two years.

When celebrities visit Cincinnati, they are generally invited to appear on the show. Ruth loves good interviews, and believes that she can retain the spontaneity of her show best by not meeting the guests prior to the show. So her audience meets the guest as soon as Miss Lyons herself does. Lisa Kirk was so popular with Miss Lyons and with the audience that she appeared on "50–50 Club" every day for a week and loved it. Eva Gabor chattered away with Ruth like the housewife next door. When Steve Allen appeared on the show, his three managers had told the show's producer that he had only four minutes to spare from his busy schedule. And although Steve looked tired, which Miss Lyons frankly told him, a half hour later he was still pounding the keys of band leader Cliff Lash's piano in a jam session with the orchestra and Ruth Lyons at the organ, while the managers sat in the back with their faces in their hands.

The result of this type of interview makes possible rewarding entertainment, and the stars love it. They tell one another when they meet on Broadway or in Hollywood to "get on the Ruth Lyons show in Cincinnati when you are there." Many shows in Cincinnati have hung out the "SRO" sign after a star's appearance on "50–50 Club."

Not all the best interviews are with guest stars, either. Ruth often finds fascinating interviews in her studio audience, and gives them the same treatment she gives to those more widely known.

Ruth Lyons receives more than three quarters of a million pieces of mail a year; the count for 1959 totaled 790,345 pieces, of which more than 164,000 were Christmas Fund contributions. Her Christmas Fund hospital drive in 1959 brought in almost a quarter of a million dollars—$242,662.55, to be exact—largely in one- and two-dollar donations. She doesn't encourage large, tax-exempt contributions from corporations. Those, she feels, would commercialize the project. What she wants is "a spontaneous outpouring of small sums of money from people everywhere.

"People tell me that the best part of Christmas to them is contributing to the Ruth Lyons fund." Each contributor, whether he gives pennies or dollars, qualifies for an impressive list of prizes which Ruth Lyons persuades businessmen to donate for nothing.

Every cent donated to the Christmas Fund is turned over to hospitals—twenty-eight last year—to help make Christmas a happy one for hospitalized children. Not only at Christmas, either. Parties and gifts the year round mark birthdays and other special events. Operating expenses for the fund drive are paid by WLW, which hires a complete crew of girls beginning in October to handle fund mail.

Last year the prizes included three automobiles, an air trip to Copenhagen, a $1000 gift certificate, a mink stole and 90 other big prizes. The two days these prizes are distributed through a series of phone calls to listeners' homes, the streets of Cincinnati are practically deserted, people say.

On her program Ruth frequently reminisces about her old-fashioned middle-class upbringing in Cincinnati. "Why, I was twelve before I was unshackled from long underwear," she tells her delighted listeners.

During high-school years, she earned money by playing the piano. During college she tutored slower classmates in any subject they required—Spanish, calculus, Latin or anything else. "I had a terrific desire to pay my own way," she acknowledges. She was hired by local radio station WKRC as a musician, but she also operated the switchboard, typed letters, and even swept cigarette butts out of the waiting room, old-timers recall.

In 1942, shortly after joining WLW's staff, Ruth met Herman Newman, who studied at Oxford to be a Unitarian minister but had turned to teaching instead. Ruth was sitting behind him at a Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra concert and wondering if she knew this tall, handsome, blue-eyed guy who looked vaguely familiar. During intermission he spoke to her and reminded her that they had been classmates at the University of Cincinnati. Then he asked for a date. Ruth had decided that she had worked too hard for success to give it up for some man. Nor did she believe the man existed who wouldn't resent her career.

So when Herman asked for a date, she accepted but later phoned and begged off, pleading a business engagement that Saturday night. "Look here," spoke up Herman. "I've waited ten years to get up the courage to ask you for a date and I'm not sure I'll ever find the courage again." Somewhat shaken, Ruth agreed to see him Sunday and they went to a night club.

Ruth didn't then, and doesn't now, touch alcohol. "I can't work as hard as I do and drink, and so I don't drink," she explains. (She has also been heard to remark that liquor is "the curse of the earth.")

At the night club the waiter came up and said, "Good evening, Miss Lyons. Would you like your usual?" Ruth nodded yes.

"I'll have the same," Herman added with an air of anticipation.

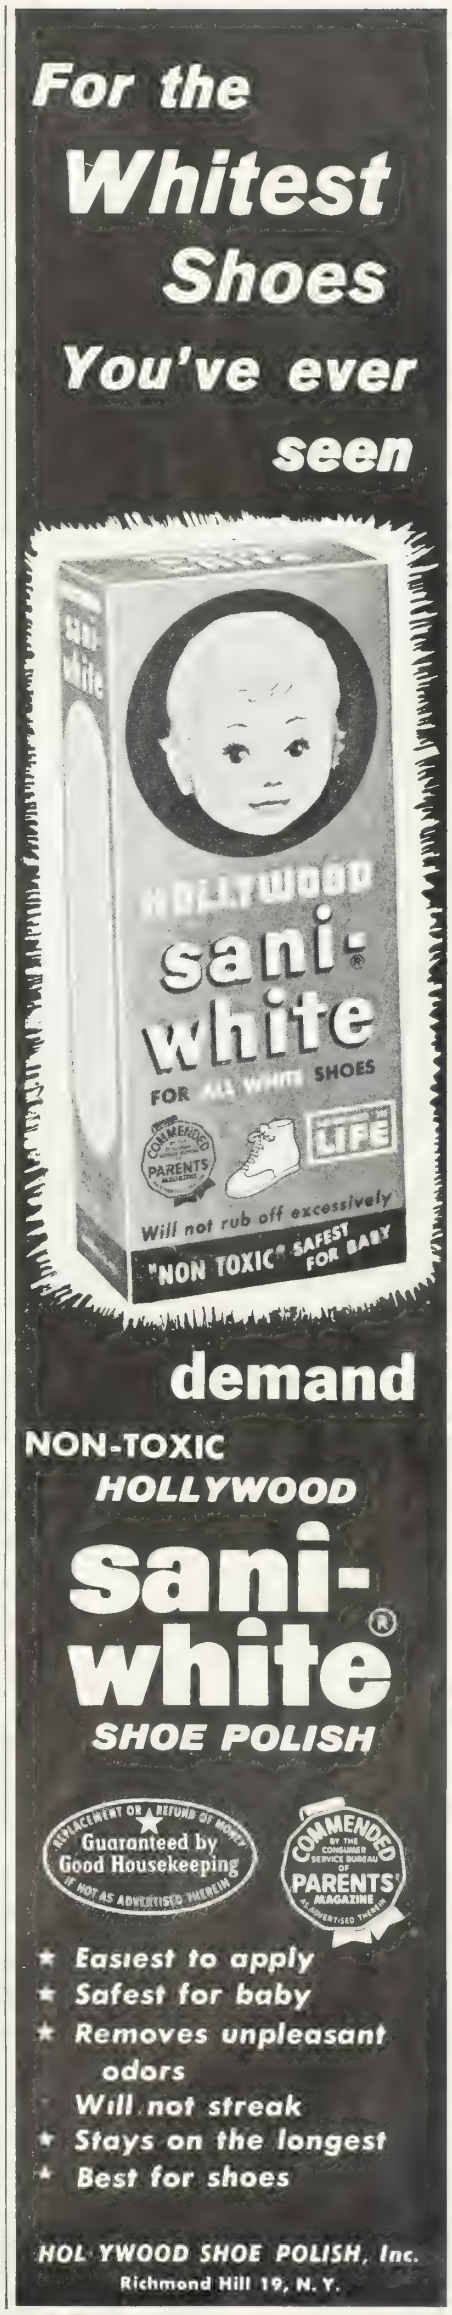
A few minutes later the waiter reappeared with two large strawberry sundaes. By the end of the evening Herman and Ruth had all their mistaken notions about each other straightened out. From then on, they dated every single night until their marriage some months later.

The Newmans live in a 150-year-old gray brick house called "Four Chimneys" near the Mt. Airy Forest section of Cincinnati. It sits on five acres with a one-hundred-foot hackberry tree in front which is Herman's special pride. The Newmans had admired the house for years, but it was never for sale. Then one day Herman came home and said he had seen an undertaker's hearse in the driveway of their dream house. From that time on, from June until the following February, they watched the real-estate ads. When the house was eventually put up for sale, they bought it the same day.

"Four Chimneys" is decorated in a style which can perhaps be best described as Rampant Early American. "You can't go wrong on Early American," says Ruth. "It's always in good taste and it never depreciates." Even her suite of offices at WLW is done in Williamsburg blues with antique pine pieces and rocking chairs. In her office Miss Lyons herself sits in a rocking sofa before a fireplace with fake glowing logs. At home, red is the dominant color, calico the dominant material, with a strawberry motif everywhere—a sentimental reminder of those first strawberry sundaes they shared together.

Ruth Lyons' TV rating has always been about five times that of all competing TV shows combined, the records show. Only once was her supremacy on the air waves even threatened. A national network announced a new high-budget show with Don Ameche and Frances Langford in the same time slot as the Ruth Lyons show.

Ruth met the challenge head on. For weeks prior to the beginning of the threatening competing show, she told her viewers she was sure she was going to lose them to "that doll" Don Ameche. She had the male commentator on her show imitate Ameche while she tried to warble like Miss Langford. On the day the Ameche show had its première, she told her audience she was going back to her office to watch her competition, and she did, while the rest of the cast of her show struggled on without her. Half an hour later she reappeared before the television cameras, looking more cheerful. "Ameche's hair is getting thin," she reported sadly, "and do you know, Frances Langford is fat!" In the succeeding weeks, while the Ruth Lyons show continued to show a rating between 28 and 31 (phenomenal for a daytime show), the competing Ameche show never pulled more than a 2 rating in Ruth's area, and died quietly after its initial thirteen weeks as far as Cincinnati was concerned.



> Every ship that goes to America got its chart from Columbus. Every novel is a debtor to Homer. Every carpenter who shaves with a foreplane borrows the genius of a forgotten inventor. Life is girt all round with the contributions of men who have perished to add their point of light to our sky.
> RALPH WALDO EMERSON

The trouble with television, Ruth feels, is the insularity of its script writers, who she thinks spend their days lunching in the East Fifties of New York or around kidney-shaped Hollywood swimming pools. "My show appeals to salt-of-the-earth people, real people," Ruth believes. "Such people exist in Boston and Atlanta as well as Cincinnati and Indianapolis. I know that because when I was on national network these women wrote to me. They told me that most women performers on TV give them a pain, with their minks and affected voices and private show-biz jokes that nobody outside the studio can understand. What does this kind of woman know about a housewife? I always assume my listeners have at least as much intelligence as I do. I never talk down to them and I welcome their comments, good or bad."

Promptly at five o'clock Ruth's daughter Candy phones Ruth at the office and this TV star, who nibbles two chocolate cookies for lunch, hurries home to an early supper and bed. Her staff seldom dares phone her after seven o'clock, when she climbs into bed and watches TV or reads. She loves sad books, the gloomier the better. "I can't wait to start The Curse of the Misbegotten," she gloats.

The Newmans' social life is practically nil. "If I go to a party, I'm very quiet and then everybody thinks I'm sick," complains Ruth.

Sharing your every thought and feeling with 7,000,000 women a day can be exhausting. "I'm tired all the time," moans Ruth, looking fresh as a rose. "For years I've been looking for a successor, but do you know I can't find one? No one will take over my hospital drive either. I can't even take a decent vacation. At our last ticket sale, we sold out every show for 365 days a year for the next five years. How can I stay away for even a single day and disappoint all these good people?" END though he had materialized, in shirt sleeves, out of the winter night. It was nightmare. But it was real, and it was happening to me.

Seeing me standing there, momentarily paralyzed, the man straightened to his full height and catapulted himself upon me, forcing me back across the room to my bed. Into my mind came the certainty that this was an insane rapist. I would be murdered. I remember thinking, "When they find me I hope they will realize that I fought as hard and as long as I could."

Much of the detail of that struggle has grown dim now in my memory. Partly, perhaps, because I thrust the recollection resolutely out of my mind when it threatens to return. But mostly, I believe, because the whole thing had such an aspect of nightmare that it vanished from my mind as one forgets a bad dream.

Next day, as I thought back, I believed the struggle had lasted for almost half an hour. The first shock passed off quickly. I had never been more alert. I found a strength in my body I had not dreamed I possessed. Believing I was going to die, I concentrated all my force on giving the best account of myself I could before I was killed.

The first clear memory I have is of his face above me, white in the moonlight, completely expressionless. I saw his hands come down as in a nightmare onto my throat. I thought, "Now he will kill me." I didn't propose to die tamely. I seized his hands, pulled them from my throat. That was the only intentionally hurtful gesture he made.

After I realized that it was not his intention to kill me, at least not at this point, I began talking to him while we struggled.

I kept telling him over and over that I believed he was someone in trouble. I offered to get him something to eat—while fending him off with all my might. I kept asking him where he came from, if he wasn't cold, if he wasn't hungry. He paid no attention for quite a while. Finally, in reply to the often-repeated question, "Where do you come from?" he paused long enough to say in a halting voice, "What do you want to know for?" I said I wanted to know about him, that I felt he was someone in trouble.

After this he would answer me, and sometimes the struggle would halt while we exchanged several sentences. He told me that he had come from a nearby hostel for homeless men; that he was twenty; that he had no mother.

The struggle became even more strenuous as more effective ways of fighting occurred to me. Finally I managed several times to wriggle off the bed. He would seize me and throw me back on it, but as he stooped over me I lashed out at him hard with both feet. Once I slammed him against the dresser, another time against the wall, so hard that the iron foot of the floor lamp was bent out of shape when he crashed against it. I can see him now on the floor, looking up at me with that expressionless face. That was the first time in my life I ever kicked anybody.

The last time, he threw me down so hard that when my head hit the window sill, I was partially dazed. I feared the end of my effective resistance was drawing near. I had escaped so far only because my reactions had been quick. If I were slowed down, I would be done for. I was half lying, half sitting against the wall, trying desperately to get my wits back, when he suddenly collapsed onto the floor. He stayed there, leaning against the bed, making no further move toward me.

Somehow I knew the battle was over. I must have said something to him about not reporting the affair if he would leave the house now. For he snarled, "Yeah, you would just get me for breaking and entering," and reeled off a long string of charges to which he evidently knew he had laid himself open. I stood up, and he made no move to stop me.

He got to his feet. I earnestly repeated my assurance that if he would leave the house now I would tell no one of the encounter. He snarled at me again—in this phase he seemed a young guttersnipe—using a coarse phrase. I stiffened, showing my distaste.

Before my eyes, I saw a new person appear. The man who stood in my room now seemed mature and poised, tall, straight with an athletic build. I judged him to be around thirty and I later learned that was his age. He said, "Of course you know who I am."

I replied that I did not, that I had never seen him before. He seemed to accept that.

We both knew that in this new mood he did not wish to harm me. He appeared to be an entirely different person. But he didn't want to go to the penitentiary either. The problem now was his fear that if he left me alive and in possession of all my faculties, I would promptly call the state troopers.

I again earnestly assured him I would not—hoping to placate him and get him out of the house. I told him I would let him out of the house the front way. "You came in through the cellar, didn't you?"

He told me he had, and admitted that he had been lurking under my bedroom window before he entered my house. If I had looked through the other east window, I might have seen him and called for help.

"Why don't you keep your cellar door locked?" he demanded accusingly.

I told him I had never dreamed anyone would molest me. "I'll keep it locked from now on." He nodded approvingly.

I went to the outside door nearest us, took off the spring lock. It was this action that saved me, later on.

Then I walked into the kitchen to get him out of my bedroom—and he followed. We still had to work out how he could be sure of his safety, in return for mine. As we entered the kitchen, he picked up his suit coat from a chair and slipped it on. Evidently he had stopped in the kitchen as he came through and prepared himself for the attack. I made no comment, nor did he. The door to the cellar was standing wide open. I closed it, shot the bolt home; also without comment.

I realized that my mouth was extremely dry. I went to the sink and drank glass after glass of water. I suppose I was in more of a state of shock than I realized at the time. Presently he joined me there. Bending far down over the counter, till his head almost touched it, he exclaimed, in what seemed an agony of shame and self-loathing, "Would you believe that I was married once to a good woman?" I said I could believe it.

Then he said, "Why, you're scared half to death!"

I was in fact shivering violently, partly from nervous reaction, partly from cold. I had on only a nightgown, was barefoot; I had turned down the furnace when I went to bed.

I replied, "Well, this is the first time anything of this kind ever happened to me!" Then matter-of-factly, "I'm going to get on a robe and slippers."

I don't know how I got the courage to go back into the bedroom. I didn't linger. I pulled a warm robe out of the closet by touch. Not seeing my bedroom slippers where I had left them—I discovered next day that they had been kicked far under the bed—I snatched a pair of sneakers out of the closet and put them on. This was my second lucky break, for my bedroom slippers would have been poorly adapted to that later desperate dash up the hill. The man sauntered after me, but remained in the bedroom doorway, keeping me always under observation.

Decently covered now, I walked back to the kitchen. He followed. We returned to a discussion of our problem. He told me he had been on the road for four days. Told me, in answer to my questions, that he had no place to go; that he would now go over to the railway and hop a freight. I was not afraid of this assailant in his present guise. Nevertheless I felt the situation called for extreme caution. I decided the thing to do was to try to behave as naturally as I could.

He leaned against the counter, watching me. "Why, you're in complete command, aren't you?" he commented. "You know, I could

WHEN DID I LOVE HIM MOST?

By MARGARET PARTON

When did I love him most?

Across the room, under the lamplight, he is curled around his grandmother's arm and shoulder, almost like a little fur tippet. He has had his bath, and is wearing now the plaid cotton bathrobe (he says wool "tickles") and the pajamas which are too big for him. One slipper has fallen off, and I can see the small pink sole of his foot, very clean, and longer than I would have expected. His grandmother is showing him a geography book, and he is absorbed in contemplation of the universe. "When can I go there?" he asks, enthralled. He is five years old, just five.

When did I love him most?

He was a tiny baby, and he slept in a laundry basket. It was dawn, and he cried for milk. I stumbled into the room and bent over the basket. He smiled at me, the first smile. His gums were toothless, and it was dawn. And I wept. But I never told anyone. I just said, "He smiled today."

When did I love him most?

He was a year old, and trying to pick up food for himself. I had read somewhere that children should be allowed to make a mess when they ate. So one day, when we were alone in the house, I stripped him naked, and put him in the empty bathtub with a plate of mashed potatoes and squashed carrots. I came back a few minutes later, to find him ecstatic, coasting down the back of the bathtub on a slide of carrots, with potatoes in his hair.

When did I love him most?

He was two years old, and he'd just learned, in a rudimentary way, the facts of life. Whenever there were guests in the house, he would pat his round little stomach lovingly. "My baby here," he'd say.

When did I love him most?

We were living in the country when he was three years old, and often there was snow and wind. He would tug on his red boots and the coat of his snow suit, and disappear into the twilight. A few moments later he would return, staggering under the weight of an apple log for the fireplace. "It's my job," he'd announce, with all the pride of the faithful workman in his voice.

When did I love him most?

Four years old . . . memories of tumult and growth. But once we walked in the woods beside a silver stream, over the deep moss. "I like to walk quiet in the woods, with no shouting or louding," he said.

When did I love him most?

I look at him again, curled up on the green couch beside his grandmother, and as I gaze this child seems not a present, but a past and a future; the baby, the boy, the adolescent, the man. Yet he is unaware—his cheeks flushed and his eyes shining as he intently follows his grandmother's finger, moving from earth to sun to moon to planet. "But what about gravity?" he asks.

Now, I think. Now, now, always right now.

have killed you in there. I don't think you care a lot, one way or the other."

It was true that I had been prepared to die. But I thought it best not to talk about the idea of killing, that I knew he might have killed me. I answered, "I thought you were someone in trouble and didn't really know what you were doing."

He said quickly, "That was it. I didn't know what I was doing. I would give anything if I could undo it."

Now he appeared ready to go. I offered him a package of cigarettes. He accepted them. My grown children had left at the house a variety of warm coats for country wear. I offered him one. He put on a foul-weather jacket that I hurriedly snatched out of the kitchen closet. I told him I had around $10 in my purse, that I would like to give it to him. He replied that he wouldn't take my money.

We were standing now at the kitchen door, just across from the outside door which I had unlocked. If I had been cleverer, perhaps I would have contrived to get him out of the house then. But if he had gone then, I would not have recognized how dangerous he was.

I believe he would have returned, and I would not have been prepared. Or that if he had not come back to my house, some other lone woman would have been attacked.

He didn't move. There was an awkward pause. Then he said earnestly, "I wish I could talk with you."

Perhaps this was where I made a big mistake that was so nearly fatal, but I hesitated only briefly before replying that I would be glad to talk to him.

We sat down at the kitchen table across from each other. First my visitor had slipped off the foul-weather jacket, saying he would not take it after all.

I suppose it had occurred to him, though it had not occurred to me when I gave it to him, that to be picked up wearing that jacket would be damning. It is ironic that this gesture of mine, instinctively motivated, enabled the bloodhounds to trail him; established one link in the case against the man whom I shall now call Jack Smith.

It bothered a member of the grand jury, later on, that the man had been in my house for so long a time, yet no light had been turned on.

That had been part of my strategy. In the semi-isolated spot, in the middle of the night with the nearest neighbor over the hill, I hadn't a chance in the world to get help from outside. I had to convince Jack Smith, somehow, that he would not put himself in danger with the authorities by leaving me unharmed. When we first entered the kitchen, I had started to turn on the light, then stopped, saying to him, "I won't turn on the light. That way I won't be able to give a description of you."

We didn't need artificial light anyway. The moonlight was flooding into the kitchen through the bay windows in the south wall. Jack Smith sat in the shadow, the moonlight reaching only as far as his ankles. I refrained from trying to get a look at his face when he lighted a cigarette. I was sure, however that I would recognize him.

I have worked a great deal with young people. Many have brought their problems to me. I know of no more valuable contribution than now and then to be able to touch a troubled young mind and soul, but I had never before dealt with a young person as deeply troubled as this one. So even though he might have killed me, and might still, I was not untouched by his plight, and in his present state he seemed capable of being helped.

He apologized again, saying he wished we could be friends, but knew we could not be, because of the way things had started out. I told him we would try to forget that. "We will figure our acquaintance began when we came into the kitchen."

He replied, "Maybe I could forget. But I know you never could."

He betrayed curiosity about me, asking many questions about who I was, what I did. He asked about my work; when I said it was vocational guidance, he wanted to know what my training had been, why I had gone into it in the first place. He asked about my children. I sized him up as a young man who had not had a great deal of formal education—I later told the troopers Jack Smith might have finished high school but I did not believe he could possibly have gone beyond that. He seemed to have good native intelligence. Now and then he would say, "You're just stringing me along." I would earnestly reply that I was truly interested in young people, that I would truly like to help him if I could possibly do so. He said once, "You're sort of the mother type, aren't you?"

I hadn't minded answering his questions, for they had been entirely respectful, but all at once I realized how tired I was. I had risen at 5:30 that morning, had had a busy day before that violent half hour of terrifying physical combat. (Next day my body was a mass of deep muscle aches, in addition to the bumps and bruises acquired in the course of the struggle.)

I stopped talking, leaned back wearily in my chair. It was then that my subconscious mind noted something unusual about the man's footgear, plainly revealed by the moonlight. Tired as I was, I did not grasp the significance until the next day. Then I told the troopers. When Jack Smith was picked up a week later, he was wearing sneakers of the type I had described.

He said, "Why did you sigh?"

I thought it best not to display any weakness, so I rallied my forces and told him that this was a strange experience for me and I felt rather inadequate. "You said you wanted to talk to me, but I don't want to pry. If there is anything you would like to say to me, I will be glad to listen."

He told me his trouble had been that he never had been able to adjust to society's requirements. "I don't seem to be able to find out what they want of me."

I asked if he had ever had anyone to help him with his problems. He said he had not. I know now a number of attempts had been made to help him. But perhaps in a deeper sense what he said was true. For it requires more than love and good will to get at the problems of a seriously disturbed person.

Suddenly he said, "Go to the phone and call the troopers!"

I asked, "Do you really want me to?" I knew I could not make a phone call unless he was entirely willing for me to.

"I may as well go and give myself up to the cops," he said. "I've got to face this thing sooner or later. This has happened over and over again." Then bowing his head low again on his hands, he exclaimed in that voice of shame and self-loathing, "Oh, I'm a mess, an awful mess! I'm a sick man!" He did not again tell me to call the troopers, however, and so the moment passed.

I asked if there was any chance that he might go somewhere new and make a fresh start. He said, "I tried that once, out in ——" (naming a distant state) "but they were after me like a pack of rats."

Thus far his conversation had been completely rational. I was unprepared for the phantasy element when it suddenly appeared. The first sign that something malign was taking place in his mind was his question: "What I would like to know now is why have you been haunting me all my life?"

I laughed at that. "You must be thinking of someone else. Your grandmother probably." For I had been laying great stress on the age difference between us.

He said, a querulous note in his voice, "No, not my grandmother. At least, I don't think so." He kept repeating that he would like to know, before he died, why I had been haunting him all his life. His talk became disconnected, his questions ceased to convey what he was trying to express, I could see he was losing control.

He said, moving his head in a tortured way, "You were cruel to me. You hurt me in there."

Then he began to talk in a flirtatious manner, completely at variance with the deference he had recently shown. I said firmly, "The time has come for you to go," and stood up. He, too, got to his feet, reluctantly. As we stood there facing each other, he took both my hands in his. He apologized again for his actions, told me it had helped him a great deal to talk to me, asked if he might come to see me.

Disengaging my hands, I answered hurriedly, "Yes, you may, if you will come in the daytime and will telephone me first."

Then he asked me to kiss him good-by. I said "No."

He asked wheedlingly, "Why not?"

He made a move toward me and I stepped back, saying sharply, "Don't start that again!"

He stood there, swaying a little, a foolish, uncertain grin on his face.

Now I was again afraid—utterly, terribly afraid. By his expressions of remorse, his respectful attitude after he had returned to his other self, the man had erased somewhat the sordidness and indignity of his initial attack. Or perhaps it was sheer relief to find myself alive, safe. Now the full horror of the situation swept over me again. I doubted I would be able to talk my way out a second time. I saw only one desperate chance—to get him out of the house, if I could.

I grasped him by the arms, turned him around and resolutely marched him toward the door. Surprisingly, he let me. His body under my hands felt rigid, poker-stiff. He walked with the jerky step of a robot. But he let me propel him to the outside door. I reached around him, turned the doorknob, opened the door wide. Just then he turned and faced me. His arms clamped tightly around me with the mechanical motion of a trap. For an instant that expressionless face, with the round black holes for eyes, again looked into mine.

But we were by the door, and it was open. I reached my hand down, caught hold of the doorjamb, pulled myself out through the door. I ran to the road, faster than I'd ever run before, and up the hill crying, "Help, help!" I knew no one would hear me, but I thought he might think someone would. Part way up the hill, I turned and looked back. He had followed me out of the house, was standing beside my car.

I turned then and ran on, as fast as I could. I did not look back again until I was well over the brow of the hill. I could not see him at all, now, and I knew I was safe. But I did not slacken my pace until I reached my nearest neighbors' house. They telephoned the state police.

After the troopers had left, I walked back and forth through my house for many minutes murmuring, "Thank You, God, thank You, God, thank You, God!" Over, and over, and over.

The state police, a wonderful organization, were at my door within twenty minutes. Two days later bloodhounds were used to pick up the trail which led up the hill to an old wood path behind my home. Here my assailant evidently hid, watching the police until it was safe to cross the highway and retrieve his car from a deserted barn. When the troopers presented me with a large selection of photographs of men who had criminal or sex-offense records, I easily identified the picture of Jack Smith, who had been in three mental institutions, an escapee from the third. The picture showed a good-looking young fellow with a cocky, self-conscious smile; but the eyes were troubled, confused.

The next day I signed a warrant calling for the arrest of Jack Smith; the charge: housebreaking and attempted rape. The local justice of the peace, a kindly man, knew Jack Smith and his family. I was told that Jack would be sent away for thirty days' observation when he was found. If adjudged insane, he would be placed at once in an appropriate institution; if sane, he would face criminal prosecution. If, after being institutionalized, he were later pronounced cured, he would still be brought to trial on my charges. This was the situation, as described to me. I took some comfort in this, since it sounded like a sensible and practical plan.

One week elapsed between that dreadful night and the arrest of Jack Smith. During this week I slept in my living room, lights on all over the house, every door and window doubly barricaded. It seemed that every time I picked up a newspaper I read of the rape or murder, or both, of some girl or woman. The police seemed always looking for some criminal or mentally deficient person who had served too brief a time in prison or had been released prematurely from a mental institution. Society seemed to bungle the job of dealing with these obviously sick men.

Still, I took heart in the hope that in the case of Jack Smith, the seriousness of his illness was evident, and he would be given a chance at effective treatment. This was my hope.

My disillusionment began when I discovered that Jack Smith was not sent away for observation. He was placed immediately in the county jail. The justice of the peace explained that Jack had waived examination at the time of his arrest, which permitted local authorities to hold him in jail for thirty days without being brought to me for identification. (I learned later that Jack had not understood what it meant to waive examination.) In the end, Jack Smith sat in the local jail for almost three months without identification; without a psychiatric examination; without any kind of treatment.

I was haunted by the one conversation I had with Jack Smith's mother—a pleasant-looking woman slightly younger than myself. She told me that Jack had been an honor student at a well-known military academy until he voluntarily entered military service during World War II—before he was eighteen years of age. His trouble seemed to show up after his release. His trouble had been diagnosed as schizophrenia, but he had never admitted that he was sick.

I was advised by lawyer friends that I should not, on my own motion, go to the jail to identify the prisoner, or see the district attorney; I had to wait until I was sent for. Only the defense counsel or the district attorney has the power to secure a psychiatric examination of an accused man.

As the weeks dragged by, I began to worry about the identification. Although there was little real doubt in my mind that Jack Smith was my assailant, I did not like the feeling that my charges were keeping a man in jail, and that these charges could blast his life and make him an outcast from society. I kept hoping that Jack had confessed, or in some other way had given evidence, that he was the man who had attacked me.

Not until the day the case finally came up before the grand jury did I have my chance to identify the prisoner. The confrontation could not have been accomplished in a way more effective to defeat its purpose. I had seen my assailant three months before, by moonlight. Today I was shown a grim, unhappy being, standing directly beneath a brilliant neon light. There was little resemblance to the photograph I had so easily identified. This man glared down at me out of cruel, cold eyes. His face was deeply grooved, furrowed with bitterness and hatred. I had described my assailant as lithe, athletic. This prisoner was heavy, starting to run to fat. He seemed years older than the man in my house on that horrible evening. But the trooper explained, "It isn't strange he is heavier; he's been sitting in a cell month after month. Wouldn't you feel mean and bitter if you'd been sitting in that jail for three months?"

I cannot describe the shock and horror of that moment. Not so much at the realization of the danger which I had faced, greater even than I realized, at the hands of this pitiable creature, but at the realization that society had perhaps destroyed a possibly salvageable human being.

Jack Smith had not confessed; the evidence turned up so far was strong, but circumstantial. Shocked and undecided, I had to go at once into the grand-jury room. So confused and upset was I that I had no idea what portion of my information was truly important to the case.

The members of the grand jury listened attentively; the questions they asked me were searching and to the point. I failed to recall certain details which I had been trying resolutely to shut out of my mind. Since I relied entirely upon the services of the district attorney, whose duty it was to represent the people against violators of the criminal laws, I had no previous legal coaching.

When the district attorney and I left the grand-jury room, I felt that the jury must have been left with grave doubts. I could not say, on that day, that Jack Smith was actually the man who had attacked me, so terribly had he changed in appearance in the months of imprisonment. Later, I was able to be sure he was the man. But this knowledge might have come too late to prevent the release into the community of a dangerously and criminally insane man. I asked what would happen if the grand jury failed to return an indictment; could not the authorities then order a psychiatric examination of the prisoner on the grounds that he was an escapee from a mental institution?

The district attorney replied regretfully, "Unfortunately, we find that the institution has marked Jack down on the records as having been given a release. That was to make them look better, I guess."

I looked at this pleasant man in consternation. Knowing these things, our county attorneys had left the identification of Jack Smith until the last possible moment; had left the part I must play in his indictment entirely to chance. That lives could be disposed of so casually, that responsibility toward the safety of women in the community be held so lightly—to me this seemed the most incredible phase of the whole unfortunate affair. And in this process, a sick and troubled man had been turned into a still less reasoning being, full of hatred and hopes for revenge—and this man had a good chance of returning to the very community which had wronged him so gravely.

The grand jury did return an indictment and Jack Smith was arraigned. But he still sat in the jail for another month before he was given a psychiatric examination and pronounced a paranoid schizophrenic, unfit to stand trial. (A paranoid schizophrenic is a person with a split personality and delusions of persecution.) Eventually he went to the state prison for the criminally insane.

Would it be possible for Jack Smith to get special treatment? I wondered. I was told, "Not a chance. The prison is overcrowded and understaffed. He'll probably stay there the rest of his life. Too bad, really, because he was a nice chap to begin with."

Sometimes men escape or are released from these prisons, returning to society still less equipped to cope with their compulsions. Would Jack Smith one day escape or be released prematurely? Would he return to terrorize another victim, less able to protect herself than I? I have asked myself these questions many times. The answers leave me deeply concerned. END her arms around him, but that he had pushed her off. He was a little too glib. Somehow I didn't believe him. I broke down and cried. At once he began talking—Greg practically hypnotizes me when he talks—and he promised to reform. He promised to put me ahead of his friends, to keep them out of our hair and to stop visiting the tavern.

"For several days there was an improvement. Then the boat-building project got under way again, and again our apartment was overrun. It was impossible to keep the place picked up and clean. Whenever it rained, the gang settled inside and played cards, drank beer and smoked cigarettes. Our horrible concrete floors were covered with cigarette butts, piled with fishing gear and shotguns—guns frighten me—and everybody's dirty clothes. I couldn't change my own clothes with any peace of mind; I was always afraid one of the fellows, constantly roaming around, might blunder in on me. There weren't any regular meal hours. Greg and his pals ate when they felt like it—our refrigerator was regarded as community property—and I was supposed to fit in with the whims of a dozen men. My marriage didn't seem like a marriage to me.

"Greg seldom noticed what I wore or complimented me on my appearance. He and I had no sexual problems at first—both of us are warm-natured—but he was too offhand and casual about making love. Frequently he forgot to kiss me when I left for work or when I returned. The next day he might be very ardent, but only after he put in hours playing cards, tinkering with the boat, cleaning his shotgun. I got the feeling that our love was an afterthought and came last with him. This spoiled my pleasure and shook my confidence and I became less affectionate and responsive. He didn't comment on the change in me and his obtuseness made me feel worse.

"During our courtship I talked a great deal about the children I wanted. After we married Greg seemed quite willing to start a family immediately, but I was afraid to take the risk. Our apartment and our whole setup were unsuitable for a baby. And Greg seemed too irresponsible to be a father.

"I couldn't trust anything he said. One time he told me that a friend of his, who represented an electrical-appliance firm, would put in a dream kitchen for us at a huge bargain. The friend lived with us for three weeks and left behind a stock of nonfunctioning pop-up toasters, and that was the last heard of the dream kitchen. Greg promised me floor-length draperies to cover the front window, which was bare to the street. He finally brought in a hunk of unhemmed ugly red cloth—I detest red—and nailed the cloth along one side of the window. When I protested, he declared the effect was artistic and said my taste in household decoration was banal and inferior.

"Despite all his talk, he kept his income and his finances a big secret. I bought most of our groceries from my pay. Occasionally he handed me a few dollars, but I couldn't count on it. Whenever I mentioned a budget, he grinned and agreed a budget would be a dandy idea for us—someday.

"Two months after our marriage, he was going off without me two evenings out of three. I knew his friends were picking up girls and I suspected he sometimes did the same. I found bobby pins in the car and once there was a compact in his pocket. He told me the compact belonged to the girl friend of a buddy. And then he kidded me about my evil mind.

"In our third month together he took the car on a hunting trip, saying he would return in a couple of days. He was gone for a week and I didn't hear from him and was terrified he might be wounded or dead. Much as I hate to complain—complaining goes against the grain with me—when he finally walked in I threw a scene and accused him of making the trip with some woman. He denied it. He seemed sincere and I believed him. He then cooked up a tale to explain what he had been doing on all the other evenings when I'd been left alone.

"He said he had enrolled in a night-school course in salesmanship to surprise me, that since I was so anxious to move to a better apartment he wanted to improve and increase his earnings. For the next few weeks I sat by myself nearly every evening hiding my loneliness and nerves, but inspired by the idea that I was helping Greg. Then one evening after he drove off with a couple of his buddies, supposedly headed for class, I suddenly decided to check up and telephone the school. It wasn't listed in the book. There was no such school.

"Maybe I should have been prepared for the blow. I wasn't. I have religious convictions against separation and divorce. Nevertheless, I was so brokenhearted by Greg's deceitfulness I knew I had to leave him for the sake of my own self-respect. My parents would have gladly made a place for me in their small apartment—I used to share a room with three younger sisters—but I didn't care to listen to them criticize and abuse Greg. My father, in particular, runs down Greg while he praises me, and I can't stand it. After I packed my clothes I called Greg's parents.

My mother-in-law and I get along just fine; I admire her tremendously. She drove over in their big car and collected me, had their maid unpack my things, and put me in a fine guest bedroom. Greg's parents own and operate a small restaurant chain, and by my standards they're rich. Their house is beautifully furnished and has four bathrooms. As a boy Greg had a room and bath of his own. That's what makes it incomprehensible to me that he now has so little ambition and is content to live in a slum.

"Greg's mother is baffled too. She says that Greg has always been hard to handle, overly independent, and more loyal to his friends than to his family. Apparently he always preferred sports and fun to application and study. His two brothers, one older, one younger, finished college, but Greg dropped out as a sophomore. Both his brothers are employed in the family business and have nice houses and nice families. I wish Greg resembled them.

"Next morning my mother-in-law telephoned and told him where I was and gave him a good lecture. He promised both her and me that he would locate a regular job and begin to behave like a real husband. I doubted it. For almost a month I stayed in the guest bedroom, although my mother-in-law wouldn't let me pay any rent. Every evening Greg came to the house and tried to convince me he had reformed. Finally he found a nine-to-five job, or so he said, and I went back to him. His buddies were on hand to greet me. They had a new hobby to keep them underfoot, a hobby Greg insisted was bound to make a fortune. He and his friends were selling to pet shops the fish, turtles, eels, and such, that they trapped on their skin-diving expeditions. Hundreds of fish, turtles and eels were swimming around in six big tanks parked all around our living room.

"When I saw that living room I had hysterics for the first time in my life. The six tanks were moved to somebody else's boardinghouse. Greg then had the excuse to spend hours at the boardinghouse helping clean the tanks; he allotted the rest of his free time to skin diving and calling on pet-shop proprietors. My loneliness became intolerable. I packed and left him again.

"I was ashamed to bother my in-laws any more. I went back to stay with my parents. Greg showed up there; he and my father had a monumental argument. I sided with Greg, whom I couldn't bear to see insulted, and consequently I was finagled into another reconciliation.

"Why Greg chases after me, I don't know. He has no need of a wife and no use for marriage. All he really wants is to fool around njoy himself. Last September, practically ight, he went into a partnership with iends to import tropical fish from South ica. All three chipped in to buy a plane to Rio, but Greg took the trip. He told e pet-shop business was booming and flew, brushing aside my protests.

TELLS HIS SIDE:

tty is too immature for marriage, but es me and we belong together," said -six-year-old Greg, as he seated him- a counseling office at the American te of Family Relations. With his rum- urly hair and innocent expression, Greg younger than his age. "Maybe Letty u she wanted a divorce, but she didn't it. She is so childish she doesn't know n mind from one minute to the next. A eeks ago she wrote a letter to South ca saying she missed me desperately. I ort an important business trip and hur- ack to the States, only to discover she had moved out of our apartment again, a fact she hadn't mentioned, hired a lawyer, and was asking you people to counsel me right out of her life.

"She refused to see me until I promised to listen to your advice and make changes in my personality. I don't pretend to be an ideal husband—who is?—but there is nothing particularly wrong with my personality. Letty didn't used to complain about my personality or complain much about anything else. She's a good kid who doesn't whine and nag. Like all married couples, she and I have had our little spats, but they're unimportant. A few times she's got mad and walked out, but she always came back.

"If Letty wants counseling on our marriage I will provide it, as soon as she agrees to talk to me. The minute I arrange to be alone with Letty I can persuade her to stop this divorce-talk nonsense. I know Letty through and through, how her mind works, how to handle her. We've been married two years; we've been acquainted for nearly ten.

"She and I ran in different crowds in high school—I was one of the live-it-up kids and she was definitely a square—but I guess I've been more or less hooked by Letty since the day we met in Social Studies Two. As usual, I was gabbling in the back row of the lecture room and I got caught at it and was ordered to come up front and sit in the first row. I happened to take a chair beside Letty. After class I said something uncomplimentary about the teacher. To my surprise Letty bristled, stood up for him and told me off. She was a terribly shy girl—the few girls in my crowd weren't shy—and I thought it was cute of her to speak her piece that way.

"But I had no notion of getting myself involved with Letty—or with any other girl, for that matter. I was too busy in activities with the other guys. In those days hot rods were the thing and I had a hot rod and whenever no weekend races were scheduled the gang and I got together and tuned up my heap. I've had plenty of friends since I was in elementary school, because I planned it that way. My oldest brother, who is six years my senior, has never had any use for me, and when my parents opened the first restaurant in their chain they boarded my baby brother with relatives, which left me more or less stranded. I was then eight years old. I can remember afternoons I came home from school to our empty apartment—at that time my folks couldn't afford to pay a sitter—and felt so lonely I was almost sick. Often after I fixed my sandwiches for supper I couldn't eat. I would go and sit on the floor in my mother's closet so I could be near her clothes. That seems funny now, since I'm anything but a mamma's boy; I admire my mother and the success she and dad achieved, but I don't feel close to either of them.

"By the time I was nine or ten I got tired of being lonesome. It was then I went all out for friends. I'm well co-ordinated physically and by practice I made myself proficient in the activities that interest boys. I spent hours batting a tennis ball against the side of a wall; I sent away for a course in judo and became fairly expert; I built the biggest model railroad in our neighborhood, buying the material from junk yards. Maybe it sounds boastful, but at school I was invariably listed as the leader type, although my marks were in the cellar. Wherever I am, wherever I live, always automatically becomes the natural meeting place for a bunch of nice guys.

"Letty ought to understand that I need my friends and they need me. As I look back I realize she was always a little mean-spirited about my friends—she never made any friends of her own—but I wasn't overly concerned at the beginning of our acquaintance. I didn't think she and I would ever get serious. We were too dissimilar in our interests.

"The first time I took her riding in my hot rod she darn near fainted from fear. The other girls I knew weren't chicken. When I tried to teach her how to swim she passed out cold, or else she pretended to. She claims she has a mortal terror of water, which I accept, although in view of the recreations I enjoy her nervousness is very inconvenient. She never once stepped on board a boat my gang and I built, despite all my urging. When I bought her a life preserver for a birthday present, she burst out crying and I surrendered on the project. Once I took her on a hunting trip—in order to please her I invited nobody else—and she got blisters on her heels and nearly froze to death. In the end I had to call off the trip and practically carry her five miles down a mountain to our car. Letty is not a good sport.

"Why we stuck together for the eight years before our marriage is still a mystery to me. We broke up many times—that is, I decided to stop seeing her—but for some reason I always went back. Letty continually pestered me to go steady with her and I continually refused. If I let a week go by without telephoning, she would drown me in tears when I did call. The other girls I knew didn't act that way. I felt could feel was worthy of her. My father-in-law is a fine man, in his way. However, he and his family occupy a run-down rental property, he owns nothing, and I have no regard for his judgment. When I reach my father-in-law's age I'll be a landlord myself. By living in a dump and paying low rent, I've managed for the past five years to invest a hundred dollars a month in real estate that is rapidly rising in value. Letty wouldn't understand the deal even if I were willing to let her in on the details of my business, which I'm not. She thinks strictly in terms of nine-to-five jobs. She is glued to her own job. Now that she and I are married, I wish she would turn in her resignation and stay home and start the family she used to talk about. Because I refused to be conned into the nine-to-five bit, she sticks to her office on the grounds that she doesn't trust me to support her. Her worry on that score is absurd. If she would agree to resign I might even agree to move, although it's beyond my comprehension why our place, which I'll admit isn't much, is so shocking to a girl who grew up with considerably less.

"Nor do I understand why Letty dislikes each and every one of my buddies. All the guys think she is O.K., if something of a wet blanket. Most girls would be pleased and flattered to go out to dinner with a husband and three or four of his presentable-looking friends. Not Letty. Whenever the fellows and I did drag her out with us, she began yawning and clamoring for bed before dessert was served. I'm a night owl. By nine P.M. Letty is living quarters, as well as his overweening devotion to his friends, as a direct and deliberate slam at her. Greg confirmed her in this conviction by his reluctance to reveal his business and financial circumstances; it was obvious that Letty, who had worked since high-school graduation, was qualified to understand his plan of savings if it were explained to her.

Although Greg badly wanted a reconciliation, he found it difficult to speak to Letty about his private affairs and ambitions. In his self-assigned he-man role, he thought it unmanly to share business confidences with any female. He was equally loath to inform his friends that he was no longer available for fun and frolic at all times. Even after Greg came to understand through counseling that a complete turnabout in his attitudes was essential to salvage his marriage, he shrank from the pain inevitable in such change. Consequently he launched himself on a second courtship, inviting Letty to dine and dance in plush night spots, showering her with attention and gifts. Often a second courtship helps to mend a broken marriage. Greg's best efforts failed with Letty.

"But then one evening Greg burst free of his inhibitions and Letty followed his lead. The two held a long, serious conversation that went on for hours, probably the first serious conversation of their ten-year relationship. What was said I don't know, but judging from later reports to me I gather Letty and Greg acquired important, intimate knowledge of each other, their anxieties and fears, their secret hopes and dreams. The next day Greg did a very hard thing. He told several of his buddies in plain words that as a married man, who loved his wife, he hoped to maintain his masculine friendships, but had found their constant company an embarrassment. This news was passed around. No doubt some of his pals were offended, although nobody said so. Greg still sees bachelor friends, but rarely. A year ago one member of the old gang was married; he and his wife are now included in Greg and Letty's circle of mutual friends.

"Letty moved back to the unsatisfactory apartment, pleased to be with Greg without his gang. She dropped her deeply entrenched habit of keeping quiet. She began to speak up and voice objections when something seemed wrong or unfair to her, instead of swallowing her complaints and then bewildering Greg with prolonged spells of cool silence which inevitably culminated in explosions.

"Greg accustomed himself to initiating and taking part in candid man-woman talk. Letty became reassured, relaxed, much less stiff. Greg then decided his wife was more fun than tavern pickups, cadging meals and drinks. One day he took Letty shopping for a new sofa and was amazed to find their tastes in furnishings were very similar.

"When Letty was advised of his investment program, she cheered it. She proved immediately that she trusted his ability and financial acumen: she resigned from her job. She put some of her spare time into studying cookbooks; she hadn't known she was a poor cook until Greg was prodded into telling her. Nor had she realized how she annoyed him with her addiction to nine-o'clock bedtime. Short naps in the afternoon helped her to stay up longer and become a livelier companion.

"Letty tried hard, but apparently was unable to learn to share in Greg's passion for outdoor sports. She still dreads water and is an indifferent swimmer, despite numerous swimming lessons. Maybe someday in the future she will conquer her nervousness and happily go hunting, fishing and skin diving with Greg. At the moment that particular problem is academic.

"Just last week Letty and Greg became the proud parents of twin boys. Greg was overjoyed by the double triumph that (in his own mind) firmly established his masculinity in the sight of his financially successful parents, his prosperous brothers and the rest of the world. And Letty is rejoicing in his delight and her own fulfillment. Their marriage, I'm sure, is on a sound basis."

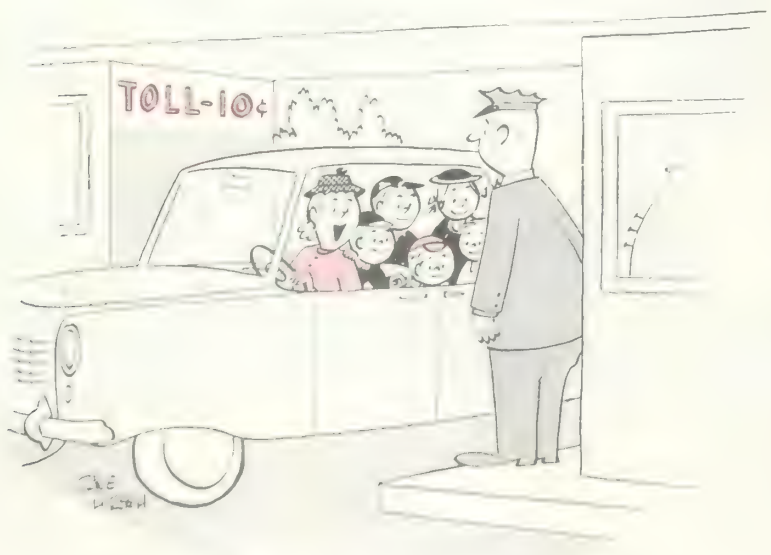
This fact is shown in a number of ways. By fan mail that still pours into his law offices in Chicago at the rate of 100 or more letters a day. By an overwhelming flood of valentines every February fourteenth. By the "Draft Stevenson" clubs which have sprung up spontaneously all over the country, organized by people who feel that only President Eisenhower's magnetic popular personality was responsible for Governor Stevenson's defeats in 1952 and 1956. By 45 requests for magazine and newspaper interviews awaiting his decision one day last winter. And by the procession of political figures, ranging from ward leaders to governors, who continue to visit Mr. Stevenson and ask his advice and opinions.

Meanwhile the governor (as he is called in Illinois, and by all who know him or work with him) does nothing to encourage the build-up. A bit ruefully he accepts his role as titular head of the Democratic Party, and agreeably presents the public image of country squire, statesman and elder sage (not so elder, for he numbers his years by the century, and was sixty on February 5, 1960). Privately, he continues to live the busy, almost hectic life of a prosperous lawyer, world traveler and doting grandfather; in the last three and a half years he has not stood in a corner, biting his thumb, but has as always been thinking, working, talking, thinking, making friends, looking, thinking, writing, reading, and just plain living.

When the governor is not traveling he is likely to be found during weekday working hours at the offices of his law firm (Stevenson, Rifkind & Wirtz) on the forty-third floor of the Field Building in the Chicago Loop. His private office, which used to belong to Marshall Field, Sr., has magnificent views over the city and Lake Michigan, paneled walls, and the atmosphere of a living room rather than an office. A huge painting of blades of golden wheat hangs over a couch—a reminder of the governor's deep affection for the Illinois farmland. On one wall is a campaign poster from 1892, when his grandfather Adlai Stevenson I successfully ran for Vice President on a ticket with Grover Cleveland. On a window embrasure is a small bronze head of Franklin D. Roosevelt; on another, a bust of Albert Schweitzer, whom Mr. Stevenson visited in Africa. Across the room is a photograph of the two men, smiling together, and above it on the wall a huge world map. One end of the room is lined with books. Most of them are on politics and world affairs, and some of them were written by Mr. Stevenson, whose recent book, Friends and Enemies, deals with his trip to Russia in 1958. In front of the shelves is a long dining table.

"We've fixed up a little kitchen in the office, and when the governor really wants to talk to guests without being interrupted, we serve lunch here," explained Carol Evans, the tall, handsome, highly discreet blonde who has been the governor's secretary since 1947.

"He gets in around nine-thirty and goes through the day like a whirlwind," she continued. "He doesn't like to go out to lunch at restaurants or even private clubs because so many people come up to the table to speak to him. People are always after him for something or other. For instance, he gets about sixty or seventy requests to speak every week, and he accepts only a fraction of them, if any. He likes to do things which can be nationally rather than just locally helpful. And he gives a lot of time to organizations which were connected in some way or another with his family. And to the Field Foundation, and the Encyclopaedia Britannica—he's chairman of their film division.



"Then there's the mail. He still gets a lot from women who think they're in love with him and want to marry him. He was mildly intrigued by these letters at first, but now he's sick of it and I screen them all out. But there's a great deal of other mail he has to see for himself, of course. It takes up a lot of time, particularly as he's away from Chicago so often."

Miss Evans produced a list of the governor's appointments for one typical month last fall, as an illustration of the infinite variety and pace of his present life. Meeting with Brooks Hays, former Democratic congressman from Arkansas, who lost a recent election largely because of his antisegregationist beliefs. Attendance at a World Series game. Two days' work at home, writing an article. A luncheon at home for Sir Julian Huxley, the British biologist, and his wife. A meeting with the board of editors of the Encyclopaedia. Overnight house guest: former Senator William Benton, of Connecticut.

That was the first week. The second included a flight to New York, where his law firm has a branch, as it has in Washington. Lunch and a football game with President Robert Francis Goheen at the governor's alma mater, Princeton. A dinner for Mme. Vijayalakshmi Pandit of India. A dinner with members of the Democratic Advisory Council, and a visit with the President of Mexico, who was then touring the United States.

The next week the governor was back in Illinois, where he gave a Democratic fund-raising party at his home for about 450 people, and lunched on another day with Governor Edmund G. Brown, of California. A few days later he was in Boston, having dinner with Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., the author and historian who is also a former speech writer for Mr. Stevenson. Then on to New York to see "The Miracle Worker," and to keep various business appointments. The end of the month found him back at home, going quail hunting with friends, and entertaining President Sekou Touré, of Guinea, at dinner.

"Typical," commented Miss Evans. "Except that during the month he didn't happen to travel outside the country."

Governor Stevenson has a vast curiosity about the rest of the world, which fits in nicely with his law firm's international interests. Between 1952 and 1956 he visited most of Asia. He goes to Europe every summer, and the West Indies or other points south every winter. In 1958 he made a long tour of Russia, where he represented the Authors League of America in efforts to arrange royalties for the Soviet use of American literary works. He failed, and came back remarking, "It is as useless to argue with a dedicated Communist as it is with a right-wing Republican." During the trip he also visited Scandinavia, Eastern Europe and the Sahara, and in 1959, while on a cruise with Senator Benton, he took a look at Spain. In February and March of this year he was scheduled to tour most of South America.

On his foreign travels the governor is usually accompanied by William McCormick Blair, Jr., one of his law partners. Mr. Blair, a tall, sardonic, youngish man-about-Chicago, has worked with Mr. Stevenson for years in and out of campaigns and is an expert at advising his boss on strategy, press relations, foreign lands and when to put on his galoshes.

"Bill Blair is the only person who can disagree openly with the governor," a mutual friend said. "Other people can do it, but they have to be diplomatic."

Another partner is Newton N. Minow, a brilliant young lawyer who frequently joins Mr. Stevenson on the New York trips. Mr. Minow often twits the governor about two of his well-known characteristics: frugality; and his love of food, any food. Furthermore, he can provide stories to prove it.

"When we're in New York we usually stay at Senator Benton's apartment in the Savoy Plaza," he says. "Since a lot of our business is down in Wall Street and we always get lost getting there, I usually suggest taking a taxi. But no, the governor says that's wasteful, and we take the subway. Sure enough, we get lost. When we're finally through our business it's lunchtime, and we start looking around for a restaurant. And sure enough, he heads right for some little greasy spoon of a place, with the kind of food you wouldn't feed to your worst enemy. But he hops up on a stool and devours everything he can get.

"Senator Benton's apartment has a little kitchen, and the last time we were there the governor said he'd cook dinner. He turned out the most nauseating mess you've ever seen—something involving eggs and tomatoes and I don't know what all—and he couldn't understand why I said he could have my share. But he ate it all up."

In New York Governor Stevenson, a devoted father, always sees his youngest son, John Fell, who is in the real-estate business there. Bordon, the middle son, is working in Boston. Adlai Stevenson III, the oldest son, practices law with a firm unconnected with that of his father, and lives in Chicago. Adlai III, a gentle and diffident young man ("Just like the governor when he was young," said a friend) is married and the father of two-about-to-be-three children.

"The gov's the most wonderful grandfather you could imagine," says his daughter-in-law, Nancy Anderson, a beautiful Smith College graduate with green eyes and hair the color of buckwheat honey, met young Adlai when he was stationed with the Marines near her home in Louisville, Kentucky. They were married in June, 1955, and little Adlai Stevenson IV was born on November 4, 1956, two days before the governor's second defeat. Typically, Mr. Stevenson told his disappointed followers, "Let there be no tears for me. If I have lost an election, I have won a grandchild."

Today young Adlai IV is a direct, sturdy, straw-thatched three-year-old who resembles his grandfather, likes hard toys, and shows a scientific turn of mind. His little sister Lucy, who was born on July 2, 1958, is a moonbeam-haired child who looks like a Vermeer painting and constantly collapses in paintable poses. She loves people and stuffed animals.

The young Stevensons live in a comfortable old brick house, painted gray with a white trim, on a quiet Chicago side street. When the

INSIDE STORY

How The Stars Reduce Without Telltale Aging

By BOBBIE REYNOLDS

Beautiful, blue-eyed Yvonne De Carlo has, without a doubt, one of the youngest-looking figures on the Hollywood scene. Read how she keeps it that way.

It was a star-studded audience at Romanoff's and everybody was dressed fit to kill. Yvonne De Carlo looked like a living doll in a strapless sheath that showed off her figure to perfection. In fact, she looked younger, slimmer and even more glamorous than when we'd met five years ago—prior to the filming of "The Ten Commandments."

Later in the evening, I asked her outright how she keeps her gorgeous figure. "Or don't you have to worry about your weight?" I added with the slightest trace of envy in my voice. Her answer took me completely by surprise.

"After my second son was born," Yvonne confided, "I decided I needed to lose a few pounds. You see, I'd signed for my first TV appearance and on a 'live' show, with no chance for re-shooting, I knew I'd be better off a few pounds under than one pound over camera proportions."

"But what did you do?" I said impatiently. "Try a crash diet?"

"Absolutely not!" said a shocked Yvonne. "I reduced the safe way. I simply ate candy."

A studio dietitian had warned Yvonne against starvation diets and rigid regimens. She knew how easily they can ruin health and looks. Instead, she recommended a special low-calorie candy that helps make you thin. And it actually does! I've seen plenty of proof walking around the cinema town.

What a pity some of the box office belles and matinee idols of the silent era never knew about this amazing reducing-plan candy. Blitz pills, rubber sweatsuits, reducing salts, dangerous drugs, dehydration diets—that's how they punished themselves in the old days. And what could be worse than a leading lady with lines that can't be covered up with cosmetics or with skin that's lost its firmness from a sudden weight reduction! Yet even worse things have happened to Hollywood stars in their struggle to reduce.

Take, for instance, Lilyan Tashman, who made a name for herself in "The Gold Diggers of Broadway"—or Barbara La Marr, the raven-haired beauty of "The Three Musketeers" or Renée Adorée of "The Big Parade" fame. Old timers tell me these beauties made themselves desperately ill from starvation dieting. Another sad case, in later years, was that of Maria Montez.

But for the most part, stars today have given up dangerous diets that work faster at "aging" them than reducing them. They now keep their figures looking younger than their years a safe, sensible way. They actually eat a delicious, low-calorie vitamin- and mineral-enriched candy, especially made for reducing.

Lovely Virginia Bruce confided that she's tried both the vanilla caramel kind and the chocolate fudge-type and finds they work equally well.

"So many women 'over thirty' become careless about their figures and looks," said Virginia at lunch one day. "And that's the time to pay special heed to these things."

Then holding up two candy squares, she added: "These let me eat all my favorite foods—beef stroganoff, macaroni, even ice cream—but keep me from *over*eating." Interesting sidelight: Virginia has lost 9 pounds on this reducing-plan candy, and I've never seen her look better.

Everybody wants to know Hedy Lamarr's secret of staying slim—and it looks as if she's telling all her friends. She says she eats candy!

Quizzing Virginia further, I found that she'd read about this candy in a magazine article, based on a medical journal report. To satisfy my own curiosity, I dug up the report and learned this. The candy is not a pill, not a drug. It's what's known as an "appetite deterrent."

Taken before meals as directed, the candy (which, incidentally, is called Ayds) curbs your appetite, so you automatically eat less . . . lose weight naturally.

It's been tested on scores of overweight men and women in clinical studies at a Boston medical center and in a recent study at a Chicago university. And when compared to other leading weight-reducing products, plus a strict diet alone, doctors found that those on the Ayds Plan lost the most weight—three times as much as those on the diet alone. What's more, they suffered no hunger pangs, no nervous jitters or sleeplessness.

It's plain to see riding instead of walking hasn't hurt Virginia Bruce's lovely figure. Fact is, she's lost nine pounds.

News as good as this couldn't help but travel fast over the theatrical grapevine. In New York City, the other day, I talked to the secretary of a talent agent who had taken off 28 pounds on the Ayds Plan. And she was just delighted. In fact, the reliability of Ayds and its success over the past 18 years have been so outstanding that its makers guarantee you'll lose weight with your first box or your money is refunded.

What people like most about these delicious Ayds candies is that they not only help you reduce—but they help you stay reduced!

Hedy Lamarr confirmed that! I ran into her at a masquerade party and noticed she was wearing a costume from "Samson and Delilah," a film she'd made in 1950. When I remarked on it, she said: "Thanks to Ayds, it still fits. I never thought losing pounds could be so easy and so pleasant."

And there it is! The inside story not only of how the stars reduce without telltale aging, but of how thousands of folks have achieved youthful figures, too. For any who'd like to follow their example, see your doctor before reducing and have him write for the medical journal report. Then pick up a box of Ayds (vanilla caramel or chocolate fudge-type) at drug or department stores.

He's really an ideal grandparent—he never

Yes, I think the grandchildren have helped
I in a kind of gap in his life. But I really t think he's very lonely. He's got lots and of friends who are devoted to him, and to m he's devoted—they see to it that he isn't lone too much. And then he's so busy . . .

he never seems to relax! Ad and I worry about that sometimes, just as we worry a little about his putting on weight.

"But I suppose he does get lonely sometimes. For instance, once in a while at night when he's working at home he'll call us up, just to say hello and see how we are. And I think of him out there alone, playing classical records to himself. We all wish he'd get married again—but I honestly don't think he will. Oh, he knows lots of lovely single women, and he goes out with them. But somehow, nothing ever seems to happen."

Mr. Stevenson and his wife, Ellen Borden Stevenson, were divorced in 1949, when Mr. Stevenson was governor of Illinois. The governor still lives in the home which they built in 1938, and as the years pass by he is more and more likely to be found there—writing, thinking, walking or, as he was one week last winter, posing for an oil portrait.

Governor Stevenson's home is a white, two-story wooden house on a seventy-acre farm near Libertyville, forty miles north of Chicago. To get there, you take an hour-long train ride to Lake Forest, a comfortably wealthy community filled with Republicans, limousines and pseudo-Tudor architecture. At the station (if you are lucky and have made careful arrangements) you are met by the amiable tenant who farms the governor's land, and are driven eight miles through open countryside which could be described as "rolling" by only a Midwesterner.

The car turns left off the highway, goes for a mile or two along an unpaved road, and whirls into a gravel driveway where an open white gate is marked "A. E. S." One third of a mile ahead the house stands on a little knoll, surrounded by what looks like an English park—wide stretches of grass beneath tall, magnificent trees. A flock of sheep dot the meadow to the right, and on a little hillock beyond them a neighbor's sleek chestnut horses prance in the keen wind of this bright blue-and-white winter day. A thin crust of old snow still lies in patches on the ground; morning sunlight bounces from a puddle of ice in the driveway and dances across the governor's bright yellow front door.

On just such a day, Carol Evans led us through the front door and into the paneled, red-tile-floored entrance hall. To the left were a guest room and bathroom; to the right, the kitchen and the housekeeper's quarters. A staircase, up which Miss Evans and her briefcase swiftly disappeared, led to the upstairs and, one gathered, the governor. The living room lay straight ahead.

The first impression of Governor Stevenson's living room is one of light, comfort and gaiety. The walls are pale yellow, and the fuzzy rugs on the hardwood floor are a paler yellow. Across the room from the fireplace a glass door leads to a flagstoned patio. On either side of the door are two tall, pale green tables, each bearing a vase of yellow flowers and red berries; two matching mirrors with wide silver frames hang on the walls above the tables.

Two comfortable mustard-colored couches face each other on either side of the fireplace, and a blue occasional chair with a gay flower pattern stands near them. On one side of the fireplace is a copper tub full of logs; on the other, a low, round table bearing a philodendron planted in a copper half-bushel measure from Somerset, England, a dagger from India, a sword from Africa, and a stone axhead which the governor found long ago in one of his fields.

Against one wall is a glass-fronted secretary filled with souvenirs of the famous family, and antique glass and china. In one small wineglass is a note: "Dear Adlai: George Washington drank out of this glass . . . go thou and do likewise . . . preferably . . . cider!" The signature is invisible. Nearby is an inlaid side table displaying a letter from Lincoln to Major General Meade, a picture of Lincoln (to whom Governor Stevenson is particularly devoted) and various historic medals. On this particular day the table also bore three small books: The Pocket RLS (Robert Louis Stevenson), Travels with a Donkey, also by the no-relation Stevenson, and Thomas More's Utopia.

Other books lay in casually happy piles around the room. A stack of new novels on a sideboard, between a ship model and a basket of juicy red apples. Candidates 1960 (which contains a particularly felicitous chapter on Adlai Ewing Stevenson) lay on a small table near one of the couches, along with several new books on current politics. Before a sunlit corner seat a big table was piled high with magazines: The French edition of Réalités; The Saturday Review; The New Republic (folded open to a critical article on Vice President Nixon); Life and the Princeton Alumni Weekly. Art and picture books fanned across the coffee table in front of the fireplace.

One of them, The Quiet Eye, contains a quotation from the Book of Discipline of the Religious Society of Friends: "True simplicity consists not in the use of particular forms, but in foregoing overindulgence, in maintaining humility of spirit, and in keeping the material surroundings of our lives directly serviceable to necessary ends, even though those surroundings may properly be characterized by grace, symmetry and beauty."

"Yes, yes, I'd subscribe to that," said Mr. Stevenson, when he was asked about this later on. And: "Yes, certainly that is what I believe." Although he is a Unitarian, there are those who believe that the Quakerism in his ancestry has had a strong influence on his character. The famous "frugality," for instance, might be looked upon as Quaker spareness and dislike of ostentation; his refusal to make glib campaign promises is seen by some people as a deliberate attempt at political suicide, and by others as a Quakerlike refusal to sacrifice the principles of conscience to expediency. His home, comfortable and spacious but not the opulent mansion which his wealth would permit, is in keeping with this interpretation. (People close to Mr. Stevenson estimate his wealth at "around a million dollars.")

Beyond the living room is the library, three of its walls lined with books, the other occupied by windows, a fireplace and a sunny, pastoral oil painting. There are four shelves of poetry, and most of the volumes looked well thumbed. There are shelves of scrapbooks containing up-to-date clippings about the governor. Reminders of his world travels are here in the form of a folded golden Japanese umbrella, a pair of golden slippers from India, and presentation swords and daggers from everywhere. His political adventures are commemorated in a collection of rather awful Democratic donkeys and, displayed prominently if perhaps ironically, a string of white ivory elephants.

A radio is built into one of the bookshelves, and below it is a phonograph. On this particular day a pile of records which the governor had evidently been playing recently lay beside the phonograph: Excerpts from Richard Strauss' Arabella; Berlioz; Tchaikovsky.

Nearby was a row of books which later turned out to be the "ones-I'm-intending-to-get-around-to-soon" books. In their wild variety they were a fine indication of the governor's wide-ranging interests: Allen Drury's Advise and Consent; Richard Nixon, by Earl Mazo; Can Man Be Modified? by Jean Rostand; Suzuki's Zen and Japanese Culture; and More in Anger, by Marya Mannes.

The governor's voice could be heard on the stairs. "I hate posing for my portrait," he was complaining to Miss Evans. "My mind goes blank. I can't bear to have my mind go blank. I want to go for a walk. Now where did I leave my boots?"

He hurried into the room, a medium-sized man in tweed trousers and a mustard-colored corduroy jacket, a man obviously intending to look under a couch for the missing boots but who swerved from the search just in time to say hello. His eyes were bluer than one had expected—very, very blue eyes in a rather pink face.

"You want to go for a walk?" he asked. "Good! We've got to hurry, only an hour until lunch. Let me see, did I remember to order tea for lunch? Yes, I'm almost sure I did. How are you fixed for shoes? My goodness, you can't go walking in the snow in those! They're very pretty, but they'll get soaked. Let me see what I can find."

The governor dived into the hall closet and began tossing possibilities out into the hall. One thigh-high rubber wader. A pair of hip-high fishing pants. A pair of heavy leather African safari boots. Two tennis shoes which didn't match.

"H'm," said the governor, looking with dismay at the collection. Suddenly he dashed upstairs, and a minute later came back with a pair of sheepskin-lined suède duck-hunting boots. They fitted perfectly.

The phone rang, and Governor Stevenson took it in the hall—we counted five telephone extensions in the house, and there are probably more. "Where's a pencil? Where's a pencil? There ought to be pencils here!" he exclaimed as we wandered back into the living room to wait. Even there, his slightly raspy voice sounded clearly: "Limitations and consortions . . . renegotiations . . . well, all right, I'll draft the letter . . . let's see . . . now remember, new nations are touchy about their sovereignty . . . let's not let a minor obstacle stop the freight train." The governor is often accused of "pathological indecision," but this one small glimpse into the conduct of his law business suggested that in that area, at least, he is as decisive as a diamond cutter.

When the call was over, when the governor had discovered that everyone else was booted but that he was still wearing his slippers, when he had finally found his boots and put them on, when he had checked again to make sure he had really ordered tea for lunch, the walkers set out. Joker and Merlin came too—Joker is a big black "stable dog" and Merlin is the fourth generation of Stevenson Dalmatians, all of which have been named after characters in the King Arthur legends. Two famous forebears, Artie and Lance, are no longer among the living.

The governor led the way past the winter-empty vegetable garden, and showed us the neat stables where he used to keep horses until he decided they were too expensive. Near them is the new aluminum barn, smelling like old barns of warm hay, manure and sunlight. A red canoe and an aluminum skiff were las to a beam for winter storage. We opene gate and crunched through wet oak leaves crusty snow down a gentle slope to the Plaines River. The governor talked of Kickapoo Indians who had lived in the area the French who had come down the r bringing perfume bottles ("Of all things!" the Indians, of the arrowheads his boys u to find in the fields.

"From this very spot," he said, point "you can take a canoe and paddle all the to New Orleans!"

"How far have you gone?"

He grinned. "To the outskirts of Chicag

We walked on briskly, following a well-worn path beside the river, and after half a mile circled the houses of some neighbors back toward the governor's house. The governor talked of his farm, of selling a few bales of hay a year, of butchering a few sheep a year for the freezer, of how he wished he hadn't sold his bigger farm in Central Illinois, of the difficulties of absentee landlordism.

We climbed a split-rail fence and headed back across the lawns toward the house. The governor pointed admiringly at a stretch of virgin forest behind us, and told of how it had been saved from the developers by a benevolent neighbor. He pointed out his tennis court, and the places where daffodils carpet the ground in spring. Tidily he collected broken branches as he walked, placing them in neat piles to be used later for firewood. Before we went in the house he stopped for a moment to gaze at his sugar maples, the bare branches, intricate as thought, lashing with apparent indecisiveness in the winter wind, the trunks, sturdy as conscience, rooted firmly in the rich Midwestern soil.

"Trees are my great love," he said.

Lunch was announced a short while later by Mrs. Viola Reardy, the governor's housekeeper and sole domestic employee. Long ago Mrs. Reardy used to work for the governor's sister, Mrs. Ernest Ives, in the old family home at Bloomington, Illinois; after Mrs. Reardy was widowed about a year and a half ago she heard that the governor (like everyone else) was desperate for efficient domestic help and decided to take on the job.

"The governor was afraid the work would be too hard for me," said tiny, gray-haired Mrs. Reardy. "But I convinced him that I was wiry and strong, and that after I got organized everything would be fine. And it is fine now. He's easy to please—he'll eat anything, although he likes to plan menus when guests are coming. And he never complains—unless I forget and move something so he can't find it. He's like all men: he likes things to be where he left them!"

The dining room, like the other rooms, is gay and cheerful. On one side a large picture window with blue-white-and-yellow-flowered draperies frames the distant view of fields and trees and the near view of a bird-feeding station and a red-berried crab-apple tree; on the opposite wall a huge mirror reflects the view for guests seated with their backs to the window at the long, rectangular table.

Tomato soup, broiled fish, salad, fruit compote and tea appeared smoothly and disappeared swiftly. The conversation moved from India to foreign policy to domestic policies (warily) and rather quickly on to the governor's travels.

"In England last summer I stayed with John Steinbeck," he said. "Funny little place way out in the middle of a field—not far from Glastonbury. He's been working for years on the Arthurian legend, maybe ten years. He's been trying to find the real Camelot, and I guess he's found eight or ten possible ones.

"He has a theory that it is necessary for humans from time to time to create versions of the Arthurian legend—round-table coalitions of the bright people and the stupid who call themselves good in opposition to all the other evil people. It's an old legend, goes back to Egypt, maybe to India. . . . I was fascinated, fascinated!"

But it was time to get down to real work, to posing for the portrait again, and talking seriously. The governor led the way upstairs to a spare bedroom, and leaned against a table in the required pose. ("Darned uncomfortable!" he muttered.) Willard W. Cummings, a young artist from New York, squinted at the documents the governor held in his statesmanlike right hand, and squeezed out some Chinese white on his palette. Midafternoon sunlight filtered softly through the gauze curtains.

"What have I been doing in the last few years?" the governor asked, echoing the question reflectively. "Well, I've never satisfied my travel wanderlust (although I'm reaching the point where I may have) and so I've been traveling a lot.

"Then there's my law firm. I have to earn a living, you know, and it keeps me pretty busy. And I have to keep up to the correspondence and the public demands still made upon me. I guess I've done what I've been called upon to do to the best of my ability. Anyway, I hope so.

"And I've been finding time to enjoy my family more than in the busy past, and to relax a little. I got caught up in an angry world from the beginning, and I can hardly remember a time when I wasn't working or involved in it. Why, even as a boy going back and forth to school on the train, I was reading; I always had a book in my hand when I traveled, but I wish now that I had looked out the windows a little more often.

"My life has been beset since I first went to Washington and got caught up in the anguish of the depression, in the days of the New Deal. Then from there I went on to the anguish of the war. I spent the summer of 1939 in Europe, and saw war coming, and when I returned I got involved in fighting the America First movement, fighting isolationism. That was a bitter fight! After that I went off to war, with Frank Knox and the Navy Department in Washington. And after the war came work with the United Nations, and then I was governor of Illinois. Then I ran twice for the presidency. . . . I guess I never slowed down at all from 1933 to 1957. So now I'm beginning to slow down a little, and enjoying it."

The governor stopped a moment to think, wriggled slightly and muttered a curse at the sharp edge of the table, glanced guiltily at the painter, and went back into his pose.

"In the realm of thought," he continued, "I guess I think most of all about world affairs, which seem to me of the most importance. And in the field of world affairs the two most important facts are the existence of nuclear weapons, which could destroy us literally, and the disparity of living standards, which could destroy our free institutions if we can't do something to narrow the gap.

"Internationally, I think our main goals should be nuclear disarmament to eliminate the threat of war, and a narrowing of the economic disparity between the living standards in the world. We can't go on much longer living in a world where, for instance, the average yearly income in America is two thousand dollars a year, and the average yearly income in India is sixty dollars! No wonder great political, social and scientific revolutions are sweeping the world, and that instead of seeing the world go democratic we've seen eleven countries (I think it is) turn to other forms of government in the last few years. Democracy is not winning in the world, it is losing.

"Domestically, the important problem is growth. To pay for what we wish to accomplish as a nation you have to have a larger net income, and to have that you have to grow. You have to take some of the bold steps toward growth, such as our forefathers were not afraid to take, and such as we took in the depression.

"Education is another vital domestic issue. Obviously, we're going to have to double our national expenditures on education. To me, it's shameful that we have permitted the fear of inflation to block all our big schemes and dreams!

"We say it would be nice to have clean, wholesome cities for our children to grow up in, and adequate schools for them to go to—but it's too bad we can't afford them. I just don't settle for that. We have to contrive ways of doing these things. We must be bold, we must be imaginative. We must not be paralyzed by large fears and little aims!"

Again he was silent, and his face looked pale now in the fading blue light of the waning afternoon. The artist's brush rasped on the canvas and the governor stared at him somberly, without appearing to see him.

"In America the spirit has had no nourishment for a long time," he said at last. "We're preoccupied with getting rather than giving, with tail fins and barbecue pits and gadgets. Young people are withdrawing to the joys of home life and are less and less interested in public service. And the television scandals were just a small glimpse of a widespread moral corruption.

"Perhaps it's because we didn't suffer material losses in the war—we weren't bombed. The rest of the world has been reminded of the eternal verities in a hard and cruel way, but we have not been. So perhaps we've lost sight of them. And we're filled with euphoric complacency.

"This state of mind goes on and on in spite of Sputnik and all the other Russian accomplishments, in spite of our knowledge of the countries turning away from democracy, in spite of the population explosion, in spite of the world revolutions taking place today! But surely our people know what is happening in the world today, don't they? Don't they?"

SILHOUETTES

By DAN JAFFE

Behind their silhouetted kiss Shadows are ciphered in the stone.
Must they be frightened knowing this?
Lovers have never loved alone.

Beyond the bare black trees and the cold horizon, the sunset was deepening. The room was sapphire with dusk and the artist worked quickly, squinting at his palette. The governor sighed, and somewhere in the house a telephone rang. He hurried off to take it on the extension in his bedroom, where he was joined a few minutes later by Miss Evans and his visitor.

The governor's bedroom has pale blue walls, a gray rug, and a triple-size bed with a chartreuse spread. On the wall above the bed are two rather surprising and very lovely Renaissance cherub heads of gilded wood. A magnolia tree brushes a window on one side of the room, and a glass door leads to a sun deck. On tables and dressers round about the room are family photographs in silver frames.

The governor stood at a window and looked across his fields to the sunset.

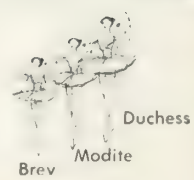
"I love this place so much," he said slowly. "I know every blade of grass, and every tree . . . I like to watch them grow, and I hate to be away from them. If I am leading a life of semiretirement, as some people say, it is only so that I can stay close to this place. I hate going away as much as I have to. I am always happiest here."

But once more it was time to go. The governor had been invited to ask some friends to a preview of a new movie in Chicago, and he was giving a dinner for them first at the Racquet Club. We were already late, but after he had changed his clothes he bustled around the living room and library, turning off lights. Then we were off on the hour's drive, the governor at the wheel. He is a fast and competent driver, although he tends to overlook direction signs and take wrong turnings when he is thinking and talking. During the drive he was thinking and talking, mostly about his own life.

"I have a good life," he said firmly. "Sometimes I think I've been one of the most fortunate men of this century—I've had a tremendously good life! I'm lucky because I like to do so many things. I like to play tennis and walk and hunt and fish a little. I like to read and to work and to write. I go to the movies only about once a year, and my television set doesn't work—it's in the gameroom in the basement —— Oh, didn't you see the gameroom? Too bad! Oh, it's just a sort of relaxing room where I dump everything. But I do manage to go to the theater quite often, and I play a lot of music to myself. And of course I travel a great deal.

"I have a great many guests at the house. And I see a lot of my friends, particularly in New York—and I get there once or twice a month. I wish I could see more of my grandchildren. Maybe I can fix that for next summer. And I wish I could see more of my old Lake Forest friends. It's just that I'm busy and away so much of the time! Well, anyway, we'll see some of them tonight."

And we did, for the governor had invited about sixty friends to his little party. Top Chicago lawyers, and heads of corporations. Smart, gray-haired Lake Forest matrons whom he has known since what a friend terms his "tennis shoes and camping days," and whom he calls by odd, affectionate nicknames like "Mudge" and "Hank." (Most of them are Social Register, and most of them were violently active in his political campaigns.) Young people, too, were there. His law partners and their pretty wives. Adlai and Nancy Stevenson. And several decorative but unexplained girls with bubble hairdos and pale lipstick. There wasn't a professional politician in the lot.



Affably, the governor moved from table to table, stopping to shake hands, to kiss a cheek, to make a joke. A mood of affection and gaiety, friendship and loyalty seemed to glow in the room, and after dinner the spirit spilled over into the bus which the governor had chartered to take his friends to the preview theater.

As the bus bounced merrily along, an old friend who had worked as a volunteer in both campaigns for the presidency glanced at her host and then turned to a friend. "I'd like to start everyone singing 'Happy Days are Here Again!'" she whispered, smiling. "But I don't dare—at least, not yet." END

AMAZING how a wisp of luxury enriches your mood, the evening ahead. Take Belle-Sharmeer. Beautiful example. From the minute you tip-toe into Belle-Sharmeer, you sense sheer elegance... scarcely more than a sleek shadow following every subtlety of your leg. ☐ But all this flattery is not a fleeting thing. One pair of Belle-Sharmeer outlives many a lesser pair by countless extra wearings. Legsize knit is so sure and snug and smooth . . . means magical fit, longer wear. At finer stores everywhere . . . when you want to feel beautiful all over.

D. A. Rayner

Let those who claim to know what a "woman's story" must be classify D. A. RAYNER's The Long Haul on page 56. It's a novel of action and character, of ships and men at sea in time of war—in short, a good, absorbing story for any reader. The writer is a British sailor, home from the sea. "I write because I have stories to tell," he says. Now that is the very best reason.

MARIAN GAVIN (The Changing of the Guard, page 52) lives in Arlington, Texas. "I was born in Mississippi, raised there, went eventually to the University of Oklahoma, where I managed to get a husband instead of a degree. I began writing stories and poetry in the first grade, have been at it ever since—and expect to be, as long as I live."

Marian Gavin

Jean Anderson

JOURNAL staff member JEAN ANDERSON (Wanted: Dinners in a Dish and a Dash, page 174) is a writer, photographer, a superb short-order cook, an art student and a pianist; also a graduate of the Columbia School of Journalism, where she was awarded a Pulitzer fellowship for travel in Europe.

BUTTON UP HIS OVERCOAT

Dear Editors: I have been a widow for two years, and I have what the Quakers call a "concern." Only I want to shout mine out, to all wives everywhere: appreciate now, and do all you can to prolong, the privilege of being a wife. Or you'll be sorry. Men are dying at an earlier age than women; sooner or later most of you will be widows too.

Recently a onetime neighbor looked me up. "I'm divorced now," she advised me quickly. "A free-lance decorator. It's nice work, if you can settle for living-once-removed, once you've had the real thing." She stared at my furniture. "Joe bought you all this?" she asked thoughtfully. "And all your clothes, everything, all those years! Think of one man doing so much!"

Suddenly I did think. I thought of Joe, who would have liked to do nothing but sail the seven seas without ever putting a foot ashore, working in a cubicle office from the month we finished college together, to buy me any idiotic thing I pointed to. Joe nailing up, rewiring, building a plant shelf, a playhouse, collecting and setting the step stones for five separate gardens. (I wouldn't let him do that again.) Joe, being a husband.

It is too much, you learn too late, for one human being. Don't let him carry the suitcases for all the women. Oh, they'll accept, and he, victim of the popular concept that gallantry and muscle are synonymous, recognizes no alternative. Don't let him spend all his weekends fighting traffic. On weekdays have dinner earlier—lunch to seven-thirty is a long, depleting stretch without refueling. Nor is two hours of cocktail quite what the doctor ordered, nor five hours' sleep. It's up to you to rescue him from these cumulative heart strains, whether he likes it or not. Husbands wear out.

There is, truly, no relationship like marriage. Someone chose you. He gave you the gift of status: his name, his place in the world, his respected knowledge or talent or specialized skill—or just his delightful foolishness. He also gave you the only attempt at understanding that will again come your way, once your parents are gone. Half a man's life on a platter. That's a pretty magnificent gift.

A wife has a built-in best friend. Someone familiar and congenial and available to play with—to walk in the first snow with, watch an oriole build its nest, read an old letter or discover a new record, wrap the Christmas presents, turn into a queer little restaurant on impulse, do nothing, or read the travel ads and plan with on a Sunday morning. With. Someone who remembers the same people and places and times and your own young selves. And the children as children. Widowhood is a whole new land, stranger than the moon. Even in the new emptiness there is no quality of peace; and in the familiar things is the most strangeness of all.

Oh, you'll manage. Sell the house, the car, find a cheaper place to live, watch the sales, don't use taxis, don't get sick. Be very wary, very alert, and very grateful to those who do help you. But you're on your own. From the exact moment of that knife-sharp cleavage, you are alone as you've never been alone in your life.

To each of you who still has her husband, I say violently, take care of him. He can't and won't do it for himself. Keep him as long as you can. You'll never have it so good again.

Sincerely,
GLADYS CLUFF

TV VIOLENCE

NEW JERSEY

Dear Journal Editors: A week ago, I showed my five-and-a-half-year-old son a house we had lived in when he was smaller. Thinking of his current kindergarten sweetheart, he commented, in a very matter-of-fact manner, "When Janie and I grow up and get married, I'm going to kill the people who live in that house so we can live in it."

When I caught my breath, I said, "But Johnny, you don't kill people to get their house. You get a house of your own. It is wrong to hurt other people, you know."

Johnny looked at me as if he thought me hopelessly behind the times and commented in a pitying tone of voice, "Oh, mother, that's not the way they do it now. On TV they shoot people all the time."

I am not the sort of mother who allows the children to watch any old thing on TV; but when I questioned the older children, what I heard curled my hair. The fact that the "good guy" kills only the "bad guy" can hardly

Amazing new formula Mum®

LETS YOUR SKIN "BREATHE"

New! More natural protection . . . for the woman who wants to feel free as air, clean as air! In new formula Mum, Bristol-Myers gives you a way to stop odor without "stopping up" pores. Remarkable new Mum does not depend on aluminum salts. It contains no harsh chemicals. Instead Mum works with hexachlorophene. So gentle, yet it destroys the active cause of odor more effectively.

It's the only leading deodorant that stops odor without "stopping up" pores

Leading medical authorities say that oxygen, carbon dioxide, fluids and other substances pass in and out of the skin. This is what we mean when we say the skin "breathes." All other leading deodorants interfere with the natural "breathing out" process. New Mum works in a different way.

Unlike other leading deodorants—cream or spray, ball-types or pads—new Mum does not interfere with the natural function of the skin. New formula Mum keeps your underarms wonderfully sweet and odor-free without "smothering" your pores. It gives you more natural protection.

New formula Mum lets your skin "breathe" freely, naturally. Nature never intended the pores of the skin to be "stopped up." Yet all other leading deodorants "smother" the normal "breathing out" action of the pores (Illustration A). But new formula Mum stops odor without "stopping up" pores (Illustration B).

Protects you every minute of the day! Even when you're on the go from morning to midnight, new Mum cream keeps on working—doesn't let you down. Effective as it is, new Mum is so safe for normal skin even a "beginning" teen-ager can use it daily. Mum is gentle to delicate underarm tissue—won't cause redness, itching or irritation.

So much softer, fluffier, whiter, new Mum is a pleasure to use. It vanishes the moment you smooth it on. Won't harm delicate fabrics—even cashmere or chiffon.

Great Moments in Medicine

Although hospitals were known in Buddhist and Moslem lands long before Christ, they were given their greatest stimulus in the Western World by Christian organizations. Like this "Great Room of the Poor", in the Hôtel-Dieu of Beaune, France (founded in 1443), most early institutions were hospices for the poor and indigent before they acquired their more modern role as a place for the care and treatment of the sick.

The clean and efficient hospitals we know today are a development of the last century. Today, one may enter a hospital with a new assurance that he will receive fine medical and nursing care. Gone is the fear of personal safety that was well justified before the use of anesthetics and antiseptics became routine in hospital procedures.

During the past century, too, Parke-Davis has become one of the world's foremost pharmaceutical firms; a leader in discovering, developing, testing, manufacturing, and distributing better medicines for physicians' use in their offices, in hospitals and in homes – medicines that contribute to longer life and better health for the people of the world.

It's All the Fault of the Women!

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

As long as I can remember there have been hues and cries about the failure of women to perform their proper function in society.

Just now the criers are divided into two diametrically opposite camps of deplorers. One, coming from many colleges and universities, asserts that a great national resource of feminine brain power is being lost because potential mathematicians, scientists, writers and artists marry early, have large families, and never put their higher education to public use.

The other says that women are being miseducated by being given the same training as men. Their place is in the home and their education should concentrate on homemaking and fitting them for their special roles as wives and mothers. Their absence from the home contributes to juvenile delinquency. It is more important that they put a good dinner on the table than that they talk Greek, said a correspondent to the Times of London, where the debate is raging as it is here.

Into the debate enters the fact of earlier marriages and childbearing which led an Oxford University educator to say that Britain had too long made the education of girls a reflection of that of boys—that decay of family life is the loss of a factor of immense value to national well-being.

In the deluge of letter writing that ensued most of the men contributors agreed with the educator, while a number of women insisted that girls no less than boys needed a "tough straightforward education" and that "the object of education is to develop sound value judgments to the extent attainable by each individual." One woman snorted, "What about a suitable education for future fathers?"

Which leads us to ask a few primary questions, the first being one of fact. Are women being overeducated in subjects shared by men?

In the United States today more girls than boys graduate from high school, but 65 per cent of men in contrast to 35 per cent of women make up the total college enrollment. Of the students in the upper 10 per cent of high school classes who do not go on to college, two thirds are women.*

Where women do go on to college their number more nearly approaches that of men (44 per cent) only in the independent colleges of arts and sciences where the traditional liberal-arts program persists. In short, most of them are looking for a general education rather than training for a specific "career."

Is such liberal-arts education of girls bad for marriage? Well, one thing that breaks up CONTINUED ON PAGE 16

So why don't you get Niblets, try this new recipe and . . . Bon Appétit.

Corn au Champignons

Created by James A. Beard, famous gourmet and author of numerous cookbooks.

2 tbsps. chopped onion
6 tbsps. butter
⅔ cup chopped mushrooms
12-oz. can Niblets® corn
½ cup cream
Salt and pepper

In top pan of chafing dish, over direct heat, melt butter, cook onions and mushrooms for about 5 minutes, or until tender. Add drained Niblets Brand corn. Warm mixture through. Toss gently. Add cream, salt and pepper. Turn lamp low, keep food hot over water pan. Garnish with chopped parsley and mushroom slices. Serves 6.

marriages is that an educated man, who must keep on learning to advance in his work, finds himself, after a few years, stuck with a wife who may put a good dinner on the table but bores him to death.

And one wonders just how a general liberal education can interfere with being a good wife, mother and housekeeper. In my own experience, educated women who are not simultaneously pursuing careers demanding most of their thought and energy are better in each category of homemaking than the uneducated. Their minds are better organized; they plan their work more efficiently; they budget household expenses; they take a greater interest in their husbands' work; they are better able to supervise their children's homework and guide their interests, and they marry later. If a girl completes a college course requiring in all sixteen years of schooling, she will usually be 22 years old, and will in all probability marry a man several years older than she.

I omit mention of the really exceptional woman—the woman of genius. Such women, like men of genius, are driven by their gifts to self-expression. They must compete in the world of men and require the same education as they. One could not design one sort of scientific education for a Madame Curie and another sort entirely for a Nils Bohr, or recommend one kind of language education for a Katherine Mansfield and another for a Joyce Cary.

Be they scientists, writers or artists, if they achieve distinction that may outlast their lifetimes they do so because they are obsessed by their work to the exclusion of almost everything else. They leave their households and children, if they have them, to other women. They are as difficult to live with as male geniuses. They are often emotionally susceptible and likely to be personally unhappy. Their husbands are affronted by their one-track minds, and their marriages often break up. Men are afraid of them—and rightly so—as candidates for matrimony. There is nothing that can be done about them. They play a negligible role in the statistics and in the problem we are discussing.

In speaking of the decay of the home we must not overlook the growing number of teenage marriages—not only of girls but of men. And we must face the fact that many of these, among high-school and college students who quit school to marry, are shotgun marriages, carried through because the girl is pregnant.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company in February reported that the number of children born to teenage husbands increased by two thirds between 1940 and 1957 while the number of marriages of males under 45 increased by only one third.

Such immature marriages have not the best chance of success. Neither party has any experience of life and reality. The romantic notions fed into them by TV and movies do not prepare them for the problems that assault every marriage. Being immature, they are impulsive and impetuous, too easily hurt and disappointed when their marriages do not work out as they had dreamed. And more often than not there is exaggerated trouble with the in-laws who try in vain to guide an immature marriage.

These marriages occur partly because of the sexual and moral looseness that pervades the whole of our society.

The girl who will not indulge in "petting" and sexual play sometimes finds herself without dates, and if she does so indulge often finds herself pregnant. Never has there been so much counseling of students, but such school counseling as they are given on sex and marriage is apparently not wholly effective and many parents seem to have abdicated before the phrase "all the others do it." Hundreds of thousands of parents don't know where their sixteen-year-old daughters are at three o'clock in the morning!

The education of girls primarily requires sober counseling about the advantages of chastity and a great deal more supervision by parents, who ought to get together on this issue.

Teenage marriages mostly occur among girls who do not go to college. For the college-bound group, boys and girls have access to the same program, though boys tend to take more science and math and girls more English and foreign language.

Girls who intend to go only through high school choose and receive less of an "education" than they do of training for homemaking and "marketable skills"—in occupations that, for years, have been largely preempted by women. Incidentally, these are usually the less well-paid positions.

Our modern comprehensive schools, in addition to home economics, have "commercial programs" or "business training" to fit girls to become stenographers, typists, office clerks, receptionists or office-machine operators. For stenography a course in typing must previously have been completed—and by no means all girls can master stenography: it requires that they possess a good vocabulary, ability to spell, and a level of understanding of what they are hearing that many girls lack, either through poor primary-school training or lack of native intelligence.

There is also "distributive education" (training, I insist), where work experience is provided for both boys and girls in retail shops in the community. This program is usually elected more heavily by girls than by boys. Opportunities for it depend on the number of openings in the community.

Most of it is training for certain occupations outside the home that have always been assigned largely to women and which men have no desire to undertake. There is no surplus in any of these fields, and in some others, notably nursing and teaching, requiring more than high-school education, there is a shortage. Many girls enter and leave such occupations to marry and are better homemakers from having acquired through their experience certain disciplines and skills.

If I do not love my neighbor whom I know, how can I love the human race, which is but an abstraction? If I have not learned to work with a few people, how can I be effective with many?

ARTHUR E. MORGAN
TAKEN FROM "DAILY READINGS"
PUBLISHED BY HUGH BIRCH-HORACE MANN FUND

But hundreds of thousands of women marry and continue to work at these and other occupations because one breadwinner, they feel, is not enough for the family. Apart from those women who feel a real vocation for this or that occupation, this is the outstanding reason why married women work outside their homes, even at the cost of their children's care. Household help is scarce and relatively so expensive that if the average woman hires a substitute for herself at home her outside work adds up to little income.

It is all very well to say that the American home is luxurious and extravagant. This is true in very few cases. The homes that have, for instance, wall-to-wall carpeting are in a minority and usually confined to those of men who are well ahead in their occupations. A TV set has (unhappily, considering many of the programs) become an automatic baby sitter. For women who do all or most of their own laundry, washing machines are essential, and where homes provide no space to dry clothing, so are dryers. Women who do all or most of their own housework need modern cleaning equipment, and modern refrigeration. The investment in these things amounts to hundreds of dollars and, in addition, there are the utility bills.

An automobile is no longer a luxury for most families. Men often live long distances from their work and with no other means of transportation than the car. Shopping centers and supermarkets have closed down many of the little neighborhood stores where women used to buy food and carry it home. And if automobiles in the last few years have been bigger and gaudier than ever, the public bought them because there was nothing else available. Many turned to smaller, cheaper, gasoline-saving compact cars when they appeared.

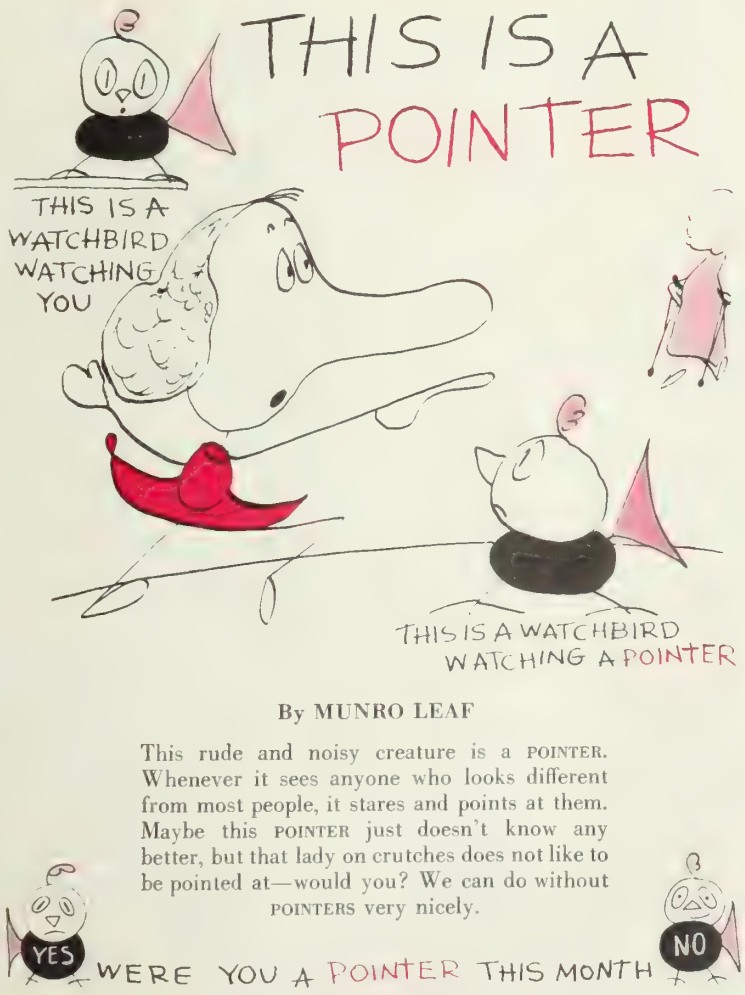
But people also buy things before they actually need them, in anticipation of rising prices. Inflation always encourages a flight from money to things.

Then there is the matter of tax exemptions for dependents. The Federal Government allows $600 exemption per child as tax-deductible. This law has been on the books for twelve years. Meanwhile the cost of raising a child through the years of compulsory schooling has doubled and although family incomes have also increased the increase is by no means evenly distributed. Organized workers have won the greatest proportional increase. But in many middle-class occupations salaries have decreased in actual purchasing power.

I know a bricklayer whose annual income averages $10,000 and who, between jobs, draws unemployment compensation. An assistant professor with a doctor's degree, in an Ivy League college, draws $7000—and averages nearer a sixty- than a forty-hour week. The bricklayer spends money on an expensive TV set, an occasional movie, and a high-priced car. The professor wants (and needs) books, publications, symphony tickets, live theater and travel.

The bricklayer's wife does not work except at homemaking. The professor's wife, a university graduate, does research work outside her home under conditions where she need not leave her children when they are out of school. Except for a weekly cleaning woman and an occasional baby sitter, she does all the housework, all the laundry except sheets and shirts, all the cooking and all the dishwashing. The combined earnings of husband and wife approach that of the bricklayer. Yet they have a highly civilized home, and extremely well-mannered and helpful children.

Where mothers of children under twelve work outside the home the Federal Government finally got around to allowing the working mother to deduct for a baby sitter—absolutely essential to the mother's work. But, at the same time, it put a ceiling on such services of $600 per year and disallowed any deduction if the joint family annual income is over $4500.



For a woman who holds a full day's job the tax deduction, if she is eligible for it, will not half cover the necessary home services.

To take a specific illustration: In an Ohio city a brilliant young woman with a master's degree in history, the wife of a college teacher, decided to respond to a frantic call for substitute public-school teachers at $18 per day. She has two children of school age who come home for lunch, and a year-old baby. She is a thoroughly responsible mother. She is absent from home seven hours a day for five days a week, and has a mature, quite reliable woman who takes care of the baby, tidies up the house, and gets the children's lunch and her own for $1 an hour or $7 a day. The school year consists of 180 days, so her sitter costs her $1260 a year. But the working mother cannot deduct anything at all for the sitter's services, because her husband's income and her own are more than $4500! She pays income tax on her own salary of $3240 a year though she is actually getting only $1980! And the baby sitter also pays income tax on hers. If the teacher's husband who teaches also had a secretary in his office he could deduct her entire salary. There would be no ceiling on it at all, and his income would not be pertinent. Yet the baby sitter is absolutely essential to his wife's work, and the work, from the viewpoint of the public welfare, is highly desirable. While conditions like this exist many educated women are unable to "prove" the value of their education by professional work or service.

The test of a good wife and mother is her willingness and ability to assume her full share of the duties and responsibilities of life—as it is the test of a good husband and father. And the better her education and her training in life's realities, the more likely she is to meet the test. In the end it will always be an individual matter, demanding an individual family solution.

Women have had the vote for over forty years and their organizations lobby in Washington for all sorts of causes but why, why, why don't they take up their own causes and obvious needs?

Now...a special laxative for women

Gives gentle relief more naturally than any ordinary laxative

Mrs. Michael Kerchak
Vienna, Ohio

"Correctol is the kind of laxative I've always looked for and never expected to find," writes Mrs. Kerchak. "It's prompt, gentle—never gives me stomach pains. You can be sure I'll keep on using it!"

Correctol® has been specially developed for a woman's delicate system. It is completely different from harsh, all-purpose laxatives.

Its secret is a non-laxative miracle regulator that simply softens waste. Along with this, Correctol contains just enough mild laxative to give regularity a start.

Working together, these two gentle ingredients make Correctol bring relief more naturally than any ordinary laxative can. Even in pregnancy and following childbirth. In menstrual periods—and after middle age, too!

Do try Correctol soon. 30 tiny pink tablets, $1.00 —at any drug counter.

"Parents can do their best by a handicapped child if they are able to think of him, feel toward him, care for him as a child who in most respects is like other children, with the same needs and responses."

Parents' feelings about Children's Handicaps

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

No child is perfect, and parents react to imperfection in their offspring in somewhat similar patterns.

All mothers and fathers can learn something from the problems faced by parents of retarded and handicapped children. That's because no child is perfect, and we all react to imperfection in our offspring in somewhat similar patterns. But it's much easier for us to see and understand the reactions to such disappointments when the handicaps are severe than when they are mild.

At the time I began to work in the pediatric clinic of a large New York hospital in the early 1930's, the buildings of the hospital and the medical school were brand-new. When a new medical center is built, it draws patients not only from the locality but from miles around. They come hoping that the new center will have new solutions for old problems. And so we saw many cases of mental retardation in children. Some had been diagnosed long before, and the parents had accepted the diagnosis. But now they wanted to be sure that there was not a new cure. Other parents had been told their child was retarded but weren't ready to believe it and came to this hospital for an independent opinion. Others still only suspected that there might be something amiss and were coming for their first consultation.

Two things made an impression on me as an inexperienced pediatrician. One was the widely varying degrees of distress in the parents and the very different ways in which it was expressed. The other was the frequency with which emotional and behavior problems were added to the symptoms of intellectual retardation in the children.

In fact, I worked in the clinic for several months before I saw a situation in which the child was very happily adjusted and in which the parents were quite serene. As you can imagine, this made a particularly profound impression on me. I wondered what the explanation was.

He was a boy six years old. When eventually he was tested he was found to have an I.Q. score of about 65, but I didn't know that, of course, when I was taking the history. His father was a moderately skilled laborer. Both parents were plump, warmhearted, sincere people. They were obviously not intellectual in their interests. They had a happy family life. They loved their son and were very proud of him. When I first asked what the problem was, they said that the teacher had suggested an examination because the boy was not learning readily in first grade. The parents had apparently not been too upset by this news, but had co-operated willingly. When I went on to get the rest of the history, the parents said he had no other problems at all. He had developed from infancy in a way that entirely satisfied them, eating well, sleeping well, being trained and managed easily. He had an unusually sunny disposition and was popular with the children in the neighborhood. When I asked whom he played with, they said they had noticed some tendency in him to prefer younger children. When he played with his own age group he sometimes had trouble getting the fine points of the game, but the kids liked him so well they made allowances for him.

When I had received the test report I told the parents that the boy wouldn't be able to make progress in an ordinary class, and that we would find out whether there was a special class in his neighborhood where he could be trained in other skills than academic ones, and where he would feel on a par with other children. The parents were disappointed for his sake that he couldn't go on in the regular class, but they did not seem deeply upset. There was no evidence that they altered their estimation of their son, or their feelings of pride and pleasure in him. I liked him too.

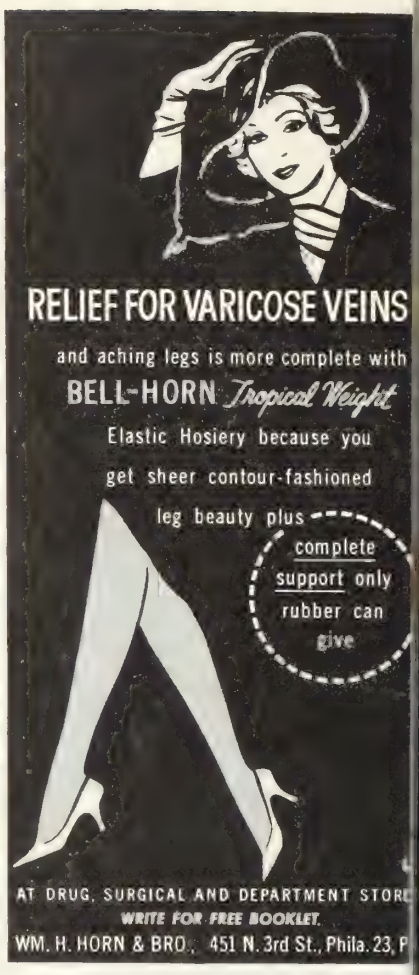
I thought hard and long about this case, wondering what the reasons were that made this boy's limitation relatively easy for these parents to take. One factor was that the boy had no physical handicaps and was able, through his early preschool years, to do about what other children did almost as well as they. There were no brothers or sisters to compare him with. Probably more important was the fact that the parents had grown up in simple surroundings in Europe and had had only a modest amount of schooling. They did not apparently think of formal education as an absolutely essential preparation for a successful life, as so many Americans assume it to be.

We forget that throughout a good part of the world there isn't any schooling at all, and that even in our country millions of people have led happy and productive lives in past generations with mighty little of it. We of the so-called "civilized" portions of the world don't realize that we are a bit peculiar compared with the rest of mankind in having come to almost worship the intellect—not only for what it will gain for us but for its own sake.

But apparently the most significant factor in this case was that the parents had some simple basic faith in themselves, in their child, and in whatever God they worshiped. This faith made them invulnerable to deep wounds when a professional person pointed out that their child had certain limitations.

But most of us have nowhere near that amount of faith, or inner security, or whatever you want to call it. When we first hear the diagnosis, whether it is deafness or blindness or mental retardation, we may simply refuse to believe it. This despite the fact that we have sought advice because we were not satisfied with the child's progress in some respect. Disbelief is a basic kind of self-protection. We have to ward off any kind of blow that life deals us for as long as we possibly can, while we gather our resources to cope with it. So we ask highly skeptical questions of our doctor or other adviser. We may request a consultation with another expert.



None are so old as those who have outlived enthusiasm. THOREAU

Of course we are trying, to one degree or another, to fend off, from the start, a feeling of responsibility for the defect, a sense of guilt. It doesn't help very much when the doctor tells us that this particular handicap is not due to heredity, or that it is not caused by anything that we have done wrong or by anything that we failed to do. Our deepest and most primitive feelings whisper to us that it is our child who is impaired. We created him. Therefore we must be responsible, somehow or other, unless we can justifiably shift the blame to someone else. Here is a situation which reveals how different people are. At one end of the scale is the individual with the kind of conscience which makes him always blame himself first and foremost. At the other end of the scale is the one who, just as soon as he begins to feel the merest twinge of guiltiness, starts to accuse someone else. I have known parents to get so angry at the diagnosis of retardation that they stormed right into the office of the hospital superintendent to demand that the physician or psychologist be fired for carelessness and incompetence. I have admired their spunk.

Most of us parents are mixtures of the guilt-admitting and the blame-shifting types. We try to defend ourselves by asking such logical questions, in the case of brain damage, as whether the obstetrician's skill was adequate during the delivery or whether the pediatrician used the right treatment soon enough when our child had the high fever. But then we shift back to blaming ourselves.

But where do we find the reasons to blame ourselves? I've already mentioned the over-all

INFECTIONS OF YOUNG INFANTS AN URGENT PROBLEM...

VIRULENT "STAPH" THREATENS BABIES

By Gene Wilburn, Medical News Writer, Houston Chronicle

A recent medical journal reveals that doctors have noted a marked resurgence of infections of the skin, the gastrointestinal tract and the lungs, which have resulted in deaths among young infants, all over this country and in other countries as well. The majority of these infections have been described as caused by antibiotic-resistant staphylococci or "staph" germs, as doctors term them.

The coming of age of antibiotics has lulled us into believing that infection is no longer a serious menace to mothers and babies. Yet virulent staph is again claiming its victims. This is particularly serious in view of the fact that antibiotic-resistant staph strains are not limited to hospitals, but are emerging in increasing numbers in the home. In view of these facts, it is of utmost importance that homemakers be aware of the dangers of an invasion by staph.

Staph is spread not only by direct contact, by objects touched by hands and other body areas, but also by room-dust through the air. The ease with which "staph" can be transmitted emphasizes sharply, how vital it is to practice scrupulous personal cleanliness, including regular hand washing, as well as to maintain proper standards of disinfection.

Anyone—sick or well—can carry "staph" and deposit it on the cleanest of surfaces! You can pick it up by touching a contaminated faucet, bowl or basin. In fact the bathroom can become a danger zone for the spread of infection. So a true disinfectant should be used as the bathroom cleanser. Unlike so-called "sanitizers" that may not kill all disease germs they touch, Lysol Brand Disinfectant kills disease germs including "staph," on contact. In laboratory tests its anti-germ action was found to last 7 full days. That is why Lysol is so important for weekly bathroom cleaning. A few drops in the cleaning solution will disinfect from one cleaning to the next as nothing else can.

Here are 3 basic steps for weekly bathroom cleaning: 1. Use Lysol in cleaning solution as directed. 2. Wipe floors, walls, bowls, fixtures with this solution. 3. When laundering bath mats and lid covers, soak in Lysol solution before adding detergent. Note: If anyone in your family has a boil (a direct source of "staph" contamination), disinfect bathtub, basin, bowl, seat, with Lysol after every use. Lysol now comes in pine scent as well as regular and a bottle costs as little as 29¢.

conviction that since we created the child we must have created the defect too. But it's not hard to find other, specific sources of guilt. We were all naughty enough in childhood to have earned our parents' moral disapproval, several times a day, at least. This has left us with some sense of unworthiness. More specifically there is the whole area of sex, about which most of us were made particularly guilty, partly because our parents worried about it anyway (whether or not we gave them any cause for concern), but also because it involves an instinct which insists on some form of expression, if only in our thoughts. You could say with justification that we are all condemned from early childhood to feel guilty about sex, in societies like ours which must repress it to a degree. And sex also happens to be the origin of babies. So the inevitable guilt left over from childhood—about touching the genitals, about sex play with others in early childhood, about petting in adolescence, about sexual thoughts in all stages of childhood—is stored up in a compartment of our conscience, all ready to beset us if there is anything wrong with our child. Many Christians assume that the Biblical phrase about the sins of the fathers being visited on the children refers to sex. I doubt that Biblical scholars think so. As if this weren't enough, the conscientious obstetrician adds another link to the chain of potential guilt by prohibiting intercourse for such a long period before childbirth that a fairly large percentage of couples probably find themselves disobeying occasionally.

I think myself that there is another quite different source of guilt, and that is the very natural and normal impulse to turn away from any kind of defect. I remember the situation that first made me aware of this factor. A childless couple, after years of waiting, were given a handsome baby boy for adoption. They were delighted with him and gave him loving care. But when he was a few months old they began to suspect he was blind. Eventually the diagnosis was confirmed. At this point the adopting mother stated definitely she did not want to keep the baby. The people in the adoption agency pointed out that this baby would need a loving family just as much as any child would. The adopting father was in favor of their keeping the baby, too, saying that they had loved and enjoyed him up to this time, so why couldn't they keep right on? But his wife just kept repeating, "I wouldn't know how to take care of a blind child." I assumed that I myself would take the same position as

BLUE FEATHERS

By ELIZA LOUISA DAWSON

Away across the river
A log cabin grew:
There you plucked on a dulcimer
With a feather of blue.

There I sang the old songs
To you all alone—
To you and your dulcimer
And your feather, my own.

There we raised our children.
Two times two.
Who pluck on dulcimers
With feathers of blue.

Now the children and dulcimers
And my love and I
Go searching for feathers
In the blue of the sky.

CAPTAIN'S CASSEROLE

Make this savory one-dish meal in hurry-up time . . . but only with Star-Kist Tuna and Minute Rice

Here's a thrifty dish that'll get calls for "seconds"—a tuna and rice casserole topped with tomatoes and crisp potato chips. And it'll cost you less than 25¢ a serving.

Toss it together in a jiffy. Just pour long-grain Minute Rice—right out of the box—into the savory seasoning. Then layer with tomatoes, sliced onions and Star-Kist Tuna (that real good meat from the sea). Pour zesty cheese sauce over the layers to hold them together while they bake to savory goodness. Try it on the family tonight. Encore guaranteed.

CAPTAIN'S CASSEROLE

1 can (10½ oz.) condensed cream of mushroom or cream of vegetable soup • ½ cup milk • ⅔ cup grated Cheddar cheese • 1⅓ cups Minute Rice ½ teaspoon oregano (optional) Dash of pepper • 1 can (1 lb.) whole tomatoes 1 cup water • ½ onion, thinly sliced 2 cans (6½ oz. each) Star-Kist Tuna ⅓ cup sliced stuffed olives ½ cup crushed potato chips or dry bread crumbs

Heat soup, milk and cheese until cheese is melted, stirring occasionally. Combine rice, oregano and pepper in greased 1½ quart shallow baking dish. Drain tomatoes, measuring ½ cup juice. Stir juice and water into rice. Slice tomatoes. Arrange most of the tomatoes on rice. Add onion, tuna and olives. Pour on sauce; sprinkle with potato chips. Arrange remaining tomatoes on top.

Bake in a moderate oven (375°F.) for 20 to 25 minutes. Makes six generous—and delicious servings.

Minute is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corp.

the father, and couldn't really imagine how the mother could feel so differently. Then a couple of months later I happened to see another case which was almost identical with the first. I realized then that the first mother's reaction wasn't an inexplicable exception, but that it represented a very basic biological response. It reminded me of how birds and other animals immediately remove a defective offspring from the nest. When ancient Roman and Greek civilizations were at their highest, it was the custom and the law to sacrifice any baby with a defect. This has also been the rule in many other parts of the world since. All of us are bothered by the sight of an accident or death. So the impulse to avoid is probably a fundamental one. Only at a later stage of civilization, as we have acquired a stronger sense of responsibility, have we learned to overcome aversion with compassion.

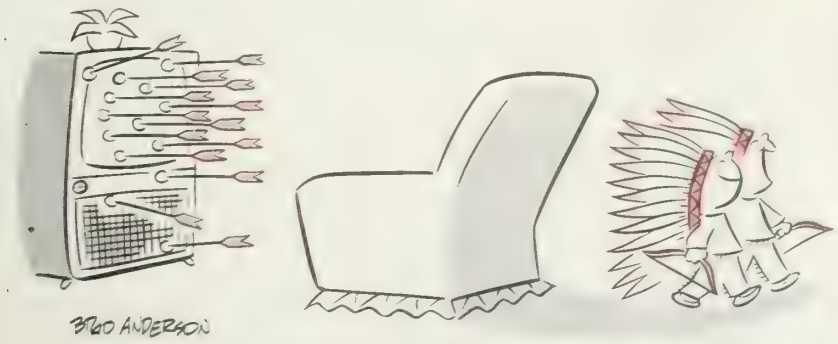
So I came to admire the two women, for being honest enough to say that they doubted their capacity to be good mothers to blind adopted children. I realized that this response would not be revealed in the usual case where the handicapped child was the parent's own by birth, because the parent's feeling of responsibility would predominate over and conceal the other. Then I suspected that the two fathers and I weren't so noble, as I had thought, but were only more used, as most men are, to suppressing their deep feelings.

Before we leave the matter of the impulse to run away, I want to confess how often it is fostered unwittingly by the professional adviser. I am thinking again of that New York hospital. When I would walk into the examining room and see a child of two or three years who was not able to do anything more advanced than lie on his back and play with his toes, my heart would sink. I felt bad about the problems the parents and child faced. But worst of all I dreaded being the one who would have to tell them that their fears were justified. I felt guilty in giving them the diagnosis, almost as if I were the creator of the defect. So I would put on my severest professional face and drag out the history and physical examination as long as possible, to put off the painful moment. When I sensed that the parents were searching my face for signs of my conclusions, I bent lower over my desk. Finally when I had told them the diagnosis I would go on to give them the talk which I knew was theoretically right: that though there was no cure for the retardation, this child like all children would need cheerful, loving parents who would appreciate his good qualities (rather than dwell on his limitations) and who would provide him with companionship and suitable playthings and training. But how hollow this talk must have sounded coming out of my grim face. I must have been really convincing them, by my manner, of how tragic I thought their problem was. This could only have the effect of making them more uncomfortable with their child, rather than reconciling them to him.

When I made the diagnosis of mongolism on a newborn baby I (like most pediatricians of that time) believed that I was giving the best possible help to the parents by advising them, if they could afford it, to place him at once in a nursing home, preferably without ever seeing him. This was on the theory that then they would not become painfully attached to him, and would be better able to provide a cheerful atmosphere and plenty of attention to their subsequent children. As if anguish and guilt could be solved by trying to forget.

It was years later before I realized that though having one's child live somewhere else than at home might be the better solution in one case (after much thought and discussion and perhaps after a trial at home), it certainly would not be better in another. The important point here is that when a professional person advises parents not to see a baby and tells them that they might do better with their other children if the baby did not stay at home, he may make the situation seem more tragic than the parents would have considered it by themselves. His well-intentioned efforts to spare their feelings and facilitate their care of other children may, in itself, give them a stronger sense of shame and guilt than they might have had otherwise. Even if this advice proves in the long run to be right, its effect at the time has been to make the parents feel more uncomfortable toward, more distant from, the baby.

One trouble with the training of doctors and psychologists is the heavy emphasis put on making the correct diagnosis. Is the child healthy or sick, normal or abnormal? If sick or abnormal, which disease does he have? To just what degree is he impaired? Their professional diagnosis is considered more fundamental than treatment, because treatment can be sound only if it is based on correct diagnosis. If diagnosis is wrong, then treatment may be worse than useless, no matter how skillfully given.



What I am emphasizing is that the training of physician and psychologist tends to make him focus on the differences between the healthy and the impaired child. It makes him put children in separate categories. To be sure, if he could not make a diagnosis he would be no great help. But what is so clear is that parents can do their best by a handicapped child if they are able to think of him, feel toward him, care for him as a child who in most respects is like other children, with the same needs and responses.

Another result of the training of the family doctor or pediatrician is that when he thinks of treatment he thinks first of whether there is a medicine, or an operation, which will cure the basic condition. If not, he feels that he is quite limited in his effectiveness and that, in honesty, he must admit this. So when the parents of a retarded child ask, "What is the treatment?" he may reply in effect, "There is none." This will block unbearably the parents who have the healthy impulse to find a course of action and get started on it. They will feel impatient or angry with him, as they do with school administrators and government officials who won't give them the means for doing something, now, for their child.

The professional people working in the fields of rehabilitation and education of children with various handicaps are more apt to think first and foremost of the worth-while techniques now available, and will start talking in a positive manner about all that must be done.

In another article I want to discuss the general management of handicapped children at home.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

"It must be writers that grow so tall," said Artur Rubinstein, greatest of pianists. It was at a large party where the masculine guests standing about were all towering, among them John Hersey, over six feet; Roald Dahl, a good six feet four; Andrew Heiskell, of Life, still taller. Mr. Rubinstein himself remained discreetly seated. Beethoven was 5'2", he said. Michelangelo was a shrimp. Copey of Harvard was only 5'1½", and he stood close to the top of the literary ladder of his day. Of our day, too, one might add, for the innumerable popular writers we know who attended his famous English 12. From John Reed to Walter Lippmann to T. S. Eliot, from Bob Benchley and Bob Sherwood and Heywood Broun to Van Wyck Brooks and Brooks Atkinson, the roll call would spill over this column. COPEY OF HARVARD, A Biography of Charles Townsend Copeland, by J. Donald Adams (Houghton Mifflin), is good reading, full of anecdotes and sparkling with Copey's wit.

For those who have not trod the fair paths of poetry, I strongly recommend THE POWERS OF POETRY, by Gilbert Highet (Oxford). Poetry lovers will hold it close. Each piece is a gem—the frustration, the inspiration, the strange incident in the lives of many poets. Lady Montagu and Pope; Byron and self-starvation; the tragedy of growing old, as Coleridge and Wordsworth and Dylan Thomas found it; Macaulay's neat propaganda; the torn soul behind The Waste Land. Careful scholarly probing, every word of it fascinating.

My favorite novel of the year is THE LEOPARD, by Guiseppe Tomasi, Duke of Palma and Prince of Lampedusa. This is the story, beautifully written, of a Sicilian aristocrat. Still sipping the fine wine of his wealth and power and boundless possession, he recognizes by the signs that the end of his world is not far away. It is the incredibly gilded world of the 1860's, pierced by Garibaldi. The old prince, mathematician and famous astronomer, was the author's great-grandfather. The author himself died in 1957, at sixty-one, a year before this remarkable book—his only book—was accepted by a publisher. (American publisher, Pantheon.)

No matter how hard a father tries to be casual, his letters contain at least a glimpse of his love and of his hope. THE FATHER, Letters to Sons and Daughters, edited by Evan Jones (Rinehart), will bring a lump to your throat—letters from Jack London, Andrew Jackson, Martin Luther, Tolstoi, Truman, Scott Fitzgerald.

THE WORLD OF JOHN SMITH, by Genevieve Foster (Scribner) is my choice for a juvenile. It is one of that outstanding series by the same author: George Washington's World, Abraham Lincoln's World, Augustus Caesar's World, each picturing what was happening all over the world at the same time. John Smith includes Elizabeth I, Boris Godunov, Rubens, Henry Hudson. (For 12-year-olds but equally good for 22-, 42- and 62-year-olds.)

PUBLIC CONCERN

for all American Youth

By JAMES BRYANT CONANT

WIDE WORLD PHOTO

James Bryant Conant, distinguished scholar and former president of Harvard University, has been analyzing the nation's junior high and senior high schools for the past three years.

"It is worse for a boy to remain in school and become frustrated than to leave school and get a satisfying job."

How much misery on the part of parents and children would be avoided if the "snob values" clinging to our educational system could be eliminated. False prestige implying a higher social status for those who have "attended" college threatens improvement long overdue in educating our boys and girls for the kind of world in which they must live and work. For several decades education beyond the high school, merely because it represents a longer education, has been regarded as a better education.

To my mind, full-time education beyond the high school should be thought of not as a matter of prestige but as desirable only to the extent that it is a fruitful development of the potentialities of the student. For the scientist, doctor, lawyer and future scholar, six years beyond high school is a minimum. For other occupations, shorter periods of time are justified. And for still others, full-time education may well terminate with graduation from high school, or even earlier. I am not one to judge a high school unfavorably if the "drop-out" rate is high. It all depends on who drops out and what happens afterward. It is worse for a boy to remain in school and become continually frustrated by his academic difficulties than to leave school and get a satisfying job.

In part, juvenile delinquency arises from the existence of academically frustrated youth who are unemployed. There are, of course, many other factors. The purpose of this article is not to supply an answer to the complex problem of how to reduce juvenile delinquency; my intent is rather to direct the attention of all public-spirited citizens to the need for public concern for all American youth. In particular, I wish to point out to parents the danger of trying to force down the throats of all children of high-school age a diet suitable only for those with academic talent.

No one would consider requiring all boys and girls, irrespective of their talent, to spend hours trying to play a musical instrument. Yet some recent proposals I have read about a high-school curriculum seem to me equally absurd. To be sure, if the United States is to survive in the kind of world in which we live, rapid improvement of the education of the academically talented youth must take place. But in our zeal to upgrade the schooling of one group of students—the exceptionally bright boys and girls—we must not forget the needs of all the others. We must not neglect the development of the manual skills or the education of future voters.

In our desire to plan a curriculum which will provide a wide academic base for the later university education of professional men and women, we must remember that a vast majority of high-school students have no intention of becoming engineers, scientists, doctors, lawyers or university professors. Their vocations require a shorter period of formal training. If their interest in high-school work is to be maintained, they must see the relation of their studies to their plans for later life. For every teacher of experience knows that if education is to be anything more than "rote learning," the pupil's interest in the subject must first be aroused. Particularly boys and girls who have failed to enjoy success in mathematics, English and social studies in the lower grades must be motivated (the educators' word) by a realization of the connection of the high-school work with their ambitions. For this purpose some portion of the school day in the eleventh and twelfth grades should be devoted to practical courses. For girls, these may be courses in home economics, typing, stenography or the use of clerical machines; for boys, vocational courses such as auto mechanics or machine-shop work. I can testify

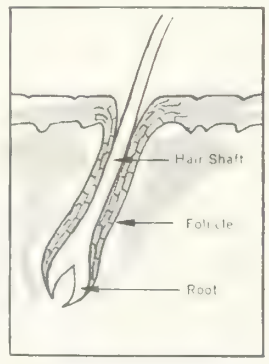
From the Rexall Laboratories comes this amazing statement:

Now you can actually ...and feed back into it the natural life and beauty other

New Awakenings

for your hair



by Rexall

Nature intended your hair to be beautiful—and provided everything necessary to make it so. Yet many of you have never known this true, natural beauty simply because so many women in America have some kind of hair problem. Now—Rexall scientists have demonstrated that the solution to practically all of these problems lies in the delicate and complex structure of hair.

Each hair on your head is composed of a root contained in a tubular sheath called the hair follicle, and the shaft which grows from the extreme end of this follicle. The hair shaft is the only part you can actually see and feel... and it receives its necessary nourishment from blood vessels that extend into the follicle and, for a short distance, into the shaft itself.

Why Hair Dries, Breaks... Loses Lustre and Manageability

If yours is a normal scalp, you have from 100,000 to 200,000 individual hair shafts... each one a living, growing organism ...and Nature is constantly supplying it with nutrients essential for healthy growth and beauty. Protein, a vital part of all life, is the basic building block that gives your hair body and strength. Panthenol is a vitamin that is a natural component of your hair. Sebum is the natural lubricating element that gives your hair lustre... keeps it elastic and resilient... helps protect it from drying, splitting, breaking.

This, then, is your "crowning glory"—an amazing life cycle designed by Nature, and she meant every moment of it to be beautiful.

But Nature's plan meets resistance, and each shaft of hair begins to die the moment it is born. Natural moisture, protective oils, pigment—all are constantly being lost through exposure to sun, wind, dust, air pollution and other environmental contaminants—plus harsh shampoos, bleaches, dyes, and improper care.

Is There an Answer?

Obviously, your hair is going to be constantly exposed to the elements—to dust, sun, wind, water. No woman can be expected to live in a vacuum. Just as obviously, you want to "do something with your hair." Not just clean it... but curl it, wind it, braid it, part it here and swirl it there, change its color, heighten its natural lustre and sheen.

Over the years "medicine men" ranging from voodoo priests to trained cosmeticians have tried to concoct formulas that would clean or condition or embellish a woman's hair. Many of them, alas, only intensified the problem.

Rexall scientists reasoned that if Nature's own replenishment cycle could be aided and abetted by actually penetrating the hair shaft with substances similar to those Nature herself uses, then real and lasting improvement could be achieved, no matter what the present condition of your hair or the things you want to do with it. Such a discovery would make possible these, until now, impossible achievements:

- You could cleanse your hair without robbing it of precious natural oils and substances essential to healthy growth and body... indeed, you could actually protect these precious nutrients during cleansing.
- You could protect and prolong the life of these nutrients... reinforce natural moisture, resilience and lustre.

A message to the Women of America from Dr. Henryk S. Rudzki

Director of Research at the world-famed Rexall Laboratories.

EVERY HAIR ON YOUR HEAD is an individual marvel of Nature... and Nature intended it to be beautiful. That's why she designed a marvelous process constantly to revive and protect it. But ancient and ever-present enemies combine to defeat her. Dust, wind, water, and sun are some of them. Improper care due to misunderstanding of the nature of your hair, inferior products—these are additional enemies of natural hair beauty. Singly or in combination, they are constant traitors to Nature's plan. No single formula... no single product, however superior, could hope to combat all of them.

"For years Rexall scientists believed that if a way could be found actually to penetrate the hair shaft itself with the same precious nutrients Nature herself created, then Nature's own replenishment cycle could be aided and reinforced... and victory over the enemies of natural hair beauty would at last be at hand.

"On these pages we want to tell you the simple truth about your hair—what it's composed of, how it's fed and renewed, what it really needs, and how at last—through NEW AWAKENINGS BY REXALL—you have real help to reveal, revive and develop the natural beauty of your hair... as well as constantly protect it from the damage which modern living inflicts on it."

penetrate the hair shaft products may be stripping from it.

That after-shampoo squeak you're so fond of may actually be a scream of hunger. But now your hair can squeak with cleanness and still not be robbed of Nature's own precious beautifiers.

★ You could sustain your healthfully clean hair between shampoos...help maintain its natural moisture balance.

★ And finally, you could enhance natural strength, body, lustre and sheen.

All these miracles are exactly what you now can do with NEW AWAKENINGS FOR YOUR HAIR by Rexall—the complete, modern, scientific formulas with special hydrophilic and lipophilic carrying agents, so they actually penetrate the hair shaft to fulfill basic grooming needs while they feed precious substances into each individual shaft of hair on your head.

At Last! A Shampoo That Doesn't Wash Away Natural Oils and Substances by Over-Cleaning

For years you've been testing the cleanness of your hair by its after-shampoo squeak. But that squeak can also mean your hair is over-clean. Over-clean is exactly what many ordinary shampoos do. They get rid of dirt, yes—but they rob your hair of the very substances that sustain it... precious oils, sebum and Panthenol vitamin. Now your hair can squeak with true cleanliness—unmarred by the loss of Nature's own beautifiers.

It's a NEW AWAKENING FOR YOUR HAIR called CONTROLLED-ACTION SHAMPOO. This unique and exclusive Rexall formula is actually automatically controlled to cleanse your hair while protecting Nature's own precious nutrients. The scientific base for such a formula is amphoteric—which means that the ingredients are so balanced and buffered they automatically meet the cleansing needs of your hair.

The result? Every hair on your head is not only controlled-cleansed, it actually retains the essential nutrients you've been washing out of it—week after week, year after year. Your hair is left with more of its natural moisture balance, softness and sheen, its natural body and strength. It falls obediently into your favorite wave or style, glowing with the life Nature originally gave it.

Now... An Invisible Shield That Actually Repels Dust and Dirt Can Protect and Extend the Beauty of Just-Shampooed Hair

Now you must preserve the healthful cleanliness and beauty New Awakening Shampoo is beginning to revive. Your hair needs defense between shampoos. And that means another New Awakening For Your Hair called SHEEN 'N' SHIELD RINSE.

This exclusive formula is fortified with revolutionary Prolanovite—a Rexall Laboratory secret that combines precious protein with a unique lanolin compound more nearly approximating the function of natural sebum in your hair, plus Panthenol—a vitamin found in the hair. And New Awakening SHEEN 'N' SHIELD RINSE actually takes miraculous Prolanovite right into each individual hair shaft.

What's more, this amazing formula protects the health and beauty-promoting action of New Awakening Shampooed-hair by leaving an invisible, anti-static shield on every single hair—a silken sheath that actually repels dust particles and other contaminants in the air. It makes even the stubbornest hair more controllable... banishes those irritating fly-away, after-shampoo days when you "can't do a thing with your hair."

Just as Your Body Needs Exercise Between Meals, Your Hair and Scalp Need Conditioning Between Shampoos

Once you have New Awakening-shampooed and rinsed your hair, you are ready to face the most active days. But you can't completely ignore your hair's ancient enemies—dust, wind, sun—not to mention the wear and tear of most permanents, color rinses, and so on. Your hair and scalp need a daily work-out to keep your hair free of simple dandruff, excessive moisture loss and dryness between shampoos.

Rexall Scientists have given you the one Nature would welcome most. Another New Awakening For Your Hair, this formula is called MOISTURE-GUARD CONDITIONER. Used for just a few moments each night or morning, Moisture-Guard Conditioner will constantly reinforce the natural elasticity of your hair... constantly restore and sustain its natural moisture balance. Dandruff and excessive dryness are quite simply denied the conditions that help cause them. Broken and split ends become a fading memory. Your hair becomes more and more obedient to your comb.

And remember, MOISTURE-GUARD CONDITIONER also contains miraculous Prolanovite... and that means you'll be giving your hair and scalp a daily treatment with beauty-promoting protein, lanolin and Panthenol vitamin.

Now You Can Hold Your Hair-Do and Heighten Sheen in Nature's Way

There's yet another New Awakening For Your Hair called CRYSTAL CLEAR HAIR SPRAY, a unique Rexall formula containing lanolin and Panthenol vitamin. It can hold your hair in the most delicate, fragile, natural style, yet there's not a single tiny ingredient in it that will dull or darken... or disturb the beauty other New Awakening formulas are promoting for you. Absolutely transparent, without the slightest trace of lacquer or goo, CRYSTAL CLEAR HAIR SPRAY is also anti-static... actually repels the dust and dirt so many other hair sprays attract. And miracle of miracles, every time you use it you're giving back to your hair precious beautifiers Nature herself would endorse.

And for those special, special dates or evenings, Rexall Scientists have provided STAR SHINE—one more New Awakening For Your Hair. Compounded of the most delicate oils, it makes your hair dance with highlights, gleam with a natural radiance you never dreamed was there. Use it as often as you like. It's fortified with lanolin and Panthenol vitamin... and Nature herself will rejoice with you.

I made this dress on a SLANT-O-MATIC machine (in a sewing class at SINGER)

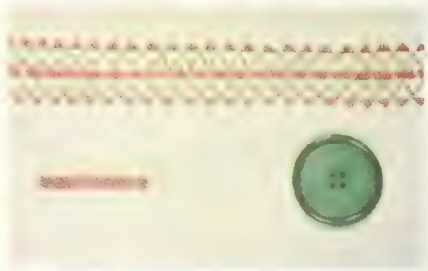
Andrea chose lush silk brocade to create [illegible] top award- in a national -ewing contest last fall!). "You know how silk has a tendency to crawl," says Andrea, "well, the sure-[illegible] SLANT-O-MATIC machine was a real lifesaver. And with the slanted needle I could see to control the work much better."

Lovely Andrea Wise, a senior at Marymount College, New York, enrolled in a dressmaking course at her local SINGER SEWING CENTER . . . discovered the famous SLANT-O-MATIC* machine . . . and you see the beautiful results at left.



Says Andrea, "Imagine everything you wish a sewing machine could do—and be—and that's the SLANT-O-MATIC machine. It's fantastic!"

Discover what you can do with a new SLANT-O-MATIC machine

Simple to run . . . beginner simple! You just "tune" the dial to the kind of stitch you want. Threading's foolproof (the chart's built in). Bobbin drops in in front of the needle. And there's even a built-in guide so you sew straighter seams.

So versatile! The things you used to have to do by hand can now be done on the SLANT-O-MATIC machine. Sew buttons, buttonholes, even darn socks. Beautiful finishing work, too—monograms, fancy stitches galore.

Smoothest, fastest straight stitching. No other zig-zag machine can match it because the SLANT-O-MATIC machine completely disengages its zig-zag mechanism for straight sewing. Never slips or stalls, either—not even on leather!

Tell me, doctor...

There are many questions which women would like to ask a trusted physician, but there is not always the opportunity. In this series, Tell Me, Doctor, Doctor Schauffler discusses some of the problems which have been sent to him by readers. The situations are all real, but all the names used are fictitious.

"My new doctor says that the fibroid tumor which I've had for years should come out, and my uterus with it. It hasn't been giving me any trouble at all lately. What do you think about it, Doctor?"

The doctor greeted his patient cordially—a plump, cheerful-looking woman in her mid-forties.

"How good to see you, Mrs. Fordyce! Is it really five years since I saw you last? How has that fibroid tumor been behaving since you moved? I hope you've had it watched."

ABBOT MILLS

"Indeed I have, Doctor. I went regularly to Dr. Knowles, whom you recommended. But perhaps you've heard Dr. Knowles has retired now. I went to our new young doctor, Dr. Hargreaves, for my last checkup. That's why I'm here. All he did was to give me a pelvic examination—it lasted about three minutes—and immediately wanted to make an appointment for a hysterectomy.

"Of course I told him that you and Dr. Knowles had warned me that fibroid might have to come out someday. Then I added that you had been my doctor for years, and I really would feel more comfortable if you agreed to an operation too. He was perfectly agreeable about it, but he seemed pretty certain you would back him up."

"You say he did only a pelvic examination. Did he make any tests at all—pulse, urine, blood pressure, for instance?"

"No, he did not." Mrs. Fordyce's tone sounded slightly injured. "I started to tell him my history, but he didn't even seem very interested in that. It was as though he was basing his whole decision on that three-minute examination."

The doctor smiled. "Suppose you tell me your history—of the last five years, at least. Let's see, you're forty-five now, aren't you? What about your periods?"

"I'll be forty-five next month. My periods are still perfectly normal. I haven't had any hot flashes or anything of the kind."

"No flow or spotting between periods?"

"No. The periods arrive on the dot and I have no pain whatsoever."

"Fibroids often cause heavy or prolonged periods. You haven't been troubled that way?"

"Well, yes. The flow is heavier than it used to be and lasts a little longer."

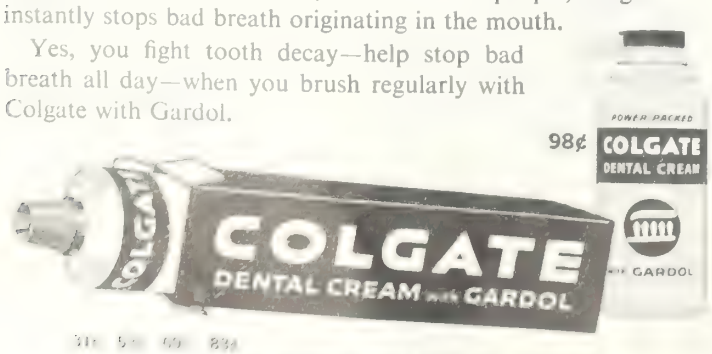
FIGHT TOOTH DECAY WITH COLGATE

Help Stop Bad Breath All Day!



Every mother should give her family the benefits of Colgate with Gardol and its help against tooth decay!

In two-year clinical tests, young adults who brushed with Colgate Dental Cream averaged far fewer new cavities than those who used a plain toothpaste.

Of course, nothing completely stops decay. But, for fewer cavities, have your family brush with Colgate with Gardol right after eating. Remember, too! For most people, Colgate instantly stops bad breath originating in the mouth.

Yes, you fight tooth decay—help stop bad breath all day—when you brush regularly with Colgate with Gardol.

"Do you have any soreness low down, or backaches? Any feelings of pressure, kind of bearing-down sensations?"

"Absolutely not. I can even play golf now."

"Have you any bladder frequency, or bowel difficulty? Do you notice differences in any of your bodily functions or in the way you feel?"

"The only difference is that my health and spirits seem to be getting better."

"That's good news. Now I'm going to examine you, Mrs. Fordyce. If you'll go on down the hall, Mary Ann will take some blood samples and I'll be along shortly."

"You should know," said the doctor after the examination was over and he and Mrs. Fordyce had returned to the consulting room, "that there is quite honest disagreement among doctors as to the best treatment of fibroids in women of forty-five or older. Dr. Hargreaves evidently belongs to the school that holds fibroids in a woman your age call for hysterectomy routinely. That's probably why he appeared uninterested in the details of your history. I belong to the school that holds surgery should be decided from the particular facts of each case."

"You know, I am confused about this, Doctor. When you first told me I had a tumor, I was sure you would operate immediately. I was glad you didn't, and I certainly haven't felt better in years than I do right now, in spite of the tumor. Yet so many of my friends have had hysterectomies because of fibroids."

"There may have been perfectly good reasons for those hysterectomies. But the word 'tumor' frightens many people. They think at once of cancer. Medically speaking, a tumor means merely a swelling, or an enlarged or swollen structure. A malignant growth may be a tumor, but very few tumors are malignant.

"Fibroids in the uterus, like yours, have nothing to do with cancer. As far as I know, there is no greater chance of a cancer's beginning in a fibroid than in a normal uterus—or at worst, very little more chance. With a few exceptions, they are harmless in themselves. Careful watching is often all the care they need."

"What causes fibroids, Doctor?"

"They begin when the muscle of the uterus somehow gets out of alignment. As you know, the uterus is a muscular organ. It expels menstrual products, and babies, too, when they are ready to be born. Its walls are what we call smooth muscle, similar to the muscle in the intestinal walls and other involuntary organs. These smooth muscles have a tendency to group into spherical bundles, and sometimes the bundles become knotted, form lumps or swellings. The lumps are given the rather sinister-sounding name of tumors. They occur in other smooth muscles, too, but the uterus seems to be a favorite spot.

"Tumors of this type have a tendency to grow, but their growth is very different from that of cancer. In cancer there is a fantastic duplication of cells, destroying blood vessels and eating into surrounding tissues and organs. Cancer cells may spread through the body and start cancers in other locations. But the fibroid merely gets bigger—quite slowly, as a rule.

"Sometimes a uterus forms many fibroids. They may make the uterine wall bulge all out of shape, or mix up the uterus' functions. Menstrual bleeding may become greater than normal. But ordinarily they are painless, and they certainly don't do the kind of damage a malignancy does."

Mrs. Fordyce nodded. "That's right. I never did feel any pain. But I did used to have that bearing-down sensation you spoke of. Especially when I did something extra strenuous."

"Our smooth muscle has amazing qualities. It can be cut or burned without causing pain. It hurts only when pulled, and naturally a tumor tucked away inside the uterus rarely gets pulled.

"However, a tumor does exert pressure on surrounding structures, doubtless aggravated by strenuous physical activity. This can cause congestion and different kinds of abdominal discomfort, depending on where the pressure falls. It may bring about bladder frequency, or constipation of an entirely mechanical kir There is more likelihood of hemorrhoi Pressure on the pelvic veins can increase t tendency to varicose veins in the legs.

"But such things are usually the result large tumors. We usually catch them long l fore they get to that stage."

"How big do fibroids get?"

"Well, a doctor I know once took out fibroid weighing a hundred and fifty poun But that was a case where there had been earlier medical care. Most doctors prefer r to let a fibroid get beyond the size of a fist o small grapefruit."

"Would you have operated if my fibr had kept growing bigger and bigger?"

LAND WHERE THE HONEY-COLORED WIND IS FAIR

By JESSE STUART

Give them leaf-laundried wind to breathe again,
Land where the honey-colored wind is fair.
Fondling the yellow stems of dying grain,
Combing the broom-sedge fields' long golden hair.
Give them a land of melancholy wind
To stir music in them eternally;
They would want sight if they were going blind,
And if tone-deaf they would love melody.
They have breathed carbon on too many roads
And choking smoke in cities near and far;
They have been too submissive
to strange fads,
Now let them wear the wind and sun and star.
The lonesome water's wordless, soothing songs
Are great for them beneath their bluer skies;
Nature's mistakes are better than man's wrongs,
Give them love language of the wild birds' cries.

"I certainly would have! There are oth types of fibroid development that call for eration too. One type combines smo muscle and glands, buried deeply in the wall the uterus. This kind often is very painful, a may cause profuse bleeding. Fortunately, i not very common.

"A peculiarity of another kind is that t tumors grow on small stems instead of fo ing within the wall of the uterus. They wa around loosely in the pelvic cavity, or ev grow clear outside the uterus and want about in the abdomen. They're called pedunc lated fibroids. If a stem gets twisted and c culation is impaired, it's a serious emergenc But we prefer them out anyway because th are prone to degenerate and become infecte Pregnancy, especially, endangers their blo supply."

Mrs. Fordyce's eyes grew round. "Wh Doctor, I thought fibroids in the uterus pr vented pregnancy!"

The doctor smiled. "That's one of the rumors you'd better not rely on. They don

"Does wife's working create conflict?"

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

DO YOU AGREE?

"How do love and infatuation differ?"

Romance without responsibility is infatuation; romance with responsibility is the normal prelude to love.

ASK YOURSELF:

Are You Hard to Live With?

A close relationship between husband and wife (and the ability to communicate understandingly) is often blocked by the personal disposition, quirks and habits of either spouse. Honest "Yes" and "No" answers to these questions may help you spot characteristics that need correction.

DO YOU OFTEN:

1. Snap at your husband or children?
2. Wake up feeling quite grouchy?
3. Nag at your husband?
4. Get into arguments with him?
5. Make unwise, impulsive statements?
6. Get into "jams" with in-laws?
7. Have an unpredictable temper?
8. Work by "fits and starts"?
9. Fail to get sufficient rest?
10. Feel tired or listless?
11. Have erratic changes of mood?
12. Pick at your food?
13. Feel sorry for yourself?
14. Think nobody appreciates you?

Credit one point for each "No" answer. The average wife earns a score of 9 to 10. With a score of 11 or more, you should have a happy and pleasant relationship with your husband. But if your score is 7 or less, you should have your physician check to see what is wrong. Getting sufficient sleep and revamping your living schedule to allow for rest and recreation should also help greatly. Consult a counselor if marked improvement is not noted within three months.

WIVES WHO HOLD JOBS

Three recent letters focus attention on different aspects of the question of a wife's holding a job after marriage. There is no simple answer, since a sound decision must take into account the couple's particular circumstances and personalities. But the situation confronts an increasing number of couples, since more than half of all women who work are married, and the proportion is rising.

1. "When I marry in June, I plan to continue in my present secretarial position. I have never liked housework, and the money I bring home will take care of all extra expenses and leave something over. Jim opposes my working for more than a year, but I would rather have a job than be a housekeeper."

2. "Bill and I were married almost four years ago. My extra earnings have added to our happiness, because we have been able to have lots of things we couldn't have afforded otherwise. I thought of quitting work last year to have a baby, but it would have meant so many sacrifices that we decided to put it off. I am now twenty-seven, we are no farther ahead financially, and I don't think we should wait much longer. But I don't see how I can afford to quit."

3. "We've been married six years, and have children of five and three. Tom's take-home pay is $98 a week, but we get a little deeper in debt every month. Monthly payments on our home amount to $182, without installments on other things. I've been offered a job at $175 a month, and this should help us get caught up. I hate to leave the children with a sitter, but don't you think I should take the job?"

The bride-to-be of the first letter seems to wish to work primarily to avoid irksome household tasks rather than to fulfill ambitions for a career. Perhaps she is unconsciously seeking to evade the other responsibilities of marriage as well. Her reason for working is questionable; and in any event, she should think long and hard about her readiness for marriage before planning to work permanently against her husband's will.

The second letter illustrates one of the major risks that working after marriage entails. This wife and her husband, instead of using her income as an investment in their future, have used it to raise their standard of living and satisfy immediate wishes. Now they find themselves too dependent on these extra comforts and luxuries to be willing to give them up, even for the sake of a family. Unless she and Bill face up to the situation and drastically modify their way of life, she will never stop working.

The third letter reflects a different problem. The young mother's only reason for working is to relieve genuine financial pressure. The big question she and her husband must answer is whether her net earnings will amount to enough to accomplish the purpose, without creating new problems and tensions. Out of her salary must come taxes, lunch money, transportation costs, the baby sitter's wages, along with unforeseeable extra expenses that arise when the homemaker is cramped for time. A little figuring with pencil and paper reveals that she will be lucky to clear as much as $50 a month. Is that sum enough to justify the extra pressures?

As said before, the decision must be tailor-made to fit the situation and the people involved. The woman with special qualifications and a strong desire for a career, or trained for some field of public service (nursing, teaching, and the like), may feel an obligation to continue her work. The woman whose children are grown may find that household tasks no longer fill her time; she and her husband may both be more content if she finds work outside the home, perhaps part time. But there are certain principles that must always be taken into account:

- The husband and wife must always agree on the desirability of her working. If he is opposed, her job will bring little satisfaction to either.
- Financial returns must be realistically appraised.
- The wife's earnings should not be used to raise the day-to-day standard of living, except in emergencies. Nor should they be regarded as the wife's personal income to be spent for her own pleasure.
- Psychological and emotional benefits and hazards must be considered, from the point of view of both husband and wife. (Will the husband resent his wife's success? Will he be grateful that she, too, is glad to stay home at night after a day at the office?)
- The wife should of course seek employment that conflicts as little as possible with her home responsibilities, in terms of hours, unpredictable demands, and pressure. (In the great majority of cases, only stringent necessity justifies the mother of preschool children in taking a job.)

Usually arguments can be found both for and against a wife's taking a job; but under any circumstances, it takes a good husband and a good wife to make marriage work when both work!

SEX DURING ENGAGEMENT

"Jerry and I will be married this summer. He is twenty-three, graduated from college last year and now has a fine position. I am twenty-two and will graduate in June. We have been deeply in love almost from the time we began dating two years ago, and our parents fully approve of the marriage.

"Like most couples in love, we felt the physical attraction between us grow steadily, and our problem was to set limits on our intimacy. During Christmas week we got carried away, and made love without reservation. I cannot say that either of us really regrets it; but once you begin such a relationship, it builds up and seems to become the main reason for being together.

"It's the only thing I've ever kept from my mother, and I know she would be shocked if she knew. She has often said that sex should be reserved for marriage. But when two people love each other as Jerry and I do, what else can they do? Are we behaving more extremely than most engaged couples? Are we likely to hurt our marriage if we keep on?"

What this girl really wants to know is whether she and Jerry have done something "wrong." This is a question the counselor cannot answer for them, though he might try to help them reach a sensible decision before the fact.

Moral standards are norms established by society in terms of what it considers to be the best interests of its members. But among different societies, and within the same society, variations from the norm are always found. What is considered wrong in one culture, or even within a particular group in that culture, may be viewed from an entirely different perspective by another society or group.

Generally, parents and other custodians of morality are opposed to premarital intercourse, even during engagement. But the emphasis upon romantic love, the influence of movies and television, opposition to the double standard, the growing independence of women, the relaxation of chaperonage, and other circumstances, have combined to permit and encourage increasing freedom—yes, the intimacy—in the relationships between young men and women before marriage.

There is abundant statistical evidence to show that premarital intercourse is far from uncommon. Various studies indicate that something like three fourths of men, and perhaps half of women, have experienced the sexual relationship before marriage.

But in reaching personal decision, no individual should conclude that a particular course of action is desirable simply because it follows the norm. Having a common cold is normal, but sensible people try to avoid the experience.

Young people today are caught in the conflict between expressed public opinion and individual private behavior.

If premarital intercourse, whether preceding or during engagement, is undesirable (and that is society's opinion), then at least parents and others in authority should recognize that young people today are under great pressure to depart from the ideal. Every mother might well ask herself if she has given her daughter the information and guidance that will help her make a sensible decision that will not create later conflict, should the question arise.

SNIDERLOAF

Meat loaf made with Snider's Catsup has a fun-loving flavor that sets it apart. That's the Snider zing—which comes from just a whisper of high-spirited chili pepper. Snider's brightens every dish you pour it on, too.

1½ pounds ground beef
½ cup dry bread crumbs
¼ cup finely chopped onion
1½ teasp. salt
¼ teasp. pepper
1 egg, slightly beaten
1½ cups Snider's Chili Pepper Catsup

Lightly mix beef, bread crumbs, onion, salt, pepper, egg and 1 cup Snider's Chili Pepper Catsup. Form into loaf in greased shallow baking pan. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) for one hour. Pour remaining catsup over loaf and bake 5-10 minutes longer. Serves 6-8.

Dear Sir: At the invitation of the Federal Communications Commission, we went to Washington and presented a statement at their hearings in December.

We are now sending a copy of Dr. Fredric Wertham's "How Movie and TV Violence Affects Children" to the members of the Federal Communications Commission, asking that it be included with our original presentation. ARGUMENT FOR SORORITIES

Dear Editors: Recently I heard an animated discussion among some young people just out of high school and college about sororities and fraternities. Some were for; some against.

It has always seemed to me that there was a good deal to be said for groups of congenial people getting together to have a good time and to maintain the standards of good society. A great many people contend that sororities and fraternities are bad because membership is taken to mean that one person is better than another. It makes us irritated only when some other person is better than ourselves instead of our being better than some other person, it seems to me.

The advantages of sororities and fraternities are that they give young people at a formative age an opportunity to try to maintain standards, to ask for good social behavior. People who are willing or able to live up to this higher standard are always acceptable in any place in the world.

After young people leave high school and college they will find that there are groups, whether clubs or not, to which only those who behave well make the grade. These organizations are open to all—that is to say, everyone has an equal opportunity to join if they qualify—so it seems to me they are entirely democratic.

I wonder what you editors think.

Sincerely,

Ipswich — D. M. WRIGHT

ILLINOIS

WHAT'S IN A BRAND NAME?

Dear Editors: It's two A.M. and I'm too heartsick to sleep—and here's a piece of my mind! Do you receive many letters complaining of the horrible conditions in the furniture industry? Don't manufacturers have any pride in their products? Don't they have factory inspectors?

Seven weeks ago we purchased a dining-room set from a Chicago store and the first thing I noted was a spot on the buffet where the finish was rubbed off. The refinishers from the store explained this was due to rubbing from the carton, which sounded reasonable. A few days later while lovingly polishing it with a "good polish," I noticed spots bare of finish on the tabletop, the veneer on the apron was uneven (possibly causing snags to clothing), and that one leaf was thicker than the other. For several weeks I've been waiting for return of the leaf and a refinisher. Can you tell me—what's in a brand name?

Last week, from another store, we bought a ninety-inch white plastic couch. It's been in our home three days and tonight we discovered part of the inner back is loose, making a large "hump" and pushing a nail through. Disgusted isn't quite the word!

No, neither cost a fortune. The dining set was four hundred and fifty hard-to-come-by dollars (knocked down from the "reg" or manufacturer's price by the store which routinely gives a certain percentage off). The couch was three hundred and forty (on sale and knocked down from a higher "recommended price"—another joke which I won't go into!).

Now, to my plea—can't you feature an article bringing the careless work to the manufacturers' attention as well as the public's?

Park Forest — Good night!

MRS. D. M. MCINTYRE

P.S. Must add that I've never noticed either of these companies advertised in your magazine—either I missed them, or you're wiser than we!

● Buying from stores which "regularly give a percentage off" can be risky. Insist that your stores take both of these purchases back as imperfect and refund your money. ED.

"I've found a way to balk Peter at his fattening midnight icebox raid-," confides Betty Comfort, filling her giant tridacna shell with water for the birds. "I trick him into going to bed when I do."

Our gifted wives seem able to discuss surgery with more agonizing vividness than the surgeons. After a rehash of the last five or six local operations I needed a giant adhesive band.

In almost every state legislature, vows our coffee-break oracle, the rural slickers are putting thumbtacks on the unreapportioned seats of the city yokels. "Maybe they're smarter 'n we are," he broods.

Culture is sweeping our town from the observatory to the ball park. Two of our solvent biggies have given a Cézanne and a Gilbert Stuart to our modest little Saarinen art center.

I've offered to bet our town's most excitable patriot $100 that we won't be embroiled in a nuclear war with Russia before New Year's Eve of 1970. He thinks I'm a zany optimist, but he won't bet.

Our town's stingiest millionaire has hit on a new way to save 95 cents: he blarneys his wife into splitting a Mexican-type frozen dinner with him. (He gets the bigger share.)

If our school board can tempt suspicious plumbers, painters, carpenters and electricians to teach "home maintenance" classes, they'll offer high-school courses to save newlyweds $10 a week.

Scorn from our eggheads for the peasantry who crave any other candidates: They argue the peerless inevitables are Dewey and Adlai, who've each lost twice. "If you'll nominate Dewey," says a Democrat, "we'll nominate Adlai."

We dined with old friends at their new house in the country, still empty. We cooked in the fireplace, ate at a card table with candles, a dinner more memorable than all of New York's epicurean top ten.

"I know two auto enthusiasts," muses Peter Comfort, chipping golf balls into a bushel basket, "who keep their auto engines cleaner under the hood than their can openers or washbowl stoppers."

One of our school principals wants all his teachers to read Admiral Rickover's book on education to their pupils, for a written summary. His kindergarten teacher doubts her kids can analyze it in 500 words. (So does the twelfth-grade teacher.)

Our town's most extravagant wife sneaks her new frocks into the house with the cleaning. When her husband suspects a new dress, she accuses him of never knowing what she has on. "I've worn it four years!" she says indignantly.

My fifth-grade teacher was the prettiest of the lot at Crocker School, and when I called on her the other day she calculated that maybe 40 of her 400 pupils still live in town. We're conspiring to give her a picnic banquet this spring.

I'm tempted to advise our lieutenant, if he buys a house near his air base, to hunt for a roomy old house built when a board was a board. He hopes he can find a new one which has been built by FHA rules, where a wallboard is a wallboard.

To replace our ancient carpet, we renounced any winter holiday in the sun. To celebrate, we camped in the living room under a sun lamp on a blanket, in swim suits, with a bottle of wine, and a little dish of sand for our toes.

A young man who used to chop firewood for us went to Alaska and got rich. Now he invites us to vacation at his summer cabin on an Alaskan lake. I remember the day he sauntered into our yard, took the ax from my hands and said, "Let me show you."

We've offered my Lady Love's grandfather's gold watch to everybody in the family as reward for swearing off smoking. So far it hasn't worked. As the family's only nonsmoker, maybe I'll get it by default.

Actually, we've found six ways to reduce the clutter in the house: we can sell, trade, give to friends, give to charity, force it on the youngsters, throw away things we no longer want. (Alas, all this takes character!)

Overwhelmed by the new fashion for colorful vests, we plotted at first to buy red ones with silver buttons for all four males in our family. Now this seems repetitious; why not buy four different patterns, take turns wearing 'em?

Home-town friends of Edna Ferber aren't positive whether her playmates actually tossed pebbles at her when she was eight or ten, or whether they merely pulled her hair. Does it matter, if it helped make a writer of her?

My athletic companion on two-mile walks downtown thinks his golf'll be sharper this spring, because he practiced putting in the parlor. "It better be," he muses. "My putting certainly interfered with the petting."

. . . When our daughter reads her tots the same Wizard of Oz books we once read to her,
. . . Or our son-in-law phones us after a ski weekend that neither of 'em has a fracture,
. . . And Junior and his blonde long-distance that Yorktown and Williamsburg are only an hour away from their guest room,
. . . Or our youngest lives a month mostly on mushrooms and loses fifteen pounds,
. . . And my Dream Girl does her parody of an Egyptian dance before the fireplace,
. . . Or we plan a trailer in the back yard (for us)
when all five tots under five visit at once,
Then my cup runneth over with honey and I mop it up with macaroons.

Journal about town

What we do Where we go Whom we meet

EDITED BY EILEEN SHARPE

50 years ago in the Journal

In May, 1910, Julia Ward Howe—author of The Battle Hymn of the Republic—turned ninety-one. "The deeper I drink of the cup of life, the sweeter it grows," she commented, "the sugar all at the bottom." On May eighteenth Halley's comet passed close to the earth and many Americans expected to be bombarded with star dust and noxious gases. Farmers hid in cyclone cellars and factory workers in their homes. Nothing happened and the New York World said, "We were all buncoed."

"Ninety per cent of the smuggling through U.S. customs is done by women," complains Editor Bok in the May, 1910, JOURNAL.

"Good Manners and Good Form: If Mrs. Smith calls up Mrs. Brown, which should be the one to say good-by?" Answer: "Mrs. Smith. Otherwise, she might be frustrated by an end being put to the conversation before she had really finished what she called up to say."

"Is it considered bad taste for a girl and a man to stop at a teahouse when out motoring?" Answer: "Yes. This is a privilege accorded engaged and married couples only."

"Katherine: Hair is not hollow and does not bleed when cut. This is an old superstition."

"For ten cents the JOURNAL can supply a pattern for refooting old stockings. In a stocking that is otherwise good it will repay you to do this work."

Fashion: "A pretty and inexpensive afternoon dress may be made of 10½ yards of dotted Swiss at 12½ cents a yard, or a total of $1.32."

"When traveling with young children, take along some black court plaster for emergency repairs of holes in the knees of their stockings."

"A pretty spring hat: Pale blue China silk is covered with white lace drooping over the wide brim which is heaped with eight large chiffon and satin roses in pale pink."

In California, actor Jimmy Stewart and our homemaking editor, Margaret Davidson, took a tea break on a breezy patio. Jimmy, back from India, and helping advise on his kitchen photos for this issue, told Margaret how to hunt a tiger, showed her his scrapbook of photos. Amateur photographer Jimmy values family albums so much that his wife Gloria told Margaret: "When we go off on a trip, he locks only irreplaceable things in the safe—such as family snapshots."

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Dawn meets Kim (left) who was spotted.

When Dawn Norman photographed Kim Novak for last month's cover, the star had a beauty problem, had to scrub oil paint off face and hair after doing a portrait of her father. "Leisure's over," she told Dawn. "I start work on a new picture, Strangers When We Meet, by an author you've met." Dawn remembered. He's Evan Hunter, who made history when the JOURNAL published Blackboard Jungle. It was only 1954, but the title is already a household word, and educators are still trying to eliminate Blackboard Jungles.

Our Liane Waite, vacationing in Costa Rica and Nicaragua, found 500 adults learning English from our ads and Dr. Spock, home-ec girls sewing our patterns and cooking from JOURNAL recipes. Now in our Workshop kitchen, Liane offers sample appetizers—"Black bean dip and fried bananas." It's our all-American idea exchange.

Our amused Gladys Denny Shultz sends us this clipping from the Journal of the American Medical Association:

"A group of specialists were discussing a new drug therapy at a party. The wife of the only non-medical person present interjected, 'The Journal said that 10 mg. is the proper dose.' All the board men considered 10 mg. pro and con, when one asked, 'What Journal?'

"'Why, the Ladies' Home Journal, of course.'"

Nobody has enough storage space, our architecture department's Anne Fuller found. In its "attic," the Bronx Zoo found a salted sea mammal stashed among old chairs. The Metropolitan Opera found a frayed bow tie—"not Caruso's—he never wore anything mended—whose?" Worst off is the Customs House, its Fibber McGee closets stuffed with 50 cans of sardines, 140 pounds of agar agar, 83 used telegraph keys. Its answer: an auction. Staff housecleaning expert Vicki Harris says she can't throw stones—her own closet is stuck with a 1300-year-old camel too useless to use, too dear to throw away. Familiar?

ABBOT MILLS

Lauren Mills, 2, practices sight-seeing at a farm.

Traveling with small fry? As vacations loom, staff parents tell us of new beguilements on the road. Many hotels now have sitters; in New York a special pamphlet from the Hotel Association tells who does. One hotel has a service to inform of puppet shows, ballets, parades. Motels cross-country beckon with gamerooms, pools, closed TV to watch babies. Some resorts offer out-of-season rates with no charge for children under 14—Abbot Mills, of our picture department, father of five, is investigating. Leading hotels will even take children behind-the-scenes to kitchens and engine rooms. "But," says one manager, "no space helmets and ray guns. Our chef, a nervous type, once thought we were invaded and ruined the soup."

Louisa,

"Louisa"—my mother's voice came over the radio; it always frightened me badly for a minute. "Louisa," she said, "please come home. It's been three long, long years since we saw you last. Louisa, I promise you that everything will be all right. We all miss you so. We want you back again. Louisa, please come home."

Once a year. On the anniversary of the day I ran away. Each time I heard it I was frightened again, because between one year and the next I would forget what my mother's voice sounded like, so soft and yet strange with that pleading note. I listened every year. I read the stories in the newspapers: "Louisa Tether vanished one year ago"—or two years ago, or three; I used to wait for the twentieth of June as though it were my birthday. I kept all the clippings at first, but secretly; with my picture on all the front pages it would have looked kind of strange if anyone had seen me cutting it out. Chandler, where I was hiding, was close enough to my old home so that the papers made a big fuss about all of it, but of course the reason I picked Chandler in the first place was because it was a big enough city for me to hide in.

I didn't just up and leave on the spur of the moment, you know. I always knew that I was going to run away sooner or later, and I had made plans ahead of time, for whenever I decided to go. Everything had to go right the first time, because they don't usually give you a second chance on that kind of thing; and anyway, if it had gone wrong I would have looked like an awful fool, and my sister Carole was never one for letting people forget it when they made fools of themselves. I admit I planned it for the day before Carole's wedding on purpose, and for a long time afterward I used to try and imagine Carole's face when she finally realized that my running away was going to leave her one bridesmaid short. The papers said that the wedding went ahead as scheduled, though, and Carole told one newspaper reporter that her sister Louisa would have wanted it that way; "She would never have meant to spoil my wedding," Carole said, knowing perfectly well that that would be exactly what I'd meant. I'm pretty sure that the first thing Carole did when they knew I was missing was go and count the wedding presents to see what I'd taken with me.

Anyway, Carole's wedding may have been fouled up, but my plans went fine—better, as a matter of fact, than I had ever CONTINUED ON PAGE 138

The Hoovers were the most formal—
"We had to tiptoe in the pantry."
The Roosevelts were never on time for meals and "word got around that the food was terrible." Sizing up the Trumans was easy—
"except for Mrs. Truman."
The Eisenhowers were something else again. . . .
Here's the completely off-the-record story of 21 years in the White House.

Alonzo Fields, six-foot-three butler at the White House from Hoover to Eisenhower, tells what he heard and saw. Part I.

Looking over the President's Shoulder

By ALONZO FIELDS

For more than twenty-one years I served the White House as butler, chief butler and maître d'hôtel. Beginning in October, 1931, through February, 1953, I planned and directed all the family, state and social functions of four Presidents, and kept the inventories of china, glassware, table linens and silverware. The famous gold service was under my trust; and believe me, no one left the pantry until each piece was accounted for after a dinner party. As the maître d'hôtel, I was further required to plan all the menus and direct the activities of the butlers and the kitchen.

In these years I came in contact with kings, queens, prime ministers, princes, princesses, generals, admirals; labor, political, race and church leaders; and some of the rabble rousers. I shall try to cite many of these men and women as they impressed me.

How did I get this position? Did I prepare and plan for such a career? No, I did not plan, nor had I ever entertained the least thought of being so close to the great men and women of this era.

© 1960 BY ALONZO FIELDS

How I got this job is a long story of events that led through the back door of the White House. I was born in Lyles, in Gibson County, Indiana, about five miles from Princeton, the county seat. It was an all-colored community with a post office, general store, church, picnic grounds, school and a baseball diamond. The trains between Louisville and St. Louis could be flagged down twice a day. It was a center for farmers to ship corn, wheat, stock and food produce.

My father kept the general store and ran an agency for the flour mills in Princeton. My mother kept a boardinghouse for the railroad section hands. Father was the organizer and director of the only military trained colored brass band in the southern part of Indiana. Brass bands were popular in those days for Sunday-afternoon concerts, picnics and parades.

The general store was the center of activities. In the summer there were band practice and drilling once a week, horseshoe pitching and tall tales by railroad section hands and farm hands. In the long winter nights there were always band practice, politics, checkers and still taller tales, mostly about hunting and the wisdom of some old hound dog. Some of the older men had been slaves and served in the Civil War, and some of the younger men had been in the Spanish-American War. A youngster, listening, would not want to go to bed.

One of the men had been a sergeant in the Negro cavalry which charged up San Juan Hill in Cuba to help Teddy Roosevelt and his Rough-riders out of a tight spot. He never related much about the actual fighting, but the meeting of Teddy Roosevelt he never stopped talking about. The sergeant would always finish his evening performance by saying, "Just think. He is now the President of these United States and on top of the world without any worries."

I, too, thought any man who could be President of the United States must be on top of the world. And what worries could he have? Little did I realize that twenty-three years later I would start my adventure of holding the chair of four Presidents. The President of these United States is on top of the world in a mighty powerful seat, but it can be a mighty hot and troublesome seat.

Naturally I had planned a musical career. After we moved to Indianapolis dad and I played in the Y.M.C.A. military brass band. In my early twenties I was teaching all the brass instruments. I had trained choirs, studied voice and sat on panels as a judge of choir contests. Father O'Brien, of St. Rita's church, where I helped in benefits for the Holy Name Society, of which I was an honorary member, had named me the Black John McCormack and instructed me in the diction of Irish ballads. So, to all intents, it appeared I was "most likely to succeed."

I owned a grocery and meat market. It was the failure of this CONTINUED ON PAGE 149

WIDE WORLD

"The Hoovers always dressed for dinner, ate in the State Dining Room even when alone, and had seven courses served promptly at eight. Being on time for meals was not one of the Roosevelts' virtues. I can count on one hand the times when they were on hand for meals."

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

"Three days after my arrival I was assigned to President Hoover's medicine-ball breakfast table. The President played medicine ball in the south grounds of the White House with some of the more energetic members of his Cabinet."

"These Roosevelts were a fascinating family—I mean you did or didn't like them and they did not seem to give a hoot if you did or did not, for they were enjoying themselves."

Changing of the Guard

She was everything that Mike Fannin wanted—but he wouldn't have her as a gift!

By MARIAN GAVIN

Even Mike Fannin, Strafton Steel's chief engineer, had to work his way through two secretaries to get into the old man's office, but the old man walked into Mike's sweaty cubicle without knock or by-your-leave.

"Drive me home, Mike."

If it was a question, the question mark got lost. For a stubborn, unwise moment Mike bent over the work schedule he'd planned to finish before quitting time. Drive me home. Like that. As if the old man were talking to George Lubera, long-time, big-shouldered, baby-faced chauffeur-bodyguard to the Straftons three—old man and daughter, the "Princess," and the Princess' lady in waiting, Miss Clara Strafton.

Drive me home. As if he were talking to George Lubera instead of Mike Fannin, his chief engineer and chief contender for the managership of Strafton Steel, one tentacle of the Strafton Enterprises' octopus.

So far, the old man had kept a managerial thumb on all enterprises except, briefly, the Big S Feed Mills. They had gone, last year, under the management of Jerry Valin, whose folks were "somebody" down in Houston. It was said that young Mr. Valin was going to end up as the old man's son-in-law. Instead, he had ended up dead in a crash out on the highway to Dallas, two months ago, and dead with him a sugar-mouthed "nobody" girl. This only an hour after he left a dinner party at the Strafton house. The old man and Pete Harter, who should have been named manager of the mills, were still trying to set things straight out there. Mike was no Jerry Valin. He was a tough "nobody" from East Texas.

A novel of intrigue and high romance.

SYNOPSIS OF PART I. I, Martha Leigh, a young impoverished gentlewoman, was employed by Connan TreMellyn, a handsome, wealthy widower, as governess to his daughter, Alvean, eight. At Mount Mellyn in Cornwall, I was told that Alvean's mother, Alice, was killed in a train wreck while running away with her lover, Geoffrey Nansellock, who also died. Nansellock's brother and sister, Peter and Celestine, still visited the manor frequently. And I heard gossip about Connan's love affair with beautiful, young Lady Treslyn. "Only waiting for her old, sick husband to die," folks said.

Dismayed by Connan's indifference to Alvean, and knowing his passion for horses, I hoped to draw attention to her by teaching her to ride and secretly entering her in the gymkhana he judged. She needed affection.

And there was a strangeness about Mount Mellyn. I felt it: in the whisper of the sea—in a sudden stillness—or the unexpected sight of Gilly, oddly silent granddaughter of Mrs. Polgrey, the housekeeper. Above all was the haunting inescapable image and mystery of Alice. "There are some," Peter Nansellock said to me once, "who think it was not Alice who was killed on that train."

PART 2

It was about a week later when I first saw Linda Treslyn. It was a few minutes past six o'clock. Alvean and I had put away our books and gone down to the stables to look at Buttercup, who, we thought, had strained a tendon that afternoon.

The farrier had given her a poultice. Alvean was really upset, and this pleased me because I was always delighted to discover her softer feelings.

"Don't 'ee fret, Miss Alvean," Joe Tapperty told her. "Buttercup'll be as right as two dogs on a bright and frosty morning afore the week's out. You see! Jim Bond, he be the best horse doctor between here and Land's End."

She was cheered and I told her that she should take Black Prince in Buttercup's place tomorrow. She was excited about this, for she knew Black Prince would test her mettle, and I was glad to see that her pleasure was only faintly tinged with apprehension.

As we came out of the stables I looked at my watch. "Would you care for half an hour's stroll through the gardens?" I asked. "We have half an hour to spare."

To my surprise she said she would, and we set off.

The plateau on which Mount Mellyn stood was a mile or so wide. The slope to the sea was steep, but there were several zigzag paths which made the going easier. The gardeners spent a great deal of time on this garden, which was indeed beautiful with the flowering shrubs which grew so profusely. At various points arbors had been set up, constructed of trelliswork around which roses climbed. The blooms were beautiful even as late as this and their perfume hung on the air.

One could sit in these arbors and gaze out to sea; and from the gardens the south side of the house was a vision of grandeur, rising nobly, a pile of gray granite on the top of the cliff like a mighty fortress. It was inevitable that the house should have a defiant air, as though it represented a challenge, not only to the sea but to the world.

We made our way down those sweet-smelling paths and were level with the arbor before we noticed that two people were there.

Alvean gave a little gasp and, following her gaze, I saw them, sitting side by side. She was very dark and one of the most beautiful women I had ever seen. Her features were strongly marked and she wore a gauzy scarf over her hair, and in this gauze sequins glistened. I thought that she looked like someone out of A Midsummer Night's Dream—Titania perhaps. She had that quality of beauty which CONTINUED ON PAGE 120

THE LONG HAUL

There were no women on the scene. But women have a part in this story of a man's most difficult decision.

By D. A. RAYNER

John Murrell, commanding His Majesty's Destroyer Hecate, had jammed himself into the port forward corner of the open bridge. In order to lessen his height and bring his head below the level of the glass windscreen, one leg was bent and the other stretched out to where his foot could obtain a purchase against the edge of the plinth that surrounded the standard compass.

The Hecate had spent the night astern of the convoy and was moving up to her day station on the port bow of the merchantmen. Steaming at twenty knots with the sea on her beam, she rolled heavily. Water, salt mixed with rain, ran all over her. Her own vibration and the flutterings of the wind formed it into glistening runnels that shone in the pale light of the new day.

In a similar posture, Bill Wheeler crouched behind his captain. Sea-booted and oilskinned, his sou'wester pulled down to shield his face, he had for the moment nothing to do. Murrell, as always, had come up to take the ship through the convoy. Although both were well aware that the executive officer was quite capable of carrying out this maneuver alone, custom dictated that the captain should be there, and so he was at his post on the bridge.

"How much farther to go, sub?" The captain spoke sideways to the second officer of the watch.

Sublieutenant Sampson raised the lid of the voice pipe that led to the radar office. "Bearing two-eight-two degrees; range two thousand," he said.

Murrell, shifting position, said to Wheeler, "Near enough. You carry on. Normal convoy speed. Normal zigzag."

Wheeler stepped onto the plinth by the compass and called down the voice pipe to the wheelhouse, "One-one-oh revolutions. Steer oh-three-oh."

"I was going to say, 'Just the same as always,'" Murrell remarked to Wheeler. "But of course we're missing the big tanker this morning. What was her name?"

"Antioch," Wheeler told him, "a Greek. What went wrong last night, sir?"

"He must have come in from just about where we are now," Murrell told him, referring to the U-boat that had done the damage. "Right between the two corvettes. Perhaps CONTINUED ON PAGE 96

Should Movie Stars Marry?

Real everyday love can seem tepid and humdrum to actors steeped in the make-believe passion of the screen.

By Joe Hyams

When people ask me why on earth Hollywood stars can't have normal, reasonable marriages like the rest of us, there is only one honest answer I can make. It is my belief that it is almost literally impossible for a man or woman to be a big-time star, with all that this connotes, and develop a normal emotional life at the same time. I'll go further. I suspect that no normal, well-adjusted man or woman with a satisfying private life would want to be a star in the first place.

The movie colony itself has persuaded me of the truth of this. We all know that inside the custom-built mansions of Beverly Hills many handsome couples blessed with health, success and the world's best wishes make a wretched botch of their private lives. Consider only a few of the headlines of recent years. A much-loved young husband (Eddie Fisher) leaves his pretty wife and two small children to become the fourth husband of another woman, a former "family friend." A couple who have been married twenty-one years and have five children (the Bob Crosbys) have a family quarrel in which she stabs him with a letter opener. A newly married couple (Marlon Brando and Anna Kashfi) are divorced within months after the birth of their son. An older man (Ernest Borgnine), after coming into fame, divorces his wife of nine years to take a younger, prettier wife. If any one of these stories were transposed to a "normal" small town, with the characters a couple down the street, the neighbors would be shocked. They might even be disgusted, because they would read signs of self-indulgence and immaturity in such behavior. And they would be right.

The high incidence of scandal in Hollywood—public and private marital squabbles, alcoholism, infidelity and divorce—is no coincidence. The fact is, Hollywood is inhabited by peculiar people.

A study of 100 studio biographies of leading stars reveals that 86 of them came from broken homes. Behind this simple statistic I'm sure lies immeasurable personal tragedy. It goes far to explain the domestic jungle of film stars' lives. Psychiatrists tell us that the good things most of us bring to marriage—a joy in loving and giving, a powerful wish to create a secure and happy family of our own—are the things we learn as children when we are members of a warm and loving family managed by two capable adults. But what happens to the children who shiver in the night at the terrible sound of grown-up quarrels? Who have unreliable, unloving parents, know nothing of normal family life? A few, say psychiatrists, find the inner resources to overcome their poor start. Many grow up to become neurotics. And of these, some emerge with just the right mixture of bravado and insecurity that drives them to become actors.

By every finding of the psychiatrist's couch and the divorce court, the severely unhappy child is a better candidate to become an actor than a marriage partner.

In the best of circumstances, actors or not, these are the people who find it hardest to make marriage stick. They have no blueprint to guide them, they feel insecure about others and themselves. Sadly enough, many know they have missed something, dream of idealized relationships with other human beings. But they are emotionally incapable of a generous, adult love, for their real needs are those of a hurt child. So they go from marriage to marriage. Superior Judge Roger Alton Pfaff, of the Los Angeles Consolidated Domestic Relations and Conciliation Courts, found in eight thousand cases appearing before the courts last year for interlocutory decrees that 51 per cent of the people involved (averaging one per couple) were from broken homes. For film stars, the rate was higher. And statistics show that it is an even shorter step from the first to the second divorce and still shorter from the second to the third—and so on.

These are the handicaps all damaged children face. But the percentage that elect to assuage their CONTINUED ON PAGE 178

Portrait of Princess Margaret

By BARBARA SCHWINN JORDAN

The coming wedding of Princess Margaret rings nostalgic bells here at the JOURNAL—nostalgic because Bruce and Beatrice Gould first met Princess Margaret, her sister and the queen mother in 1942, at a luncheon given at the Cliveden country home of Lady Astor. Margaret was just eleven years old. The Goulds reported that lollipops, a wartime scarcity in England, were a favorite treat to the royal sisters. Eight years later, after the war, the story of The Little Princesses was serialized in the JOURNAL, giving the stirring events of history through the eyes of two lovable little girls at Windsor Castle, near Cliveden. A beautiful JOURNAL illustrator, Barbara Schwinn, was then doing romantic illustrations for JOURNAL fiction stories. Since then she has become an internationally famous portrait painter, and has the distinction of being the only American painter granted permission to paint Princess Margaret. Her portrait, painted last year, is shown here, with Barbara Schwinn Jordan nearby at her easel. The portrait belongs to Princess Margaret, and when Mrs. Jordan asked her where she would like to hang it, the princess smiled: "I would love to hang it over the fireplace, but mother would like to hang it someplace else. And for all the world I wouldn't disappoint mother."

It's Such Fun to be a Woman

Take my hand, little one ——
Small bud upon the stem of a mother who really tries
To be your flower!
Could any woman know headier flattery than the look in your eyes,
That dazzled gaze that seems to say,
"I want to be like you"?
In your turned-up hat "like mummy's,"
You go swinging down the walk with me.
A glistening store front throws back our reflection
And suddenly I envision
Two ladies crossing the years together,
Their new spring suits and lady gloves,
Part of a long parade of Sunday strollers.
Mamma and grandmamma are there
And (though we can't see her yet) your own small daughter.
All of us happy in the joy of living and reliving
The fun and loving ritual of woman's beauty.
Bless your heart, little one.
We must walk together often.

Mothers held preschoolers by the hand, pushed babies in strollers, carried signs and banners in a parade such as Oskaloosa, Iowa, had never seen. Their Crusade for Better Schools paid off in next day's election when the million-dollar bond issue at stake made a clean sweep in every ward.

BECAUSE WOMEN CARE

By BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD

In the forty years since women won the right to vote, they have come to wield a kind of political power as yet underestimated. The pioneers with placards are gone, their places taken now by women whose political activity is very different in method and in manner.

Those early leaders poured their energies into getting the ballot, with too little emphasis on the duty to use it intelligently. Their heirs today—women who vote, who work in party organizations and who seek elective office—accept the responsibility for informed action. Like the mothers in Oskaloosa described in this month's feature, they work quietly and effectively, combining painstaking study, firm opinions and charming ways.

Such women are still not common. A lingering belief that political activity is somehow in conflict with being a good wife and mother deters some. And there are practical obstacles for those with youngsters to care for. Yet, more and more, these are the very ones most alert to the fact that there is no basic conflict in values.

"I have five good reasons, ages one to ten, for being active in politics," writes Mrs. George B. Hoffman from Hammond, Indiana. "I want to pass on to them a goodly heritage; I regard their freedom and well-being as citizens as their greatest wealth. I don't want it dissipated by apathy and inertia of citizens who don't care enough to win elections and put into office those best qualified."

Because they see the safety and the strength of their homes dependent on the quality of government, such women persevere. Another mother, Republican Lynn Wulfing, when she decided to seek her place in practical politics, ran for "the lowliest and also most effective" job: local committeeman. She won and two years later won again—this time taking on the same post for the entire sprawling St. Louis County.

Believing that only continuous education will break down the prejudice that there is "something unsavory about politics," Lynn held a series of educational political workshops for women in 33 precincts. She found hundreds of women who really cared about local government—"fine women who were glad to work when shown how to go about it." Their service as election judges, clerks, block workers (sought by post-card follow-up) helped bring overwhelming voter acceptance of a needed new city charter.

Statistical yardsticks cannot measure woman's increasing political prestige. Yet we believe it is beginning to fulfill the excitement, the importance, the hopes once attached to the crusade for woman suffrage. Frequently manager of the family's economics, often a partner in earning its high standard of living, woman now adds her influence to political-party circles. By using her powers wisely, she will see her efforts pay off in mounting quantity and quality of votes cast, stronger officials, better government. END

It was evident that the citizens of Oskaloosa, Iowa, who cared enough to vote didn't want new schools. It was evident, that is, between 1949 and 1954, when bond issues to build new classrooms were voted on four different times, and defeated every time.

Oskaloosa had no bonded indebtedness whatsoever, but one might have thought from the opposition that it was being suggested the town pay off the national debt. Renters received letters threatening catastrophically higher rents. Social Security pensioners were warned of ruinous taxes. School officials were harangued in public, received ugly anonymous letters in private. In progressively more bitter campaigns, everything except the main issue was attacked: the school board had chosen the wrong site, the wrong survey firm, the wrong order of priorities for building.

But not even the opposition could attack the main issue: that Oskaloosa needed more school space—badly. At the time of the bond fights, Oskaloosa had a state-wide reputation for standing still. Its population had stood at 11,000 for twenty years—not much greater than it had been in 1910. A market and service town for a vast farming area, it was also known as a "retirement town" for elderly farmers and their wives. But pressures were at work even though no over-all population growth was showing. Oskaloosa, too, had had a baby boom after the war. School attendance rose 10 per cent even during the five years that the bond issues were being talked about. Furthermore, the schools themselves were a collection of high-ceilinged period pieces. The high school dated from 1897 (the newest school building in town was a wing added in 1937). Of the six elementary schools, only the most recent, built in 1921, was up-to-date enough to have a gym. The oldest was Webster, built in 1882, now crammed to capacity.

The interests of women are as varied as the needs they seek to meet, the problems they hope to solve, as varied as American communities themselves. This month in the second of its series "Because Women Care," the JOURNAL salutes five women for the contributions they have made, the leadership they have shown.

MRS. OSWALD BATES LORD of New York City
U. S. Representative on the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.

Mary Pillsbury Lord has brought distinction to each of her many assignments. Upon graduation with honors from Smith College in 1927, she signed up as a social-welfare volunteer in Minneapolis. By 1939, she was directing the East Side Settlement House in New York City. During World War II, she headed up both the National War Fund's Advisory Committee on Women's Participation and the Civilian Advisory Committee of the Women's Army Corps. Appointed to the U.S. Committee for UNICEF in 1947, she toured Europe to study the lot of children. As U.S. representative on the UN Commission on Human Rights since 1953, she has continued her on-the-spot studies of world conditions.

MRS. JOHN EISENHOWER of Gettysburg, Pa.
American Red Cross Volunteer

A world-wide audience witnessed Barbara Thompson Eisenhower's friendly interest in people when last year she made the 11-nation trip with her famous father-in-law. Member of the local board of the Red Cross and volunteer nurse's aide in Gettysburg, Pa., she visited hospital wards wherever possible, observed the care of infants, said "hello" to older children, cheered ailing adults. At home she tries to serve eight hours a week, finds it rewarding, hopes to do more later.

MRS. RANDOLPH GUGGENHEIMER of New York City
Chairman, Women's Division, Federation of Jewish Philanthropies

President of New York City's Day Care Council as well as director of women's work for Jewish philanthropies, Eleanor Coleman Guggenheimer says, "I don't know whom I spend more time with, the 6000 women in Federation or the 6000 children in Day Care." Mrs. Guggenheimer's other lively interests include education, politics and her first grandchild.

MRS. LEO F. CURTIS of Hammond, Indiana
Director, Junior Division, General Federation of Women's Clubs

Ever since teenage membership in the Sub-Juniors of Whiting, Indiana, Phyllis Root Curtis has found great satisfaction in sharing her energy with others. Mother of a nine-year-old son, she is today an inspiration to the almost 100,000 members of some 2500 Junior Women's Clubs throughout the land; last year represented them at the international conference in Manila. She is grateful for the opportunities for personal development and service which have come her way, has put her talents to use for children as member of Indiana's Council for Children and Youth.

Summer is a pretty time

*M*uch has been said about the virtue of the plan, the wisdom of deciding what you need before you shop. True, and double-true. But these pages illustrate the wizardry of the opposite theory: the dress bought impulsively because you can't resist it. . . .

*S*ummer is the loveliest of all seasons for fashion. A summer dress can make a woman younger, gayer, prettier, more feminine. Now, as summer begins, a new color changes the pace, a full skirt makes you feel different, and the new prints are ravishing.

COTTONS WITH A BRILLIANT FUTURE

Here, and on the following pages, in breath-taking rooms, we sing the praises of beautiful, practical, inexpensive cottons. What fun to give your living room (or dining room or bedroom) a new summer look—and what a year to do it in, with a veritable kingdom of flowered, striped and checked cottons for your choosing. The new easy-care finishes simplify your life; there are marvelous blends from silklike sheers to textured upholstery weights. As always, the price tag is irresistible, the materials ranging here from 79 cents a yard to around $6.00. In this dramatic room the long windows are framed by panels of old chestnut rubbed with a pale violet paint. Greeny-blue batiste curtains are simply shirred on a rod behind dark, fanlike grilles—a wonderful dashing look, but achievable. Fan lights from old houses are available in many parts of the country, in second-hand shops and in lumberyards. Against an elegant background, flowered chintz and painted furniture create an air of informal distinction.

What was once a cramped kitchen and pantry combination now becomes a family kitchen that copes with varied demands from small snacks to big dinner parties. The secret: each activity center is complete.

The Jimmy Stewarts' "Instant" Kitchen

A masterpiece of planning gives the busy Stewarts a chance to have fun together.

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor

Capacity aplenty for baking cookies and other delights that please the twins is in the two-oven baking center seen across the cooking island. Griddle, steam, fry or barbecue: cooking facilities here meet all demands. Some burners have controls to hold selected heats; the rack of the gas-fired grill tilts so fat drains away from flame and doesn't smoke or smell.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY DALE HEALY

"You can set your clock by this family," says Lydia, who presides over the Stewart kitchen, and we soon discovered why. The Stewarts live by a code that could best be described as "organized informality." Their house, which they bought nine years ago and have been remodeling gradually, is a reflection of their philosophy; it is planned for easy access with no wasted space.

"When we bought the house, the kitchen was unworkable—for us." Space was limited; areas were blocked by walls and pantries, and extra steps added up in a big way. And when a family is as prompt as the Stewarts, this inconvenience can be a definite drawback. Especially since mealtime is the framework of their day.

"We never have to call anybody for breakfast or lunch. We always eat together except when the boys are at school or Jimmy is on camera." At 8:30 each morning the clan gathers in the breakfast room just beyond the pantry; they all go their separate ways until 12:15, when luncheon (usually a sandwich and salad on the terrace near the pool) brings them together again. Dinner is served in the dining room at 6:30. Mealtimes are relaxed sessions with the children—Ron (15), Mike (14), and the twins, Judy and Kelly (8). The emphasis is on fun, with lively conversations centering around family jokes (Mike is currently president of the Big Dumb Nut Club, the family organization for "goofers") and the day's events. And while the Stewarts prefer simple cooking (steaks and lamb stews are favorites), they like plenty of it—when they want it.

For coping with this, their new kitchen deserves star billing. There is a double quota of equipment in the right place—two gas refrigerators, one for salads and desserts conveniently in the pantry, the other for meats and staples. Each activity center is complete. Both refrigerators turn out a constant supply of ice. A sink in the kitchen, another in the pantry area prevent traffic jams. The ovens keep up with the demands for cookies and brownies and other treats to satisfy four hearty appetites (the twins love white cake; the boys are crazy about chocolate). Thanks to the carefully planned kitchen, the Stewarts can entertain a houseful of people or a few teenagers at lunch with the same ease.

Jimmy and Gloria may travel all over the world, but when home make the most of time with their family. All the Stewarts love outdoor sports—the children go along on camping trips, and at their ranch the boys work as cowboys. Because the pool is a favorite recreation spot, Jimmy told us they next plan to build a pool house among the hibiscus, oleanders and citrus trees in their yard.

The library is the room where the family gathers often; it has photographs on the walls and busts of the four children. Here, too, are models of airplanes which Jimmy has built with the skillful hands of an expert. He is an avid camera fan, and has taken family movies and hundreds of pictures on their travels. Gloria carefully organizes them into scrapbooks so they have records of people and places. Jimmy regrets he didn't catch on film Gloria shooting a charging tiger on their safari.

The library is filled with well-thumbed books revealing the Stewarts' wide range of interests—from sports, politics and drama to histories and the Bible (Jimmy takes up collections at the Beverly Hills Community Presbyterian Church; Gloria and the children take part in activities there). The Stewart family has purpose and direction and plain good fun.

Gloria wanted her kitchen "any color as long as it's yellow." Walls and gas appliances are sunny with cabinets of dark wood as contrast. There is a furniture look to these cabinets with metal dividers between sections. Practical counters are ceramic tile.

PAT BOONE TALKS TO TEENAGERS

TEEN-TIME ROMANCE

Well, Let's Talk About Love

Do you know why I think love is important enough to sing about? Because, in musical logic, it's love that makes the world go round. Love of God. Love of country. Love of friends. And that very special kind of love you'll feel for your One-and-Only when he or she comes along. That kind leads to marriage, and marriage leads to families, and families make nations.

That is the far goal of your dating days.

But before we get to that point we pass through the spring-time—the teen-time of romance. We usually start those first, tentative approaches toward the opposite sex feeling: "I love me, and I'm going to take good care of me and see that I'm properly treated and safe and have a good time."

Then one day along comes someone who makes us think: "I like you because you like me, and I'll be safe with you." Now we have the beginning of a twosome.

But it takes a lot more growing before we can finally say: "I love you and I'm going to take good care of you and see that you're properly treated and safe no matter what happens to me." In that instant when we forget ourselves, when we put someone else first, we find real love.

The journey starts quite naturally with our first date.

When Does Dating Start?

That depends. A boy with an avid interest in sports and a hatful of hobbies may not notice a girl as a girl for quite a while. That doesn't mean he's a drag. And some girls go into their junior or senior year in high school without paying too much attention to boys. This doesn't make them drips. Sometimes these slow starters move into the dating game at the end of the fifth inning and start scoring big with the first pitch.

If you belong to the group who started noticing early, at the thirteen-, fourteen- and fifteen-year level, you'll operate under some handicaps for a while. Dates in the early teens are dependent, mostly, on family transportation, and activities are usually planned in groups. And parties by people who care at this age include chaperons. (Revolting, but necessary! You're much better off with a group where the rules are observed.)

We come next to the point of who asks whom for the date and how you ask.

Generally speaking, Miss America, don't seek out boys and suggest that they take you out, leap year or not! A boy will run the other way if you move rapidly in his direction. It's the nature of the beast. On the other hand, ma'am, it's a valuable thing for you to know when to stop running and how to do it gracefully.

In asking for any date, try to have something interesting to suggest, something you think this particular person will enjoy. Then, either by telephone or in person, say frankly, "Would you like to come with me to the basketball game next Friday night?" Try not to say, "Are you busy on the fourteenth?" (I know one high-school queen who really jolted 'em by answering, "I can't tell yet. What did you want to do?")

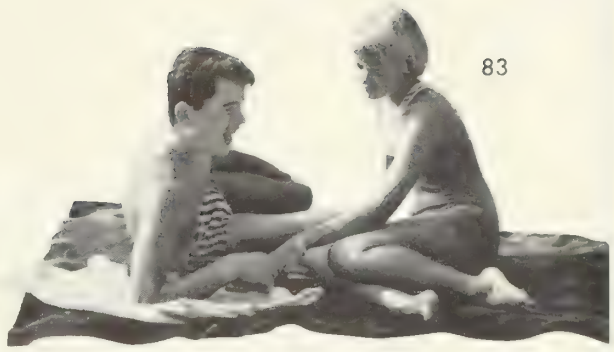
"Cars have done more to change the pattern of courtship than anything else."



Car Dating Makes a Difference

A noted sociologist once stated that cars had done more to change the pattern of courtship than anything else in 2000 years. Now you and I know about cars. We know that when Tom asked his insurance man why there are fewer railroad accidents than automobile accidents the insurance expert was voicing as much truth as humor when he replied: "Well, it might be because the engineer isn't always huggin' the fireman!"

"We detest phonies."

"Nothing is more important than friends."

TEENAGE REPORT to the NATION

e level with each other."

"A girl should not be a dish."

In January we reported on teenagers in 1960—their tastes, pastimes, the way they look and act. We wanted to know more about them: the teenage point of view, what they are like underneath the surface.

What is their standpoint on marriage . . . on drinking . . . on religion? How do they regard their parents? What do good manners mean to them? How do they feel about cheating?

To find out, the JOURNAL questioned hundreds of teenagers all over the United States—in big cities, in little towns, from one corner of the country to the other. They themselves were the reporters.

Since, rightly, there is universal concern about juvenile delinquency, though less than 3 per cent of the youngsters of the country are delinquent, the results of this survey are especially reassuring. It reflects accurately the idealism, optimism, good humor, good sense and good will of the majority of today's teenagers.

HERE AGAIN IS WHAT THEY TOLD US

TEENAGERS SPEAK FOI

on Morals and Behavior

There are reasons why teenagers aren't coming in clear to grownups. First, we're getting slammed for so many things these days that we're wary of being misunderstood. Second, why should we go out of our way to talk to the adults closest to us, when they're the very ones who persist in seeing us still as children? Third, we have to put up a defense wall—because behind it we're still working out what we believe.

No wonder we've decided it's easier to take the Fifth* and avoid trouble.

Still—when someone asks us, seriously asks us what we think, we're flattered. We're tired of the black eye our whole generation has with the public. Whatever we are, less than three in a hundred of us are delinquents. Furthermore, we have a few million answers (most of them agree; naturally there are a few differences among them). Behind our defense wall we are really thinking. Thinking hard, for we're at an age when it means most to us to get along with other people.

All across the country we have tough standards of right and wrong, a lot of common sense, more idealism than we usually admit out loud. So here's how these views work out in practice. We've put down nothing phony, for one of the many things we believe in is leveling with each other.

This isn't going to please adults exactly, but the majority of teens would go along with the group's code when the parents' rules conflict.

Most parents, when they read the above, will think instantly of old family conflicts about wearing lipstick or high heels or at what age teens can single-date. That isn't what we mean. These are the problems facing younger teens, mostly, and we're agreed that young teens should abide by parents' rules and that each family has to work out its own. CONTINUED ON PAGE 192

ABBOT

Reporter Janet Ross questions teenagers about everything their attitudes on sex to the way they feel about pa

JOHN LEWIS

Teenagers pulled no punches, when reporters interviewing them were their own classmates with serious purpose.

Answers came from Oregon to Miami, Florida, from big cities and small towns.

ABBOT MILLS

THEMSELVES | WE ARE | WE ARE NOT ASHAMED

All right, what do teenage ethics cover? The answer is, many things. Here are some of them:

1. Cheating. It's true, you're a creep if you report it. But nobody is proud of the extent of it.

2. Harmful drinking. A boy is not ashamed of having tried it to see what it's like. He's not ashamed of having been high. But heavy, frequent drinking is definitely something to be ashamed of, and is very rare.

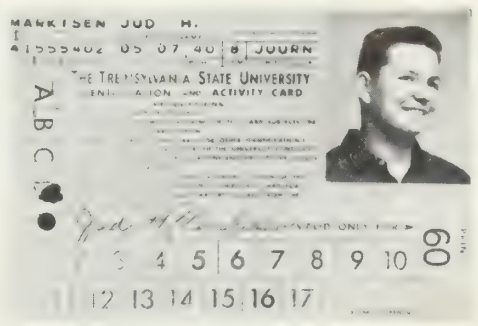
3. Pickups. Girls who go out with boys they don't know feel definitely they are doing wrong; if they run into unpleasantness they are even more ashamed. Most girls are too knowledgeable to get into such a situation.

4. Sarcasm or teasing that hurts. Most teenagers don't like to see people's feelings hurt.

5. Stealing. Not countenanced at all. Teenagers do not even feel obliged to cover for a thief.

This list only scratches the surface. Most teenagers, like most human beings, are genuinely sorry for all their truly antisocial misdemeanors. A further complication for teenagers is the delicate state of their social poise. Shame is often confused with simple embarrassment. For example, a girl is "ashamed" of staying home, yet ashamed of being seen out with a clod. A boy is ashamed not to fight when taunted, but ashamed to fight when he's with a girl.

And teenagers admit they sometimes do the things they are ashamed of. They know they are outside their own code when they drive without a license, change a mark on a report card. As one teenager said, "Sometimes we're clods—but we really know better."



Teenagers say not many cheat.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ABBOT MILLS

But almost all at least try smoking sooner or later.

Fake identity cards get teenagers into night clubs.

Parents and communities may lay down the laws, but if teenagers decide a law is "dumb" they will break it—and no shame involved. Here are some examples of legislation that many teenagers don't worry too much about observing.

1. No night movies for persons under 16 unless accompanied by an adult. This is regarded as an open invitation to falsify one's age.

2. Laws prohibiting smoking (as well as the purchase of cigarettes) by persons under 18. The 17-year-old who smokes (often with his parents' knowledge) regards this as no deterrent at all.

3. No purchase of alcoholic beverages by minors. Nowhere are teens interested in pub crawling. But many teenage boys are interested in getting together to see what drinking is all about. Almost everywhere there are older men who make a business of selling bottled liquor to minors. It is against the teenage code to squeal on these men—even under pressure from the police.

4. No admittance of persons under 21 (in some places 18) into night clubs where alcoholic beverages are consumed. Teenagers begrudge this rule because they want to hear the jazz they're so crazy about. Floor-show headliners are often ones the teenagers made famous. All a teenager needs to get in to hear them is technical evidence of proper age—driver's license, college-matriculation card. In some cities there is a brisk trade in forged ID cards (as they are called) at $10 a card. One card will see hard service among a group of friends. Older brothers are often helpful with loaned cards. Girls usually need only look not too scared. But teenagers figure they have a right to hear their favorites, and one way or another they will get in.

Teenagers want to look pretty too

From North, South, East and West—from teenagers who are "too fat" . . . "too colorless" . . . "too self-conscious" . . . young beauty pleas pour in to us. Though problems vary, all girls are uniformly sure of one thing: "We want to look pretty too!"

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN, Beauty Editor

A newly shaped hairdo, a touch of make-up light but right, a dress in a deliciously becoming style—these are the things that make the difference in Diane's appearance shown here, "before" and opposite, "after."

Diane's do-over, as well as those of other teenagers on the following pages, took less than a day. To all teenage readers, we suggest: find the girl whose problem closely resembles your own, then follow her JOURNAL lead to new loveliness—and all the fun that will come with it!

For Diane's new hairdo, a lot of thinking preceded the final "This is it!" decision. With Diane sitting in front of a mirror, we stood with comb and brush in hand, fluffing her hair this way and that to see which direction did the most for her. Reasons for the grand finale concern the shape of her face. See how her naturally narrow forehead gains an illusion of needed width, now that there is more fullness of hair near the temples, more emphasis on sideswept bangs. At the same time, the broadness from cheekbone to cheekbone seems to slim down prettily with shorter, fluffier hair at the sides, and with the new tapered cut. For setting, rollers approximately the diameter of a quarter were used all over the head, except for the short back hairs which were wound in pin curls.

Diane's biggest make-up discovery: a lip brush to even out her irregular upper lip line. A pinky-coral shade of lipstick was used, and by extending the color ever so slightly beyond her natural lip line a prettier shape was quickly achieved. For big evenings only, more glamour comes with a whisper of green eye shadow, and a bit of dark brown mascara.

Last step: a dream dress for a dream figure. In her colorful cotton, chosen to emphasize her fair skin tones and 21″ waist, Diane looks just as pretty as she feels.

"Why on earth did you ever allow yourself to gain up to 240 ugly pounds?" we asked blond, 16-year-old Kathryn Shallcross. "Well, I just loved to eat," she admitted shyly. "Yes," Kathryn's mother added. "Her father and I worried at first that she might have a glandular problem. But doctors assured us Katie was perfectly normal—except for her stevedore appetite!"

"What made you finally decide to diet?" we inquired.

"Pretty clothes," Katie said. "I got tired of wearing matronly sizes. And—uh ——" She blushed.

"Shall I tell?" her mother asked. Katie nodded.

"She had a crush on a boy at school, but Katie's girl friend told her she had heard him say: 'I wouldn't be caught dead with Katie—unless she loses weight.'" That did it! Katie started her diet last summer and by January had reduced 100 pounds. Regular medical checkups assured the Shallcrosses that Katie's health was actually improving, despite her strict 750 calories a day.* "At first it was hard to stick to it," Katie confessed. "But after three or four weeks I became used to eating less. And I was encouraged by how much better I looked as the pounds disappeared." Dressed in the pretty pink-and-white-striped cotton for her "after" picture, Kathryn couldn't help smiling at her slim reflection in the mirror. "How does it feel to look really pretty?" we asked. Blue eyes twinkling, Katie thought and said, "I wish every overweight girl in the world would diet and find out for herself how it feels to receive compliments and know in her heart she at last deserves them!"

*Katie's "before" and "after" diets are on page 169.

who is a beauty while I am too old and serious looking. Can you help me?"

Kirsten Nielsen, King Ferry, New York

Young Kirsten's big problem was that, in her admirable effort to appear conservative, she had gone too far—she looked austere. In a matter of hours, Kirsten learned how to draw the fine line in her favor. Hairdo: still simple, but softer. The lift at the forehead adds needed height for her face shape, while the gently waved side fullness, ending in a sleek French twist in the back, adds femininity without frills. Minor changes in make-up: a faint, faint touch of rouge to add warmth to her fair skin; lipstick, brighter (and gayer!) than before. Clothes suggestion: try for a younger look. Although her "before" dress is an especially becoming color, it seems too stark. See how Kirsten "after" maintains the simplicity she likes, but still emphasizes her naturally pretty proportions.

"I am 16 and very self-conscious. I have light hair and very colorless 'cow eyes.' So far I sound like a real drip. Also my forehead is square, and I can't find a good shade of lipstick. I leave with one parting word: help!"

Louise Smith, Toms River, New Jersey

HAIR DESIGNS BY MICHEL KAZAN

When our "real drip" (far left) saw her new look she said, "Pinch me—it can't be true!" Actually Louise's changes were simple, requiring only a little forethought concerning the "big problems" and how to cope with each one in turn. Her high, square forehead disappears under a pretty fringe of bangs, and her entire hairdo loosens and softens up, by combing the ends up and out rather than into the stiff pageboy roll she wore before. Her "cow eyes" lose their colorless look with make-up lightly and artfully applied. Rich brown mascara applied sparingly to upper lashes, along with a warm brown eyebrow pencil for her too-pale brows, works the pretty miracle. A clear, bright lipstick takes the place of wishy-washy "before" color to add vividness to her natural monotone coloring. And note the sprightly look achieved with light-bright colors in dress—as opposed to the drab shade of brown that does nothing for her in her "before" picture. By experimenting with different make-up and clothes colors, new and becoming hair effects, most any teenager can discover she, too, can look prettier than ever before!

Summertime Favorites

Mollie Farnham, our Barbara J., likes to have one dress to start wearing those first summery days and to count on all summer long. She looks for one as bright and light as the season . . . basic enough to be just right no matter what the day. Mollie's choice, a bright pink piqué, fits these prerequisites to perfection. One summer favorite deserves another, and Mollie makes a pair of slacks to wear for leisure hours. With these two investments and a minimum of fashion $'s, Mollie has her summer basics. By BET HART

Mollie makes a pair of slacks—a summer favorite for leisure hours. She chooses bright blue cotton, Vogue Design No. 9990.* A pretty addition with it, a plaid sleeveless shirt. Slacks cost her $4.12 to make; the blouse, $2.98 to buy.

BLOUSE BY JOHN NEIZKY

*For other views, sizes and price, see page 108.

Mollie can wear her new slacks, as much a basic as the dress, with other blouses and sweaters she already has. This time, she chooses her beige shirt and sweater from last fall.

For a summer day, Mollie likes to keep the dress as light and bright as possible. Here she adds a white belt, white jewelry, and a pink polka-dot scarf at the waistline.

A warm spring day; Mollie wears her new dress to school. The fabric is piqué . . . the color the brightest of pinks. For the classroom, Mollie keeps her accessories as simple (and pretty) as possible: black patent shoes, a matching belt and white pearl earrings. Price of dress, $12.95.

A good marriage requires both a common goal and the successful interaction of two personalities. Some marriages falter when a husband's dedication to his professional goal is in opposition to his wife's desires for a better family living experience. Some marriages falter because husband and wife are unable to communicate their true feelings to each other and so they cannot work together in mutual understanding. In this month's case from the files of The American Institute of Family Relations, Lynn and Paul have neither a common goal nor a good understanding of each other. Each has some personality characteristics which prevent him from meeting the emotional needs of his partner. In helping save such a marriage, often, as in this case, the marriage counselor tries to help the partners to deal with their marriage problems first. Once their relationship with each other is improved, usually personality difficulties are easier to overcome. For then each partner can help the other, instead of increasing his problems. . . . The counselor in this case was Mr. Harrison West. PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director.

Can this marriage be saved?

SHE: "Paul says I have been an ideal wife, that he has been a miserable husband. Last Thursday he told me about the other woman. But he won't specify what's wrong with our marriage."

HE: "I've made a hash of my marriage and my life. My complaints of Lynn are trivia. Nevertheless, Margaret's companionship has fed a hunger I've felt for years."

Lynn tells her side: "I never thought the life of a doctor's wife would be easy," said thirty-nine-year-old Lynn, personable wife of a brilliant Seattle physician. "Both of my grandfathers practiced medicine and both my grandmothers warned me not to follow in their footsteps. Yet when Paul wanted to marry me I hardly waited for him to finish asking before I said yes. He remains the most attractive man I've ever met. He is also the most baffling.

"For eighteen years I've done everything in my power to subordinate my own desires and interests to Paul. We've arrived at the $18,000 bracket after years of struggle. During our tough times I scrimped and juggled pay checks and did the tightrope walking for us both, though I doubt Paul noticed. He is a babe in the woods on the subject of finances.

"I balance our checkbook, each March I sweat blood with our tax accountant—Paul has never met the man—I pay all bills. Every Monday morning I ask if he needs cash and he blinks at me and usually shakes his head, no. I then look through his billfold—often I find it empty—and I supply him with $20 or $30, depending on the amount that seems advisable.

"Paul is as indifferent to clothes as he is to money. However, he makes many speeches before medical groups—he is a cancer specialist—and I feel he should put up a good appearance. I buy his suits, shirts, socks.

"Paul can't take contention and argument. He is inordinately sensitive to criticism. The chief of staff at the hospital where he operates is brusque and hard to please. If the man makes the slightest derogatory remark, Paul caves in and for days broods and finds fault with himself. I can't bear to see him in those self-abasing moods. I make sure he receives only praise and compliments from me.

"The last really unpleasant difference between us occurred at least ten years ago. I bought theater tickets on an evening Paul had set aside for work, as are most of his evenings. I was so insistent that he agreed to go, but he dawdled at his books and we missed the opening curtain. I was disappointed and I cried. Paul was devastated. Indeed, he denounced his own selfishness until I suffered more on his account than on mine.

"Of late years many hopeless cases have been referred to Paul by other doctors. When one of his brilliant CONTINUED ON PAGE 144

"Paul dressed and left our bedroom.
He took along his instrument bag to convince me he was making an emergency call.
I knew the telephone hadn't rung."

From mother to daughter the priceless gift was handed down.

You didn't come to the phone when Julie's long-distance call came this morning. Other times Julie would say to me, "Hold the line now, Francie, mamma wants to talk to you." And I'd wait. And for a moment I'd think maybe I was getting over the loneliness at last. Maybe your voice wouldn't still hold that soft blur of remembered sweetness. Maybe ——

And then you'd say, "Hello, love."

And I'd know that no one else in all the world could get that much feeling into two words.

Those minutes always went so fast. A few questions. A few answers. Then, "I must hang up now, Francie. Take care of yourself and the children, and give Dan a good big hug for me." And no matter how hard I'd try, my tongue would thicken.

Hush, love

By AGNES FRANCES WHITE

"If there just weren't three thousand miles, mamma ——" I'd begin, and choke. And then you'd whisper the old, old words, and once more the magic of them would quiet the yearning:

"Hush, love."

Hush, love. I guess the first time I remember them was the spring I was five years old. It was the year your sister Delia came to visit us. You hadn't seen her in twelve years and you were so excited. You dressed with such care. I remember you wore a dove-gray suit with a little black velvet collar, and a wide-brimmed gray hat with narrow bands of ribbon around the crown. I remember how high the hat sat on your great coil of hair, and how you had to anchor it tightly with the little pansy-topped hatpins.

All morning long I'd heard you practicing the Gaelic. "Delia mightn't like it, that I've let it go so," you explained. And at noon you left for the dock to meet her.

Delia wasn't at all like you. Oh, she had the same eyes, the black-fringed blue that looked almost violet; and yes, she had your small bones and tiny feet. But nothing else. Her mouth wasn't all curved and soft the way yours was. And her voice—that's where the biggest difference was. Her voice was quick and sharp, snapping out the ends of words as if she had to be rid of them. You always invited a word out, as if words were friends you wanted to share but didn't ever want to quite lose.

The evening of that day was hot, and with the earlier excitement I couldn't seem to get to sleep. I could hear your voices as you and Delia sat out CONTINUED ON PAGE 169

BROCCOLI FLORENTINE
CHINESE SALAD
ORIENTAL ORANGES

A ... gala treat ... a succession of the Chesapeake. Bring out a casserole, a blend of flavors provocative and new to delight your guests. By MARGARETTA STEVENSON

DONALD STUART

Chinese Salad

1 5-ounce can crisp Chinese noodles
3 tablespoons melted butter
1 teaspoon garlic salt
1 teaspoon curry powder
2 teaspoons Worcestershire sauce
Dash liquid pepper seasoning
2 quarts salad greens
2 tablespoons sliced ripe olives
French dressing

Heat noodles with butter and seasonings in a slow oven, 200° F., for 15 minutes. Toss, hot, with greens, olives and French dressing.

Sea Food Supreme

4 6½-ounce cans crab meat, boned and flaked
3 cups shredded day-old white bread
1 cup peeled and finely chopped onion
2 tablespoons lemon juice
1 tablespoon chopped parsley
1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce
1 tablespoon caper liquid
2 teaspoons dry mustard
½ teaspoon curry powder
1 cup mayonnaise

Drain shrimp, reserving liquid. Mix all ingredients together and moisten with 1 cup shrimp liquid. Turn into a 3-quart casserole. Refrigerate until needed. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1 hour. Add more shrimp liquid if necessary.

Broccoli Florentine

2 large bunches broccoli, trimmed
2 cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
½ cup olive or salad oil
Salt
Pepper
Parmesan cheese

Cook broccoli until barely done. Drain. Heat garlic and oil in a skillet. Add broccoli and sauté until tender, turning occasionally. Season with salt, pepper and a generous sprinkling of Parmesan cheese.

Oriental Oranges

8 firm navel oranges
16 pitted dates, cut small
8 figs, cut small
8 large marshmallows, cut small
2–3 tablespoons flaked coconut
½ teaspoon cloves
1 tablespoon honey or brown sugar
½ teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon nutmeg
Juice of ½ lemon
¾ cup blanched slivered toasted almonds

Cut off orange tops. Remove meat and scrape out membrane. Drain juice into a bowl. Cut meat into bite-sized pieces. Mix in all ingredients except almonds. Put 1 tablespoon orange juice into each orange cup and fill with fruit mixture. Top with almonds. Arrange in a pan. Add a little water. Cover and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for ½ hour.

someone's radar wasn't working—or some operator not watching the set. But conditions were pretty bad—it may just have been luck that let him through. The biggest ship in the convoy, and bang in the middle! She was like the hub of a wheel."

"Bruce has been signaling to the rescue ship for the last half hour," Wheeler said. "I could read a bit of the signal before we'd got too far up the convoy to see the light. It seems they got the crew off her."

Although the senior officer's lamp had not been trained on them, they had for some minutes been able to see its continual flickering. Now Bruce was receiving a long message from the rescue ship that was stationed astern of the convoy. But there were ships in the way, and the officers on the Hecate's bridge could not read the words.

Despite the foul conditions, the morning's run through the convoy had given Murrell a pleasurable sensation. There were many ships with deck cargoes: tanks, motor transport and small specialized landing craft. It was heartening to exchange a friendly wave with the officers they passed. It brought a touch of human warmth to the whole bloody business of war.

Suddenly Bruce's lamp was trained on them. "Yeoman!" the captain called. But it was a needless warning. Willis, the senior signal rating, was already at the lamp.

Murrell moved into the charthouse which formed a low shelter across the front of the bridge. There he lighted a cigarette, and gratefully inhaled the smoke.

The yeoman appeared, pad in hand, in the doorway. The captain took the pad and laid it on the chart table before him. "Senior officer Fortieth Escort Group to Hecate." Murrell read. "I have formed the opinion that Greek tanker Antioch is still afloat and could probably be towed to U.K. You are to return and, if practicable, take her in tow until relieved by ocean tug."

The captain looked up from the pad. "Damn and blast! What does he think we are—a bloody tugboat? Surely he could have given a towing job to a corvette!"

"It'll be a change, sir." Wheeler attempted to offer sympathy.

"Oh, yes," Murrell snapped. "Interesting—very interesting on a summer's day in peacetime. It will be a nightmare job in a North Atlantic winter. And I don't like the idea of being tied by the backside to a floating oil well. Not when the enemy may still be hanging around."

"You really think she'll be fit to tow?" Wheeler asked.

"I'm afraid so. When we first saw the flames last night they looked bad enough. But when you compare them with some of the other bangs we've seen, you'll realize that the main cargo tanks just can't have been punctured. Remember the blowing up of the Tapico!"

A signalman put his head through the doorway. "Signal from Bruce, sir," he said. "Private prefix."

It was a personal message from one captain to another.

"I bet you're sucking your teeth," the new signal read, "but if the job is hopeless you can get back much more quickly than a corvette. It may be a big decision to make so I'm afraid it's your honor to go. Good luck."

"Well," Murrell said handing the signal to Wheeler, "that sweetens the pill a little—but not much."

As soon as he had seen the Hecate settled on a course that would take her back to the position where the tanker had been torpedoed, Murrell left the bridge to go down to his sea cabin on the deck below for his breakfast.

Kirby, his steward, was already there. "Chucking herself around this morning," Kirby said. "Hear we got a towing job, sir."

Murrell sat down heavily in the chair before the table. So it had got round already. "If it's still afloat," he said, trying to be noncommittal. He had no wish that his private thoughts should be relayed round the ship.

Kirby, a coffeepot in one hand and the doorpost in the other, held the pot waveringly toward the captain's cup. "No, thank you," Murrell said. "Don't pour it out yet. Stand the jug in the wastepaper basket. It'll stay quiet there."

As Kirby went out, Murrell called, "Kirby, my compliments to the first lieutenant and will he come and see me here as soon as he's had his breakfast." He began to hurry the food into his mouth.

He had hardly finished when there was a knock on the door. "Come in," he called; and then, "Oh, it's you, doc. What does the medical adviser want at this hour of the morning?"

"I could do with a case," Macmillan said. "A nice difficult diagnosis—something to make my brain work."

"I know," Murrell said. "Your father and mother stinted themselves for your education, and now a broken finger or a simple case of skin disease is all you're ever asked to mend. Come in and help me think."

"What about?" Macmillan said as he perched himself on the bunk.

"It's no use pretending you don't listen to rumor and it's no use saying you don't know."

"You mean this towing job?" Macmillan grinned. "Maybe she's sunk."

"Frankly, I hope she has. I don't think I'm psychologically fitted to be a tugmaster in wartime! It calls for a special sort of courage I don't think I've got."

"Is it different from any other courage?"

"Quite different. It's got to go on for so long! Continual fear draws courage from men as surely as sun evaporates water. There are lots of people who, if they had to, could die a fine gladiator's death, but who'd put up a pretty poor show as a martyr. How do you take a big merchantman in tow with a destroyer?"

"Aren't there diagrams and directions in the books?"

DARK PURPOSE

By DORIS HUME

Complete novel, condensed in the JUNE JOURNAL

e you know so well and like so much to sit top of four million gallons of high-octane trol when you can't give him proper defense ainst either aircraft or U-boats."

"Is there really as much petrol as that?"

"What are a few thousand gallons more or s? They'd make little difference to the size the bang. A fourteen-thousand-ton tanker ries nearly four million gallons—enough to d two thousand Wellington bombers to rlin and back. You hadn't joined us when Tapico was hit, had you? That shook me. hook us all."

Macmillan had heard the tale from others, er from the captain.

"—— a big tanker—big as the Antioch—d almost new. In something less than a sec-d she went. There was a flicker in the dark d then a wall of flame hundreds of feet high, wound about and patterned with black oke. In that fraction of time we saw her ks burst—one after the other, till all her gth was one great silent blaze. To this day I n't know where the noise went. It was so et! And then, in the awful hush, we heard n crying—a drawn-out wail you'd not k could come from human throats. I don't r want to hear that again."

"It might be as well to put that on the ship's ice board—about the amount of petrol in Antioch and how many bombers it would e to Berlin. I bet not a man in the ship realized the size of the endeavor."

"It's an idea," Murrell agreed.

The doctor slid off the bunk. "I'll be getting ng. There's a very interesting case in the bay: a split fingernail—a little finger, k you. Not even a thumb!"

"Never mind," Murrell told him. "You e a fine mess secretary—and you're a great al support for me."

When the doctor had left, Murrell went into the chartroom. Masters, the navigator, was bent over the table. He stood up and faced the captain. "Barometer?" Murrell asked.

"Twenty-nine and two tenths; falling about a tenth each hour, sir."

"No star sight this morning, pilot." Murrell's words were not a question.

"No, sir. And not much chance of seeing the sun today. But I had quite good stars last night."

"Did you?" Murrell said. "That would be only about two hours before the Antioch was 'fished.' So our guess at her position should be pretty good. What's the approximate distance of the Antioch from Bloody Foreland?"

"Five hundred miles, sir."

"Have we had the weather forecast?"

"The wireless office should be sending it up soon. I'll decode and plot it right away."

"Good," Murrell said. "Bring it to me as soon as it's done."

Returning to his own cabin, he met Wheeler. "Come in, Number One, and let's prepare for taking the Greek in tow. We've got to assume she's afloat and be as ready as possible. If we aren't, we'll not get the tow secured before dark and we certainly don't want to show lights at night."

It was, he found, extremely difficult to tell Wheeler.

"I must have someone I can trust in the tow. I think you'd better take charge of the party." Murrell had to make a great effort to be natural.

"How long have I got to get ready?" Wheeler was matching his captain's detachment.

"The ship was torpedoed at eight o'clock last night. We turned back twelve hours later. She'd be about a hundred miles astern of the convoy when we left them. If we can maintain this speed, we should have her in sight by one o'clock this afternoon. Then we'll have five hours of daylight in which to work."

Murrell settled himself in the chair. "Sit on the bunk," he told Wheeler. "Who'd you like to take with you? I'll leave the choice to you. I'd prefer not to send the boat across more than once. When it has put your party aboard, it can drop downwind and I'll pick it up. Two men and a coxswain should be enough to paddle the boat back. You can take three men and yourself in the stern sheets and three men for the other oars—that will give you a crew of six. You'll need a signalman, a torpedo rating in case you can do anything with the electrics, a leading stoker or engine-room artificer—better ask the chief whom he recommends—one leading seaman and two able seamen."

There was a tap at the door. Murrell called, "Come in."

Both men looked up at the newcomer. Their eyes asked the same question.

"Not so good, sir," Masters, the navigator, said. "There's a deep depression running along under the edge of the Arctic high. It's traveling east at twenty knots." He put the open weather chart on the captain's desk, as the ship suddenly flung herself skyward.

Murrell rose to peer out through the salt-caked glass of the scuttle. As he rubbed away the beaded moisture the Hecate's bow rose again as she shot over the top of an Atlantic grayback. The wave top, broken by her passage, became a mass of frothy lace. Then the ship's propellers bit deeply into the sea.

"How long is this pocket gale going to last?"

"Not long, sir. It's really only a secondary to the one we've just had."

"Then the sooner we can get to the northward and into that Arctic high, the better. Thank you, pilot," he said in dismissal.

When the door had shut, Murrell turned again to his first lieutenant. "Well, there you are, Number One. The weather is going to do its best to muck up our plans, but we should manage. I only wish I had some experience of towing."

"Looks as if, until the ocean tug arrives, we're both going to learn a lot."

Wheeler had spoken so casually that Murrell wondered whether the younger man's imagination had been dulled by his sense of adventure. He said, "Yes, as you say—until the tug arrives."

"You don't sound very hopeful, sir!"

Does Junior get up with no appetite . . . and dawdle over his food? . . . Does Dad rush off to work . . . with only a cup of coffee and a bun to sustain him? . . . Does Sister skip breakfast entirely . . . to keep a trim figure?

Does your family have these breakfast problems?

The success or the failure of your day often depends on the breakfast that starts it. And yet, far too many of us either skip breakfast entirely—or eat a sparse one on the run—or substitute "coffee breaks" for a healthful morning meal.

If you've never thought breakfast important, consider these facts. In the morning, perhaps more than at any other time of the day, you need a well-balanced meal. That's because your energy is lowest after the long stretch between dinner and breakfast. So, your body requires "fuel" to renew your supply of energy—to help you feel better, think clearly and work more efficiently.

On the other hand, a sparse breakfast invites fatigue. In fact, many studies show that when you eat little or no breakfast, tiredness will almost surely overtake you while the morning is still young. And, in many cases, breakfast skippers become irritable, nervous or weak.

How much breakfast should you eat? Enough to supply at least one-quarter of your total food needs for the day. And to get the essential carbohydrates, proteins, vitamins and minerals, your breakfast should include fruit in some form; bread made from whole grain or enriched flour; cereal, eggs, meat or fish; and milk to drink or to use in a cereal.

Such a breakfast (with other things you like including coffee or tea) should be eaten by everyone in the family—mother, father and the children.

Try it for a while. Chances are you'll notice how much more energy you have, and how much better you'll feel around 11 o'clock than you did before.

If you have "no time" for breakfast, just set the alarm clock a quarter of an hour earlier than usual. You'll never miss those 15 minutes. And to save time in the morning, plan and prepare some of your dishes the night before.

Even if you're dieting, don't skip breakfast. Without breakfast, you're far more likely to overeat at lunch or dinner. And that can wreck anyone's reducing program.

All of us, overweight or normal, should take time to eat a substantial, unhurried breakfast. It's a fine way to help every member of your family to better health.

SIGN OF A GOOD BUSINESS NEIGHBOR

"There are so few tugs and they've so much to do! As rare as taxis in London on a wet day." All at once the desire came to Murrell to turn time on by a week. Not that he particularly wanted to know what he would be doing. He just wanted assurance that they'd all be there to do it.

Wheeler's voice cut into his thoughts. "I'd like to get the towing hawser laid out before I send the hands to dinner, but while she's traveling at this speed it's not possible."

"Don't bother about that," Murrell told him. "We can get it out while you're paddling across to your first command. Go and get your party together."

Murrell had not finished the first course of his lunch when the bell above the head of his bunk buzzed angrily. He spoke conversationally into the mouthpiece. "Captain's cabin."

At first he heard only the attenuated whine of the wind, and then Masters' voice against the continuous background of sound. "Radar has reported a definite echo bearing red two-oh, ten thousand yards. The plot suggests that it's stationary. Shall I alter course?"

"Yes, please. I'll be up."

Before mounting the ladder, he turned into the chartroom. The barometer had fallen another tenth. He went back to the passage and climbed the ladder to the bridge.

The wind was warmer than it had been an hour before. With the big area of cold Arctic anticyclone so close to them, the unseasonal warmth was not a good sign. Everything in sight was gray: the bridge, the lighter camouflage of the forward gun, the darker tone of the foredeck. Gray seas sweeping out of the gray drizzle, and even the wave tops, when they broke into foam, were gray. He climbed heavily up to the standard compass. "Can you see her yet?"

Masters raised his arm to point ahead of the ship, and the captain saw her clearly through the curtain of rain—and much nearer than he had expected. The Antioch lay beam on to their approach. Come upon suddenly, she appeared vast and, in her desolation, phantasmal.

"She's a bit down by the stern, sir." The navigator was the first to speak.

"With a laden tanker it's difficult to tell. They've so little freeboard," Murrell answered, keeping his long binocular on the object of their quest. "She's not much damaged, and she's spewing out enough oil to stop the seas' breaking. There's no seaman's reason why we shouldn't try to tow the brute. Ease her down to ten knots while I take a look round."

They were passing close by the Antioch. From the height of the bridge he could look down on her wallowing hull. It was certain that, bad though the weather might be, the whaler could put men aboard her.

Wheeler climbed the ladder to the bridge. With an oilskin over his duffel coat, a length of line round his middle, and pockets stuffed with articles, he looked like a badly made up parcel.

"Your party ready?" Murrell asked.

"They're mustering by the whaler now, sir."

"Very good. I'll come down and have a word with them." Murrell turned and called, "Masters, keep the ship circling the wreck until I'm back."

The first lieutenant had already begun the descent of the long ladder that led to the main deck. The captain followed.

"Don't forget, Number One," Murrell said, "that the merchantman is drifting through the water at almost two knots. There'll be a big undertow on her lee side. Don't get your boat broadside on to the ship. There are some falls hanging from a davit on her lee quarter. If you can get in under those, you may be able to climb up a ladder that's over the side there. Don't risk smashing your rudder."

Murrell, sure that Wheeler was fully aware of the necessity for all he'd said, wondered why it had had to be said at all. Speech was not always limited to just what the words said. Speech could be a hand expressing friendship or encouragement.

They came to a stop by the whaler. Fallen in abreast of the boat were nine of the best, and certainly the strongest men in the ship. The captain ran his eyes over them quickly. Hart, the engine-room artificer, a dependable honest man with a wife and two children. Signalman White, a big laughing youngster who would be difficult to dishearten. Leading Seaman Pengelley, the best seaman in the ship, not perhaps quite up to the weight of the others but as tough as a man could be. Murrell thought that Wheeler had been right so far. He was not so certain of the next: Sibson, torpedoman, was big enough and strong enough, but his punishment record was bad. And there were two able seamen: Trotman, a hulk of a man who would be as brave as a lion because he hadn't the imagination to be otherwise; and Anders, a flaxen-haired giant who, though he sometimes appeared simple-minded, had, in the affairs of the sea, a quite uncanny knack of doing the right thing by instinct.

Each of these six carried a parcel done up in waterproof cloth. This and their heavier clothing distinguished them from the three men who would make the return journey.

"Richards," Murrell said, "you're coxswain of the boat. When you've put the party aboard, row downwind. When you see me closing you, turn your boat round and keep her heading about twenty degrees off the wind. I'll pick you up—don't you start chasing me. If I miss you the first time, I'll try again." And then to the six, "You men of the towing party: don't forget that from the moment you leave this ship Mr. Wheeler is your commanding officer—and don't worry. I'm sure that between us we'll manage the tow."

Murrell turned to Wheeler and offered his hand. "Good luck, Number One," he said. Then a thought came to save banalities. "My apologies. Good luck—captain."

"I'd dearly love to be taking a trip in the boat," Macmillan said as the captain took the ship upwind of the wreck to slip the whaler.

The doctor had followed the captain up to the bridge. Towing and salvage had always seemed to him the highest exposition of a seaman's art. "You know," he went on, "what I've always most wanted to do was to sail my wee yacht across the Atlantic. Perhaps when the war is over, and before I go back to the hospital, I'll do just that."

"Alone?" Murrell asked as he kept his eye on the sea, the Antioch and the behavior of his own ship.

"Yes," the doctor said. "I'd prefer it that way. Just think of the blessed solitude. Out there and alone, you could really think things out!" He waved a hand over a gray and empty arc of the sea.

"You couldn't," Murrell said. "I've tried it. Not on such a long trip as that—only from Scotland to Norway and back. But it doesn't work out. Your mind is full of the minute-by-minute problems the yacht creates: the set of the sails, the necessity to make little repairs and the job of getting the next meal while at the same time you look after the ship. I'm afraid the best forcing ground for philosophy is a nice dry hut on the beach. Any day I'd back Diogenes' land-based tub against your seagoing one!"

"You disappoint me," Macmillan said. "Without a wife I could take time off and accept the risk."

Murrell said to the wheelhouse, "Steer five degrees to starboard," and to the doctor, "I reckon we'll be ready to slip the boat very soon. Why are you a bachelor?" and thought how one could, when men were busy, ask personal questions that would be very difficult to broach even when you were alone with a friend and a bottle of wine.

"A defect in my own character." Macmillan spoke frankly. "I can't accept interference in my own work—either active or passive. That's why I prefer working in a hospital to being in practice."

"But hospitals are full of women!"

Macmillan laughed. "But the nursing staff do what they are told."

Murrell said, "I'm going to slip the boat now. But I don't see how you're going to be much of a philosopher unless you accept the coexistence of women. Slow ahead. Steady as you go." The last remark had been made to the wheelhouse. Then he left the compass for the side of the bridge where he could look down the whole length of the ship.

With engines at "Slow" and steaming into the weather, the Hecate was barely making way through the water. Two groups of men held the ropes that would lower the boat to the water. Leaning over the side of the bridge, Murrell motioned downward with his hand.

With a splash the boat was in the water, the oars out and she was pulling strongly away. The captain went back to the compass platform.

Graves, the gunnery officer, had the afternoon watch. "Boat's clear," Murrell said with a flutter of inward satisfaction. "I'll take her"; and down the voice pipe, "Half ahead. Port twenty. Steer one-eight-oh."

As the Hecate swung round, they could see the boat, small and insignificant in the immensity of the ocean. Soon it went down into the trough of a wave, lost to view. Then it would be lifted into sight again. As the wave's crest passed beneath it, the whole boat rocked backward and began its slide down the smooth wave back.

Wheeler was making to pass under the Antioch's stern. In a much wider circle, Murrell followed him round. The watchers on the bridge could see the tanker's lee side. It was not easy to make out, even with the glasses, exactly what was happening.

Someone was on the ladder, was clambering up, was over the rail. Another, and another, five—six—seven, and the boat was backing away, turning and paddling downwind to where the Hecate waited.

Murrell seized the lanyard of the siren. Against the immensity of the ocean the little noise would be cast in defiance. Although the noise shook the eardrums of those on the bridge, only with luck would it be heard in the Antioch. In long and short blasts the captain spelled out "Maneuver well executed."

Slowly Murrell let the Hecate creep up until the whaler was under the davits. He saw the falls jerk tight as the boat was hooked on; saw the men on deck begin to haul away. He caught a glimpse of the boat clear of the water, and, thankful that this too had been accomplished, he went back to the compass platform.

"Half ahead, starboard fifteen. Steer oh-three-oh." With the boat recovered, he could get the ship under way again. He said to Graves, "I want to circle the Antioch at about a mile." Then he heard from below high-pitched shouts and a dull crash.

Flinging himself to the back of the bridge, he saw the whaler held only by the after fall. Its bow hung down. A wave, catching the boat, flung it against the ship's side.

Half a ship's length away, Murrell could only stand in horrified silence while, far below him, Gray, the commissioned gunner, leaped for the davit head. Murrell saw the flash of the knife. Gray had made his own decision and, fearful that the hanging boat would stave in the thin plating of the destroyer's hull, he was

MIRACLE WHIP

Actually, Miracle Whip is more than a "salad dressing." It is a truly different dressing, luxuriously rich and smooth . . . and so wonderful tasting.

To make Miracle Whip, Kraft uses more expensive ingredients and more of them—plenty of good country eggs and the very best salad oil.

And Kraft combines these fine ingredients in a special way that gives the creamiest, smoothest texture imaginable.

But it is Miracle Whip's flavor that's really exciting. A lively, teasing, uniquely delicious flavor that no one has ever been able to copy.

Try it! You'll see why Miracle Whip Salad Dressing is America's favorite by far.

trying to cut her adrift. He saw the cut ends of rope part under the knife. A moment later the boat fell into the sea and drifted astern.

The captain turned heavily. The eyes of all those on the bridge, both officers and men, were expressionless. None could see a boat—the symbol of safety—lost without feeling a catch in the heart that his own chance of safety had been expended. No man had gone overboard with the boat. That was Murrell's only consolation.

Without the whaler there would be no means of putting more men aboard the Antioch. The motorboat was not fitted with slipping gear and could be put in the water only when the weather was perfect.

From the wing of the Antioch's bridge a light flickered. The voice of the signalman, reading the signal, could be heard plainly.

"Preparatory report. Engine room flooded. Fuel-oil tanks port side buckled and leaking. Remainder of hull appears undamaged. Quite impracticable to steam, but tow possible. All cable work will have to be done by hand as winches are electric. Am preparing to tow as arranged. Will signal when ready."

"Yeoman," the captain called, "we'd better make a signal to Bruce and commander-in-chief Western Approaches. Let me have a pad, please." He went into the charthouse.

Taking a pencil from the shallow tray at the back of the chart table, the captain wrote, "Consider Antioch can be salvaged. Main cargo tanks undamaged. Have party aboard and am preparing to tow. Request early arrival of ocean tug, air cover and surface escort. Time of origin fifteen-oh-two."

The Hecate steamed round the crippled tanker, her track a square whose sides were each a mile long. The captain had an intense desire to make a questioning signal to the dark shape around which he patrolled. But he could be certain that Wheeler and his men were doing everything possible to ensure that the Antioch would be ready before nightfall. A signal would only cause annoyance.

To hide his impatience Murrell left the bridge and went down to his sea cabin. Wheeler might be another hour or he could be ready in a minute's time. Then his ears, preternaturally sharp, heard the cry on the deck: "Antioch signaling." He went up the ladder as fast as his legs would take him.

A white light flickered from the tanker's bridge. "Watch the splash. I am going to slip the starboard anchor. Will be ready to tow from starboard cable in fifteen minutes. Suggest you take station on my starboard bow."

Murrell heaved a sigh of relief. "Very well, Mr. Graves. I'll take her. Tell Mr. Thompson that we'll be passing the towing hawser in fifteen minutes. Have the coxswain at the wheel and see that Mr. Gray is ready with the line-throwing rifle." After the long wait it was satisfactory, indeed, to have the chance to handle the ship himself.

A rifle sent the first line over. A heavier rope was tied to the line's end, and then, snaking from the deck along which it had been laid, the big towing hawser crept out. Inch by inch, and foot by foot, it grew to form a coupling between the low stern of the destroyer and the towering bow of the tanker.

From the bridge Murrell had seen Wheeler's head and shoulders above the deep bulwarks. When the hawser had passed up the pipe Wheeler's head had been withdrawn, and White's appeared in its place. The signalman's hands moved swiftly as he passed a message in that peculiar brand of semaphore which is too fast to be read by anyone other than a fleet signalman.

"Have four shackles of cable ranged on deck and held by slip. Without power on the winch I am unable to let it out slowly. It will come all at once when slip is knocked off. Please go ahead as soon as my hand is dropped."

The signalman read the message to the captain. "Reply, 'Well done,'" Murrell said and raised his voice. "Mr. Graves. Stand by to go half ahead as soon as I give the order."

Wheeler's head reappeared over the Antioch's rail. His hand was raised while his head was turned to watch the men who worked on the tanker's deck. The hand fell. "Half ahead seven-oh revolutions," Murrell ordered. "Steady as you go."

That part of the hawser that had been hauled aboard the Antioch ran out of the hawsepipe. Then, with a roar that could be heard on the Hecate's bridge, the chain cable followed. In the widening gap between the ships, the cable poured into the sea like falling shot—and then as suddenly stopped. Seven heads appeared over the tanker's bow to exchange cheerful waves with those of the Hecate's crew.

As the distance between the ships widened, the cable that hung from the Antioch's bow began to move forward. The destroyer, moving faster, raised the hawser from the waves as it took the strain. It came up streaming and the falling drips made a dappled line over the waves.

The destroyer, caught by the stern, was checked. Her screws thrashed the water. Murrell sickened at the sensation. A giant had seized his free-floating ship and tied her up.

When the Hecate first took the tow both ships were lying beam on to the westerly weather with their bows to the northward, and the tow followed her tug reasonably well. But as soon as Murrell tried to draw her round to an easterly course, the devil entered into the Antioch. There was so much disparity in size that the ships were differently affected by the waves. The big tanker would yaw violently—first one way, then the other. The Hecate, with one propeller stopped and the other churning the water, would struggle desperately to bring her charge back on course. For perhaps a minute the odious craft towed correctly, before once more she swung away.

"You wouldn't think she wanted us to take her home!" Murrell said to the yeoman who stood beside him. "Trouble is that with the towing hook right at the stern we can only hold ourselves straight by the power of our engines. I'm damned if I know how we're to go on doing this until the tug arrives!"

The signalman of the watch came with a signal pad. Rain had made the paper sodden. Murrell dared not take his eyes from the tow. "Read it to me, please," he said.

"Senior officer Fortieth Escort Group and Hecate from C. in C. W. A.," the yeoman read. "Weather permitting air cover will be provided during daylight hours from oh eight hundred tomorrow. Regret no surface escorts can be detached from convoy duties. No ocean tug immediately available. Hecate is to do her utmost to bring Antioch in."

"Hell and damnation!" Murrell exploded. "It's five hundred miles! Five days and—and—oh, hell!" Then, seeing the expression of bewilderment on the yeoman's face, he stopped. "Ever seen an ant trying to get a dead butterfly across a lawn?"

The yeoman nodded. "Yes, sir."

"We're the ant!" Murrell told him.

Pengelley had been the first to go aboard the Antioch, and Hart next. Then Wheeler had made the climb, followed by Sibson, Anders, Trotman and White. Now they stood clustered round the head of the ladder. Wheeler realized that they waited for his lead, as much as the three men in the boat waited for his order to return to the Hecate. Leaning over the rail, he waved to Richards in the boat.

The whaler backed away and was soon paddling downwind to where, in the rain-smoked distance, the destroyer waited. They watched her go in distrustful silence. The tanker rolled heavily, and from somewhere within her there came a loud clang.

"Ain't she flipping big." Sibson in wonder spoke softly. "You wouldn't think a thing as big as this could sink."

"That big one that blew up beside us—she sank all right," White said; and, in the alarmed silence that followed, "What was her name?"

"Tapico," Wheeler told him.

"She were gone in half a minute!" Pengel reminded them.

Hart was looking toward the destroy "They've got the whaler, sir," he said.

"Like hell they have!" Pengelley said.

In stricken silence the seven men watc the whaler's bow fall down as the destro turned away. With awe in his voice Whe said, "They'll lose her!"

"They have—and so have we," Pengel said. "Anyway, after that banging about, wouldn't carry a crew of mice."

"How will we get off?" White asked.

"Unless you're J. C. Himself, an' can w across the waters—you'll swim for it!" sacrilege Pengelley lashed out at both hims and White.

"We've just got to be prepared to stay h until we're towed in." Wheeler spoke hars striving to find authority. "Hart, get the n mustered on the fo'c'sle!"

The next two hours were employed in phy cal labor of the most strenuous kind. W the tow had been fixed, Wheeler led his n up to the wheelhouse. There they found en gency oil lights, and wooden shutters to bl off the bridge windows. After the cram and crowded quarters of a destroyer, the ta er's wheelhouse appeared a vast and bar place.

"We'll turn it into a mess deck," Whe said. "While White keeps signal wa we'll hunt in pairs for what we want. Hart Sibson, see what you can find out about galley—and if there's any fuel to light it w Pengelley and Trotman, have a look round fo'c'sle and see if you can find the lamp ro Bring back two more oil lamps and a drun oil. Anders, come with me and we'll hav scout round the officers' cabins and col some bedding."

As he went down the interior ladder, to in hand, he wondered why he had sent then pairs. Partly to solve the age-old problem preventing men from thinking of their t by keeping them employed, but more mutual support. An aura of fear hung o the lifeless ship. Within the dark dese hull, that creaked and groaned continua he admitted to a strong disinclination to alone.

Back in the wheelhouse with their bund they found the others already arrived. C pared with the rest of the ship, the place peared a haven of sanity, and, as the m tresses were unrolled and the blankets sha out, it rapidly acquired a lived-in aspect P gelley and Trotman had returned with more lights, a can of oil and a funnel. H and Sibson had found the galley. Althoug was fired by oil, this would not work with electricity for the fans. Hart, however, thou that with a little work he could make it b wood. They had also found the storero which had tinned meat enough and quit store of macaroni. Of bread they'd found a few rolls.

Wheeler, as he wound and set the clock was fixed to the bulkhead behind the now less wheel, felt that he was helping the ret to something like an ordinary life. "We m be a lot worse off," he said. "Now ab watches. There are six of you with White, he'll be needed for signaling. . . . What Sibson?"

"What do we want to stand watches We can't do nothing by night."

"But we got to have watches!" Hart s "We're a ship, aren't we?"

"Bloody fine ship's company we are," son said. "Work all day, and hang about the night looking at something we can' nothing about."

Wheeler saw Sibson's eyes make a q appraisal of possible support. There was a a moment of suspense while all, and n particularly Sibson, waited for his own words. "You'll stand your watch along the others," Wheeler told him. "White wi a dayman. The rest of us will keep watc pairs. We might as well stick to the coupl which we have already hunted. Anders a will take the second dog. Pengelley and can toss for which pair has the first watch."

losers will have the middle. Anders and I get the morning. Come on, Anders, we'll go out and relieve White now."

With Anders on one wing of the bridge and himself forty feet away on the other, Wheeler felt a reaction from the keyed-up excitement of the past six hours. At twenty-four, he was still young enough for his first thoughts on boarding a derelict in the middle of the Atlantic to have been overlaid with memories of boyhood stories of endeavor. It was not until he was alone in the rain-laden dark that the thought of what the enemy might do came home to him. Then the more he thought of the excellent target that the slow-moving ships would make, the more queasy his stomach felt.

He wondered if Sibson was going to cause trouble. He had perhaps been too intent on choosing strength without giving sufficient care to character.

To Murrell, on the Hecate's bridge, the slowly deepening night in one way increased the strain, but in another eased the tension. When he could see neither the Antioch's wild yaws nor the surge of the hawser that connected the two ships, he had just that amount less to worry about.

Gray, the commissioned gunner, had fitted up a telephone and chest pad, and now the officer of the watch had earphones under the hood of his duffel coat, and the captain a mouthpiece strapped to his chest. The wire trailing across the deck was a nuisance, but at least he did not have to shout his orders.

A dark shape appeared beside him. "Your medical adviser," the doctor announced his identity.

"That remark sounds a little ominous. Do you want to feel my pulse or give me a pill?"

"I was just interested to see how long you could stand it."

In the dark the doctor interpreted the silence that greeted his remark for a shrug of the shoulders.

"So you think you can go on doing that for the next five days?"

"I hope it won't be as long as that," Murrell said.

"You certainly can't do it all the time, and you won't."

"I could arrest you for interfering," the captain remarked conversationally.

"I could certify you as insane—that would fix you."

"Could you?"

"If you go on like this, I'll probably have to."

"Port ten," the captain ordered while he thought over the doctor's remark. Then, "So what?"

"You've got to teach someone else."

"Have you thought who? I've got to have officers of the watch. The ship must go on—the tow is not the only thing. Once the weather clears, the enemy won't miss their chance."

"How about me?" Macmillan asked. "I may not be an executive officer, but I've played about with boats since I was a child. The two of us may get her in. You can't possibly do it alone."

There was a long silence while the captain pondered the suggestion. He had to admit that another twenty-four hours would be about the limit of his physical endurance. After that his efficiency would drop so rapidly that an alternative would be essential. As he had said to Macmillan, there was not only the question of the tow; he must keep some part of his brain to deal with the enemy when the latter should put in an appearance.

"Thank you, doctor," he said and began to divest himself of the harness that held the mouthpiece to his chest. "I'll stay with you for half an hour."

"I hoped you'd do that," Macmillan said. "I've told Kirby to have your dinner in your sea cabin at eight o'clock. I had mine before I came up. Now begin to teach me my new trade of tugmaster."

In the warmth and seclusion of his own sea cabin there was much to suggest that Hecate was in her normal station astern of the convoy. Only the peculiarly heavy feel of the ship was a continual reminder of her present unnatural task.

Until he had sat down before his dinner Murrell had not realized how hungry he was. Relaxed, he began to think—and at once realized that he had been guilty of overlooking obvious facts. Their asdic could be heard at a considerable distance by a German hydrophone operator. In the present bad visibility, a U-boat could sight a ship only if it was less than a mile away. He picked up the telephone to the bridge.

"Thompson, you'd better stop the asdic transmissions. If a U-boat wants to attack us in this weather he'll come in on the surface and then the radar should detect him." Murrell waited for Thompson's acknowledgment and then replaced the handset.

Thank heaven that in February, 1943, they had radar, and the German U-boats had not. It was rumored that the enemy did not yet know what it was. If the radar officer did pick up an echo, he'd have to slip the tow. Now that he had the doctor to relieve him, he could plan the necessary alteration in his ship's routine. The pieces of the puzzle were fitting into place.

THE MUSIC-GO-ROUND

By JOHN NIXON, JR.

Remember the "Red Moon Waltz"?
I stood on tiptoe and wound
And wound the music-go-round,
Then stuck in a needle and thrilled
As the far-away orchestra filled
The parlor with three-quarter sound.

Remember? Impressive and tall,
The music-go-round hummed its airs,
And though we were clearly too small,
We started to dance in the hall
And bumped into tables and chairs.

I wonder: whatever became
Of that waltz-making box and us two?
Some afternoon when there is rain,
I'd like to go back there again
And bump some more tables.
Would you?

The winter dawn came sluggishly, and as a sad apology for sunrise, the rain became visible again. But there were cups of hot "kai" being handed round and life was stirring once more. "Tow signaling," the doctor called.

Murrell, who, after three hours' sleep, had come on deck at seven o'clock, joined the doctor. Astern of them, her outline blurred by the driving rain, the big tanker slid awkwardly over the waves. From the center of her bridge the light flickered as, shining through the rain, it gathered an added nimbus. It was only natural that Wheeler should wish to break the silence of the night watches as soon as daylight had come.

"Please let me have recipe for cooking macaroni," the signal started. "Have plenty of meat, but no other starch food."

The navigator passed them. "The glass is rising, sir," Masters said.

"'Morning, pilot. I rather expected so. This heavier rain suggests a break in the cloud. I'm going down to get my breakfast. Wheeler and his lads are all right if their first interest is food."

Murrell began to descend the ladder. He was halfway down when a sea caught the ship, and he had to grasp the ladder to avoid being thrown to the deck below. As she hung poised on the wave, he felt her stern drawn back by the tow. And then suddenly she was free, kicking her heels like a young colt as she bounded over the seas. "Tow parted!"

It was only too true. Murrell, clinging to the standard compass, looked across the heaving waters to the tanker which, released from its tow, was now turning to lie once more broadside on to the seas.

Already the yeoman had rejoined his captain. "Make to Antioch," Murrell told him: "'Consider tow has parted at extreme end of your cable. Am recovering hawser now while steaming slowly round you. Can you recover your cable?'"

The captain turned to Thompson. "Commence normal asdic sweep." Then the Antioch was signaling again. "To Hecate: Agree your diagnosis. Regret unable to recover cable in anything like reasonable time. Submit we recommence tow with port cable. Can probably improve slightly on yesterday's time for preparation. Starboard cable can be recovered at leisure."

The captain was dictating the signals direct to the yeoman at the light. "Don't be downhearted. With drift and tow, you are nearly a hundred miles nearer home than this time yesterday. Consider weather will clear and wind shift to northwest. We have hawser foul of port propeller. Continue preparation while I clear myself."

Hans Edelmann, copilot of the big four-engined Focke-Wulf aircraft, leaned forward to catch his captain's words. "What did you say?" he asked.

"Might as well have stayed in Bordeaux as be flying around the Atlantic in this weather. Let's go down and look at the waves."

His copilot grinned without humor. "Not too close—I hate swimming."

Slowly the big plane lost height. The two German officers peered inquisitively through the windows.

"Soon we must see something," Richter grumbled.

But Edelmann was not listening. With his gloved hand he rubbed at the window. "Herr Kapitän—Herr Kapitän! A big tanker. Do you see her?"

Peering forward, Richter pulled the joy stick slightly toward him. "Yes. I see her—and an escort circling."

"You will attack, Herr Kapitän?"

"No. We are of the reconnaissance wing. In this weather one cannot tell who would win. We'd have no time to set the bomb sights and could only attack from such a low altitude that we'd be sure to be hit ourselves. I will report the position. It is for our U-boats to sink her."

The shadow, which had not been seen in either ship because both crews were too busy with their own troubles, winged away to the eastward.

U-boat 506 was virtually hove to. On the ninth of February, two nights before, she had executed a raid on an eastbound convoy and secured—so she claimed—the obvious jack pot by torpedoing the big tanker that had been in the center. It was her commanding officer's first patrol as captain, and the tanker his first victim. He had, not without reason, been pleased with himself.

Lying in his bunk, Korvetenkapitän Willi Lachmann reread a letter from his wife, Magda. She wanted to know why he had not had leave for so long. He thought he had explained a hundred times that he'd had to stay about in Lorient, keeping himself before the notice of people who could assure his promotion. It would be three months at least before he could hope for leave. But the tanker had been a good start! Possibly his name had already been mentioned on the wireless or in the newspapers and Magda would have learned of his success. He hoped so.

"Herr Kapitän." A voice disturbed this pleasurable reverie. Turning on his side, Lachmann saw the narrow face of Kleist, the signalman.

"What is it?" Lachmann demanded.

"A signal for us, Herr Kapitän. From U-Boat Command, Lorient."

"Give it me." The Kapitän took the signal from the man's hand.

Lachmann read it. He read it through again carefully. "Very well," he said. But he did not hand it back. He waited until he heard Kleist's feet move away and then, steeling himself, he read the signal a third time.

"U-Boat 506 from U-Boat Command, Lorient. Reconnaissance aircraft reports damaged 15,000-ton tanker in position 54° 10′ North 21° 19′ West at 0835 this morning the 11th, accompanied by destroyer escort. As no other attacks have been carried out in the area, this vessel is assumed to be tanker claimed sunk by you on the 9th. Position indicates that ship can steam. You are to close the position and sink her. Repeat, sink her. Your attention is drawn to my standing orders numbers 31 and 46."

Lachmann raised his hand to the shelf above his head, where a thin official volume rubbed shoulders with his other literature. Taking this down, he thumbed the pages carefully: 30 and 31.

"Commanding officers are, when they have penetrated the escort screen, to force home their attacks with the greatest determination. Inside the convoy and on the surface, even though the merchant ships are plainly visible, U-boats are very difficult to see in darkness. At important targets a spread of torpedoes is always to be fired, and the enemy is to be closed until all possibility of a miss is eliminated."

No. 46, when he reached it, was even worse:

"Commanding officers are at all times to avoid making false claims. These are not only misleading, but react unfavorably on the officer concerned."

It took Lachmann some few minutes to recover. Then he swung his legs from the bunk and, slipping on his coat, went out into the narrow central gangway and turned toward the control room. Gessner, the navigator, was bending over the chart table. He stood back expectantly when he saw the Kapitän beside him.

"Lay me off a position 54° 10′ North 21° 19′ West," Lachmann ordered. There was a roughness in his voice that sent the navigator to his work in a hurry. When the position had been marked, the navigator stood back.

"How many miles?"

Lachmann took a pair of dividers; a moment's work, and he threw the instrument back into the tray. "Zum Teufel! It is 138 miles—and 21° 19′ West. The British aircraft come as far as 22° West. It means going into the area they cover. Even if she is steaming slowly, she will be east of 20° West before we get there."

"What is it, Herr Kapitän?" Gessner asked.

"A damaged tanker with a destroyer escort. They ask us to repeat our performance." With this mixture of truth and half-truth Gessner must be content. The Kapitän was not going to put the signal on the file. He could, he hoped, trust Kleist, who as a signalman might be supposed to be a confidential servant. "What is the course to the position?" he asked, tight-lipped.

"Oh-eight-five degrees, Herr Kapitän," Gessner told him.

"Bring her round to that. Speed fifteen knots."

"Jawohl, Herr Kapitän."

The diesels increased their noise to a shattering roar as the throttles of the powerful engines were opened. A savage hound had been laid on to the quarry, with the efficient U-Boat Command to whip it in.

"I don't believe the cable is round a propeller," Murrell said to Gray as they leaned over the rail and looked at the chain that led down into the water. "I think it's foul of the rudder. How did she manage to do it?"

"It happened just as she turned into the wind," Gray told him. "She'd very little way on her, and that big wave we hit stopped her nearly dead. As she went over it, her stern came clean out of the water. She must have slapped it down on top of the cable and there we were with an obvious foul. So I telephoned the bridge."

The engineer officer joined them. He was a wizened little man who loved machinery in motion more than anything else on earth.

"Well, chief?" Murrell asked.

"It's the rudder right enough, sir. I reckon, by the scrapings I can hear, that the cable is over the forward half of the blade."

"If we could recover the main length of hawser to relieve the weight, and then knocked off this slip, the short end might fall clear?" Murrell suggested hopefully.

The engineer shook his head. "I reckon she's too tight to do that. She'll need a good tug to jog her free. We've got to get a line onto her somehow."

"Then there's nothing for it but to dive," Gray said.

"I don't like it," Murrell told them.

"There's this much about it," the engineer said. "You won't tow that another mile unless you do." He jerked his thumb in the direction of the rain-soaked tanker.

Murrell had to accept the inevitable. "How long will it take to get the diving gear ready?" he asked.

"It'll be half an hour before I can go over the side," Gray told him.

"Then I'll be very grateful if you'll try. Telephone the bridge when you're ready."

FRENCH PROVERBS

The reputation of a man is like his shadow: it sometimes follows and sometimes precedes him; it is sometimes longer and sometimes shorter than his natural size.

It is the men who make the roads, but it is the women who teach the children to walk on them.

A colt is worth nothing if it does not break its halter.

Balancing his distaste for risking one brave man against his fear for them all, he made his way forward.

The rain clouds were breaking. The Antioch, rolling mightily, was seen with greater clarity. The color of the sea had changed from gray to green.

"Barometer's up another tenth, sir. We'll have the clearing within an hour?" Masters' tone was one of suggestion.

"We would," Murrell snapped. "Just when we'd prefer to remain hidden."

"We've heard from our aircraft," Masters told him; "he's asked if we've any special orders."

For a moment the captain thought. "Yes. Tell him to carry out circular patrols at a radius of alternately two and ten miles."

He was drinking his coffee when Masters telephoned from the bridge. "Gray says he's ready to dive, sir."

"If there's no reason for my coming up," Murrell said, "I'll go straight down to the quarter-deck."

"No reason, sir," Masters answered.

When he reached the stern Murrell saw Gray, stripped to bathing shorts. Oxygen cylinders were strapped to the gunner's back, and his eyes regarded his captain steadily from behind the goggled facepiece. Gray had tied a length of light rope under his armpits, so that he could be hauled back. He walked confidently to the rail. Murrell accompanied him. "Be careful, Guns," he said. "If you can't do it, we'll find some other way." Neither man thought there was one. Gray climbed over the rail and, taking the end of wire rope that was handed to him, began to lower himself down the cable.

The wire rope ended in a hook that was to be put into one of the links of the cable. One party of men on deck let this rope go slowly as another party tended the life line. A wave lashed at Gray and swung him sideways—and another. The gunner slipped quickly down, paused while he adjusted a valve and the in a flurry of kicking legs, disappeared.

There followed four minutes of acute an iety. Murrell watched the second hand of l watch complete another circle. Then men we stirring beside him, shifting feet that had be held for long without movement. A voi laughed in too high a pitch. Gray came to t surface. His arms and legs moved slow clutching the cable. Leading Seaman Thom pushed past the captain. He had a line ti round his waist and was stripped to his und wear. He began to climb down to Gra assistance. Afterward no one was quite su how they managed to get them both aboa

Gray was half dragged, half carried to t after house. His body was dappled blue w cold and there was a nasty gash on his sho der. The doctor waited to tend him, but Gr indicated that he wished to speak to the ca tain. Someone had taken off his face ma "It's hooked on, sir," he said, "about a fatho below the rudder. The chain was over t forrard upper corner—as chiefy said."

"Well done, you," Murrell said, feeling a words to be inadequate.

A signalman forced his way through t crowd. Murrell took the pad. There were tw signals. The first, from Admiralty, read, "Wi less traffic in your vicinity suggests you ha been sighted by enemy aircraft." The seco was from Wheeler: "Am ready to take tow port cable."

"Reply to Antioch," Murrell said to the s nalman. "'Think we have got to the botto of our trouble, but it will be another h before we are ready to tow.' You'd bet repeat that signal from Admiralty to t Antioch 'for information.'"

It was eleven o'clock before the Hecate w once more ready for the Antioch, and midd when the tanker was again hitched up. then the visibility was so improved that th could see the real horizon.

With the breaking of the cloud layer, t wind had shifted and the change of tow fr the starboard to the port cable of the Anti suited the new conditions. With the shift h come the first pale sunshine they had seen f more than forty-eight hours, but as the baro eter had gone up the thermometer had go down. The wind now was cold enough penetrate the heaviest clothing. It set Murr shivering as he stood at the after end of t bridge, waiting to be relieved by the doctor.

Macmillan, arriving, asked, "How does s go?"

"Not too well," the captain said as he to off the telephone. "That wretched length cable hanging from the starboard bow is m ing her even more cranky than usual. I'll ha to tell Wheeler he must get it in somehow

"In the meantime," Macmillan said, "yo ship is happier with her tow than she w yesterday. I refer, of course, to the men."

"I hadn't noticed it," Murrell said.

"Oh, it's there all right. They are becom just a little proud of her."

Murrell felt too tired, hungry and cold embark with the doctor on one of the disc sions he so loved. "I'm going to write out t signals to Antioch. Then," he said, "ple God, I'll have a sleep until four."

He went into the charthouse and wr down two signals to be passed to the t "As soon as possible you should do yo utmost to get in your starboard cable. I adversely affecting the tow." And, "As s as opportunity permits you should insp your AA armament and arrange to bring much as possible into action if we are tacked. Report results so that I may kn what help I may expect from you. Fire a rounds from all guns for practice after 1 tonight."

When he flung himself on his bunk, his l thoughts before sleep were that the men mig be happier—and he was glad of it—but himself could never be happy when his sl felt so heavy.

There was a knocking on his door. Mur struggled furiously to rid himself of the clo of exhaustion that seemed to smother hi "Come in," he gasped.

A signalman was at his side. "Signal from aircraft, sir." Murrell, propping his shoulders on the pillows, tried to read, but his eyes were blurred with sleep. Then, as the import melted the mists of his brain, the writing became clear: "Have attacked U-boat approximately 20 miles 270° from your position. Enemy was steaming 090° fast. Fear attack did nothing but annoy. He sighted me in time to dive. Have reached prudent limit of endurance and am going home now. See you tomorrow."

"Thank you, Reeves." Murrell handed the pad back. "I suppose he sent that and went."

"Yes, sir. He was going away fast. I was only just able to read the end of the message." Reeves disappeared through the door.

Murrell raised himself purposefully from his bunk. "'See you tomorrow,'" he murmured. "I hope he's right!"

Wheeler and his six men had had a back-breaking morning and Murrell's signal, suggesting that they haul in the starboard cable, had been received with determined but cold resolution. As seamen they could not fault the order—as men they felt that they had had enough.

Arrived on the fo'c'sle, they gazed at the task before them. The cable was so heavy that only when short lengths of rope were passed through the links had they been able to move it at all. And that was yesterday when it had only had to be lifted from the cable locker. Now three hundred feet of it hung down from the bows, and it weighed more than fifty tons.

Fortunately they had found two fourfold tackles, and, arranging these so that one pulled on the fall of the other, they set to work. But it was desperately slow. At the end of two hours they had brought in twenty feet of cable, and they were all worn out. Suddenly Hart began to laugh. He laughed wildly and held his sides until tears ran down his cheeks.

There is always something deeply disturbing about laughter that is out of place. Men have been shot for less—and with reason. Hart's laughter suggested madness, and there was no man there who did not feel his own brain reel. The immediate effect was to make each let go of the rope. Then, to their consternation at the laughter, was added the chagrin of seeing at least a foot of the heavy cable lurch outboard once more.

"Gone balmy," Trotman said, inspecting Hart with tired eyes that were red-rimmed with salt.

Wheeler, feeling the situation slide, tried desperately to place normality in his own voice. "What's so funny, Hart?"

Hart stopped laughing. "Why, if you don't want the ruddy thing, cut it off. There's shackles and shackles left in the locker—and none of it ours!"

The line of men dropped to the deck. None of them spoke. Each was shamed before the others at his lack of common sense. And Wheeler, who knew he had to be the first to recover, was the most affected because he should have seen the obvious solution. He had to say something to pull his silent men together—anything.

"I had an aunt who went on a visit to America," he told them. "She wrote on a post card, 'You'd never believe who I met the other day. I met Cousin Mary. I can't ever tell you what a shock it was. It's too awful. I'm going to forget all about it.'"

"What had she done, sir?" Anders asked.

"That's just the point," Wheeler said. "My aunt was killed in an air crash on the way home, and so we never found out. Whatever Cousin Mary had done was completely hidden. I mean, that's what we all want to do about today's foolishness. Come on—let's cut it off."

When Murrell reached the bridge it was illuminated by the setting sun. The men gathered there appeared like actors on a stage where there are only footlights, their faces had an unreal and paper-thin quality. By contrast, the eyes that followed the captain held the same, and very real, query: "What is he going to do about it?" They all knew of the signal. It had been passed by light from the aircraft, and the signalman had called out each word as it had been received.

Murrell thought that they would all expect him to pull out of the hat some rabbit that would allay their personal fears. But when he felt inside it, the hat seemed to be remarkably empty.

"How's she go?" he asked, coming up behind the doctor.

"Much as usual, sir," Macmillan spoke over his shoulder. Then, "Starboard five. Half ahead together."

Murrell went back to the charthouse. There was something in the hat after all; a nebulous germ that blossomed into a definite idea. "Mr. Graves, has Gray recovered from his bathing party?"

"He ate a good lunch, sir, and got his head down this afternoon."

"Pass the word for him to come to the bridge," Murrell said.

The U-boat would surface again within an hour of the aircraft's departure and be hot on his trail. At the very slow speed of the tow, an alteration of course would be useless unless it was a very large one—almost ninety degrees.

A WOMAN GARDENING

By S. L. HYNES

Over the new-turned earth
Where earliest seedlings are showing.
She bends in a curve of praise
For the tender new things growing;
And each gesture that she makes,
The smallest touch of her hand,
Is a ceremony of love
For spring, and the living land.
And my heart warms, too, although
I will not tell her I love
Her most for the tender way
Her gardening fingers move.

But the tow would probably behave better beam on to the sea, and they might be able to go a little faster. Which way to turn? Or more important: which way would the enemy expect him to turn? He had obviously been sighted either by a patrolling German aircraft or, a worse thought, by another U-boat.

With the chart of Western Approaches to the British Isles before him, Murrell studied the position. The top right-hand corner of the chart showed the Hebrides and at the bottom right-hand corner the headland of Ushant, the German-occupied French headland. It was odds on that when the captain of the U-boat came to decide his own tactics, he would be using an almost exactly similar chart—and Ushant would be "home" to him.

Surely the German would expect him to turn to the northward away from the occupied territory? He thought so. He had to choose one way or the other. He noted, however, that to turn to the south would make no difference to their own air cover. For, though he would be going slightly nearer to Ushant, he would be no farther away from the Irish coast

He had thought thus far when a shadow darkened the doorway of the charthouse. "You wanted me, sir?" It was Gray's voice.

"Yes, indeed." Murrell smiled "Have you recovered from your swimming party? Incidentally, I hope that earns you something that we can have a party to celebrate."

"Quite recovered, sir," Gray said.

"You've heard about the U-boat?"

Gray nodded. "Yes, sir."

"I want to arrange something to draw the enemy away from us."

"You mean a false trail, sir?"

"Yes. Something which will look like a ship, but isn't. A light would do it—just a little light. With no moon and the stars veiled, th night will be as black as the Earl of Hell' riding boots. You'd not see an unlighted shi more than a quarter of a mile away—but th Germans would see a light when they're good six miles off it. I hope they'll waste tim stalking it. Something like a Carley Float wit a lamp on it—as high up as we can get it. I we were to rig a bearing-out spar as a mas on a Carley Float, and put a dan-buoy light o top of the spar, it would be about eightee feet above the water—the height of the port holes in the tanker's stern. I intend to make ninety-degree alteration of course to starboar as soon as, or just before, we slip the contrap tion, so you can arrange to put it into th water with the port torpedo davit. It won weigh much. Do you get the idea?"

"Yes, sir. Indeed I do!"

Murrell, seeing the light in Gray's eyes, de cided that he had been right to choose hir for the preparation of the machine. "Righ Cut along and get the work started. I want ready in an hour."

When Gray had left, Murrell called for th yeoman. He fancied that no good ever cam of withholding vital information from th men, except those secret matters where tal ashore might endanger themselves or the companions. He took the pad that the yeo man gave him and wrote:

"Hecate to Antioch. Aircraft has reporte U-boat presumably chasing us twenty mile astern. Aircraft forced U-boat to dive. Pre sume it will not surface until dark. In orde to reduce chance of interception intend t alter course 90° to starboard at 1700. At th same time launching raft carrying dan-buo light to decoy enemy. If enemy is detecte during night I intend to slip tow and attacl Good night, and keep smiling."

Murrell tore off the signal and handed it t the yeoman. "Get that off while I write a mes sage to the commander in chief."

The next signal was more difficult. "Heca to C. in C., Western Approaches. In view c aircraft's report of U-boat approaching fror westward, intend to alter course at 1700 t the southward during night, resuming m course for Bloody Foreland at daybreak tc morrow. My position at 1700 today will b 54° 18′ N. 19° 45′ W. Am making four knot and hope to maintain this unless weathe deteriorates. Request tomorrow's aircraft b informed."

The first signal was being passed by Signa man Reeves. Murrell could hear the clickety clack of the lamp. He went out onto the ope bridge. "Here you are, yeoman. Have it code up and sent as soon as ready." The captai crossed to join the doctor.

"Sorry, doc, but I'll have to ask you to han on for another hour. I'm going to launch decoy at five, and turn to the southward du ing the night. Are you all right?"

"I wondered what it was that Guns wa making down there," Macmillan said. "Ca do." Then he bent his head to the mouthpiec "Starboard twenty. Slow starboard."

Down below on the long deck, Gray ha already made a start. The bearing-out spa its heel suitably lashed, and with the sma electric light secured to its head, was bein fitted with stays to keep it upright. For som minutes the captain watched the work.

"How would it be to give it a sail?" Murre suggested to Gray. "We could set up th whaler's jib on that stay you've just fitte Then the raft would sail downwind and reall give the light the appearance of moving."

"Don't see why not, sir."

The bag was taken down, the sail taken o and bent on. Once set, it gave promise o pulling so well that it had to be rolled up an lashed until the craft was ready for launchin

"Pity we haven't got a prisoner, sir," Leac ing Seaman Thomas said as he worked. "W could put him aboard and let him sail home."

The suggestion was valueless, but it serve to raise a laugh, and it made Murrell thin out one move more. "You know, Gray, ther is something in Thomas's remark. Not tha I'd put a prisoner aboard—even if we had on But I don't see why we shouldn't help it t sail itself. We might give it a tail—somethin like a kite."

"A couple of jerry cans lashed to the end of two fathom of warp?" Gray suggested.

"Make it six fathom, and fill the cans three quarters full of water so they'll just float."

The captain watched the final preparations, checked over the drill to be adopted in launching the raft, and climbed back to the bridge. "Ready, doc. I'll take her—and thank you for the extra time."

As he strapped the harness on his chest, he wished that he had had more time to think. The doctor had relieved him at half past twelve and it was nearly five o'clock. But during that time he had been able to snatch only one and a half hours' sleep and he had so far never succeeded in having more than two hours consecutively since the towing had started.

He glanced at his watch. He could just make out the figures in the gathering dusk. Five o'clock—1700 hours. The lanyard of the siren hung near his hand. He pulled it sharply. He had better, he thought, indicate to the tow that he was turning, even though they could not steer their own ship.

When he had made the sound signal, he gave the order for the turn. Watching the towing hawser as the Hecate came out to starboard of her tow, he could see the hulky shape begin to follow her round. The Hecate's screws tore purposefully into the waves. The motion, which had been a succession of forward swoops snubbed by the tow, became one in which a sharp roll was the main feature. The men clustered round the decoy struggled backward and forward as the ship lurched. Murrell could see that the davit, normally used for hoisting torpedoes aboard the ship, had now been turned outboard. From its head the raft, carrying its light and its sail, hung over the side.

The little light burned brightly on the top of its spar. In the radiance it cast, he could see Gray directing the launch. Then Gray's face was turned toward the bridge. Murrell motioned downward with his hand. With a splash, the raft hit the water and at once began to drift astern. The sail, a dark smudge against the gray water, filled, and the machine sailed off steadily downwind.

Murrell raised his glasses. The tow was around now. "Port twenty." Astern of the rolling Hecate the tanker wallowed. Already, far distant on the port quarter was the little light of the decoy. At that distance it had the most satisfying resemblance to the light that might be supposed to show from the unshut porthole of a merchantman.

The Antiochs watched the launching of the decoy with interest—all except Hart and Sibson, who had taken themselves off to investigate the stove. They were already promising the others a hot meal by eight o'clock that night. Without electricity, it was impossible to use the oil fire; but when the burner had been removed, they found that the firebox was large enough to burn wood.

Wheeler had had time to inspect the armament. There were four Oerlikon guns—one on each wing of the bridge and one each side of the after superstructure on either side of the funnel. Behind the funnel, on the upper deck, there was a Bofors, and a four-inch gun on the boat deck. More fortunate still, the weapons were in tolerably good condition. With one man to each Oerlikon and two on the Bofors, they could fight five guns, with Wheeler as spare man wherever he should be most wanted. Without electricity they had no method of sounding a general alarm until Pengelley discovered an old-fashioned hand foghorn in the fo'c'sle. Taken to the bridge, this answered the purpose.

Tired out, the Antiochs settled down for their second night, but with the satisfaction that the unknown and unfriendly habitation had, with the provision of hot food, become a ship—their ship.

"Fourteen meters, Herr Kapitän." Braun's incisive voice announced that, after the aircraft's abortive attack an hour before, U-506 had been brought up to a depth where she could use her periscope.

With the subdued hiss of high-pressure air, the big periscope rose from its well. Lachmann grasped the handles as it came within reach and, placing his forehead against the thick rubber pad, pressed his eyes to the eyecups.

"It is dark. Too dark to see if that confounded aircraft is still about—but not dark enough for us to surface."

The periscope hissed softly as it sank down into the well again. Lachmann mopped his face and neck with a scarlet handkerchief.

"Had it not been for that aircraft, we should have been thirty miles nearer the target. It will take us two hours to make up what we have lost. If we surface at half past five, we should be very close to them by seven-thirty. The moon is new and sets early, but with luck we may find some glow from the northern lights."

There was silence in the control room—and very little movement. The minutes ticked by. For the twentieth time Lachmann consulted his watch. "Surface," he ordered.

At eight o'clock that night the doctor came to relieve Murrell. "How is she behaving now?" he asked.

"Different kettle of fish altogether. With the wind on the port beam, I'm nicely sheltered—and the heat of the forward funnel takes the bite out of the wind."

"You make this patch of deck sound like a Lido."

"Well, it's a lot better than the other course. See you at midnight."

Murrell hurried below. Before he snatched at sleep, he had a problem to consider. If, to attack the enemy, he had to slip the tow, how was he to pick it up again?

He had only the one towing hawser; and if he had to disconnect the hawser at his end, how could he connect up again? Somehow that cable had to be buoyed—and buoyed with something that would float well clear of the tanker. The merchantman would be beam on and drifting down sea. Six hundred feet of three-inch manila on the Hecate's end of the hawser, buoyed with something that had little windage but would yet keep it afloat? A Carley Float—or, better still, two Carley Floats lashed one on top of the other; and, let the last twenty fathom of the manila go from the Carley Floats to a dan buoy. That in its turn, having more grip on the water, would lie upwind of the floats, and the line between the two could readily be secured with a grapnel thrown from his ship.

Hastily he drew the sketch of what he wanted. But who was to do it? Thompson had had the dog-watch and must be on deck at four in the morning. Masters was on watch now and Graves had to be up for the middle. It looked like another job for Gray.

But even when he had given Gray these instructions, Murrell was unable to sleep until he knew for certain that, should the radar detect an echo that would send the Hecate off to investigate, he would be able to recover the tow he had slipped. It was ten o'clock before Gray's knock announced the job completed.

Lachmann was eating his supper in the tiny wardroom when the call reached him. In a moment his heavy-booted feet were beating the iron-runged ladder. Braun and a seaman clung to the conning-tower coaming with their elbows. Their arched backs and hands raised to their eyes showed that both peered through glasses.

"Where is it?" Lachmann asked.

"Fine on the port bow!" Braun told him. "Sometimes when she yaws it is right ahead."

"How far away?"

"It is difficult to say, Herr Kapitän. As much as five miles, perhaps. It is a very small light."

"I can't see anything. Ah—I have it. You are right! The destroyer must have left. Otherwise she would certainly have seen that light."

"Or she may be zigzagging ahead," Braun suggested.

"The destroyer may be a fool—but hardly so silly as to stay ahead of a ship traveling downwind as slowly as this one must be."

Sweeping down toward it at fifteen knots, they could see the light more plainly every minute. "I will take her," Lachmann said. "I will go to action stations now, and reduce speed to eight knots."

"You will require the attack table, Herr Kapitän?"

"If, as I think, she is stopped, she will be lying beam on to the sea. I will spread two torpedoes on each side of the light. For the angling, yes—we will use the attack table."

"Jawohl, Herr Kapitän."

As Braun hurried down the hatch to the control room the action alarms filled the ship with raucous sound. The bridge had rung down for slow speed, and the hydrophone operator had been asked if he could hear propeller noises. But even with the diesels running slowly, the noise of the submarine's own propellers had been so great that the hydrophone operator could not be sure. The engines were stopped while another listening watch was made. Braun reported the result into the voice pipe that led to the conning tower. "Absolutely nothing, Herr Kapitän. Nothing."

"Very well. It is as I thought. The tanker is disabled, and the destroyer gone home. Slow ahead both engines. Prepare tubes one to four. Give the target a range of one mile and a length of one hundred thirty meters. Bearing, right ahead; torpedo speed, forty knots; depth five meters."

Gessner at the attack table set the range, bearing and distance on the machine; then threw over the switch that connected it to the angling mechanism of the torpedoes. "Attack table lined up, Herr Kapitän," Gessner reported.

"Tubes one to four ready, Herr Kapitän," Braun reported when, each in its turn, the "ready-to-fire" lights had glowed alight.

In the tense atmosphere in the control room, the quartermaster could be heard muttering to himself. At slow speed it was no easy work to keep the narrow hull steady before the following sea.

"Fire!" Lachmann's voice sounded.

The boat lurched once: "Torpedo running," the hydrophone operator reported. Again: "Torpedo running." A third time: "Torpedo running." The last time: "Torpedo running."

"Tubes one to four fired correctly," Braun reported to Lachmann.

They waited. A minute of anxiety, while rapid calculations were made; another minute of unbelief; a third of incredulity. Surely all four torpedoes could not have missed?

Lachmann's voice came down the voice pipe—high-pitched and strained: "Braun."

"Herr Kapitän?"

"Check all ranges and bearings on the table and then report to me here."

Braun climbed the ladder.

"Well?" Lachmann asked.

"Everything is correctly set, Herr Kapitän."

Lachmann turned to look forward. The light was plainly visible now.

Braun looked at it intently. "Herr Kapitän"—he spoke diffidently—"I think there is something odd about that light."

"What on earth do you mean?"

"Can we not close it carefully?" Braun asked.

"We are doing that, Herr Leutnant."

With glasses raised the two officers studied the light. "It is no ship," Braun remarked.

"Then what is it? It must be a ship." Lachmann sounded distraught.

"It's a decoy," Braun said. "It is—I can see it now—it's a tall slender pole with a light on top."

"You imagine things. I can see nothing." The Kapitän now sounded less certain. In reality he was shivering so much with chagrin, annoyance and mystification that he could hardly hold the binocular to his eyes. Then at last he saw it. He clutched the rail of the conning tower. Four torpedoes. Twenty thousand Reichsmarks apiece. Eighty thousand thrown away on some tomfoolery that a crazy enemy had set in the sea!

The U-boat was overhauling the raft, now plainly visible by its own light, only a few feet from the U-boat's inquiring bow.

Suddenly Braun, who had caught sight of the rope leading from the stern of the raft and the jerry cans it towed, was running aft. His boots clattered and stumbled on the deck. "It's an infernal machine!" he roared. "It's towing a mine!"

Lachmann heard him. "Full astern together," he ordered.

To go astern, diesel engines must be stopped and restarted in the opposite direction. While the men in the engine room sweated to obey the order, U-506 ran on. Her bow cut into the raft. Lachmann flung up his arm to protect his face from an explosion that did not come. The diesels, tearing the water to frenzy in their efforts to stop the boat, began to run astern. As the propellers revolved at full speed in the opposite direction, the U-boat's stern was sucked down. A wave creamed over it and submerged Braun as he clung, gasping, to the rail of the antiaircraft gun. The wave broke into the conning tower, soaked Lachmann to the skin.

When the wave had passed, Braun joined Lachmann. "What now?" he gasped.

"Reload. We must dive to eighty meters and reload the four forward tubes. Then we shall search for the swine, and when I find him ——"

It was midnight before reloading had been completed, and U-506 had once more been brought to the surface. Waiting in the control room, Lachmann had been studying the chart. "If they set off that fool toy, they must have altered course," the Kapitän said. "And they are sure to have altered to the northward. They would never have chosen a course that would take them nearer our own coast. Therefore we shall search along this line and along that—and then this."

Murrell, Gray and the Hecates could hardly have expected more for their money.

The following dawn was high and clear with only a few cumulus clouds in the sky. But the surface wind was just as strong. At half past seven Murrell altered the course to the eastward again. At eight o'clock the doctor came up.

Miss FLUFFY RICE says:

"EASY, DELICIOUS! VERSATILE, NUTRITIOUS!

RICE IS YOUR MOST USEFUL FOOD!"

PLAIN OR FANCY—RICE IS SO GOOD. The eating's wonderful with America's good rice! For instance, Heavenly Rice Fluff: Prepare 1 pkg. lemon-flavored gelatin; when partially set, beat until frothy. Whip ½ pt. heavy cream, add ⅔ cup sugar. Fold into gelatin with 4 cups chilled cooked rice and grated rind of 1 lemon. Mold; chill until set. Serve with raspberries. Serves 6 to 8.

RICE IS SUCH A HELP FOR VARIED MEALS. At breakfast, lunch or dinner—for main course or dessert—there's nothing so versatile as rice. Try it in Ham Roll-Ups: Sauté ½ c. each minced green pepper and onion in 2 T. butter for 5 minutes. Mix with 4 cups of hot cooked rice (cook in chicken consommé instead of water). Spread 6 slices of boiled ham with mustard; spoon on rice; roll. Bake, open side down, in a low pan in a 400° oven for 15 minutes.

RICE IS EASY! Today's high quality rice is a breeze to fix—just follow directions on the package. Grown in the USA, the rice you get now is so carefully prepared you don't even have to wash it. Awfully good idea: heat frozen shrimp soup (undiluted) and pour over hot cooked rice.

"She was much better behaved before," Murrell told him. "She's trying to wander all over the ocean. You've got to watch her the whole time."

"At least we'll be four miles nearer home for each hour's work," Macmillan said.

"It's a point," Murrell agreed. "You ready to take over?"

"Yes. I'll take her."

Murrell unbuckled the chest pad and telephone. Last night he had deceived and evaded the U-boat. He was sure that this morning a number of very angry Herrenvolk would be gunning for him—and the excellent visibility would give them every chance to find their target.

"Aircraft red five-oh." The port lookout's voice reached the captain. "Low down. Just under that cloud," the report was amplified.

There was no mistaking the long sharklike silhouette. "Focke-Wulf reconnaissance plane," Murrell said. "We're spotted. Duty watch stand by guns. I won't go to action stations because in this visibility I don't think he'll attack."

"Radar reports range sixteen thousand, sir," Thompson informed him.

"Out of range," Murrell said. "He'll just fly round and annoy us. I only hope he doesn't shoot down our Sunderland."

The men on the heaving bridge watched the slim pencil that slid so smoothly under the flat base of the cloud. Never deviating from its course, it winged on southward and Murrell knew that his present position would be reported to the U-boat.

The German had only just been lost to sight when another aircraft was sighted. It was coming straight toward them out of the east. The heavy body beneath the straight wing confirmed it was their Sunderland. A signal lamp started to blink from its white-painted side.

"Good morning. I am pleased to see you," it announced.

"Reply: 'Not half as pleased as I am,'" the captain said.

"Have you any orders?" the aircraft asked.

The signal had already been written and the yeoman commenced the reply at once: "Anticipate our friend of last night will try to attack. Please patrol round us, radius four miles. Look out for periscope."

Now that any underwater attacker would have to face the vigilance of the big flying boat, Murrell felt happier. A really skillful and determined captain could attack him at any time, day or night, but the average U-boat commander was a night bird by disposition and by training. Murrell fancied that the coming night, the third of the tow, would introduce him to the U-boat and its commander.

The navigator climbed the ladder to the bridge.

"Did you get your morning stars?" the captain asked.

"Yes, sir. Two hundred and fifty miles to Bloody Foreland."

"We're getting on," Murrell said. "I'll earn my tugmaster's certificate yet. Any news of that anticyclone?"

"It's intensifying, sir, and stretches from the British Isles to the Baltic."

"We'll probably get a period of bad visibility on the outside edge. I must say that, just at the moment, I could do with a day of low visibility and murk."

Lachmann had spent an unprofitable and sleepless night, and the dawn, which brought such good visibility, showed him a sea that was completely empty. To his angry mind, the clarity of the weather was an added insult—as if the perfect conditions mocked his inability to make use of them.

He was loath to search the southern arc of the probable area in which his quarry lay. To do so was to admit to Braun that he had been wrong on the previous night. But there was no help for it. It was now certain that the merchantman and destroyer had not turned north. Even so, he had not assumed that the British ships would make such a large alteration of course. Had it not been for the Focke-Wulf, it is probable that he would never have found them.

At nine o'clock the German U-Boat Control started their morning transmission of signals, and among them was one for U-506.

"At 0805 this morning aircraft reports damaged tanker towed by destroyer in position 54° 15′ N. 19° 30′ W. Course 085° speed 4 knots. No other surface escort observed. You are to close and sink this easy target forthwith."

The Kapitän winced as he read it. U-Boat Command were laying the whip across his shoulders! He consoled himself with the thought that within the next twenty-four hours he would sink both ships.

Standing by his bunk, Lachmann beat the hard edge of the bunkboard with his fist. "I've got to sink them. I'm going to sink them." Catching sight of Magda's letter, he crumpled it and tossed it to the floor. He couldn't even fix his thoughts on home.

He brushed his hand across his forehead. Then, pulling himself together, he parted the curtains and went out to the control room to plot a course that would lead him to the enemy. The course when laid off proved to be 202° and the distance forty-five miles. It would take him three hours to go the full distance, but, as he might reasonably expect to sight the surface ships fifteen miles away, he hoped to see them at about eleven o'clock. Leaving orders that he was to be called at half past ten, he lay down to take what little rest he could.

"I must be at the dangerous age—whatever I want to do, either I'm too young or I'm old enough to know better."

His deductions had been accurate. At ten minutes to eleven the masts and funnels of both the destroyer and the merchantman were in sight. But either his own aircraft had not seen the big flying boat, or it may have arrived after the reconnaissance plane had left. The aircraft was a very bad thing indeed. Its presence turned what should have been a simple target into one almost impossible of approach during daylight hours. He was angered still more by the knowledge that the admiral ashore would not know of this extra hazard he had to face.

U-506 slunk once more into the protecting depths. At one o'clock she saw with relief that the Sunderland was going away, and watched with satisfaction the signaling between ship and plane. She was so intent on this transaction that she omitted to carry out her routine sweep for other dangers. When at last Lachmann swung the periscope round he found himself looking at the pendulous body, straight wings and four roaring propellers of the fresh Sunderland which had, unnoticed by him, relieved the other. The U-boat only just got down to a safe depth in time.

With the coming of the relief aircraft, it was obvious to Lachmann that he would have to wait until dark to make his attack.

As the Antioch managed a heavier roll than usual, Wheeler stumped down the ladder to go forward to have another look at the towing cable. Halfway down, he discovered that he had left his scarf behind. He climbed back and opened the wheelhouse door.

Sibson stood between him and the light from the far side. He was showing Pengelley something in a slim leather box. Sibson, surprised, had to make two movements with his hand: one to close the box, and the next to slip it into the pocket of his duffel coat. But Wheeler had seen the wrist watch. There was no doubt that Sibson had been rifling the cabins. The realization was a blow to the pit of his stomach.

Hastily taking his scarf from the hook, he went out onto the bridge. By ignoring the whole thing he could keep his men together until the tow was finished. But to overlook theft was not really possible. The problem had become a challenge to himself. He wondered how Murrell would have faced the situation. It was quite certain that if he had put the question to the Hecate's captain, Murrell would have said, "Go in and tackle the lot."

It was time for the men to gather in the wheelhouse for their dinner. He watched Hart stumble forward, bearing a huge mess tin covered with a cloth. Wheeler could smell the unmistakable odor of macaroni cheese. All the men were inside except White, who was keeping watch on the weather wing of the bridge.

Wheeler thought, It's now or never. He called to White, "Come inside for a moment. I want to talk to the lot of you."

He held the door for the signalman, followed him in and shut it. There was a pleasant haze of tobacco smoke, and a wonderful smell of hot food from the big mess tin.

"I want to speak to you all. There's something very serious to be said." The men, caught unawares, faced him. "I know that one man has been pilfering the cabins." Wheeler paused to let the words sink in.

Sibson had half turned away. His shoulders, hunched, suggested truculence. Pengelley looked down at his feet. The pause had gone on longer than Wheeler expected. But he felt the breaking power of silence at work. He thought he could afford to wait.

Sibson himself broke it. "So what? So I took a watch—and why not? If we was doing this in peacetime, we'd get salvage money—thousands o' quid apiece. Findings is keepings, ain't they?" He turned to the others with a gesture that assumed their support.

The atmosphere was tense. Some of the men were on Sibson's side. Wheeler could feel it.

Help came from an unexpected quarter. "No, Sibby," Trotman said, "you done us all wrong. Thieving at sea won't never bring you luck—and you know it."

The suggestion that fate might not be blind—worse still, that retribution might follow wrongdoing—struck hard on men living in momentary fear of a dreadful death. Wheeler saw that the appeal to ineradicable magic had had more effect than anything he could have said.

"Ooh," Anders said. "He can't do that—that's stealing."

There was a burst of laughter, and with that Sibson's support vanished.

Wheeler crossed to Sibson. "I'll take care of it," he said and held out his hand.

For a moment Sibson hesitated. Then his hand went to his pocket. "O.K., you win," he said.

"Like the cable—not to be mentioned again," Wheeler said. "Now let's have our dinner before it gets cold."

Since eleven o'clock that morning Murrell had felt sure that a U-boat had joined the party. It was a particularly nasty sensation, for, however efficient the U-boat might believe the destroyer's asdic to be, he knew that there was a large arc astern where, because of the disturbance caused by her own propellers and by the Antioch, the machine could not detect the enemy.

Normally this arc would have been covered in the process of zigzagging. But on a steady

Peach Cream Salad . . . tree-ripened

Del Monte Peaches make it sunny as summer itself

You'll find the easiest way to make any salad or dessert come aglow is to give it the golden good looks and mellow good taste of DEL MONTE Cling Peaches.

Tree-ripening is one big reason for that happy DEL MONTE difference. We give Nature all the time she needs to produce the lovely color, rich flavor and mellow texture that have made DEL MONTE the world's best-liked brand of peaches for so long.

So whether you serve them plain . . . or use them to dress up other foods . . . you're sure of your peaches every time you choose the famous DEL MONTE Brand.

PEACH CREAM SALAD

- 2 packages (3-oz. size) pineapple or lemon-flavored gelatin
- 1½ cups boiling water
- 1 tablespoon lemon juice
- 1 No. 2½ can (1 lb. 13 oz.) DEL MONTE Sliced Cling Peaches, drained
- 1 cup syrup from peaches
- 2 packages (3-oz. size) cream cheese, softened
- ½ cup mayonnaise
- ½ cup heavy cream, whipped
- Salad greens

Dissolve gelatin in boiling water; stir in lemon juice. Mix 1 cup of the dissolved gelatin (saving rest to mix with cheese and mayonnaise later) with 1 cup syrup; cool till syrupy and pour ¼-in. depth into 2 qt. mold. In it arrange about 15 of the drained peach slices; chill till set. Pour in remaining gelatin-syrup mixture. Chill. Mix cheese with mayonnaise. Dice remaining peaches; stir into cheese mixture with reserved gelatin. Fold in whipped cream. Spoon over set mixture in mold. Chill till firm. Unmold on greens. Serves 8 to 10.

course he was vulnerable all the time from astern. The U-boat had only to attack to make certain of a kill. Murrell's only hope was that the opposing captain would not realize this.

The doctor, coming to relieve the captain and asking his usual, "How is she?" received the answer, "Bloody."

Murrell went down to his cabin, deeply vexed by his own ill humor. Just as he was finishing lunch came the signal from the relief aircraft, "U-boat at periscope depth four miles 350° from you." In the circumstances there could be no sleep for him that afternoon—nor, for that matter, for any of the Hecates.

At four o'clock he made a signal to the Antioch: "Anticipate enemy will attack tonight. Intend to slip tow as soon as he is detected. Don't worry, only two hundred more miles." He had the signal passed by semaphore. A lamp could have been read by the U-boat if he happened to have his periscope up.

During the afternoon the wind had eased. The cumulus clouds of the morning had gone but a thin gray film had crept over the sky from the east. With the coming of darkness their aircraft left them.

Murrell had sent for the petty officer radar mechanic, and explained the position. "Within the next four hours the U-boat that has been chasing us will attack," he said. "As soon as you can get him on the radar, I shall slip the tow and go after him. I'd rather go to a false alarm than have him surface and sink the Antioch before I can get at him. So, for heaven's sake, report everything. We'll have little time to spare."

With that, and the loading of star shells into the guns, Murrell felt that everything had been done that could be anticipated. On the way to the bridge he went into the wireless office. "Lawrence, connect up the intercom for me, will you, please." Then he went up to the bridge. "I'll take her in a minute. I just want to talk to the men on the intercom," he said to the doctor.

"Hecates"—he spoke into the mouthpiece—"you're all waiting—so you might as well go to your action stations. Take plenty of warm clothing. I'll sound the alarm gong as usual when I want you to stand to—but if you're ready, we'll save a few minutes."

Waiting for the other side to open the battle was not a pleasant pastime. At the moment the initiative lay entirely with the U-boat.

Lachmann brought U-506 to the surface with deliberation. From where he had chosen to surface, four thousand meters on the starboard bow of the target, he could see the long bulk of the tanker plainly and make out with only a little strain the slighter form of the destroyer. In the prevailing conditions of light there was no chance of his being seen at that range, and so no need to keep the boat running at reduced buoyancy.

He was in no hurry. He had the whole night before him. This time his opponent was a sitting duck. In fact, the target was a brace of ducks. The destroyer added to the tanker would surely appease the admiral.

Leaning over the side of the conning tower, his glasses fixed on the tanker, he tried to estimate her length. One hundred and thirty meters, and the tow line as much again—or possibly a little more; say one hundred and sixty meters. The destroyer one hundred and ten meters. She did not look it, but the target she made for the underwater weapons was almost as big as that of the tanker itself. In the improving condition of the sea, he intended to set the torpedoes to a shallow depth in the case of both ships. Two torpedoes would be angled to hit each vessel.

But first he would move in closer to the target. There was no need to stay out at four thousand meters. He could make a certainty of the job by shortening the range by half.

Clattering feet on the ladder that led from the control room below brought an engine-room artificer to the conning tower. He saluted Lachmann. "Herr Kapitän, the engineer requires a tin of hydraulic oil from the casing locker. I request permission to get it."

"If you must," Lachmann grumbled. He would tell the engineer what he thought of him for not obtaining all the necessary stores before they had dived in the morning.

The man swung himself down to the deck and made his way aft. There he raised a heavy cover that was let into the wooden deck planking. Below was a locker, open to the sea, where imperishable stores could be carried. The drums were securely lashed and Voss glanced rather dubiously at the conning tower before he clambered into the locker to undo the fastenings of the drum he had been sent to fetch.

Lachmann passed the information that he had gained of their targets down the voice pipe to Gessner at the attack table.

Murrell, after hanging round the bridge for an hour, had tried the seclusion of his cabin. But even here he could find no relief from the agony of waiting. Finally he moved to that position where the first news of the enemy's presence would be known—the radar office.

In the close air of the dark and ill-ventilated radar office Murrell stood behind the operator. The petty officer slowly spun the wheel that sent the searching beam round and round. A radar mechanic sat beside him. The eerie green light from the set was reflected on the faces of the three men. Too weak to penetrate the shadows, it lay like varnish on the facial planes.

"There! What's that?" the captain said.

The beam of the set wavered and then swung back. It passed beyond the tiny spot of brighter fluorescence; retraced its path, then hovered over it. The spot grew in intensity. Its outlines hardened.

"Bearing green four-eight. Range oh-four-oh." The operator spoke with maddening slowness. Aware of the importance, he was making doubly sure of each figure.

Murrell had to fight hard to restrain his voice. "What do you make of it?" he asked.

"Could be, sir." The man was noncommittal. With his captain there he could not be expected to take the responsibility of making a definite classification.

With a shock Murrell realized this. Calling instinct to his aid, he recognized in the bright little spot his enemy. He called up the voice pipe to the bridge: "Captain here. Slip the tow. As soon as she's free, steer one-one-three degrees at full speed. I'm coming up now."

It took Lachmann some time to deal with Voss, and to give the details of the targets to Gessner. Four minutes passed before he was free to look at the tanker. At the reduced range, she was easier to see. She was a big modern vessel—a really worth-while victim. He swung his binocular slowly toward the destroyer's position. His heart beat furiously.

There was no need for the glasses to see the destroyer. He roared "Full ahead" down the voice pipe, and turned to look again at the horror that bore down on him. There was no time, no opportunity to wonder how it had happened. She was less than five hundred meters away, and traveling so fast that, as she rolled to windward, the bow wave was massed in an arch of foam that rose higher than the tearing bows.

Then U-506 was leaping ahead herself. By instinct Lachmann turned his stern toward the enemy. Moving twice as fast as the submarine, the destroyer was closing rapidly. He thought he could even hear the roar of her bow wave.

The enemy was dead astern—one hundred meters. With voice surprisingly calm he ordered the wheel hard aport, and, having closed the voice-pipe vent, his finger pressed the button that set the klaxon roaring. Then he stepped calmly into the hatch and went down, knowing that the turning circle of his own boat was so much smaller than the destroyer's that she could not possibly carry out her intention to ram. He was thankful he had not lost his nerve. He turned the wheel that locked the hatch and dropped lightly to the deck of the control room.

The boat's bow was depressed steeply. The clatter of the diesels had been replaced by the whir of the electric motors. For the moment the dive was, except for the corkscrew motion, just like any other emergency dive that U-506 had made in her two years of life.

"Hard aport." Murrell's command could be heard by all on the bridge.

The Hecate lay over sharply as her rudder bit deep into the sea, and Murrell had to grip the binnacle to prevent his being catapulted from the platform. Men went slithering and falling on the wet decks, while, in an effort to see the ram take place, they tried to recover their footing.

But Murrell knew that the U-boat would not be rammed, and that all he had achieved had been to wrest the initiative from the enemy's grasp. With the U-boat a fugitive below the surface, it was an advantage that he hoped to retain.

Sliding sideward into the waves that broke clean across her low deck, the destroyer turned desperately.

"Half ahead both. One-five-oh revolutions. Steer oh-three-oh. Lower the asdic. Start transmissions. Search the port side." The orders rolled mechanically from Murrell's tongue.

"Quarter-deck reports a man in the water, sir. They've dropped a flare." The yeoman had answered the telephone.

"What a time to fall overboard! I can't possibly stop for him now," the captain exclaimed.

"Not one of ours, sir," the yeoman told him. "Some joker must 'a' got left behind when she dived."

"Oh, well, that's different. Not that I'm hardhearted, but he can wait until we've finished with his pals."

"Echo bearing red eight-five. Submarine. Range six hundred." Graves' voice rose from the voice pipe that led to the asdic hut.

"Thank you, Graves. Are you ready to attack?"

"Ready to attack, sir."

Turning to port, the destroyer had now changed places with her adversary. At reduced speed she stalked sedately over the waves in quest of her prey.

U-506 after her scrambled dive had some difficulty in regaining trim. She twisted and turned like a porpoise below the water, while her well-drilled crew fought for a control that they never quite lost. Within five minutes she had settled down to a steady course eighty meters below the surface. Looking round him, Lachmann, until he remembered Voss, was well satisfied at his escape. That memory was not so good, even though every man in the boat knew that the same fate could overtake any of them in an emergency. In Lachmann's own mind the sense of blame was brought by the fact that, in the excitement of evading the destroyer, he had truly forgotten the unfortunate man.

"Destroyer approaching starboard beam," the voice pipe from the hydrophone cabinet announced.

Lachmann decided to turn away under full helm. Even when he was below the water, he could still turn more quickly than the destroyer. The steady beat of the destroyer's propellers was heard plainly, but the sensation of his boat turning under helm was satisfying, and presently the propellers were heard to pass down the starboard side. Depth charges began to explode, but, although they shook the submarine and some lamps were broken, they were too far away to do any material damage.

Twice Lachmann had escaped the destroyer by making use of his maneuverability. He was confident that he could keep it up. Down the voice pipe he said, "Tell me when the destroyer turns, and then at once give me a bearing."

"Jawohl, Herr Kapitän."

They waited in strained silence: forty men in a steel shell that was suspended in the sea; held there by delicate machinery controlled by their own nerves.

The engineer appeared in the doorway. He was excited. "Herr Kapitän. Herr Kapitän!"

"Yes?"

"Voss!" the engineer accused.

"He has been unfortunate," the captain told him.

"You mean ——" the engineer said.

Lachmann nodded. "It was his own fault. You know ——"

"Destroyer approaching starboard beam," the voice pipe announced, "bearing green eight-five to green nine-oh."

But Lachmann was busy defending himself. You know the orders!"

"Of course, Herr Kapitän, I know the orders, and I know too that it is something which very rarely happens!" The engineer spoke with bitter anger.

"Are you challenging my judgment?" Lachmann's voice rose as anger answered anger.

Braun touched the captain's sleeve. "Herr Kapitän. The destroyer!" he said.

"What! Why has it not been reported?" Lachmann spun round.

"It was, Herr Kapitän," Braun said defensively.

"What was the report?"

"Starboard beam."

"Hard aport."

The dead silence in the control room was broken by the steady thrumming beat that all could hear. As a train passes over an iron bridge, the confident propellers swept over them.

They waited, and while they waited the ten heavy canisters sank down toward them.

The ten depth charges began to explode: not all together, but in pairs. The stricken boat was flung backward and forward, from side to side, and up and down, by the successive pressure waves. For one mad moment her bow reared, and then hung down—the angle increasing all the time. Every light bulb had been smashed and only the dim glow of the emergency lighting enabled the terror-stricken men to see their equally horrified companions. Even when the dreadful explosions had ceased, the boat, as high-pressure air escaped from broken pipes and great bubbles rose from her torn flanks, still went on shivering.

To save himself from falling, Lachmann had seized the ladder that led to the conning tower. But now, as her bow dipped, his feet lost their grip. Men and gear fell forward and ended in a heap against the forward bulkhead. One or two, because they could not help themselves, went on through the doorway.

From forward came a dreadful hissing as air water entered the batteries. The water was rising: coming up into the control room through the door to which Lachmann's own feet pointed. It was foul and bubbling water that made the hanging man cough and retch. He felt the wetness at his feet, and round his middle.

Then, mercifully, the sides of the boat collapsed, for she had already long since passed the depth to which a submarine may safely dive.

"Breaking-up noises." Graves' voice came from the asdic hut.

"What was that attack like?" the captain asked the navigator, who was down below on the plot.

"Copybook, sir! That time I don't think we knew it was coming. He never altered course."

Slowly the Hecate nosed her way over the position. There was a strong smell of diesel oil, and bubbles rose steadily to the surface.

"Let's go and see if our lucky lad's still there," Murrell said. "We can't be very far away."

They found Voss. Leading Seaman Thomas brought the news from the quarter-deck.

"Doctor, you can speak German, can't you? Will you go below and find out what you can? I want to know the U-boat's number. Then try and find out if there are any more of its pals about—and anything else you can think of. Take the bridge messenger down with you and send him back with the number."

The captain watched the doctor move toward the ladder. Reaction from excitement set in, and tiredness and the increasing cold overwhelmed him like a wave. "Half ahead together, one-two-oh revolutions. Coxswain. Pipe 'Secure' and 'Both watches lay aft to recover tow.' Yeoman, make to Antioch by blue light, 'U-boat sunk. One survivor. I am going to attempt to recover tow now.' When you've sent that, bring me a pad and I'll make a signal to the commander in chief."

Murrell wrote out the signal: "C in C Western Approaches from Hecate. Have sunk U-506 in position 54° 30′ N. 18° 05′ W. One survivor. Am recovering tow."

Slowly and carefully Murrell took the Hecate stern first toward the bow of the Antioch. One hour and ten minutes later the tow was under way again.

Dawn of the fourth day of their ordeal came slowly and brought an intensification of the already hard horizon. They had lost the advantage of the strong westerly wind which had hurried them home, but they had the better behavior of the Antioch in the calmer sea to set against its loss. They had in the last twenty-four hours made by dead reckoning another hundred and two miles, and were left with only one hundred and eight to go.

In the weather conditions that morning a sighting between aircraft and ships would be made at a very great distance. The Focke-Wulf came especially to inspect them. Watching the German plane, Murrell spoke over his shoulder to the doctor: "This morning it has a surprised and worried look."

"He's much closer today than he was yesterday," Macmillan agreed. "Probably he can't believe his eyes."

The yeoman, with a pad in his hand, came to the two officers. Murrell, taking the signals, glanced at the top one. "The commander in chief compliments us on the way we take advantage of our opportunities," he told the doctor. "Yeoman, you can put a copy of that signal on the ship's notice board."

"There's another signal, sir," Willis said.

Murrell turned the page. "Good heavens! Northern Belle and Bromwich Town."

"What about them?" Macmillan asked.

"A couple of antisubmarine trawlers being sailed today as close escort. They should be with us about dawn tomorrow. And the salvage tug Ocean Queen sailing tomorrow. Things are happening at last!" Murrell paused and went on: "Queer thing—I'll be glad to see the trawlers, but I'm not so sure about the tug. I'd hate to lose the cow; maybe I'd not feel like handing her over to anyone else!"

"You will," the doctor said. "I bet you!"

The captain glanced round the horizon. "That plane's going away!" he said. "I wonder what he's going to tell his pals back home—and wouldn't I love to be in the staff office at Lorient when his report comes in!"

Masters brought the decoded weather chart.

"What's it like today?"

"Not so bad, sir. At least from our point of view. The anticyclone over Europe is intensifying nicely, and creeping out into the Atlantic."

Murrell beat his arms across his body. "It's brought some Russian cold with it."

"We may run into a belt of snow," Masters said.

"However much I hate the stuff, at least it will hide us," Murrell told them. "I feel dreadfully naked in this visibility—not that I think we're really in need of shelter."

The doctor said, "Our friend the Antioch is towing rather nicely."

"Well, she's all yours," Murrell said as he took himself out of the cutting wind.

It was only ten minutes past eight when he reached his cabin. Kirby had not yet brought his breakfast. Still muffled, he stood by the radiator and looked out the little scuttle. The most distant object he could see through the glass was the bulk of the Antioch.

Murrell watched a drop of water as it spiraled down one of the wire stays of the foremast. The drop stopped. Its stopping fixed his attention. It had no apparent reason to stop, and every reason why, with the help of the ship's vibration, it should have continued its journey. He moved closer to the scuttle and rubbed the glass. He heard Kirby come into the cabin. "Was there any ice on the iron deck?" he asked without turning his head.

"Not on the deck yet, sir—but it's forming on the stanchions and guardrails."

"I feared so." Murrell sat down to his meal.

"I'm afraid I slipped and lost your first breakfast—that's why I'm late, sir. "

Murrell was becoming very tired, too tired even to express sympathy with his steward. This morning he really would break with routine and get his head down for a sleep. He was too tired even to finish the meal that Kirby had brought. He did not want to offend Kirby. He went out into the cross passage and opened the sliding door to the signal deck. There was no one in sight. He flung the food overboard, went back to his cabin, and in spite of the ten minutes it took for the soreness in his eyes to subside, he was asleep when his steward came again for the emptied plate.

On the Hecate's bridge the doctor was bitterly cold. The wind had settled down to a steady stream of air flowing out of the high-pressure system to the east. It stung the eyes, froze the fingers; it cracked men's lips and made their eyes sore. It drew the moisture out of everything that had been wet. The signal halyards, like the bough of a winter tree, crackled and whispered, and tiny crystals of salt formed on the bridge windscreens where the spray was dried to brine.

Steaming straight into the wind's eye, the ship was remarkably steady. The towrope led straight to the bluff-bowed Antioch, following dutifully in her wake. The sky to the north and east darkened until, as it reached over them, it was like the mouth of a great cave.

"We'll be as easily seen as specks on a mirror," Macmillan observed to Masters, who happened to pass him. "My word, it's cold!"

"It's going to snow," Masters said. "It may be warmer when it does."

"It'll cut visibility to nearly nothing. How are we going to tow then?"

"It will be here soon. There's the edge of it, not more than a couple of miles away. Do you think we ought to call the captain?"

"'Deed and I don't know," the doctor said. "I'd rather let him sleep—speaking as a doctor."

"But it is his responsibility," Masters reminded him.

Macmillan looked unhappy; he rubbed his cold pipe on his cold nose and left a coal-black smear. He saw that the navigator wanted the captain to be called because then he, Masters, would feel safer. Come to think of it, he too would like to feel the captain's authority by his side. "I suppose so," he said.

"I'll go and call him." Masters, having obtained agreement, was in a hurry.

Murrell thought that the fog in his brain solidified and filled his mouth. It stuck to his tongue and he knew it had to be swallowed if consciousness were to be regained. It was a sensation of near panic. He rolled angrily on his bunk and his throat worked in time with the noise in his ears. The knocking on his door was repeated. "Come in," he croaked.

"There's a snowstorm coming up," Masters told him.

"Snow?" Murrell whispered. "Snow?"

"We won't be able to see the tow from the bridge, sir. The doctor and I, we thought we'd better call you."

"Of course," Murrell said. He struggled to a sitting position and slid his trousered legs over the bunk's side.

Masters felt it kinder to leave Murrell to recover from sleep alone. He thought the captain looked tired and far from well.

"I'll be up in a minute," Murrell called after the navigator. He stood up and dragged the duffel coat over his arms.

At first only a few feathery flakes came wistfully down. Then, all at once, the storm was on them. Drifting like the dead leaves of autumn, the flakes fell slantwise into the sea, which swallowed them up as if they had never been.

The flakes mantled the ships with white. They settled on gun barrels, and on the bridge drifted with satanic glee into corners where no storm had ever carried water. The chart in the charthouse was reduced to pulp, and the yeoman to fury when he found his spare pads were soaked. Unbelievably lovely the Hecate may have looked, but neither could she see herself nor could her captain see the Antioch.

So the snow brought a new problem. The stern of their ship was six hundred feet from the bow of the tow. Their own bridge was a further two hundred feet away. This last, they discovered, made all the difference between seeing the Antioch dimly and not seeing her at all. Murrell and the doctor had to make a hurried journey to the stern of the destroyer and do their tugmastering from the open shelter behind the after house.

A telephone led from there to the bridge, and helm and speed orders could be passed to the officer of the watch. But the change of position produced a problem. For the last four days they had trained themselves to counteract the swing and adjust the pull that one ship had on the other. To do this they had taught their eyes to use the two-hundred-foot-long sighting bar of their own ship, and to judge by the way she swung what orders they should give to counteract the pull.

Now, they had lost their sighting bar. What they had learned to achieve with comparative ease from the bridge was much more difficult from their new position.

The captain and doctor ate their lunch standing in the corner of the shelter. The two had been together since eleven o'clock, experimenting with ways to manage the tow: an interest so absorbing that they had come to consider the art of towing as the main part of their enterprise. It was as a disturbance that they regarded the signalman who came padding along the snow-covered deck. The captain read the signal aloud.

"C. in C. Western Approaches to Hecate. Trawlers and Ocean Queen sailing from Londonderry ten today. Hecate is to signal rendezvous to ships concerned."

The captain tapped the thin paper with his gloved finger. "You'll observe, doc, that there's a catch in it."

"Meaning?" Macmillan queried.

"That if they are sailing from Londonderry at ten o'clock this morning, they are going to meet up with us about dusk tonight; that there's a very strong tide runs backward and forward along the north coast of Ireland; that, as we're going, we'll pick up the tide off Bloody Foreland with two hours to spare and carry it all the way to Rathlin Island; that if, for some reason, we miss that flood tide we'll make no progress toward land for six hours; that it may well take an ocean tug all that time to get rid of the lash-up that we are towing with and get her own men and wires aboard; that the tug won't try doing so in the dark. In fact, my friend, any alteration to present circumstances that delays us more than two hours is going to mean that the Antioch will be another day at sea."

"She's floating well enough," the doctor remarked.

"She may be at the moment," Murrell answered. "But don't forget the enemy. I bet there's a very angry admiral in Lorient."

At two o'clock they ran out of the snow as suddenly as they had entered it.

In the pale sunshine of a winter's afternoon the ships looked unreal and insubstantial. Delicately fragile, they seemed to be made of ice. Seeing them so ethereal, the doctor, halfway through his watch and tired beyond belief, felt himself a phantom man. Murrell had gone to his cabin.

Macmillan left the after house and went back to the bridge. Gray was on watch and Masters about the bridge. The navigator brought him a cup of cocoa.

A signalman came out on the bridge. Masters called, "I'll take it." The man brought him the paper. Together doctor and navigator read the message which was prefixed "Most immediate." It read: "Enemy aircraft are being 'homed' on to you. You should anticipate air attack between now and sunset."

The sun was already sinking. Since the snow the sea had been the green of old jade, but as the sun sank it became gray once more.

"I think I'd better take it down to him," Masters said.

"It seems a pity. I suppose we can't just go to action stations and hope he doesn't wake up?" the doctor suggested.

"It wouldn't be fair to him, doc."

"You're right." Macmillan sighed. "You'd better tell him."

Masters shook the captain's arm—then his shoulder. "Captain, sir. Captain." Murrell's head turned as his body was moved, but his breathing remained deep and regular. "Captain, sir, captain!" Masters had not previously met the druglike sleep of utter exhaustion and found the experience as unnerving as if he had come across his captain's dead body. "Please, sir." But there was no answer. And then quite suddenly Murrell sat up. His eyes opened.

"Signal from admiralty. Most immediate. Enemy aircraft are being homed on to you. You should anticipate air attack between now and sunset." Masters, holding the message for Murrell to read, was surprised that the captain neither read it for himself nor showed any emotion.

But Murrell's next words satisfied him. "Go to action stations at once. Pass that signal to Antioch for information and tell Wheeler to man his guns. I'll be up directly."

Masters hurried from the cabin. He was not too old to anticipate the thrill of pressing the alarm button himself; of the chance to trigger off the chain reaction that would turn the destroyer into a fighting weapon.

Murrell sat on in his bunk. Slowly his head fell forward. His shoulders sagged. He went on sleeping because he had never waked up. It was his subconscious mind that had answered Masters' call with the correct solution. The Hecate's captain did not even hear the racket of his ship preparing for action. He slept.

With the sinking of the U-boat, the men of the Antioch had experienced the same lightening of tension that had refreshed the Hecates. And because they were afloat in what was the main target, their sense of relief was even more intense. The Antioch's men were not short of sleep, and Wheeler had no idea of the tiredness that overwhelmed Murrell. To Wheeler, the destroyer was identified with her captain. He had watched her maneuver with precision and seen her attack with daring. It never occurred to him that her captain might have less strength than the steel of his ship.

In the afternoon Wheeler was reading a book he had found aboard. His back was propped against pillows and his legs were thrust out along his mattress. White was on watch. Sibson and Anders were playing draughts, while Pengelley cleaned and filled the oil lamps ready for the night. The air was cozily warm, and if the place was overfull of tobacco smoke, at least it had acquired the lived-in aspect of a home.

Pengelley, bearing a lamp in his hand, moved across to the starboard side to catch the better light. Sibson lay on his belly with his face close against the draughtboard.

Into this scene White burst through the door. "What is it, man?" Wheeler asked.

"Signal, sir. Most immediate: we're to expect air attack between now and sunset. Another from Hecate, sir: you're to man the guns aboard here."

The news was a tight band of strain drawn round every head of those who heard it. Pengelley, stepping back, trod on the draughtboard.

"Can't you control those flipping feet of yours, you silly Cornish swab?" Sibson said.

Pengelley said, "Don't you call me names, you big lump of dirt."

Sibson sprang to his feet.

Wheeler shouted, "Be careful there."

Pengelley stumbled over Anders and fell. The lamp, shooting from his hand, spread paraffin oil across the floor. Eagerly the flame from their homemade stove leaped along the river of oil that ran to its door. The four men tried to beat it out, and then, when that was obviously impossible, for the mattresses were burning fiercely, they ran for the fire extinguishers on the main deck.

But, with no heat on the ship, these particular extinguishers had frozen. They were useless.

"Water! Water!" Wheeler found himself calling desperately. Smoke, hot and acrid, swirled round him. A figure lurched out of the murk. It was Sibson. It was obvious to the officer that the man was no longer a naval rating. He was just a very frightened man.

"You'll stop here!" Wheeler ordered.

"The hell I will! I ain't frying for you nor nobody else." With a vicious wrench Sibson tore himself free, and was gone.

Like a needle sinking through anesthetized flesh into the quick beyond, the shaking sank through Murrell's brain until at last a wakeful nerve was reached. "Captain, sir, captain, sir. You wouldn't answer the phone."

"What is it, man?" Murrell gasped, swinging cramped limbs upright.

"Tow's on fire, sir!"

The captain was out of the cabin as fast as he had ever been. Fourteen thousand tons of high-octane spirit was something to go on fire!

He had to push past men whom he was surprised to find already at their action stations. Breathless and battered, he reached the back of the bridge.

He found the ship heeled as she tugged at the tow, dragging the tanker round so that she would be beam on to the wind. Thank God for the doctor! He had appreciated the position and acted.

Black billows of smoke rose from the burning wheelhouse, but he could see that, desperate as the situation might appear, it was not yet catastrophic. A signal lamp flickered from the starboard wing of the tanker's bridge as her bows were dragged round to the north.

"What is it, yeoman?" Murrell called as he leaped to the compass platform. The yeoman told him the signal: "Fire extinguishers useless. Can you supply?"

"Reply 'Yes, will come alongside your starboard quarter to put fire party aboard,'" the captain said.

To Gray, "Slip the tow."

To the wheelhouse, "Pipe the fire party to muster on the fo'c'sle with all the extinguishers from the ready-use stowage."

To the quartermaster, "Starboard fifteen. One-eight-oh revolutions."

To Gray, "Thank you, Gray—I'll take her. Will you lead the fire party? You'll have to jump for it—but it won't be too bad."

To Thompson, "Go down and collect enough men to hang every fender you can find round the port bow."

The Hecate, describing a half circle, swept round to windward of the tanker. The ships, as the distance between them was reduced, appeared to roll more and more heavily. Murrell realized that considerable damage would be done to his own ship, but there was no other way.

Already below him the ship's side had been festooned with fenders, their rope lanyards tied to the guardrails. The boarding party, sixteen strong, waited. Half of the men carried the scarlet cylinders of the extinguishers and half, the buckets that each held four refills. Two white-helmeted engine-room ratings held asbestos suits over their arms, ready to put them on as soon as they had made the jump.

The Hecate vibrated gently. The distance narrowed until it could be measured in feet. The burning wheelhouse could no longer be seen. There were only the heavy billows of black smoke.

"Stand by to jump when you have a chance," Murrell shouted. "Stop both."

The Hecate's shoulders nudged the tanker. Two men leaped. The ships rolled apart and together again—but this time much more heavily. More men went across. Like a man amputating his own damaged limb, Murrell watched the quarter-inch plating of his light ship pounded against the heavier hull. Blood-red streaks on the tanker's side showed where paint had been rubbed off. And there were dents too.

"Half astern together. Port fifteen," the captain ordered. The destroyer, shaken by battering her shoulder against the tanker, vibrated to the power of her own engines. She gave one more nudge and then drew away. Murrell took her back again toward the burning ship—but a cable clear to windward so that they could see what went on. Already they had seen the men of the fire party clamber up the double ladders and disappear toward the high bridge of the tanker.

The captain turned to the doctor. "Doc," he said, "how is it that the men are at action stations? Who sent them there?"

Macmillan with surprise said, "You did."

"No," Murrell said. "No! When?"

"When Masters took the signal about the aircraft to you."

"What aircraft? What do you mean!" Murrell clutched his friend's arm.

Macmillan saw the look of dismay that could turn to fear. He said, "Don't let it worry you. It often happens in cases of exhaustion. Men act correctly but don't know what they do."

"Get me the signal," Murrell told him.

Macmillan, going to fetch the signal pad from the charthouse, said gently, "You put up a fine show going alongside that tanker—you're all right."

"Damn your bedside manner." Murrell spoke with sharp cruelty. "Will you get me the signal!"

It was the nearest to a snap that he had ever made at the doctor. He felt ashamed of himself, but took pleasure in the shame. As if by his being beastly he justified his captaincy. He looked again at the Antioch.

The heavy smoke, blowing to leeward and pressed flat to the sea by the cold wind, made the ship look as if she had developed a list to port. But after a moment's acute anxiety, Murrell satisfied himself that this was an optical illusion. If, deep within himself, he had fear for the lives of the twenty-three men he had put aboard her, he neither showed nor allowed himself to feel it. He was riding himself hard, riding down imagination.

Macmillan brought him the pad. There were the signal from the Admiralty and the one that had been made to the Antioch. "I suppose I sent this signal too?" he asked.

Macmillan nodded.

Murrell tore his mind from the personal problem. He went to the voice pipe that led to the radar office. "Can you find any aircraft?" he asked.

"No, sir. We've had a small echo from time to time, but only for a second or two."

"If it stays up in the cloud layer, I suppose we're unlikely to pick it up?" Murrell asked.

"That's it, sir. If it stays behind the clouds we shan't have much chance of finding it with this surface-to-surface set."

"And anyway it will stay out of range," Murrell said. "These homers are very careful of themselves."

The engineer officer came on the bridge, to report the extent of the damage. "Well, chief, what have I done?" Murrell asked.

"The heads and bathrooms, sir. Smashed in the carling and broken the water pipes. I've had to disconnect the lot, sir."

"What a place to smash up! What about your stokers?"

"They're all right, sir. Of course it was a little difficult for them to start with—all those alterations of speed. It wasn't easy."

Looking again at the Antioch, Murrell saw that the character of the smoke had changed. The sunset tinge of flame seemed to be less, and the black smoke from the burning paint-layered wood was mixed round its base with the light gray haze from the chemical extinguishers. To the doctor he said, "There's just a chance the gamble may come off ——"

"Aircraft green eight-oh." The cry came from the starboard side. "See 'em—low on the water. Three of them."

The German planes were coming in with the advantage of the darkening night behind them. They were so close to the sea that they only just cleared the waves.

"Heinkels!" the captain exclaimed as he dived for the compass platform. "Range ten thousand. Rapid independent. Shoot. Port ten. Steer oh-four-five."

The two long 4.7 guns began to fire. Boom—boom—boom. The Hecate started to move out diagonally to enable Murrell to bring an enfilading fire on anything attacking his charge.

"Range seven thousand," the captain, looking at the enemy, said grimly. "Obviously the first team. I'm afraid they mean business."

With the reduced range, the shell bursts from the guns were nearer. The shooting was good, but it was terribly difficult to hit the low black planes against the dark backdrop of eastern cloud. The aircraft were in reverse-arrowhead formation. Each of the leaders was aiming for a ship. The third was potentially the most dangerous, for there was a chance that he would succeed in making his attack without being fired at. The Bofors gun in the stern of the tanker opened up. Chump—chump—chump. It had a curiously satisfying sound.

"Mr. Thompson," the captain said, "shift fire of main armament to the third plane as soon as the close-range weapons can engage the first two."

A second later a terrific clatter sounded on the bridge as the single-barreled port-bridge Oerlikon and the double-barreled midship Oerlikons opened up together. Streams of red tracer bullets soared confidently toward the planes. Antioch's two Oerlikons on the port side were firing.

"Range five thousand."

Boom—boom. Chump—chump—chump, and the continual racket of the Oerlikons. At close range Murrell couldn't do anything more. It was up to the individual gun layers.

For a moment after Sibson's sudden disappearance, Wheeler had been alone in the throat-catching smoke; the next he found himself in clean air with the pillows of smoke blown to leeward.

For the rest of his life Wheeler was to wonder where personal fear went for the next ten minutes. The only conclusion he could ever draw was that, when faced with the inevitable, man could ignore the obvious; completely closing one part of his mind to one particular probability—that of the imminent explosion beneath his feet.

It was White who first drew attention to the three tiny dots.

"Man the guns," Wheeler cried, and oddly found the advancing enemy far more frightening than the threat of fire.

The Hecate's guns were firing. The shell bursts showed white against the black clouds to the east. Then the destroyer's close-range weapons were firing, and White beside him was firing too.

Wheeler saw that the enemy were intent on pressing home their attack, and he, too, realized the danger of the third and last plane as specifically as Murrell had done.

The Antioch's Bofors and Oerlikons were engaging the left-hand plane, the Hecate's Oerlikons the right-hand one, while the destroyer's long-range armament was firing at the third. The planes were surrounded by the red dots of tracers that climbed like scarlet mice toward their targets: planes that seemed indestructible. And then the Bofors fell silent.

Wheeler wondered if he should run aft to see if he could help to clear the jam. But Pengelley knew more about the gun than he did, and in any case the attack would be over long before he had run even as far as the after superstructure.

Suddenly he realized that Sibson had been given the starboard gun beside the funnel—and God alone knew where Sibson was. Then White's gun jammed. When he had helped to clear the bent cartridge that had caused the trouble, the leading plane was so close that he set White to fire at the last attacker.

But miraculously the gun by the funnel had begun to fire. For half a vital minute it was the Antioch's only defense. The weapon was hidden from Wheeler's sight and he had no idea who fired it. All he could see was the lean black barrel that pulsed steadily as shell after shell left its muzzle. The Heinkel was firing back with its cannon. Spurts of flame rippled along the leading edge of the wing, and the plane's nose was directed full at the gun.

Wheeler could see the shells bursting all round, but still the Oerlikon went on firing—and hitting. To Wheeler it had become a duel between the single gun and the massed cannon of the enemy. For a hushed second there was silence—then one last, and very deliberate, shot came from the gun. Wheeler saw it smash through the plane's nose. The enemy plane tipped up sharply. Its whole pale green underside was visible. It went upward and sideways—over the ship. Its wing missed the funnel by a foot—no more. With a great splash it fell into the sea beyond.

Then there was time to look round. White was still firing at the last plane, and he could hear again the happy chump—chump of the Bofors from behind the funnel. In front of the destroyer's bows there was a large oily patch with a black object sinking there—like a shark's fin when the fish dives.

AUNT MARTHA

By PATRICIA DUFF McGINLEY

Her face was carved by nobleness
And by those virtues, brave and grim,
Which let the harried mortal bless
The twistings of immortal whim.

No evening saw her Bible closed.
In grace and graciousness, grown wise,
She stood immovably opposed
To evil and to store-bought pies.

The last Heinkel was turning. It was still half a mile away, but had broken off the attack. Like a wild duck that has been wounded, it fluttered unhappily over the sea. Its head was round to the east. The destroyer was turning under full helm to keep her guns bearing. Wheeler thought that, now that the plane was out of range of their gun, he need not bother further about the enemy, and he stopped White from firing. Then he ran down the ladder and along the iron deck of the tanker to the gun by the funnel.

As he tore along the deck he caught sight of Hart, also running from his side of the superstructure to the other. There were two flights of ladders to the boat deck. Wheeler pounded up them both. He came to the gun. The muzzle pointed upward, while all around the wood of the deck and the metal side of the funnel base had been pockmarked by cannon shells. In the harness that was fastened to the breech hung what was left of Sibson. He was quite dead, for no man could take such injury and live.

Hart turned as Wheeler joined him. The two men looked at each other. "He fired last," Wheeler said.

"Yes, sir. He'd copped all this before he fired that last one."

"Mr. Wheeler, sir. Mr. Wheeler," a distant voice hailed.

"Wait a minute, Hart." Wheeler went to the rail that looked over the deck to the bridge sixty feet away.

White was hailing. His hands cupped his mouth and the words were long-drawn-out. "Signal . . . from . . . Hecate. Stand . . . by . . . to . . . recover . . . tow."

Wheeler waved his arm to show that he ha heard. Then he went back. Hart had clippe the gun in its housed position. And over heap that lay behind it he was drawing winch cover. Sibson, the man with a problem had found the solution within himself.

When Wheeler got back to the bridge, Whit brought him another signal from the Hecat "In view of the late hour, the probability further damage to this ship, and the necessit to catch the tide off Bloody Foreland, I do no intend to re-embark fire party tonight."

Gray looked at his companion. "I don blame him," he said. "You've got visitors fo the night."

Together captain and navigator bent ove the chart. Murrell pushed the deck log to on side. "I want to keep well clear of the land, he told Masters, "even if it does mean a cou ple of hours' more steaming—no cutting cor ners with our unpredictable friend astern!"

Masters said, "I'd like to alter course to oh eight-three, sir. The wind seems to be drawin a little more northerly."

Murrell gave his navigator a long stare Now it was all over, his officers were taking u their respective duties and very soon he woul revert to being the figurehead again: very soo he would be able to handle the ship and t make the decisions of a seaman only in a emergency or when conditions were difficult

Desperately tired as he was, he had to admi that in the last five days there were period that had been deeply satisfying. "Very well pilot," he said. "Alter course to oh-eigh three."

Moving slowly and thoughtfully, he re joined the doctor. "I began by never darin to hope to see land again. Then I longed for most passionately. Now I'll be sorry to see it sorry that this period of intense endeavor over. Why is that?"

"I'm a physician and surgeon—not psychiatrist." Macmillan's eyes were blue an amused within their red rims.

"Do I need a psychiatrist?" Murrell asked

"Yes, I think you do—that is, if you're go ing to tell me that you want to go on towin this crate all the way home. Not that I'm th person to go to. I ought to see one too—fo I'm damned if I'd hand her over to anyon else. Come to think of it, the whole ship's com pany are potential cases."

"What do you mean?" Murrell asked.

"That we're all balmy!" Macmillan tol him. "This thing—this Antioch—has got un der our skins. She's the symbol of something or other. Oh, when they certify us, they'll find a word for it that none of us will under stand ——"

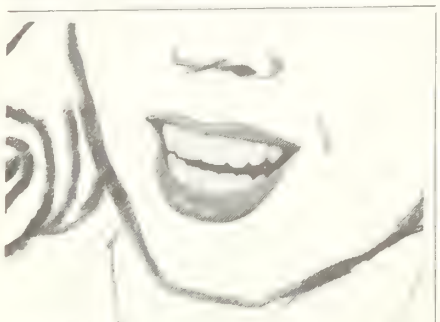
"Ships bearing red oh-five." The cry fro the port lookout interrupted further discus sion. Murrell moved to the fore part of th bridge.

"Vessel's signaling, sir," Masters called.

The yeoman flicked over the pages of th book of pennant numbers. "Ocean Queen sir."

Murrell through his glasses could make ou the deep scallop-shaped hull; the heav bridge, far forward; the two flat-sided fun nels; the long afterdeck so admirably de signed for towing.

A mile on either side of the tug were th lesser dots of the two antisubmarine trawlers The little party of ships was all of six mile away. It would be more than half an hour be fore they met. The tug was signaling: "Slip your tow. I will take over."



Murrell looked blankly at the signal that th yeoman held for him. To be ordered about by a blasted tugboat! He saw the look of inquiry in the eyes of the yeoman. "No, tell him t take station astern," he said, and walked back to the doctor. "If we haven't time to take ou own men off that floating death trap, we haven't time to transfer the tow."

Macmillan rubbed his pipe against the side of his nose. "Just as you say; just as you say."

Murrell could hear his message being sent; could hear the clickety-clack of the signal lamp. The reply to his message came back immediately: "I am ocean tug."

The captain of the Hecate found his mind stiffened by resolve.

"Make 'So am I,'" he said. END

THE MISTRESS OF MELLYN

attracts the eyes as a needle is attracted by a magnet. You have to look whether you want to or not; you have to admire. Her dress was pale mauve of some clinging material such as chiffon and it was caught at the throat with a diamond brooch.

Connan spoke first. "Why," he said, "it is my daughter with her governess. So, Miss Leigh, you and Alvean are taking the air."

"It is such a pleasant evening," I said, and I made to take Alvean's hand, but she eluded me in her most ungracious manner.

"May I sit with you and Lady Treslyn, papa?" she asked.

"You are taking a walk with Miss Leigh," he said. "Do you not think that you should continue to do so?"

"Yes," I answered for her. "Come along, Alvean."

Connan had turned to his companion: "We are very fortunate to have found Miss Leigh. She is . . . admirable!"

"The perfect governess this time, I hope for your sake, Connan," said Lady Treslyn.

I felt awkward, as though I were in the position of a horse, standing there while they discussed my points. I was sure he was aware of my discomfiture and rather amused by it.

I said, and my voice sounded chilly, "I think it is time we turned back. We were taking an airing before Alvean retires for the night. Come, Alvean," I added.

"But," protested Alvean, "I want to stay. I want to talk to you, papa."

"But you can see I am engaged. Some other time, my child."

"No—no—now!" Alvean's voice had a hysterical note. I had never known her to defy him so utterly.

Lady Treslyn murmured, "I see Alvean is a very determined person."

Connan TreMellyn said coolly, "Miss Leigh will deal with this matter."

"Of course. The perfect governess." There was a note of mockery in Lady Treslyn's voice, and it goaded me to such an extent that I seized Alvean's arm and almost dragged her back the way we had come.

She was half sobbing, but she did not speak until we were in the house. Then she said, "I hate her. You know, don't you, that she wants to be my new mamma?"

I said nothing then because I felt that it was so easy to be overheard. It was only when we reached her room and I had followed her in and shut the door that I said, "That was an extraordinary remark to make. How could she wish to be your mamma when she has a husband of her own?"

"He will soon die. Everybody says they are only waiting."

I was shocked that she should have heard such gossip and I thought, I will speak to Mrs. Polgrey about this. Is it those girls, Daisy and Kitty—or perhaps Joe Tapperty or his wife?

"She's always here," went on Alvean. "I won't let her take my mother's place."

"You are becoming quite hysterical about improbabilities, and I must insist that you never allow me to hear you say such things again. It is degrading to your papa."

That made her thoughtful. How she loves him! I thought. Poor little Alvean, poor lonely child!

A little while before I had been sorry for myself as I stood in that beautiful garden and was forced to be quizzed by the beautiful woman in the arbor. I had said to myself, Why should one person have so much, and others nothing? Should I be beautiful in chiffon and diamonds? Perhaps not as Lady Treslyn is, but I am sure they would be more becoming than cotton and merino and a turquoise brooch which had belonged to my grandmother.

Now I forgot to be sorry for myself, and my pity was all for Alvean.

I had seen Alvean to bed and returned to my room, conscious of a certain depression. I kept thinking of Connan TreMellyn out there in the arbor with Lady Treslyn. Of course Alvean and I had interrupted a flirtation. I felt shocked that he should indulge in such an intrigue; it seemed wholly undignified, since the lady had a husband to whom she owed allegiance.

I went to the window and was glad that it did not give me a view of the south gardens and the sea. It was not quite dark yet, but the sun had disappeared and the twilight was on us. My eyes turned to the window where I had seen the shadow on the blind.

The blinds were drawn up and I could see the blue curtains clearly. I stared at them. I don't know what I expected. Was it to see a face appear at the window, a beckoning hand? There were times when I could laugh at myself for my fancies, but the twilight hour was not one of them.

Then I saw the curtains move, and knew that someone was in that room.

I was in an extraordinary mood that evening. Alice's room was not in my part of the house, but I did not care. Thoughts of Alice obsessed me. There were times when I felt such a burning desire to discover what mystery lay behind her death that I was prepared to go to any lengths.

So I slipped out of my room. I left my wing of the house and went along the gallery to Alice's dressing room. I knocked lightly on the door and, with my heart beating lik sledge hammer, swiftly opened it.

For a second I saw no one. Then I detec a movement by the curtains. Someone hiding behind them.

"Who is it?" I asked.

There was no answer.

I strode across the room, drew aside curtains and saw Gilly cowering there. lids of her blank blue eyes fluttered in a te fied way.

"It's all right, Gilly," I said gently. "I wo hurt you."

She continued to stare at me, and I went "Tell me, what are you doing here?"

Still she said nothing. She had begun stare about the room as though she were a ing someone for help, and for a moment I the uncanny feeling that she saw something or someone—I could not see.

"Gilly," I said, "you know you should be in this room. I am going to take you to room. Then we'll have a little talk."

I put my arm about her; she was trembli I drew her to the door, but she came rel tantly and at the threshold of the room lool back over her shoulder. Then she cried suddenly, "Madam—come back, mada Come—now!"

I led her firmly from the room and shut door behind us, then almost had to drag along to my bedroom. Once there, I firm shut my door.

"Gilly," I said, "I do want you to und stand that I won't hurt you. I want to be y friend." The blank look persisted and, tak a shot in the dark, I went on: "I want to your friend as Mrs. TreMellyn was."

ACQUAINTANCE: a degree of friendship called slight when its object is poor and obscure, and intimate when he is rich and famous.

AMBROSE BIERCE

That startled her and the blank look d appeared for a moment. I had stumbled another discovery: Alice had been kind to t poor child.

"You went there to look for Mrs. TreM lyn, did you not?"

She nodded.

She looked so pathetic that I knelt do and put my arms about her. "You can't fi her, Gilly. She is dead. It is no use looking her in this house."

Gilly nodded and I was not sure what s implied—whether she agreed with me that was no use, or whether she believed that s could find Mrs. TreMellyn.

"So," I went on, "we must try to forget h mustn't we, Gilly?"

The pale lids fell over the eyes to hide the from me.

"We'll be friends," I said. "If we we friends, you wouldn't be lonely, would you

She shook her head, and I fancied that t eyes which surveyed me had lost something their blankness. I was sure that she was longer afraid of me.

Then suddenly she slipped out of my gra and ran to the door. I did not pursue her, a as she opened the door and turned to lo back at me there was a faint smile on her lit Then she was gone.

I believed that I had established a lit friendliness between us. Then I thought Alice, who had been kind to this child. I w beginning to build up the picture of Al more clearly in my mind.

I went to the window and looked across the window of the room, and thought of th night when I had seen the shadow on t blind. My discovery of Gilly did not expla that. It was no child I had seen silhouett there. It had been a woman.

It was the next day when I went to Mr Polgrey's room for a cup of tea. She was d lighted to invite me. "Mrs. Polgrey," I he said, "I have a matter which I feel to be

How tension taxes your body

"A woman's work is never done." She's never able to relax completely from her responsibilities to her home and family. She's never completely free from the unending series of little crises that, when added to her jam-packed schedule, brings on a lot of tension.

Tension is an insidious thing. You have one of those bad days and suddenly tension erupts. You're the victim of a miserable headache, taut nerves and muscles, queasy stomach.

When you're in the throes of such tension, you need more than a simple headache remedy to ease your pain, tight nerves and stomach jitters. So take Bufferin® to relieve not just one—but all three—of your symptoms.

The quick and potent action of Bufferin in relieving the pain of headache, tension's most nagging and painful symptom, has been known for many years. And clinical studies prove that Bufferin works twice as fast as aspirin for millions—even faster for many others.

Equally important, stomach jitters are calmed by Bufferin with Di-Alminate*, the exclusive stomach-soothing agent which only Bufferin adds to aspirin.

And, as Bufferin circulates through the bloodstream, it exerts an over-all calming effect on your body by relaxing tight nerves.

Whenever you have one of those bad days and feel tension building up, take Bufferin—to relieve your headache, relax your nerves and soothe your stomach.

some importance, and I should very much like to discuss this with you."

She bridled with pride. "I shall be delighted to give you an hour of my company and a cup of my best Earl Grey," she told me.

Over the teacups she surveyed me with an expression bordering on the affectionate.

"Now, Miss Leigh, pray tell me what it is you would ask of me."

"I am a little disturbed," I told her, stirring my tea thoughtfully. "It is due to a remark of Alvean's. I am sure that she listens to gossip, and I think it most undesirable in a child of her age."

I told her how we had walked in the cliff gardens and met the master with Lady Treslyn. "And then," I went on, "Alvean made this offensive remark. She said that Lady Treslyn hoped to become her mamma."

Mrs. Polgrey shook her head. She said, "What about a spoonful of whisky in your tea, Miss? There's nothing like it for keeping up the spirits."

I had no desire for the whisky, but I could see that Mrs. Polgrey had, and she would have been disappointed if I had refused to join her, so I said, "A small teaspoonful, please, Mrs. Polgrey."

She unlocked the cupboard, took out the bottle and measured out the whisky. Now we were like a pair of conspirators and Mrs. Polgrey was clearly enjoying herself. "I fear you will find it somewhat shocking," she began.

"I am prepared," I assured her.

"Well, Sir Thomas Treslyn is a very old man and only a few years ago he married this young lady, a play-actress, some say, from London. Sir Thomas went there on a visit and returned with her. Her set the neighborhood agog, I can tell you."

"I can well believe that."

"There's some that say she's one of the handsomest women in the country. And men can be foolish. The master has his weakness," admitted Mrs. Polgrey.

"If there is gossip I am most anxious that it shall not reach Alvean's ears."

"Of course you are, Miss. But gossip there is, and that child's got ears like a hare's."

"Do you think Daisy and Kitty chatter?"

Mrs. Polgrey came closer. "Everybody chatters, Miss. There's some as say that they'm not the sort to wait for blessing of clergy."

"Well, perhaps they are not." I felt wretched. I hate this, I told myself. It's so sordid. "So you think ——"

She nodded gravely. "When Sir Thomas dies there'll be a new mistress in this house. All they have to wait for now is for him to go. Mrs. TreMellyn, her—her's already gone."

I did not want to ask the question which came to my lips, but it seemed as though there were some force within me which would not let me avoid it. "And was it so when Mrs. TreMellyn was alive?"

Mrs. Polgrey nodded slowly. "He visited her often. It started almost as soon as she came. Sometimes he rides out at night and we don't see him till morning. Well, he'm master and 'tis for him to make his own rules."

"So you think that Alvean is only repeating what everyone knows? When Sir Thomas dies Lady Treslyn will be her new mamma?"

"There's some on us that thinks it's more than likely." She went on piously: "I'd sooner see the master of the house I serve living in wedlock than in sin, I do assure you. And so would we all."

"Could we warn the girls not to chatter, before Alvean, of these matters?"

"As well try to keep a cuckoo from singing in the spring. I could wallop them two till I dropped with exhaustion and still they'd gossip. They can't help it. It be in their blood. And there's nothing much to choose between one girl and the other. Nowadays ——"

I nodded sympathetically. I was thinking of Alice, who had watched the relationship between her husband and Lady Treslyn. No wonder she had been prepared to run away with Geoffrey Nansellock.

Mrs. Polgrey was in such an expansive mood that I felt I might extend the conversation to other matters in which I happened to be very interested

I said, "Have you ever thought of teaching Gilly her letters?"

"Gilly! Why, that would be a senseless thing to do. You must know, Miss, that Gilly is not quite as she should be." Mrs. Polgrey tapped her forehead.

"She sings a great deal. If she could learn songs, could she not learn other things?"

"She's a queer little thing. Reckon it was the way she come. I don't often talk of such things, but I'll swear you've been hearing about my Jennifer." Mrs. Polgrey's voice changed a little, became touched with sentiment. "Sometimes I think that Gillyflower be a cursed child. Us didn't want her; why, she was only a little thing in a cradle—two months old—when Jennifer went. The tide brought her body in two days after. 'Twas found there in Mellyn Cove."

"I'm sorry," I said gently.

Mrs. Polgrey shook herself free of sentiment. "Her'd gone, but there was still Gilly. We did all we could for her—me and Mr. Polgrey. He thought the world of her."

"When did you notice that she was not like other children?"

"Come to think of it, it would be when she was about four years old."

"She must be the same age as Alvean. She looks so much younger."

"Born a few months after Miss Alvean. They'd play together now and then—being in the house, and being of an age. There was an accident when she was . . . let me see—she'd be approaching her fourth birthday."

"What sort of accident?"

"She were playing in the drive not far from the lodge gates. The mistress were riding to the house. She was a great horsewoman, the mistress. Gilly, her darted out from the bushes and caught a blow from the horse. She fell on her head. It was a mercy she weren't killed."

> A lady who has been seen as a sloven or slut in the morning will never efface the impression she has made, with all the dress and pageantry she can afterwards involve herself in.
> THOMAS JEFFERSON

"Poor Gilly," I said.

"The mistress were distressed. Blamed herself although 'twas no blame to her. Gilly should have known better. The mistress made much of her after that. Gilly used to follow her about and fret when she was away."

Mrs Polgrey poured herself another cup of tea and asked if I would have another. I declined. "Gilly," she went on, "were born in sin. It looks like God be taking vengeance on her, for it do say that the sins of the fathers be visited on the children."

I felt a sudden wave of anger sweep over me. I was in revolt against such distortions. But I said nothing, because I believed that I was battling against strange forces in this house and, if I were going to succeed, I needed all the allies I could command.

I wanted to understand Gilly. I wanted to soothe Alvean. I was discovering a fondness for children in myself which I had not known I possessed before I came into this house. So I sat in Mrs. Polgrey's room, listening to her talk, and did not tell her what was in my mind.

There was excitement throughout the house because there was to be a ball—the first since Alice's death—and for a week there was little talk of anything else. I found it difficult to keep Alvean's attention on her lessons.

"I fail to see," I said to Alvean, "why you should feel this excitement. Neither you nor I will take part in the ball."

Alvean said dreamily, "When my mother was alive there were lots of balls. She used to come in and show me how she looked. She was beautiful. Then she would take me into the solarium and I would sit behind the curtains and look down on the hall through the peep."

"The peep?" I asked.

"Ah, you don't know." She regarded me triumphantly.

"There is a great deal about this house that I do not know," I said sharply. "I have not seen a third of it."

"You haven't seen the solarium," she agreed. "There are several peeps in this house. Oh, Miss, you don't know what peeps are, but a lot of big houses have them. There's even one in Mount Widden. My mother told me that it is where the ladies used to sit when the men were feasting and it was considered no place for them among the men. They could look down and watch, but they must not be there. There's one in the chapel—a sort of one. But I shall go to the solarium and look down on the hall through the peep. Why, Miss, you ought to come with me. Please do."

"We'll see," I said.

On the day of the ball Alvean and I took our riding lesson as usual only, instead of riding Buttercup, Alvean was mounted on Black Prince.

When I had first seen the child on that horse I had felt a twinge of uneasiness, but I told myself that, if she were going to become a rider, she must get beyond the Buttercup stage. Once she had ridden Prince, she would gain confidence and very likely never wish to go back to Buttercup.

We had done rather well for the first few lessons. Prince behaved admirably. But this day we were not so fortunate. I suspect that Alvean's thoughts were on the ball rather than on her riding. She was still diffident with me, except during our riding lessons when, oddly enough, we were the best of friends.

We were about halfway through the lesson when Prince broke into a gallop. I had not allowed her to gallop unless she was on the leading rein. All would have been well if Alvean had kept her head, but as Prince started to gallop she gave a little cry of fear and her terror seemed to communicate itself to the animal.

Prince was off. I saw Alvean, forgetting what I had taught her, swaying to one side.

It was all over in a flash because I was after her immediately. I had to grasp Prince's bridle before he reached the hedge, for I believed that he might attempt to jump. I brought him to a standstill while a white-faced, trembling Alvean slid unharmed to the ground.

"It's all right," I said. "Your mind was wandering. You haven't reached that stage when you can afford to forget for a moment what you're doing."

I knew that was the only way to deal with her. Shaken as she was, I made her remount Prince. She obeyed reluctantly. But by the time our lesson was finished she was well over her fright.

It was when we were leaving the field that she suddenly burst out laughing.

"What is it?" I asked, turning.

"Oh, Miss," she cried, "you've split!"

"What do you mean?"

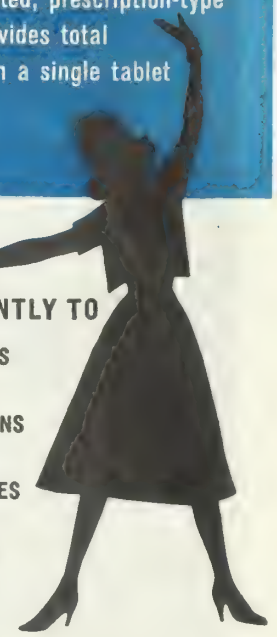
"Your dress has split under the armhole. Oh—it's getting worse and worse."

I put my hand behind my back and realized what had happened. The riding habit had always been a little too tight for me and during my efforts to save Alvean from a fall the sleeve seam had been unable to stand the extra strain.

I must have shown my dismay, for Alvean said, "Never mind, Miss. I'll find you another. There are more, I know."

Alvean was secretly amused as we went back to the house. I had never seen her in such good spirits. It was, however, somewhat disconcerting to discover that the sight of my discomfiture could give her so much pleasure.

The guests had begun to arrive. I had been unable to resist taking peeps at them from my window. The approach was filled with carriages, and the dresses I had glimpsed made me gasp with envy.



The ball was being held in the great hall which I had seen earlier that day. I thought I had rarely seen a setting so beautiful. The beams had been decorated with leaves. "An old Cornish custom," Kitty told me. "Reckon there'll be other balls now the period of mourning be up. Well, so it should be. Can't go on mourning forever, can 'ee?"

I said, as I looked at the pots of blooms which had been brought in from the greenhouses and the great wax candles in their sconces, that the hall did Mr. Polgrey and his gardeners great credit. I pictured how it would look when those candles were lighted and the guests danced in their colorful gowns, their pearls and their diamonds.

Alvean and I had supper together that evening. "Miss," she said, "I've put a new riding habit for you in your cupboard."

"Thank you," I said. "That was thoughtful of you."

"Well, you couldn't go riding in that!" cried Alvean, pointing derisively at my lavender gown.

I looked down distastefully at my cotton gown. It was the favorite of the two which had been especially made for me by Aunt Adelaide's dressmaker when I had obtained this post. One was of gray—a most unbecoming color. I fancied I looked a little less prim, a little less of a governess in the lavender. But now unbecoming it seemed, with its bodice buttoned high at the neck and the cream lace collar and the cream lace cuffs. I realized I was comparing it with the dresses of Connan TreMellyn's guests.

Alvean said, "Hurry and finish, Miss. Don't forget we're going to the solarium."

"I suppose you have your father's permission ——" I began.

"Miss, I always peep from the solarium. Everybody knows I do. My mother used to look up and wave to me." Her face puckered a little. "Tonight," she went on, as though she were speaking to herself, "I'm going to imagine that she's down there, dancing. Miss, do you think people come back after they're dead?"

"What an extraordinary question! Of course not."

"You don't believe in ghosts, then. Some people do. Do you think they lie when they say they see ghosts, Miss?"

"I think that people who say such things are the victims of their own imaginations."

"Still," she went on dreamily, "I shall imagine she is there. Perhaps if I imagine hard enough I shall see her. Perhaps I shall be the victim of my imagination."

I said nothing because I felt uneasy.

"If she were coming back," she mused, "she would come to the ball, because dancing was one of the things she liked doing best." She seemed to remember me suddenly. "Miss," she went on, "if you'd rather not come to the solarium with me, I don't mind going alone."

"I'll come," I said.

The vastness of the house continued to astonish me as I followed Alvean along the gallery, up stone staircases through several bedrooms, to what she told me was the solarium. The roof was of glass and I understood why it had received its name. I thought it must be unbearably warm in the heat of the summer.

The walls were covered with exquisite tapestries depicting the story of the Great Rebellion and the Restoration. There was the execution of the first Charles, and the second shown in the oak tree, his dark face peering down at the roundhead soldiers. There were pictures of his arrival in England, of his coronation and a visit to his shipyards.

"Never mind those now," said Alvean. "My mother used to love being here. There are two peeps. Don't you want to see them?"

I was looking at the escritoire, at the sofa and the gilt-backed chairs; and I saw her sitting here, talking to her daughter—dead Alice who seemed to become more and more alive as the days passed.

There were windows at each end of this long room, high windows curtained with heavy brocade. The same brocade curtains hung before what I presumed to be doors, of which there appeared to be four in this room—the one by which we had entered, another at the extreme end of the room and one on either side. But I was wrong about the last two.

Alvean had disappeared behind one of these curtains and called to me in a muffled voice. When I went to her, I found we were in an alcove. In the wall was a star-shaped opening, quite large but decorated so that one would not have noticed it unless one had been looking for it.

I gazed through it and saw that I was looking down into the chapel.

"They used to sit here and watch the service if they were too ill to go down, my mother told me. They had a priest in the house in the old days. My mother didn't tell me that. Miss Jansen told me. She knew a lot about the house. She loved to come up here and look through the peep. She used to like the chapel too."

"You were sorry when she went, Alvean?"

"Yes, I was. The other peep's on the other side. Through that you can see into the hall."

She went to the other side of the room and drew back the hangings there. In the wall was a similar star-shaped opening.

I looked down on the hall and caught my breath, for it was a magnificent sight. Musicians were on the dais and the guests, who had not yet begun to dance, stood about talking.

There were a great many people down there and the sound of the chatter rose clearly. Alvean was breathless beside me, her eyes searching in a manner which made me shiver slightly. Did she really believe that Alice would come from the tomb because she loved to dance?

I felt an impulse to put my arm about her and draw her to me. Poor, bewildered little creature! But of course I overcame that impulse. Alvean had no desire for my sympathy, I well knew.

I saw Connan TreMellyn in conversation with Celestine Nansellock, and Peter was there too. If Peter was one of the most handsome men I had ever seen, Connan was the most elegant. There were few in that brilliant assembly whose faces were known to me, but I did see Lady Treslyn. She was wearing a gown which seemed to be composed of yards and yards of chiffon the color of flame. Yet, had she wanted to attract attention, she could not have chosen anything better. Her dark hair looked almost black against the flame; her magnificent bust and shoulders were the whitest I had ever seen. She wore a band of diamonds in her hair and diamonds sparkled about her person.

Spring Flowers from a small garden

By JANET COTTIER

DI PIETRO

After the lean pickings of the winter months, the spring garden seems to have a never-ending supply of flowers for the house. At the top of the page various shades of purple tulips are set against puffy sprays of lavender and purple lilac. At left, exotic parrot tulips stand out against a background of Scilla campanulata, wild phlox and lacy meadow-rue leaves.

Tulips with their full rainbow of shades fit into any color scheme in the house. These bright lily-flowering tulips, Mrs. Moon, shine like spring sunlight against peony foliage.

CAN HANDS TELL YOUR FORTUNE?

When they're pretty and well-groomed they say a lot!

By Ruth Miller

What kind of person are you? It doesn't take a fortune-teller to find out. Even an untrained eye can tell a lot about you by looking at your hands. Are they pretty and well-groomed? You're the kind of woman whose husband will bring her flowers long after the honeymoon is over! Are they work-worn and neglected? Perhaps you're too busy looking after others to give yourself the care you deserve!

Now look at your own hands and see what you read in them.

Ragged, unattractive cuticle? Spend a little time on regular cuticle care. Carefully trim off any hangnails... and then put away your scissors! Cutting the cuticle will only make it grow faster. And it's so easy to snip the flesh and start a painful finger infection. Instead, use Cutex Oily Cuticle Remover. This time-tested formula was developed many years ago to make cuticle care simpler and safer.

Dip a cotton-tipped Cutex genuine Orangewood Stick in the Remover and use the moistened end to push your cuticle back all around the nail. Cutex Oily Cuticle Remover actually floats away dead tissue... leaves your nails perfectly groomed.

Incidentally, did you know that real orangewood makes the finest hand-care instruments for this purpose because of its resistance to splitting and chemicals? That's why so many careful manicurists use Cutex genuine Orangewood Sticks.

Short, stubby nails? How you file them can make a difference. Pointed nails break more easily and just accent stubby fingers. Leave a sixteenth of an inch at each corner for reinforcement and file in a rounded curve with a flexible Cutex Emery Board.

Cutex Emery Boards are made with the finest abrasives so as not to damage the nail. Harsh abrasives and rigid metal files can split the delicate layers of the nail and cause cracking, chipping and breaking.

How to grow longer, stronger nails? You'll find more helpful tips in our little booklet "Beauty Treatments for Your Hands," now available absolutely free. Just send your name and address to Cutex, Box 1000, Department D, New York, New York.

Alvean's attention was caught by her even as mine was and her brows were drawn together in a frown. "She is there then," she murmured.

I said, "Is her husband present?"

"Yes, the little old man over there, talking to Colonel Penlands."

"And which is Colonel Penlands?" She pointed the colonel out to me, and I saw with him a bent old man, white-haired and wrinkled. It seemed incredible that he should be the husband of that flamboyant creature.

"Look!" whispered Alvean. "My father is going to open the ball. He used to do it with Aunt Celestine, and at the same time my mother used to do it with Uncle Geoffrey. I wonder who he will do it with this time."

"With whom he will do it," I murmured absent-mindedly, but my attention, like Alvean's, was entirely on the scene below.

"The musicians are going to start now," she said. "They always start with the same tune. Do you know what it is? It's the Furry Dance. Some of our ancestors came from Helston way and it was played then and it always has been since. You watch! Papa and mamma used to dance the first bar or so with their partners, and all the others fell in behind."

The musicians had begun and I saw Connan take Celestine by the hand and lead her into the center of the hall. Peter Nansellock followed and he had chosen Lady Treslyn to be his partner.

I watched the four of them dance the first steps of the traditional dance, and I thought, Poor Celestine! Even gowned as she was in blue satin, she looked ill at ease. She lacked the elegance of Connan, the beauty of Lady Treslyn and the dash of her brother.

Neither Alvean nor I seemed to tire of watching the dancers. An hour passed and we were still there. It was now dark, but the moon had risen. I turned my eyes from the dance floor to look through the glass roof at that great gibbous moon which seemed to be smiling down on us. No candles for you, it seemed to say; you are banished from the gaiety and the glitter, but I will give you my soft and tender light instead.

The room, touched by moonlight, had a supernatural character all its own. I felt in such a room anything might happen.

I turned my attention back to the dancers. They were waltzing and I felt myself swaying to the rhythm. As I listened, entranced, I felt a hand touch mine and was so startled that I gave an audible gasp.

I looked down. Standing beside me was a small figure. I was relieved to see that it was only Gillyflower.

"You have come to see the dancers?" I said.

She nodded.

She was not quite so tall as Alvean and could not reach the star-shaped peep, so I lifted her in my arms.

I said to Alvean, "Bring a stool and Gillyflower can stand on it."

Alvean said, "Let her get it herself."

Gilly nodded and I put her on the floor. She ran to the stool and brought it with her. I thought, Since she understands, why can she not talk with the rest of us?

Alvean did not seem to want to look now that Gilly had come. She moved away from the peep and as the musicians began the opening bars of that waltz which always enchanted me—I refer to Mr. Strauss' Blue Danube Waltz—Alvean began to dance across the floor of the solarium.

The music seemed to have affected my feet. I don't know what came over me, but I could not resist the strains of the Blue Danube Waltz. I danced toward Alvean. I waltzed as I used to in those ballrooms to which I went accompanied by Aunt Adelaide, but I was sure that I never danced as I did that night in the solarium.

Alvean cried out with pleasure. I heard Gilly laugh too.

Alvean cried, "Go on, Miss. Don't stop, Miss. You do it well."

So I went on dancing with an imaginary partner, dancing down the moonlit solarium with the lopsided moon smiling in at me. And when I reached the end of the room a figure moved toward me and I was no longer dancing alone.

"You're exquisite," said a voice, and there was Peter Nansellock. "No—no. You must dance with me, Miss Leigh, as you were meant to dance with me."

We went on dancing. It was as though my feet, having begun, would not stop.

But I said, "This is most unorthodox."

"It is most delightful," he answered.

"You should be with the guests."

"It is more fun to be with you. How exquisitely you dance!"

"It is my only drawing-room accomplishment."

"I am sure it is one of many that you are forced to squander on this empty room."

"Mr. Nansellock, do you not think this little jest has been played out?"

"It is no jest."

"I shall now rejoin the children." We had come close to them and I saw little Gilly's face enrapt, and I saw the admiration in Alvean's. If I stopped dancing I should revert to my old position; while I went on dancing I was an exalted being.

"So here he is!"

To my horror, I saw that several people had come into the solarium. My apprehension did not lessen when I saw the flame-colored gown of Lady Treslyn, for I was sure that, wherever that flame-colored dress was, there Connan TreMellyn would be.

Somebody started to clap; others took it up. Then The Blue Danube ended.

I put my hand to my hair in acute embarrassment. I knew that dancing had loosened the pins. I thought, I shall be dismissed tomorrow for my irresponsibility, and perhaps I deserve it.

"What an excellent idea," said someone. "Dancing in moonlight. One can hear the music up here almost as well as down there."

> Every man is a poet when he is in love. PLATO

Someone else said, "This is a beautiful ballroom, Connan."

"Then let us use it for that purpose," he answered.

He went to the peep and shouted through it, "Once more—The Beautiful Blue Danube."

Then the music started.

I turned to Alvean and gripped Gilly by the hand. People were already beginning to dance. They were talking and did not bother to lower their voices. Why should they? I was only the governess.

I heard a voice: "The governess. Alvean's, you know."

"Forward creature! I suppose another of Peter's light ladies."

I was blushing hotly, furiously angry and a little frightened. I was aware of Connan's face in moonlight looking at me.

"Alvean," he said, "go to your room and take Gillyflower with you."

She dared not disobey when he spoke in those tones.

I said as coolly as I could, "Yes, let us go."

But as I was about to follow the children I found my arm gripped. Connan said, "You dance extremely well, Miss Leigh. I could never resist a good dancer. Perhaps it is because I scarcely excel in the art myself."

"Thank you," I said. But he still held my arm.

"I am sure," he went on, "that The Blue Danube is a favorite of yours. You looked . . . enraptured." With that he swung me into his arms and I found that I was dancing with him among his guests—I in my lavender cotton and my turquoise brooch, they in their chiffons and velvets, their emeralds and diamonds.

I was glad of the moonlight. I was overcome with shame, for I believed that he was angry and that his intention was to shame me even further.

My feet caught the rhythm and I thought to myself, Always in future The Blue Danube will mean to me a fantastic dance in the solarium with Connan TreMellyn as my partner.

"I apologize, Miss Leigh," he said, "for my guests' bad manners."

"It is what I must expect and no doubt deserve."

"What nonsense," he said, and I told myself that I was dreaming, for his voice, which was close to my ear, sounded tender.

We had come to the end of the room and, to my complete astonishment, he had whirled me through the curtains and out the door. We were on a small landing between two flights of stone stairs. We stopped dancing, but he still kept his arms about me. On the wall a paraffin lamp of green jade burned. Its light was only enough to show me his face. It looked a little brutal, I thought.

"Miss Leigh," he said, "you are very charming when you abandon your severity."

I caught my breath with dismay, for he was forcing me against the wall and kissing me.

I was horrified as much by my own emotions as by what was happening. I knew what that kiss meant: You are not averse to a mild flirtation with Peter Nansellock; therefore why not with me?

My anger was so great that, with all my might, I pushed him from me. I lifted my skirts and began to run down the stairs.

I did not know where I was, but I went on running blindly and eventually found the gallery and made my way back to my own room. There I threw myself onto my bed and lay there until I recovered my breath.

There is only one thing I can do, I told myself, and that is get away from this house. He has made his intentions clear to me. I have no doubt at all that Miss Jansen was dismissed because she refused to accept his attentions. The man is a monster.

I was more desperately unhappy than I had ever been in my life. I would not face the truth, but I really cared more deeply than I had about anything else that he should regard me with such contempt.

These were the danger signals. I had need now of my common sense.

I rose from my bed and locked my door. The first thing I would do would be to write to Phillida. I sat down and tried to do this, but my hands were trembling and my handwriting was so shaky that the note looked ridiculous, and I destroyed it.

I could start packing.

I went to the cupboard and pulled open the door. I packed my trunk in a very short time, for my possessions were not many. Then, as I was more composed, I sat down and wrote the letter to Phillida.

When I had finished writing I heard the sound of voices below and I went to my window. Some of the guests had come out on the lawn and I saw them dancing down there.

I stood in the shadows watching, and eventually saw what I had been waiting for. There was Connan. He was dancing with Lady Treslyn; his head was close to hers. I imagined the sort of things he was saying to her.

Then I turned angrily from the window and tried to tell myself that the pain I felt within me was disgust.

I undressed and went to bed. I lay sleepless for a long time, and when I did sleep I had jumbled dreams.

I was up late next morning because when I had slept I had done so deeply, and it was Kitty banging on the door with my hot water who awakened me. I leaped out of bed and unlocked the door.

"Anything wrong, Miss?" she asked.

"No," I answered sharply, and she waited a few seconds for my explanation of the locked door.

I was certainly not going to give it to her, and she was so full of last night's ball that she was not as interested as she would have been had there been nothing else to absorb her.

"Wasn't it lovely, Miss? I watched from my room. They danced on the lawn in the moonlight. My dear life, I never saw such a sight. It was like it used to be when the mistress was here. You look tired, Miss. Did they keep you awake?"

"Yes," I said, "they did."

"Oh well, it's all over now. Mr. Polgrey's already having the plants taken back. The hall do look a sorry mess this morning, I can tell 'ee. It's going to take Daisy and me all day to get it cleared up."

I yawned and she put my hot water by the hip bath and went out. In five minutes' time she was back again. I was half clothed and wrapped a towel about me to shield myself from her inquisitive eyes.

"It's master," she said. "He's asking for you. Wants to see you right away. In the punch room. He said, 'Tell Miss Leigh it is most urgent.'"

I finished washing and dressed quickly. I guessed what this meant. Well, I would be first. I would tell of my decision to leave before he had a chance to dismiss me.

I went down to the punch room prepared for battle.

He was wearing a blue riding jacket and did not look as though he had been up half the night. "Good morning, Miss Leigh," he said and, to my astonishment, he smiled.

I did not return the smile. "Good morning," I said. "I have already packed my bags and should like to leave as soon as possible."

"Miss Leigh!" His voice was reproachful, and I felt an absurd joy rising within me. I was saying to myself, He doesn't want you to go. He's actually going to apologize.

I heard myself say in a high, prim voice which I should have hated in anyone else as self-righteous and priggish, "I consider it the only course open to me after ——"

He cut in: "After my outrageous conduct of last night. Miss Leigh, I am going to ask you to forget that. I fear the excitement of the moment overcame me. I forgot with whom I was dancing. I ask you to overlook my depravity on this occasion, and to say generously—I am sure you are generous, Miss Leigh—we will draw a veil over that unpleasant little incident and go on as we were before."

I had a notion that he was mocking me, but I was suddenly so happy that I did not care.

I inclined my head and said, "I accept your apology, Mr. TreMellyn. We will forget this unpleasant and unfortunate incident."

Then I turned and went out of the room.

I found I was taking the stairs three at a time. My feet were almost dancing as they had been unable to resist dancing last night in the solarium. The incident was over. I was going to stay. The whole house seemed to warm to me. I knew in that moment that if I had to leave this place I should be quite desolate.

I gave Alvean her riding lesson as usual. It went off well and the only remarkable thing about it was that I wore the new riding habit. It was different from the other, for it consisted of a tightly fitting dress of lightweight material and a jacket, tailored almost like a man's.

I was delighted that Alvean showed no signs of fear after her mishap of the day before, and I said that in a few days' time we might attempt a little jumping.

We arrived back at the house and I went to my room to change before tea.

I put on my gray cotton—Aunt Adelaide had warned me that it was advisable not to wear the same dress two days running—and was about to hang up the riding habit in the cupboard when I felt something in the pocket of the coat. I thrust in my hand. There was nothing actually in the pocket, but there was something beneath the silk lining. I laid the jacket on the bed and soon discovered the concealed pocket. In it was a book, a small diary.

My heart beat very fast as I took it out because I knew that this belonged to Alice.

I hesitated a moment, but I could not resist the impulse to look inside. Indeed, I felt in that moment that it was my duty to look inside.

On the flyleaf was written in a rather childish hand "Alice TreMellyn." The date was the previous year.

I turned the leaves. If I had expected a revelation of character, I was soon disappointed. Alice had merely used this as a record for her appointments. I looked at the entries. "Mount Widden to tea." "The Trelanders to dine." "C. to Penzance." "C. due back."

Still, it was written in Alice's handwriting and that made it exciting to me.

I turned to the last entry in the book. It was under the twentieth of August. I looked back to July. Under the fourteenth was written "Treslyns and Trelanders to dine at M.M." "Do not forget see Polgrey about flowers." "If jeweler has not sent brooch by sixteenth go to see him." And on the sixteenth: "Brooch not returned must go along tomorrow morning. Must have it for dinner party at Trelanders on eighteenth."

It all sounded very trivial. I put the bo back into the pocket and went along to ha tea in the schoolroom.

While Alvean and I were reading togethe sudden thought struck me. I didn't know exact date of her death, but it must have be soon after she was writing those trivial thi in her diary. How odd that she should ha thought it worth while to make those entr when she was planning to leave her husba and daughter for another man. It sudde became imperative to know the exact date her death.

Alvean had had tea with her father beca several people had come to pay duty calls a compliment Connan on last night's ball.

Thus I was free to go out alone. So I m my way down to Mellyn village and to churchyard where I presumed Alice's rema would have been buried.

I had not seen much of the village, as I had little opportunity of going except when went to church on Sunday, so it was a tou exploration.

The village nestled about the old church, gray tower of which was half covered in i There was a pleasant little village green an few gray stone houses clustered round among which was a row of very ancient c tages which I guessed were the same age as church. I promised myself that I would mak closer examination of the village later. In meantime I was eager to find Alice's grav

I went through the lich gate and into churchyard. It was very quiet at this time the day. I felt I was surrounded by the still of death and almost wished that I had brou Alvean with me. She could have pointed her mother's grave.

How could I find it among these row gray crosses and headstones, I wondered looked about me helplessly. Then I thou The TreMellyns would no doubt have s grand memorial to their dead. I must look the most splendid vault, and I am sure I s quickly find it.

I saw a huge vault of black marble and not far off. I made for this and quickly covered it to be that of the Nansellock fan

A sudden thought occurred to me. Geof Nansellock would lie here, and he died on same night as Alice. Were they not found c together?

I discovered the inscription engraved or marble. This tomb contained the bones o funct Nansellocks as far back as the mi 1700's. I remembered that the family had been at Mount Widden as early as there been TreMellyns at Mount Mellyn.

Geoffrey's name was naturally the last e on the list of the dead. He had died last on the seventeenth of July.

I was all eagerness to go back and loo the diary and check up that date.

I turned from the tomb, and as I did so Celestine Nansellock coming toward me.

"Miss Leigh!" she cried.

I felt myself flush because I rememb seeing her last night among the guests i solarium, and I wondered what she was th ing of me now.

"I took a stroll down to the villag answered, "and found myself here."

"I see you're looking at my family's tomb."

"Yes. It's a beautiful thing."

"If such a thing can be beautiful. I come here often," she volunteered. "I like to bring a few flowers for Alice."

"Oh, yes," I stammered.

"You saw the TreMellyn vault, I suppose?"

"No."

"It's over here," Celestine told me. "Come and look."

I stumbled across the long grass to the vault, which rivaled that of the Nansellocks in its magnificence.

On the black slab was a vase of Michaelmas daisies—large perfect blooms that looked like mauve stars.

"I've just put them there," she said. "They were her favorite flowers."

Her lips trembled, and I thought she was going to burst into tears.

I looked at the date and saw that it was that on which Geoffrey Nansellock had died.

I said, "I shall have to go back now."

She nodded. She seemed too moved to be able to speak.

It was on the tip of my tongue to tell her about the diary I had discovered, but I hesitated. The memory of last night's shame was too near to me. I might be reminded that I was, after all, only the governess. And what right had I, in any case, to meddle in their affairs?

I left her, and as I went away I saw her sink to her knees. I turned again later and saw that her face was buried in her hands.

I hurried back to the house and took out the diary. So on the seventeenth of July last year, on the day before she was supposed to have eloped with Geoffrey Nansellock, she had written in her diary that as her brooch was not returned she must go to the jeweler the next day as she needed it for a dinner party to be held on the eighteenth! That entry had not been made by a woman who was planning to elope.

I felt that I had almost certain proof in my hands that the body which had been found with Geoffrey Nansellock's on the wrecked train was not Alice's.

I was back at the old question. What had happened to Alice? If she was not lying inside the black marble vault, where was she?

I felt I had discovered a vital clue, but it took me no farther. Sometimes I pondered on several courses of action. I wondered whether I should go to Connan TreMellyn and tell him that I had seen his wife's diary and that it clearly showed she had not been planning to leave.

Then I told myself I did not quite trust Connan TreMellyn, and there was one thought concerning him which I did not want to explore too thoroughly. Suppose Alice was not on the train, and something else happened to her, who would be most likely to know what that was? Could it be Connan TreMellyn?

There was Peter Nansellock. I might discuss this matter with him, but he was too frivolous; he turned every line of conversation toward the flirtatious. So I decided that, for the time being, I would keep my suspicions to myself.

October was upon us. I found the changing seasons delightful in this part of the world. The sea mist would come drifting in, wrapping itself about the gray stone of the house so that from the arbor in the south gardens it would sometimes be completely hidden. The gulls seemed to screech on a melancholy note on such days, as though they were warning us that life was a sorrowful affair. And in the humid climate the hydrangeas continued to flower—blue, pink and yellow—in enormous masses of bloom such as I should not have expected to find outside a hothouse. The roses went on flowering, and with them the fuchsias.

When I went down to the village one day I saw a notice outside the church to the effect that the gymkhana date was fixed for the first of November.

I went back and told Alvean. I was delighted that she had lost none of her enthusiasm for the event. I said, "There's only three weeks. We really ought to get in a little more practice."

She was quite agreeable.

We could, I suggested, rearrange our schedule. Perhaps we could ride for an hour in both the mornings and the afternoons.

She was eager. "I'll see what can be done," I promised.

Connan TreMellyn had gone down to Penzance. I discovered this quite by accident. Kitty told me when she brought in my hot water one evening.

"Master have gone off this afternoon," she said. "'Tis thought he'll be away for a week or more."

"I hope he's back in time for the gymkhana."

"Oh, he'll be back for that. He be one of the judges. He'm always here for that."

I was annoyed with the man. Not that I expected him to tell me he was going; but I did feel he might have had the grace to say good-by to his daughter.

I thought a good deal about him and I found myself wondering whether he had really gone to Penzance. I wondered whether Lady Treslyn was at home, or whether she had found it necessary to pay a visit to some relative.

Really! I admonished myself. Whatever has come over you? How can you entertain such thoughts?

I promised myself that while Connan TreMellyn was away there was no need to think of him, and that would be a relief. I was not entirely lying about that. I did feel relaxed by the thought that he was out of the house.

"Now," I said to Alvean, "we will concentrate on practicing for the gymkhana."

I procured a list of the events. There were two jumping contests for Alvean's age group, and I decided that she should take the elementary one, for I felt that she had a good chance of winning a prize; and of course the whole point was that she should win a prize and astonish her father.

"Look, Miss," said Alvean, "there's this one. Why don't you go in for this?"

"Of course I shall do no such thing. My dear child, I am here to teach you, not to enter competitions."

A mischievous look came into her eyes. "Miss," she said, "I'm going to enter you for that. You'd win. There's nobody here can ride as well as you do!"

She was looking at me with what I construed as shy pride, and I felt a thrill of pleasure. I enjoyed her pride in me. She wanted me to win. Well, why not? There was no rule about social standing in these contests.

I fell back on my stock phrase for ending an embarrassing discussion. "We'll see," I said.

One afternoon we were riding close to Mount Widden and met Peter Nansellock. He was mounted on a beautiful bay mare, the sight of which made my eyes glisten with envy.

He came galloping toward us and pulled up dramatically, removing his hat and bowing from the waist. Alvean laughed delightedly.

"Well met, dear ladies," he cried. "Were you coming to call on us?"

"We were not," I answered.

"How unkind! But now you are here you must come in for a little refreshment."

I was about to protest when Alvean cried, "Oh, do let's, Miss. Yes, please, Uncle Peter, we'll come in."

"I had hoped you would call before this," he said reproachfully.

"We had received no definite invitation," I reminded him.

"For you there is always welcome at Mount Widden. Did I not make that clear?"

He had turned his mare and we all three walked our horses side by side. He followed my gaze, which was fixed on the mare.

"You like her?" he said.

"Indeed I do. She's a beauty."

"She's a real beauty, are you not, Jacinth, my pet?"

"Jacinth. So that's her name."

"Pretty, you're thinking. Pretty name for a pretty creature. She'll go like the wind. She's worth four of that lumbering old cart horse you're riding, Miss Leigh."

"Lumbering old cart horse? How absurd! Dion is a very fine horse."

"Was, Miss Leigh. Was! Do you not think that the creature has seen better days? Really, I should have thought Connan could have given you something better from his stables than poor old Dion."

"It was not a matter of his giving her any horse to ride," said Alvean in hot defense of her father. "He does not know what horses we ride, does he, Miss? These are the horses which Tapperty said we could have."

"Poor Miss Leigh! She should have a mount worthy of her. Miss Leigh, before you go, I would like you to take a turn on Jacinth. She'll quickly show you what it feels like to be on a good mount again."

"Oh," I said lightly, "we're satisfied with what we have. They serve my purpose—which is to teach Alvean to ride."

"We're practicing for the gymkhana," Alvean told him. "I'm going in for one of the events, but don't tell papa; it's to be a surprise."

Peter put his finger to his lips. "Trust me. I'll keep your secret."

"And Miss is entering for one of the events too. I've made her!"

"She'll be victorious," he cried. "I'll make a bet on it."

I said curtly, "I am not at all sure about this. It is only an idea of Alvean's."

We had reached the gates of Mount Widden, which were wide open. There was no lodge here as at Mount Mellyn. We went up the drive, where the same types of flowers grew in profusion—the hydrangeas, fuchsias and fir trees which were indigenous to this part of the country.

I saw the house, gray stone as Mount Mellyn was, but smaller and with fewer outbuildings. I noticed immediately that it was not so well cared for as what in that moment I presumptuously called "our" house and I felt an absurd thrill of pleasure because Mount Mellyn compared so favorably with Mount Widden.

There was a groom in the stables and Peter told him to take charge of our horses. He did so and we went into the house.

Peter clapped his hands and shouted, "Dick! Where are you, Dick?"

The houseboy, whom I had seen when he had been sent to Mount Mellyn with messages, appeared. Peter said, "Tea, Dick, in the library. We have guests."

"Yes, master," said Dick and hurried away.

We were in a hall which seemed quite modern compared with our own hall. The floor was testellated and there was a wide staircase at one end which led to a gallery containing oil paintings, presumably of the Nansellock family.

Peter took us into the library, a huge room, the walls of which were lined with books on three sides. I noticed that the furniture was dusty and that dust was visible in the heavy curtains. What they need, I thought, is a Mrs. Polgrey with her beeswax and turpentine.

"I pray you sit down, dear ladies," said Peter. "It is to be hoped that tea will not long be delayed, although I must warn you that meals are not served with the precision which prevails in our rival across the cove."

"Rival?" I said in surprise.

"Well, how could there fail to be a little rivalry? Here we stand, side by side. But the advantages are all with the grander house. Your father, dear Alvean, is a man of property. We Nansellocks are his poor relations."

"You are not our relations," Alvean reminded him.

"Now is that not strange? One would have thought that, living side by side for generations, the two families would have mingled and become one. There must have been charming TreMellyn girls and charming Nansellock men. How odd that they did not join up and become relations! I suppose the mighty TreMellyns always looked down their arrogant noses at the poor Nansellocks and went farther afield to make their marriages. But now there is the fair Alvean. How maddening that we have no boy of your age to marry you, Alvean. I shall have to wait for you. There is nothing for it but that."

Alvean laughed delightedly. I could see that she was quite fascinated by him. She began to talk about the gymkhana and he listened attentively. I occasionally joined in, and so the time passed until tea was brought to us.

"Miss Leigh, will you honor us by pouring?" Peter asked.

I said I should be happy to do so, and placed myself at the head of the tea table.

Peter watched with attention which I found faintly embarrassing because not only was it admiring, but contented.

"How glad I am that we met," he murmured as Alvean handed him his cup of tea. "To think that, if I had been five minutes earlier or five minutes later, our paths might not have crossed. What a great part chance plays in our lives."

"Possibly we should have met at some other time."

"There may not be much more time left to us." He looked at me seriously. "Miss Leigh, I am going away."

"Where, Uncle Peter?" demanded Alvean.

"Far away, my child, to the other side of the world."

"Soon?" I asked.

"Possibly with the new year."

"But where are you going?" cried Alvean in dismay.

"My dearest child, I believe you are a little hurt at the thought of my departure."

"Uncle, where?" she demanded imperiously.

"To seek my fortune."

"You're teasing. You're always teasing."

"Not this time. I have heard from a friend who was at Cambridge with me. He is in Australia, and there he has made a fortune. Gold! Think of it, Alvean. You, too, Miss Leigh. Lovely gold, which can make a man—or woman—rich. And all one has to do is pluck it out of the ground."

"Many go in the hope of making fortunes," I said, "but are they all successful?"

"There speaks the practical woman. No, Miss Leigh, they are not all successful. But there is something named hope which, I believe, springs eternal in the human breast. All may not have gold, but they can all have hope."

"Of what use is hope if it is proved to be false?"

"Until she is proved false she can give so much pleasure, Miss Leigh."

"But I don't want you to go, Uncle Peter."

"Thank you, my dear. But I shall come back a rich man. Imagine it. Then I shall build a new wing on Mount Widden. I will make a house as grand as—no, grander than—Mount Mellyn. And in the years to come people will say it was Peter Nansellock who saved the family fortunes. For, my dear young ladies, someone has to save them—soon."

He began to talk of his friend who had gone to Australia a penniless young man and was now, he was sure, a millionaire or almost.

I felt exhilarated by his company. He at least, I thought, has never made me feel my position. The very fact of his poverty—or what to him seemed poverty—endeared him to me.

It was an enjoyable teatime. Afterward he took us to the stables and both he and Alvean insisted on my mounting Jacinth, and showing them what I could do with her. My saddle was put on her, and I galloped her and jumped with her, and she responded to my lightest touch. She was a delicious creature and I envied him possession of her.

"Why," he said, "she has taken to you, Miss Leigh. Not a single protest at finding a new rider on her back."

I patted her fondly and said, "She's a beauty." And the sensitive creature seemed to understand.

We then mounted our horses, and Peter came to the gates of Mount Mellyn with us, riding Jacinth.

As we went up to our rooms I decided that it had indeed been a very enjoyable afternoon.

Alvean came to my room and stood for a while, her head on one side. She said, "He likes you, I think, Miss."

"He is merely polite toward me," I replied.

"No, I think he likes you rather specially—in the way he liked Miss Jansen."

"Did Miss Jansen go to tea at Mount Widden?"

"Oh, yes. I didn't have riding lessons with her, but we used to walk over there. And one day we had tea just as we did this afternoon. He'd just bought Jacinth and he showed her to us. He said he was going to change her name to Jacinth. That was Miss Jansen's name."

I felt foolishly deflated. Then I said, "He must have been very sorry when she left so suddenly."

Alvean was thoughtful. "Yes, I think he was. But he soon forgot all about her. After all ——"

I finished the sentence for her: "She was only the governess, of course."

It was later that day when Kitty came up to my room to tell me that there was a message for me from Mount Widden.

"And something more, too, Miss," she said; it was clearly something which excited her.

"Well," I said, "where is the message?"

"In the stables, Miss." She giggled. "Come and see."

I went to the stables, and Kitty followed me at a distance. When I arrived I saw Dick, the Mount Widden houseboy, and, to my astonishment, he had the mare, Jacinth, with him.

> Great beauty, great strength and great riches are really and truly of no great use; a right heart exceeds all.
> BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

He handed me a note. I saw that Daisy, her father and Billy Trehay were all watching me with amused and knowing eyes.

I opened the note and read:

Dear Miss Leigh: You could not hide from me your admiration for Jacinth. I believe she reciprocates your feelings. That is why I am making you a present of her. I could not bear to see such a fine and graceful rider as yourself on poor old Dion. So pray accept this gift.

Your admiring neighbour,
PETER NANSELLOCK.

In spite of efforts to control myself, I felt the hot color rising from my neck to my forehead. How could Peter be so foolish! Was he laughing at me? How could I possibly accept such a gift even if I wanted to? Horses had to be fed and stabled. It was almost as though he had forgotten this was not my home.

"Is there an answer, Miss?" asked Dick.

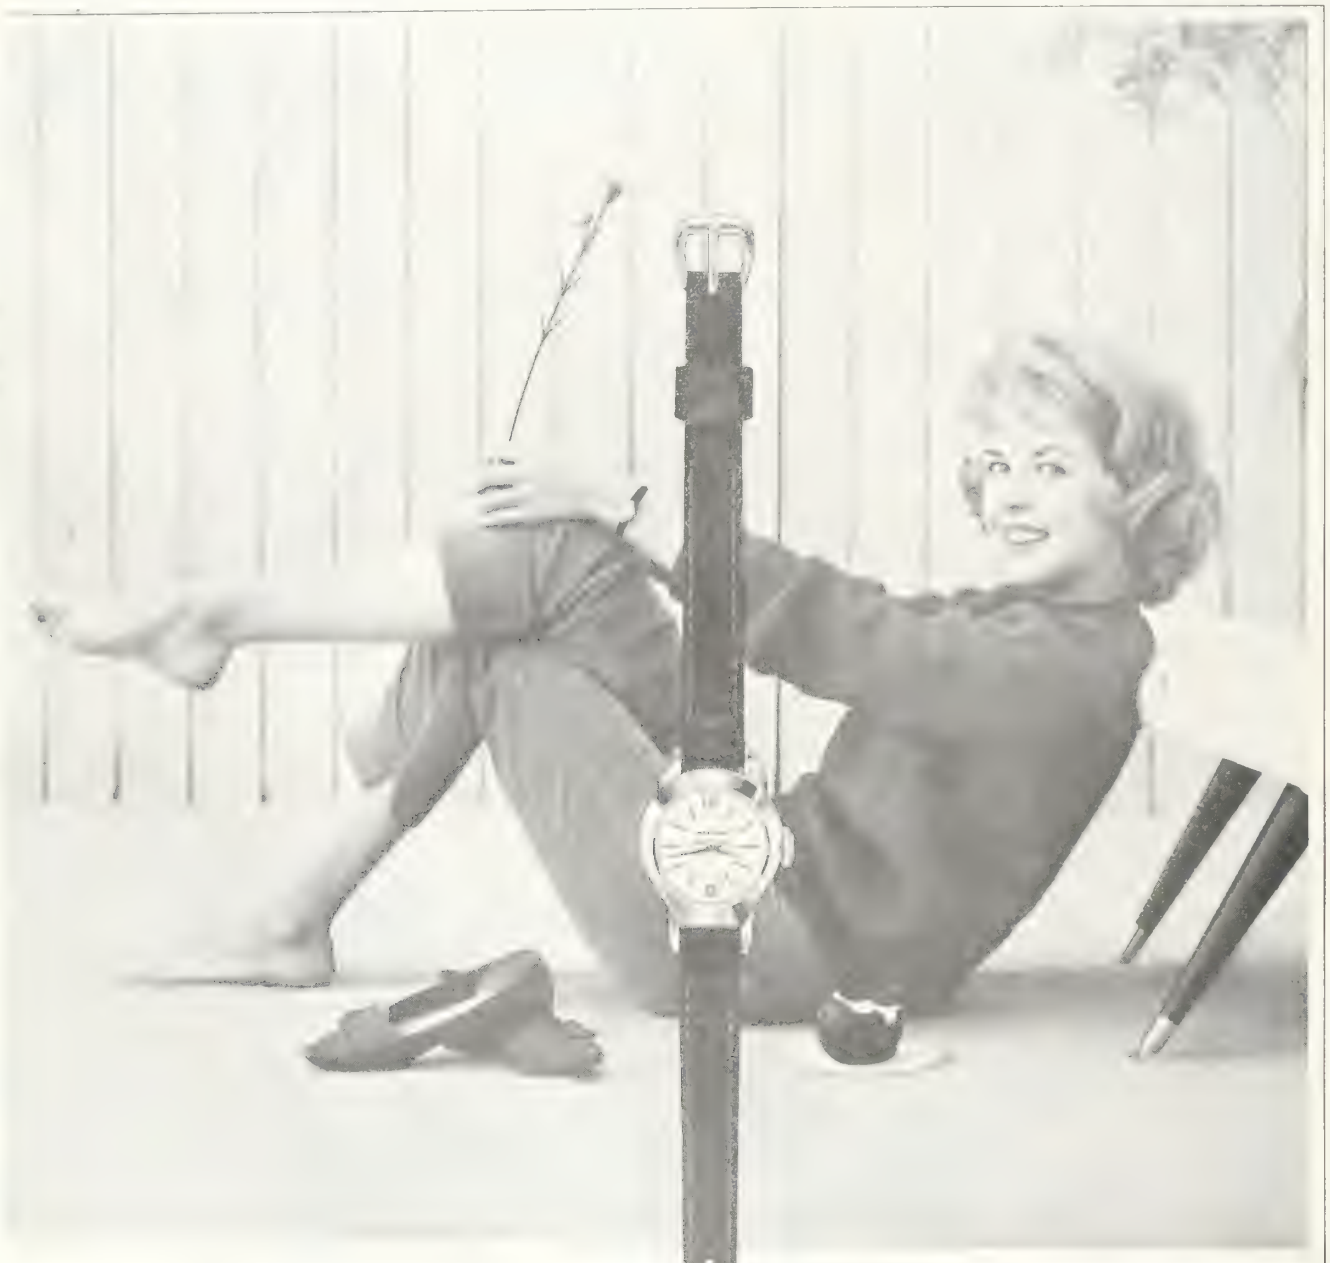
"Indeed there is," I said. "I will go to my room, and you may take it back with you."

I went with as much dignity as I could muster in front of such an array of spectators and in my room I wrote briefly:

Dear Mr. Nansellock: Thank you for your magnificent gift which I am, of course, quite unable to accept. I have no means of keeping a horse here. It may have escaped you that I am employed in this house as a governess. I could not possibly afford the upkeep of Jacinth. Thank you for the kind thought.

Yours truly,
MARTHA LEIGH.

I went straight back to the stables. "Here you are, Dick," I said. "Please take this note to your master with Jacinth."



"But—but," stammered Dick, "I was to leave her here."

I looked straight into Tapperty's lewd face. "Mr. Nansellock," I said, "is fond of playing jokes."

Then I went back to the house.

The next day was a Saturday and Alvean said that, as it was a half holiday, could we take the morning off and go to the moors? Her Great-Aunt Clara had a house there, and she would be pleased to see us.

I considered this. I thought it would be rather pleasant to get away from the house for a few hours. I knew that they must all be talking about me and Peter Nansellock.

I guessed that he had behaved with Miss Jansen as he was behaving with me, and it amused them to see the story of one governess turning out so much like another. And he had not cared when she was dismissed. A fine friend he would be!

We set out after breakfast. It was a beautiful day for riding, for the October sun was not too fierce and there was a soft southwest wind. Alvean was in high spirits, and I thought this would be a good exercise in staying power. If she could manage the long ride to her great-aunt's house and back without fatigue, I should be delighted.

I warned Alvean to be watchful of boulders, but she was sure-seated and alert now, so I did not feel greatly concerned.

We studied the map which would guide us to Great-Aunt Clara's house—a few miles south of Bodmin. Alvean had traveled there in a carriage once or twice and thought she would know the road; but the moor was the easiest place in the world in which to lose oneself, and I thought that we could profit by the occasion to learn a little map reading.

But I had left a great deal of my severity behind and found myself laughing with Alvean when we took the wrong road and had to retrace our steps.

At length we reached "The House on the Moors," which was the picturesque name of

One post card a year can wreck their home

Eric Simpson tells the heartbreaking story of foster parents who may keep their little girls only by proving the "real" mother has abandoned them. Yet if she sends just one post card a year, the law considers her "in touch." What is a "real" mother—and what is best for the child?

My wife has always been unfair to my parents

"Ivy thinks I'm a mama's boy," said thirty-five-year-old Tod. "It isn't true. I enjoy my mother's company more than I enjoy hers, but so would any other man in my shoes." See if you agree with him in next month's "Can This Marriage Be Saved?"

Strawberries under the maples

The strawberry festival at Appleyard Center (to help pay for the new church organ) features a towering pink whipped-cream mold, a strawberry-cream cake, "gingham" muffins, baked ham with barbecue sauce, tangy shrimp-and-coleslaw aspic, and strawberries, strawberries, strawberries. To read these recipes is to yearn.

FEMS IS A TRADEMARK OF KIMBERLY-CLARK CORP.

Now! A better-fitting napkin you can wear and forget!

You're confident . . . carefree . . . ready for all outdoors. At long last, here's a feminine napkin you can wear and forget!

Fems feminine napkins fit better and absorb better. Long enough to fit securely—yet there's not an ounce of extra bulk.

Now your napkin stays put even under stress, thanks to the extra length of the tab ends. What a wonderful feeling of security!

Forget about stains. Wear your nicest things, knowing there's a protective safety-cushion to prevent accidents, whether you're seated or moving about.

Forget about shifting and binding. Better-fitting Fems feminine napkins are made to adjust to your body without discomfort.

Forget about chafing. Touch the chafe-free covering to the inside of your wrist, where your skin is extra sensitive. No wonder Fems bring welcome relief from chafing. Fems absorb quickly. That's another protection against chafing. And both the covering and inner materials are designed to keep surfaces comfortably dry, even during the heaviest flow.

TRY THE NEW FEMS BELT. Its long-wearing elastic won't curl or cut. The slip-proof nylon clasp won't dig or break. Napkins attach easily and firmly. Next time, wear Fems feminine napkins with a Fems belt—and learn how freedom feels!

Great-Aunt Clara's home. And a charming house it was, indeed, set on the outskirts of a moorland village. There were the church, the little inn, the few houses and the House on the Moors, which was like a small manor house.

Great-Aunt Clara lived here with three servants to minister to her wants, and when we arrived there was great excitement.

"Why, bless my soul if it b'aint Miss Alvean!" cried an elderly housekeeper. "And who be this you have brought with 'ee, my dear?"

"It is Miss Leigh, my governess," said Alvean.

"Well now! And be there just the two on you? And b'aint your papa here?"

"No. Papa has gone to Penzance."

I wondered if I should be banished to the kitchen to eat with the servants. But I was soon reassured. We were taken into a drawing room and there was Great-Aunt Clara, a charming old lady seated in an armchair, white-haired, pink-cheeked with bright friendly eyes. There was an ebony stick beside her, so I guessed she had difficulty in walking.

Alvean ran to her and was warmly embraced. Then the lively blue eyes were on me.

"So you are Alvean's governess, my dear," she said. "How thoughtful of you to bring her to see me. It is particularly fortunate just now, for I have my grandson staying with me and I fear that he grows a little weary of having no playmate of his own age around. When he hears that Alvean has arrived, he'll be quite excited."

I did not believe that the grandson could be any more excited than Great-Aunt Clara herself. She was certainly charming to me, so much so that I forgot my diffidence and I really did feel like a friend calling on a friend, rather than a governess bringing her charge to see a relative.

Dandelion wine was brought out and we were pressed to take a glass. There were wine cakes with it, and I must say I found the wine delicious.

Great-Aunt Clara wished to hear all the news of Mount Mellyn. She was indeed a garrulous lady, and I guessed it was due to the fact that she lived a somewhat lonely life in her house on the moors.

The grandson appeared—a handsome boy a little younger than Alvean—and the pair of them went off to play, although I warned Alvean not to go far away, as we must be home before dark.

As soon as Alvean had left us I saw that Great-Aunt Clara was eager for a real gossip.

She spoke of Alice as I had not heard her spoken of—with complete candor. I quickly realized that from this gossipy lady I was going to discover a great deal more than I could from anyone else.

As soon as we were alone she said, "Now tell me how things really are at Mount Mellyn."

I raised my eyebrows as though I did not fully comprehend her meaning.

She went on: "It was such a shock when poor Alice died. Such a tragic thing to happen to such a young girl—for she was little more than a girl."

"Is that so?"

"Don't tell me you haven't heard what happened?"

"I know very little about it."

"Alice and Geoffrey Nansellock, you know. They went off together—eloped. And then this terrible accident."

"I have heard that there was an accident."

"I think of them—those two young people—quite often. And then I blame myself."

I was astonished. I did not understand how this gentle, talkative old lady could blame herself for Alice's infidelity to her husband.

"One should never interfere in other people's lives. Or should one? What do you think, my dear? If one can be helpful ——"

"Yes," I said firmly, "if one can be helpful I think one should be forgiven for interference."

"But how is one to know whether one is being helpful, or the reverse? I think of her so much—my poor little niece. She was a sweet creature. But, shall I say, not equipped to face the cruelties of fate."

"Oh, was she like that?"

"I can see that you, Miss Leigh, are good for that poor child. Alice would be so happy if she could see what you've done for her. The last time I saw her she was with her—with Connan. She was not nearly so happy—so relaxed as she is today."

"I'm glad of that. I am encouraging her to ride. I think that has done her a world of good." I was loath to interrupt that flow of talk from which I might extract some fresh evidence about Alice. I was afraid that at any moment Alvean and the grandson would return, and I knew that in their presence there would be no confidences. "You were telling me about Alvean's mother. I am sure you have nothing with which to reproach yourself."

"I wish I could believe that. Alice stayed with me before her marriage. Here—in the house. It was so convenient, you see. It was only a few hours' ride from Mount Mellyn. It gave the young people a chance to know each other."

"The young people?"

"The engaged pair."

"Did they not know each other then?" I asked.

"The marriage had been arranged when they were in their cradles. She brought him a lot of property. They were well matched. Both rich, both of good families. Connan's father was alive then and, you know, Connan was a wild boy with a will of his own. The feeling was that they should be married as soon as possible."

"So he allowed this marriage to be arranged for him?"

"They both took it as a matter of course. Well, she stayed with me several months before the wedding. I loved her dearly."

I thought of little Gilly and I said, "I think a great many people loved her dearly."

Great-Aunt Clara nodded. And at that moment Alvean and the grandson came in. "I want to show Alvean my drawings," he announced.

"Well, go and get them," said his grandmother. "Bring them down and show her here."

I believed that she realized she had talked a little too much and was afraid of her own garrulity. It was clear to me that she was the sort of woman who could never keep a secret; how could she when she was ready to confide family history to me, a stranger?

The grandson returned with his portfolio, and the children sat at the table. I went over to them and was so proud of Alvean's attempts at drawing that I determined to speak to her father about that at the first opportunity.

Yet as I watched, I felt frustrated. I was sure that Great-Aunt Clara had been on the point of confiding something to me which was of the utmost importance.

Aunt Clara gave us luncheon and we left immediately after. We found our way back with ease, but I was determined to ride out again, and that before long, to the house on the moors.

When I was strolling through the village one day I passed the little jeweler's shop. But perhaps that was scarcely the term to use when describing it. There were no valuable gems in the window; a few silver brooches and plain gold rings, some engraved with the word Mizpah, or studded with semiprecious stones such as turquoises, topazes and garnets.

All who have meditated on the art of governing mankind have been convinced that the fate of empires depends on the education of youth.

ARISTOTLE

I guessed that the villagers bought their engagement and wedding rings here and that the jeweler made a living by doing repairs.

I saw in the window a brooch in the form of a whip. It was of silver, and quite tasteful, although it was by no means expensive. I wanted to buy that whip for Alvean and give it to her the night before the gymkhana, telling her that it was to bring her luck.

I opened the door and went down the three steps into the shop.

Seated behind the counter was an old man wearing steel-rimmed spectacles. He let his glasses fall to the tip of his nose as he peered at me.

"I want to see the brooch you have in the window," I said. "The silver one in the form of a whip."

"Oh yes, miss," he said, "I'll show it to you with pleasure."

He brought it from the window and handed it to me. "Here," he said, "pin it on and have a look at it." He indicated the little mirror on the counter.

As I was looking at it I noticed a tray of ornaments with little tickets attached to them. They were clearly jewelry which he had received for repair. Then I wondered whether this was the jeweler to whom Alice had brought her brooch last July.

The jeweler said to me, "You're from Mount Mellyn, miss?"

"Yes," I said; and smiled encouragingly. "As a matter of fact, I want to give the brooch to my pupil."

Like most people in small villages, he was interested in those living around him. "Ah," he said, "poor motherless little girl. It's heartening to think she has a kind lady like yourself to look after her now."

"I'll take the brooch," I told him.

"I'll find a little box for it. A nice little box makes all the difference when it be a matter of a present."

He bent and from under the counter brought a small cardbox which he began to stuff with cotton wool.

"Make a little nest for it, miss," he said with a smile.

I fancied that he was loath to let me go.

"Don't see much of them from the Mount these days. Mrs. TreMellyn, her was often in," he told me.

"Yes, I suppose so."

"See a little trinket in the window and she'd buy it—sometimes for herself, sometimes for others. Why, she was in here the day she died."

His voice had sunk to a whisper and I felt excitement grip me. I thought of Alice's diary which was still in the concealed pocket of her habit.

"Really?" I said encouragingly.

He laid the brooch on the cotton wool and looked at me. "I thought 'twas a little odd at the time. I remember it clearly. She came in here and said to me, 'Have you got the brooch done, Mr. Pastern? It's very important that I should have it. I'm anxious to wear it tomorrow. I'm going to a dinner party at Mr. and Mrs. Trelander's, and Mrs. Trelander gave me that brooch as a Christmas present so you see it's important I should wear it to show her I appreciate it.'"

His eyes were puzzled as they looked into mine. "She were a lady who talked like that. She'd tell you where she was going, why she wanted a thing. I couldn't believe my ears when I heard she'd left home that very evening. Didn't seem possible that she could have been telling me about the dinner party she was going to the next day, you see."

"No," I said, "it was certainly very strange."

"You see, miss, there was no need for her to say anything to me like. If she'd said it to some it might seem as though she was trying to pull the wool over their eyes. But why should she say such a thing to me? That's what I've been wondering. Sometimes I think of it—and still wonder."

"I expect there's an answer," I said. "Perhaps you misunderstood her."

He shook his head. He did not believe that he had misunderstood. Nor did I.

unless they're unusually large or are causing other complications. But fibroids can complicate pregnancy, especially the pedunculated ones. Interestingly enough, during the rapid pregnancy growth of the uterus, fibroids grow at the same exaggerated rate. Then after childbirth they usually shrink back to their original size. They can make a pregnant woman pretty uncomfortable, or even cause loss of a baby in pregnancy. On the other hand, it's amazing how normal a labor can be even with a big fibroid or a number of them."

"You don't always remove the fibroids, then, when a woman is pregnant?"

"No indeed. Very seldom, in fact. We don't operate during pregnancy unless the fibroids are a real threat to mother or baby. And we don't perform hysterectomy in younger women because of fibroids unless special circumstances make it mandatory."

"I see. And in all this, where is the 'honest disagreement' you spoke of among doctors?"

"Well, first there can be wide differences of opinion as to when a tumor is too big. But the difference I was speaking of concerns women who are in, or approaching, the menopause. It's no longer so important for them to keep their reproductive organs, so when a fibroid or fibroids are discovered, there are some who argue for routine hysterectomy. Their thought is that taking out the uterus removes any possibility of trouble, from the fibroids, or from the uterus itself."

"Only you don't agree!"

"Not as a routine measure. Let's take your case. You have had your fibroid for a good ten years. It never reached a size or produced symptoms that, in my opinion, called for surgical intervention. Now, at the age of forty-five, you no longer experience even the symptoms you used to have. There is no evidence of fixation of the organs, which often happens when a pelvic condition is more serious. And your fibroid is smaller than it was the last time I saw you, five years ago. Which is just what I would expect in a woman your age."

"But you said these lumps grew!"

"Ah, but they don't necessarily continue to grow at an abnormal rate. Even in younger women, they may reach a certain stage and then stop growing—for no apparent reason. They are particularly likely to stop developing at the menopausal period. The fibroid tissue is subject to exactly the same hormonal influences as the uterus and other female reproductive organs. When the ovaries begin to wane a little, the fibroids are very apt to wane a little too.

"This helps explain the difference of opinion between Dr. Hargreaves and me. He hasn't watched you for years, and has no way of comparing your tumor as it is today with the way it used to be.

"If your tumor were bigger now than it was before, and your symptoms worse, I would be disturbed myself. Or if you started bleeding uncontrollably, as sometimes happens, we would be forced to operate. In your case, an operation would mean a hysterectomy because the tumor seems to be within the wall of the uterus, inextricably mixed with the body of the uterus. But I honestly see no need for surgery as things stand now."

"Without surgery, what is likely to happen?"

"I'd expect your tumor to grow smaller and less bothersome with the passage of years. My advice is the same as it always was: have it watched carefully, checked at regular intervals. You should have occasional smear tests to indicate that no cancer cells are developing. That's good advice for every woman your age. Any unusual bleeding or return of pressure symptoms should be reported to the doctor at once."

"In other words," said Mrs. Fordyce happily, "go on exactly as I've been doing! That suits me. But oh, dear, what about Dr. Hargreaves?"

"I suspect it will be easier than you think to get him to agree with us. Tell him I followed your fibroid for years, and that my opinion is based on comparative observations. I'll talk the situation over with him myself, if you like, too.

"I'm sure he'll go along with us for three months, at least, before proposing anything radical. If your tumor behaves as well during that time as it has recently, I think he'll be on our side from then on!"

Next month Dr. Schauffler discusses Rh incompatibility.

LOUISA, PLEASE . . .

expected. Everyone was hurrying around the house putting up flowers and asking one another if the wedding gown had been delivered, and opening up cases of champagne and wondering what they were going to do if it rained and they couldn't use the garden, and I just closed the front door behind me and started off. There was only one bad minute, when Paul saw me; Paul has always lived next door and Carole hates him worse than she does me. My mother always used to say that every time I did something to make the family ashamed of me Paul was sure to be in it somewhere. For a long time they thought he had something to do with my running away, even though he told them over and over again how hard I tried to duck away from him that afternoon when he met me going down the driveway. The papers kept calling him "a close friend of the family," which must have overjoyed my mother, and saying that he was being questioned about possible clues to my whereabouts. Of course he never even knew that I was running away; I told him just what I told my mother before I left: that I was going to get away from all the confusion and excitement for a while; I was going downtown and would probably have a sandwich somewhere for supper and go to a movie. He bothered me for a minute; he wanted to come too. I hadn't meant to take the bus right there on the corner, but with Paul tagging after me and wanting me to wait while he got the car so we could drive out and have dinner at the inn, I had to get away fast on the first thing that came along, so I just ran for the bus and left Paul standing there; that was the only part of my plan I had to change.

I took the bus all the way downtown, although my first plan had been to walk. It turned out much better, actually, since it didn't matter at all if anyone saw me on the bus going downtown in my own home town, and I managed to get an earlier train out. I bought a round-trip ticket; that was important, because it would make them think I was coming back—that was always the way they thought about things. If you did something you had to have a reason for it, because my mother and my father and Carole never did anything unless they had a reason for it, so if I bought a round-trip ticket the only possible reason would be that I was coming back. Besides, if they thought I was coming back they would not be frightened so quickly and I might have more time to hide before they came looking for me. As it happened, Carole found out I was gone that same night when she couldn't sleep and came into my room for some aspirin, so all the time I had less of a head start than I thought.

I knew that they would find out about my buying the ticket; I was not silly enough to suppose that I could steal off and not leave any traces. All my plans were based on the fact that the people who get caught are the ones who attract attention by doing something strange or noticeable, and what I intended all along was to fade into some background, where they would never see me. I knew they would find out about the round-trip ticket, because it was an odd thing to do the day before your sister's wedding, but it was the last unusual thing I did. I thought when I bought it that knowing about that round-trip ticket would be some consolation to my mother and father. They would know that no matter how long I stayed away at least I always had a ticket home. I did keep the return-trip ticket quite a while, as a matter of fact. I used to carry it in my wallet as a kind of lucky charm.

I followed everything in the papers. Mrs. Peacock and I used to read them at the table over our second cup of coffee before I went off to work.

"What do you think about this girl disappeared over in Rockville?" Mrs. Peacock would say to me, and I'd shake my head sorrowfully and say that a girl must be really crazy to leave a handsome, luxurious home like that, or that I had kind of a notion that maybe she didn't leave at all—maybe the family had her locked up somewhere because she was a homicidal maniac. Mrs. Peacock always loved anything about homicidal maniacs.

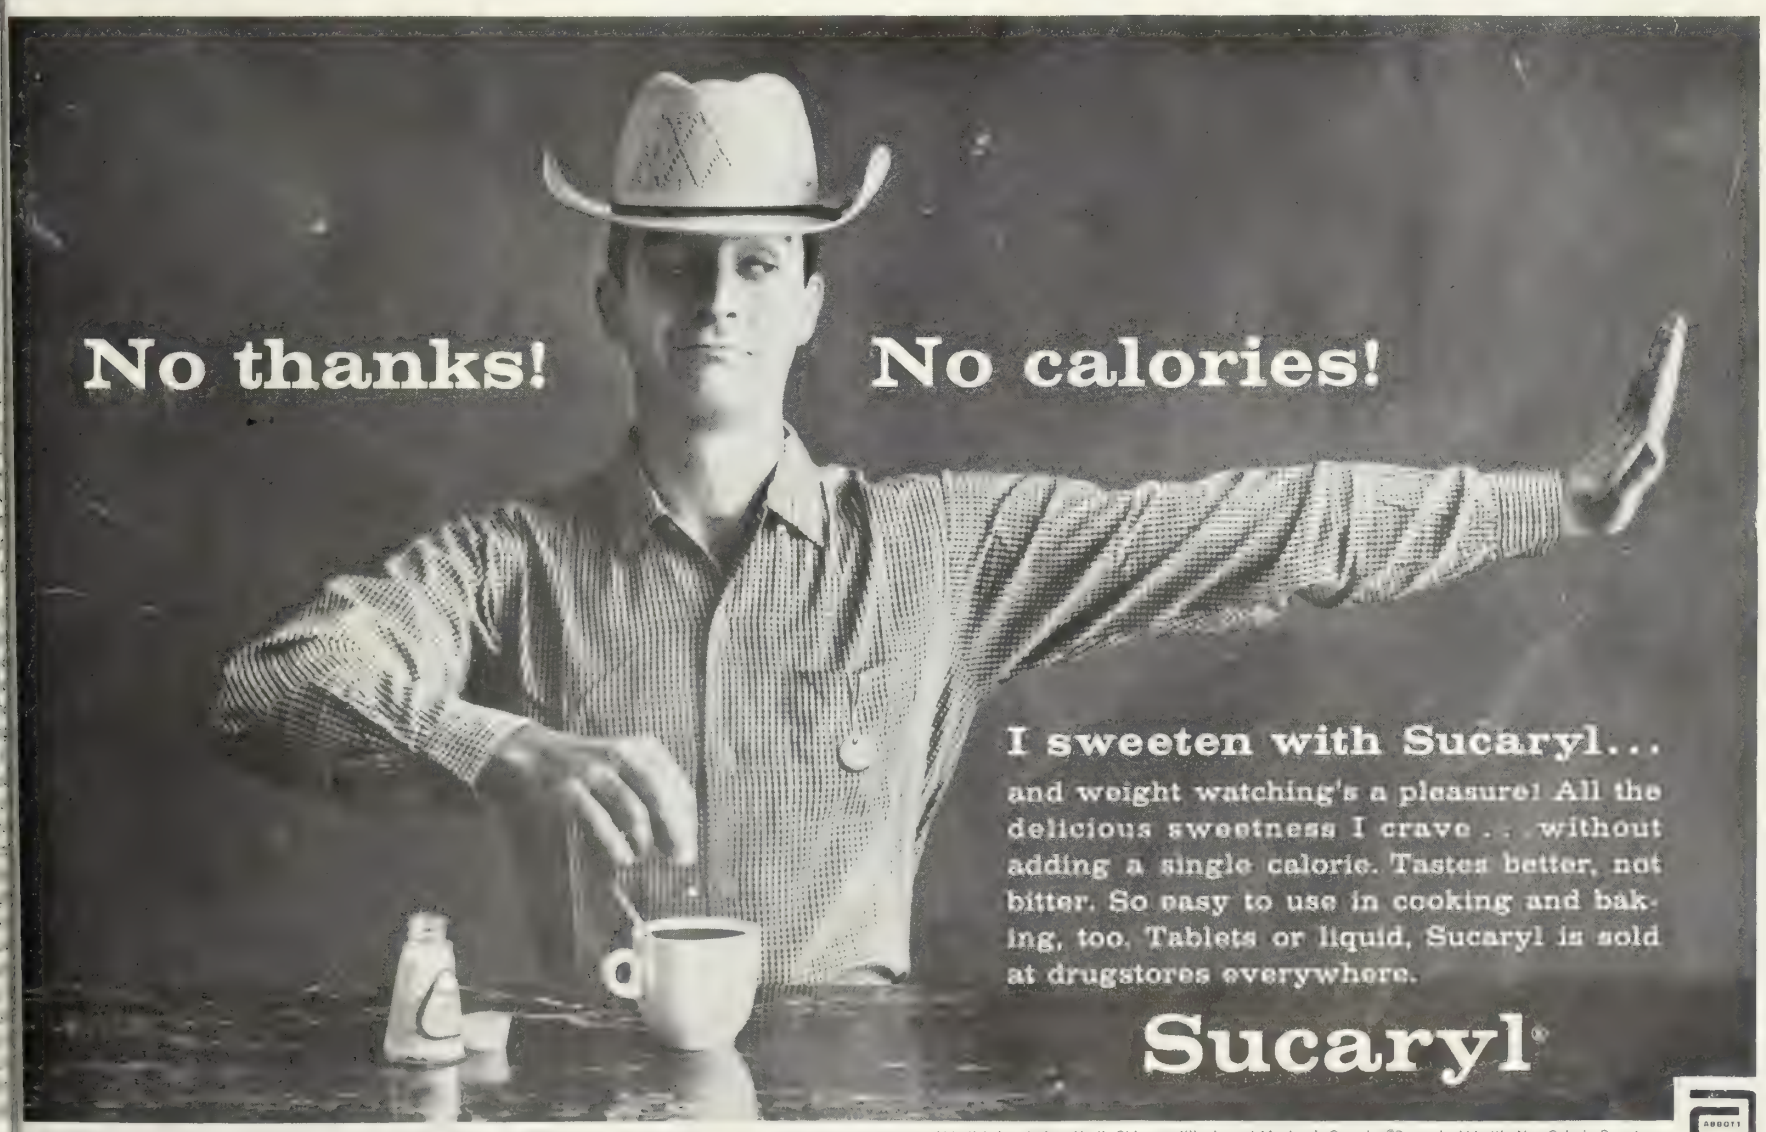
Once I picked up the paper and looked hard at the picture. "Do you think she looks something like me?" I asked Mrs. Peacock, and Mrs. Peacock leaned back and looked at me and then at the picture and then at me again and finally she shook her head and said, "No. If you wore your hair longer, and curlier, and your face was maybe a little fuller, there might be a little resemblance, but then if you looked like a homicidal maniac I wouldn't ever of let you in my house."

"I think she kind of looks like me," I said.

"You get along to work and stop being vain." Mrs. Peacock told me.

Of course when I got on the train with my round-trip ticket I had no idea how soon they'd be following me, and I suppose it was just as well, because it might have made me nervous and I might have done something wrong and spoiled everything. I knew that as soon as they gave up the notion that I was coming back to Rockville with my round-trip ticket they would think of Crain, which is the largest city that train went to, so I stayed in Crain only part of one day. I went to a big department store where they were having a store-wide sale; I figured that would land me in a crowd of shoppers and I was right: for a while there was a good chance that I'd never get any farther away from home than the ground floor of that department store in Crain. I had to fight my way through the crowd until I found the counter where they were having a sale of raincoats, and then I had to push and elbow down the counter and finally grab the raincoat I wanted right out of the hands of some old monster who couldn't have used it anyway because she was much too fat. You would have thought she had already paid for it, the way she howled. I was smart enough to have the exact change, all six dollars and eighty-nine cents, right in my hand, and I gave it to the salesgirl, grabbed the raincoat and the bag she wanted to put it in, and fought my way out again before I got crushed to death.

That raincoat was worth every cent of the six dollars and eighty-nine cents; I wore it right through until winter that year and not even a button ever came off it. I finally lost it the next spring when I left it somewhere and never got it back. It was tan, and the minute I put it on in the ladies' room of the store I began thinking of it as my "old" raincoat; that was good. I had never before owned a raincoat like that and my mother would have fainted dead away. One thing I did that I thought was kind of clever. I had left home wearing a light short coat, almost a jacket, and when I put on the raincoat of course I took off my light coat. Then all I had to do was empty the pockets of the light coat into the raincoat and carry the light coat casually over to a counter where they were having a sale of jackets and drop it on the counter as though I'd taken it off a little way to look at it and had decided against it. As far as I ever knew, no one paid the slightest attention to me, and I saw a woman pick up my jacket and look it over; I could have told her she was getting a bargain for three ninety-eight.



It made me feel good to know that I had got rid of the light coat. My mother picked it out for me and even though I liked it and it was expensive, it was also recognizable and I had to change it somehow. I was sure that if I put it in a bag and dropped it into a river or into a garbage truck or something like that sooner or later it would be found and even if no one saw me doing it, it would almost certainly be found, and then they would know I had changed my clothes in Crain.

That light coat never turned up. The last they ever saw of me was someone from Rockville who caught a glimpse of me in the train station in Crain, and she recognized me by the light coat. They never found out where I went after that; it was partly luck and partly my clever planning. Two or three days later the papers were still reporting that I was in Crain; people thought they saw me on the streets and one girl who went into a store to buy a dress was picked up by the police and held until she could get someone to identify her. They were really looking, but they were looking for Louisa Tether, and I had stopped being Louisa Tether the minute I got rid of that light coat my mother bought me.

One thing I was relying on: there must be thousands of girls in the country on any given day who are nineteen years old, fair-haired, five feet four inches tall and weighing one hundred and twenty-six pounds. And if there are thousands of girls like that, there must be, among those thousands, a good number who are wearing shapeless tan raincoats; I started counting tan raincoats in Crain after I left the department store and I passed four in one block so I felt well hidden. After that I made myself even more invisible by doing just what I told my mother I was going to—I stopped in and had a sandwich in a little coffee shop, and then I went to a movie. I wasn't in any hurry at all, and rather than try to find a place to sleep I thought I would sleep on the train.

It's funny how no one pays any attention to you at all. There were hundreds of people who saw me that day, and even a sailor who tried to pick me up in the movie, and yet no one really saw me. If I had tried to check into a hotel the desk clerk might have noticed me, or if I had tried to get dinner in some fancy restaurant in that cheap raincoat I would have been conspicuous, but I was doing what any other girl looking like me and dressed like me might be doing that day. The only person who might be apt to remember me would be the man selling tickets in the railroad station, because girls looking like me in old raincoats didn't buy train tickets, usually, at eleven at night, but I had thought of that, too, of course: I bought a ticket to Amityville, sixty miles away, and what made Amityville a perfectly reasonably disguise is that at Amityville there is a college, not a little fancy place like the one I had left so recently with nobody's blessing, but a big sprawling friendly affair, where my raincoat would look perfectly at home. I told myself I was a student coming back to the college after a weekend at home. We got to Amityville after midnight, but it still didn't look odd when I left the train and went into the station, because while I was in the station, having a cup of coffee and killing time, seven other girls—I counted—wearing raincoats like mine came in or went out, not seeming to think it the least bit odd to be getting on or off trains at that hour of the night. Some of them had suitcases, and I wished that I had had some way of getting a suitcase in Crain, but it would have made me noticeable in the movie, and college girls going home for weekends often don't bother; they have pajamas and an extra pair of stockings at home, and they drop a toothbrush into one of the pockets of those invaluable raincoats. So I didn't worry about the suitcase then, although I knew I would need one soon. While I was having my coffee I made my own mind change from the idea that I was a college girl coming back after a weekend at home to the idea that I was a college girl who was on her way home for a few days; all the time I tried to think as much as possible like what I was pretending to be, and after all, I had been a college girl for a while. I was thinking that even now the letter was in the mail, traveling as fast as the U.S. Government could make it go, right to my father to tell him why I wasn't a college student any more; I suppose that was what finally decided me to run away, the thought of what my father would think and say and do when he got that letter from the college.

That was in the paper too. They decided that the college business was the reason for my running away; but if that had been all, I don't think I would have left. No, I had been wanting to leave for so long, ever since I can remember, making plans till I was sure they were foolproof, and that's the way they turned out to be.

Sitting there in the station at Amityville, I tried to think myself into a good reason why I was leaving college to go home on a Monday night late, when I would hardly be going home for the weekend. As I say, I always tried to think as hard as I could the way that suited whatever I wanted to be, and I liked to have a good reason for what I was doing. Nobody ever asked me, but it was good to know that I could answer them if they did. I finally decided that my sister was getting married the next day and I was going home now at the beginning of the week to be one of her bridesmaids. I thought that was funny. I didn't want to be going home for any sad or frightening reason, like my mother being sick, or my father being hurt in a car accident, because I would have to look sad, and that might attract attention. So I was going home for my sister's wedding. I wandered around the station as though I had nothing to do, and just happened to pass the door when another girl was going out; she had on a raincoat just like mine and anyone who happened to notice would have thought that it was me who went out. Before I bought my ticket I went into the ladies' room and got another twenty dollars out of my shoe. I had nearly three hundred dollars left of the money I had taken from my father's desk and I had most of it in my shoes because I honestly couldn't think of another safe place to carry it. All I kept in my pocketbook was just enough for whatever I had to spend next. It's uncomfortable walking around all day on a wad of bills in your shoes, but they were good solid shoes, the kind of comfortable old shoes you wear whenever you don't really care how you look, and I had put new shoelaces in them before I left home so I could tie them good and tight. You can see, I planned pretty carefully, and no little detail got left out. If they had let me plan my sister's wedding there would have been a lot less of that running around and screaming and hysterics.

I bought a ticket to Chandler, which is the biggest city in this part of the state, and the place I'd been heading for all along. It was a good place to hide because people from Rockville tended to bypass it unless they had some special reason for going there: if they couldn't find the doctors or orthodontists or psychoanalysts or dress material they wanted in Rockville or Crain, they went directly to one of the really big cities, like the state capital; Chandler was big enough to hide in, but not big enough to look like a metropolis to people from Rockville. The ticket seller in the Amityville station must have seen a good many college girls buying tickets for Chandler at all hours of the day or night because he took my money and shoved the ticket at me without even looking up.

Funny. They must have come looking for me in Chandler at some time or other, because it's not likely they would have neglected any possible place I might be, but maybe Rockville people never seriously believed that anyone would go to Chandler from choice, because I never felt for a minute that anyone was looking for me there. My picture was in the Chandler papers, of course, but as far as I ever knew no one ever looked at me twice, and I got up every morning and went to work and went shopping in the stores and went to movies with Mrs. Peacock and went out to the beach all that summer without ever being afraid of being recognized. I behaved just like everyone else, and dressed just like everyone else, and even thought just like everyone else, and the only person I ever saw from Rockville in three years was a friend of my mother's, and I knew she came to Chandler only to get her poodle bred at the kennels there. She didn't look like she was in a state to recognize anybody but another poodle fancier, anyway, and all I had to do was step into a doorway as she went by, and she never looked at me.

Two other college girls got on the train to Chandler when I did; maybe both of them were going home for their sisters' weddings. Neither of them was wearing a tan raincoat, but one of them had on an old blue jacket that gave the same general effect. I fell asleep as soon as the train started, and once I woke up and for a minute I wondered where I was and then I realized that I was doing it, I was actually carrying out my careful plan and had got better than halfway with it, and I almost laughed, there in the train with everyone asleep around me. Then I went back to sleep and didn't wake up until we got into Chandler about seven in the morning.

So there I was. I had left home just after lunch the day before, and now at seven in the morning of my sister's wedding day I was so far away, in every sense, that I knew they would never find me. I had all day to get myself settled in Chandler, so I started off by having breakfast in a restaurant near the station, and then went off to find a place to live, and a job. The first thing I did was buy a suitcase, and it's funny how people don't really notice you if you're buying a suitcase near a railroad station. Suitcases look natural near railroad stations, and I picked out one of those stores that sell a little bit of everything, and bought a cheap suitcase and a pair of stockings and some handkerchiefs and a little traveling clock, and I put everything into the suitcase and carried that. Nothing is hard to do unless you get upset or excited about it.

Later on, when Mrs. Peacock and I used to read in the papers about my disappearing, I asked her once if she thought that Louisa Tether had got as far as Chandler and she didn't. "They're saying now she was kidnaped," Mrs. Peacock told me, "and that's what I think happened. Kidnaped, and mur dered, and they do terrible things to young girl they kidnap."

"But the papers say there wasn't any ran som note."

"That's what they say." Mrs. Peacoc shook her head at me. "How do we kno what the family is keeping secret? Or if sh was kidnaped by a homicidal maniac, wh would he send a ransom note? Young girl like you don't know a lot of the things that g on, I can tell you."

"I feel kind of sorry for the girl," I said.

"You can't ever tell," Mrs. Peacock saic "Maybe she went with him willingly."

I didn't know, that first morning in Chanc ler, that Mrs. Peacock was going to turn u that day, the luckiest thing that ever hap pened to me. I decided while I was havin breakfast that I was going to be a nineteer year-old girl from upstate with a nice fam ily and a good background who had bee saving money to come to Chandler an take a secretarial course in the business scho there. I was going to have to find some kind c job to keep on earning money while I went t school; courses at the business school wouldn start until fall, so I would have the summer t work and save money and decide if I reall wanted to take secretarial training. If I d cided not to stay in Chandler I could easi go somewhere else after the fuss about n running away had died down. The rainco looked wrong for the kind of conscientio young girl I was going to be, so I took it c and carried it over my arm. I think I did pretty good job on my clothes, altogeth Before I left home I decided that I would ha to wear a suit, as quiet and unobtrusive as could find, and I picked out a gray suit, with white blouse, so with just one or two sm changes like a different blouse or some kir of pin on the lapel, I could look like whoev I decided to be. Now the suit looked abs lutely right for a young girl planning to take secretarial course, and I looked like a thou sand other people when I walked down t street carrying my suitcase and my rainco r my arm; people get off trains every min-looking just like that. I bought a morning er and stopped in a drugstore for a cup of ee and a look to see the rooms for rent. It all so usual—suitcase, coat, rooms for —that when I asked the soda clerk how to to Primrose Street he never even looked at He certainly didn't care whether I ever got Primrose Street or not, but he told me very tely where it was and what bus to take. I n't really need to take the bus for economy, it would have looked funny for a girl who saving money to arrive in a taxi.

I'll never forget how you looked that first rning," Mrs. Peacock told me once, much r. "I knew right away you were the kind of I like to rent rooms to—quiet, and well nnered. But you looked almighty scared of big city."

I wasn't scared," I said. "I was worried ut finding a nice room. My mother told so many things to be careful about I was id I'd never find anything to suit her."

*Any*body's mother could come into my se at any time and know that her daughter in good hands," Mrs. Peacock said, a lit-nuffy.

ut it was true. When I walked into Mrs. cock's rooming house on Primrose Street, met Mrs. Peacock, I knew that I couldn't e done this part better if I'd been able to n it. The house was old, and comfortable, my room was nice, and Mrs. Peacock and t it off right away. She was very pleased n me when she heard that my mother had me to be sure the room I found was clean that the neighborhood was good, with no nce of rowdies' following a girl if she came ne after dark, and she was even more sed when she heard that I wanted to save ney and take a secretarial course so I could a really good job and earn enough to be to send a little home every week; Mrs. cock believed that children owed it to parents to pay back some of what had spent on them while they were growing By the time I had been in the house an Mrs. Peacock knew all about my imaginary family upstate: my mother, who was a widow; and my sister, who just got married and still lived at my mother's home with her husband; and my young brother Paul, who worried my mother a good deal because he didn't seem to want to settle down. My name was Lois Taylor, I told her. Actually I think I could have told her my real name and she would never have connected it with the girl in the paper, because from then on she was feeling that she almost knew my family, and she wanted me to be sure and tell my mother when I wrote home that Mrs. Peacock would make herself personally responsible for me while I was in the city and take as good care of me as my own mother would. On top of everything else, she told me that a stationery store in the neighborhood was looking for a girl assistant, and there I was. Before I had been away from home for twenty-four hours I was an entirely new person. I was a girl named Lois Taylor who lived on Primrose Street and worked down at the stationery store. I used to type letters from my imaginary sister in the stationery store and bring them home and read them to Mrs. Peacock.

I read in the papers one day about how a famous fortuneteller wrote to my father offering to find me and said that astral signs had convinced him that I would be found near flowers. That gave me a jolt, because of Primrose Street, but my father and Mrs. Peacock and the rest of the world thought that it meant that my body was buried somewhere. They dug up a vacant lot near the railroad station where I was last seen, and Mrs. Peacock was very disappointed when nothing turned up. Mrs. Peacock and I could not decide whether I had run away with a gangster to be a gun moll, or whether my body had been cut up and sent somewhere in a trunk. After a while they stopped looking for me, except for an occasional false clue that would turn up in a small story on the back pages of the paper, and Mrs. Peacock and I got interested in the stories about a daring daylight bank robbery in Chicago. When the anniversary of my running away came around, and I realized that I had really been gone for a year, I treated myself to a new hat and dinner downtown, and came home just in time for the evening news broadcast and my mother's voice over the radio.

"Louisa," she was saying, "please come home."

"That poor, poor woman," Mrs. Peacock said. "Imagine how she must feel. They say she's never given up hope of finding her little girl alive someday."

"Do you like my new hat?" I asked her.

I had given up all idea of the secretarial course because the stationery store had decided to expand and include a lending library and a gift shop, and I was now the manager of the gift shop and if things kept on well would someday be running the whole thing; Mrs. Peacock and I talked it over, just as if she had been my mother, and we decided that I would be foolish to leave a good job to start over somewhere else. The money that I had been saving was in the bank, and Mrs. Peacock and I thought that one of these days we might pool our savings and buy a little car, or go on a trip somewhere, or even a cruise.

What I am saying is that I was free, and getting along fine, with never a thought that I knew of about ever going back, and I had been gone three years now. It was just plain rotten bad luck that I had to meet Paul. I had got so I hardly ever thought about any of them any more, and never wondered what they were doing unless I happened to see some item in the papers, but there must have been something in the back of my mind remembering them all the time because I never even stopped to think; I just stood there on the street with my mouth open, and said "Paul!" He turned around and then of course I realized what I had done, but it was too late. He stared at me for a minute, and then frowned, and then looked puzzled; I could see him first trying to remember, and then trying to believe what he remembered; at last he said, "Is it possible?" He said I had to go back. He said if I didn't go back he would tell them where to come and get me. He also patted me on the head and told me that there was still a reward waiting there in the bank for anyone who turned up with conclusive news of me, and he said that after he had collected the reward I was perfectly welcome to run away again, as far and as often as I liked.

Maybe I did want to go home. Maybe all that time I had been secretly waiting for a chance to get back; maybe that's why I recognized Paul on the street, in a coincidence that wouldn't have happened once in a million years: he had never even been to Chandler before, and was there for only a few minutes between trains; he had stepped out of the station for a minute, and found me. If I had not been passing at that minute, if he had stayed in the station where he belonged, I would never have gone back. I told Mrs. Peacock I was going home to visit my family upstate. I thought that was funny.

Paul sent a telegram to my mother and father, saying that he had found me, and we took a plane back; Paul said he was still afraid that I'd try to get away again and the safest place for me was high up in the air where he knew I couldn't get off and run.

I began to get nervous, looking out the taxi window on the way from the Rockville airport; I would have sworn that for three years I hadn't given a thought to that town, to those streets and stores and houses I used to know so well, but here I found that I remembered it all, as though I hadn't ever seen Chandler and its houses and streets; it was almost as though I had never been away at all. When the taxi finally turned the corner into my own street, and I saw the big old white house again, I almost cried.

"Of course I wanted to come back," I said, and Paul laughed. I thought of the return-trip ticket I had kept as a lucky charm for so long, and how I had thrown it away one day when I was emptying my pocketbook; I wondered when I threw it away whether I would ever want to go back and regret throwing away my ticket. "Everything looks just the same," I said. "I caught the bus right there on the corner; I came down the driveway that day and met you."

"If I had managed to stop you that day," Paul said, "you would probably never have tried again."

Then the taxi stopped in front of the house and my knees were shaking when I got out. I grabbed Paul's arm and said, "Paul . . . wait a minute," and he gave me a look I used to know very well, a look that said, "If you back out on me now I'll see that you never forget it," and put his arm around me because I was shivering and we went up the walk to the front door.

I wondered if they were watching us from the window. It was hard for me to imagine how my mother and father would behave in a situation like this, because they always made such a point of being quiet and dignified and proper; I thought that Mrs. Peacock would have been halfway down the walk to meet us, but here the front door ahead was still tight shut. I wondered if we would have to ring the doorbell; I had never had to ring this doorbell before. I was still wondering when Carole opened the door for us. "Carole!" I said. I was shocked because she looked so old, and then I thought that of course it had been three years since I had seen her and she probably thought that I looked older too. "Carole," I said, "oh, Carole!" I was honestly glad to see her.

She looked at me hard and then stepped back and my mother and father were standing there, waiting for me to come in. If I had not stopped to think I would have run to them, but I hesitated, not quite sure what to do, or whether they were angry with me, or hurt, or only just happy that I was back, and of course once I stopped to think about it, all I could find to do was just stand there and say "Mother?" kind of uncertainly.

She came over to me and put her hands on my shoulders and looked into my face for a long time. There were tears running down her cheeks and I thought that before, when it didn't matter, I had been ready enough to cry, but now, when crying would make me look better, all I wanted to do was giggle. She looked old, and sad, and I felt simply foolish. Then she turned to Paul and said, "Oh, Paul—how can you do this to me again?"

Paul was frightened; I could see it. "Mrs. Tether ——" he said.

"What is your name, dear?" my mother asked me.

"Louisa Tether," I said stupidly.

"No, dear," she said, very gently. "Your real name?"

Now I could cry, but now I did not think it was going to help matters any. "Louisa Tether," I said. "That's my name."

"Why don't you people leave us alone?" Carole said; she was white, and shaking, and almost screaming because she was so angry. "We've spent years and years trying to find my lost sister and all people like you see in it is a chance to cheat us out of the reward—doesn't it mean *any*thing to you that you may think you have a chance for some easy money, but we just get hurt and heartbroken all over again? Why don't you leave us alone?"

"Carole," my father said, "you're frightening the poor child. . . . Young lady," he said to me, "I honestly believe that you did not realize the cruelty of what you tried to do. You look like a nice girl; try to imagine your own mother ——"

I tried to imagine my own mother; I looked straight at her.

"—— if someone took advantage of her like this. I am sure you were not told that twice before this young man"—I stopped looking at my mother and looked at Paul—"has brought us young girls who pretended to be our lost daughter; each time he protested that he had been genuinely deceived and had no thought of profit, and each time we hoped desperately that it would be the right girl. The first time we were taken in for several days. The girl looked like our Louisa, she acted like our Louisa, she knew all kinds of small family jokes and happenings it seemed impossible that anyone but Louisa could know, and yet she was an impostor. And the girl's mother—my wife—has suffered more each time her hopes have been raised." He put his arm around my mother—his wife—and with Carole they stood all together looking at me.

"Look," Paul said wildly, "give her a chance—she knows she's Louisa. At least give her a chance to prove it."

"How?" Carole asked. "I'm sure if I asked her something like—well—like what was the color of the dress she was supposed to wear at my wedding ——"

"It was pink," I said. "I wanted blue, but you said it had to be pink."

"—— I'm sure she'd know the answer," Carole went on as though I hadn't said anything. "The other girls you brought here, Paul—they both knew."

It wasn't going to be any good. I ought to have known it. Maybe they were so used to looking for me by now that they would rather keep on looking than have me home; maybe once my mother had looked in my face and seen there nothing of Louisa, but only the long, careful concentration I had put into being Lois Taylor, there was never any chance of my looking like Louisa again.

I felt kind of sorry for Paul; he had never understood them as well as I did and he clearly felt there was still some chance of talking them into opening their arms and crying out, "Louisa! Our long-lost daughter!" and

WHAT IS BLACK?

By MARY O'NEILL

Black is the night
When there isn't a star
And you can't tell by looking Where you are.
Black is a pail of paving tar.
Black is jet
And things you'd like to forget.
Black is a smokestack,
Black is a cat,
A leopard, a raven,
A high silk hat.
The sound of black is "Boom! Boom! Boom!"
Echoing in
An empty room.
Black is kind—
It covers up
The run-down street,
The broken cup.
Black is charcoal
And patio grill.
The soot spots on
The window sill.
Black is a feeling
Hard to explain
Like suffering but Without the pain.
Black is licorice
And patent-leather shoes,
Black is the print
In the news.
Black is beauty
In its deepest form.
The darkest cloud
In a thunderstorm.
Think of what starlight
And lamplight would lack.
Diamonds and fireflies
If they couldn't lean against Black.

then turning around and handing him the re ward; after that, we could all live happily eve after. While Paul was still trying to argue wit my father I walked over a little way and looke into the living room again; I figured I wasn' going to have much time to look around and wanted one last glimpse to take away wit me; sister Carole kept a good eye on me a the time too. I wondered what the two girl before me had tried to steal, and I wanted t tell her that if I ever planned to steal anythin from that house I was three years too late; could have taken whatever I wanted whe I left the first time. There was nothing there could take now, any more than there ha been before. I realized that all I wanted was t stay—I wanted to stay so much that I felt lik hanging onto the stair rail and screaming, bu even though a temper tantrum might brin them some fleeting recollection of their dea lost Louisa I hardly thought it would persuad them to invite me to stay. I could just pictur myself being dragged kicking and screamin out of my own house.

"Such a lovely old house," I said politely t my sister Carole, who was hovering arour me.

"Our family has lived here for gener ations," she said, just as politely.

"Such beautiful furniture," I said

"My mother is fond of antiques," my sist told me.

"Fingerprints," Paul was shouting. We we going to get a lawyer, I gathered, or at le Paul thought we were going to get a lawy and I wondered how he was going to feel wh he found out that we weren't. I couldn't ima ine any lawyer in the world who could get mother and my father and my sister Carole take me back when they had made up th minds that I was not Louisa; could the l make my mother look into my face and reco nize me?

I thought that there ought to be some w I could make Paul see that there was nothi we could do, and I came over and stood n to him.

"Paul," I said, "can't you see that you only making Mr. Tether angry?"

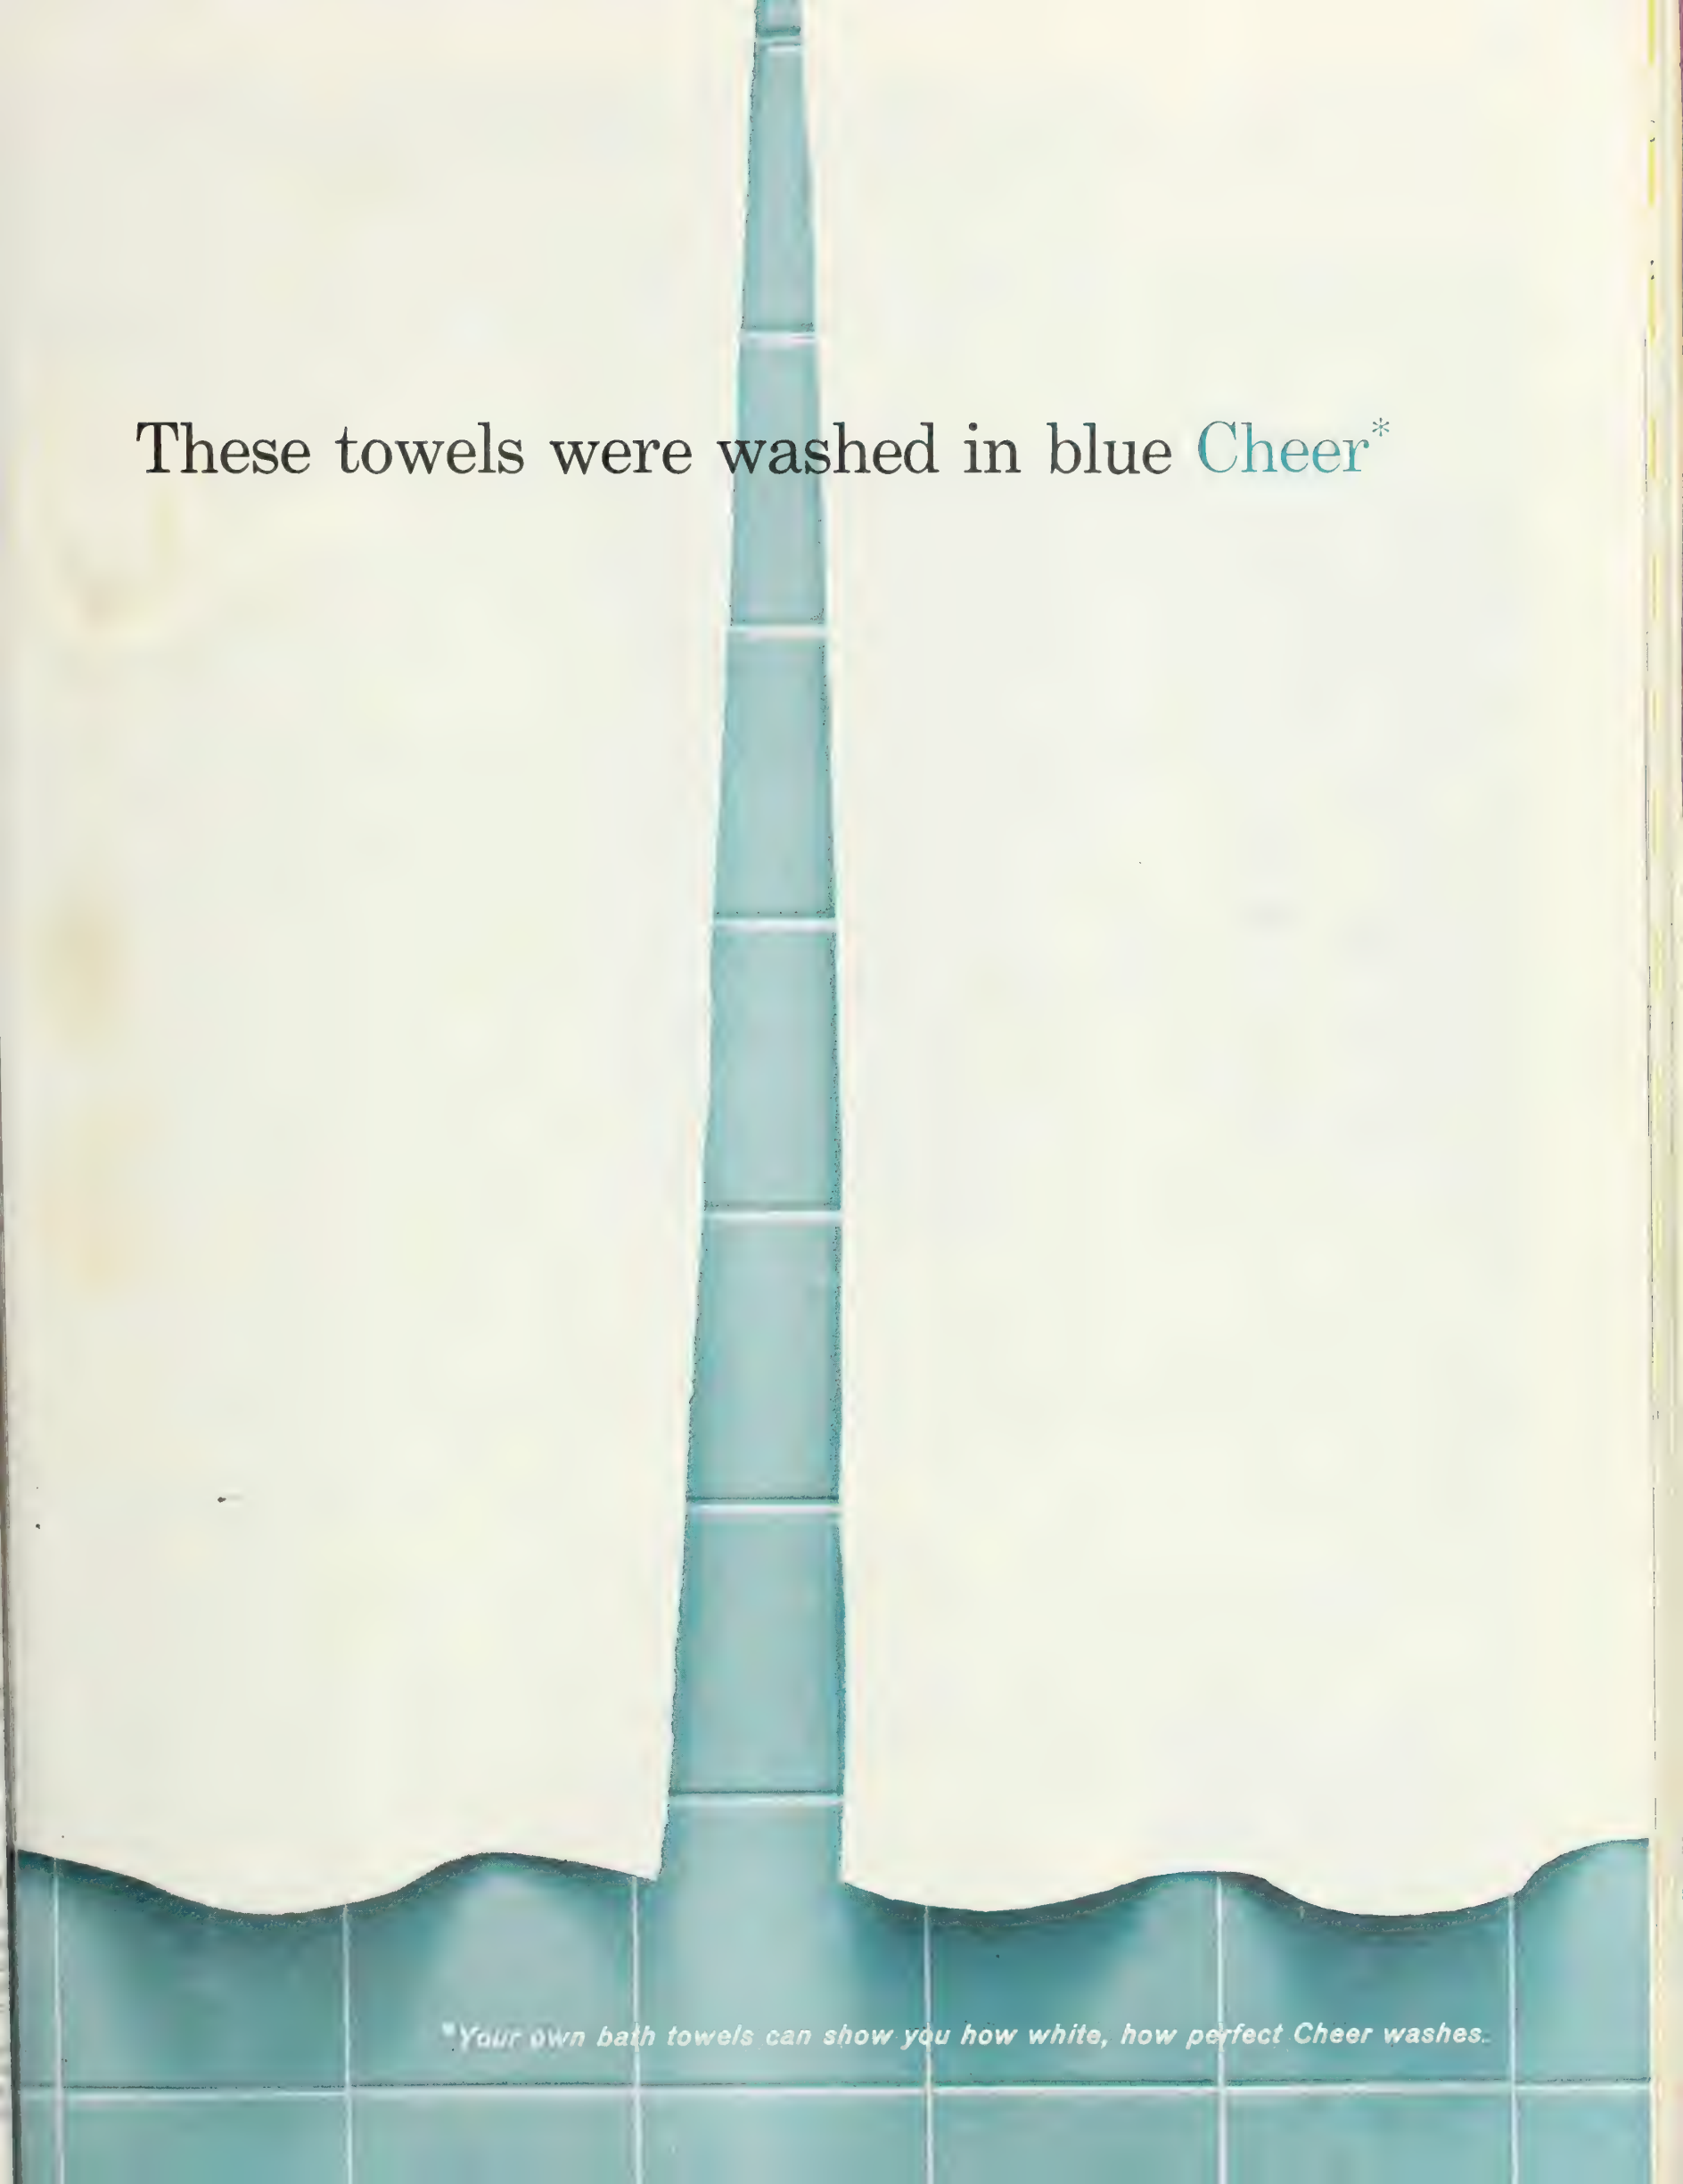
"Correct, young woman," my father sa and nodded at me to show that he though was being a sensible creature. "He's not do himself any good by threatening me."

"Paul," I said, "these people don't want here."

Paul started to say something and then the first time in his life thought better of it a stamped off toward the door. When I turn to follow him, thinking that we'd never past the front hall in my great home-com my father—excuse me, Mr. Tether—came behind me and took my hand. "My daugh was younger than you are," he said to me v kindly, "but I'm sure you have a family so where who love you and want you to happy. Go back to them, young lady. Let advise you as though I were really your ther—stay away from that fellow, he's wic and he's worthless. Go back home where belong."

"We know what it's like for a family worry and wonder about a daughter," mother said. "Go back to the people who you."

That meant Mrs. Peacock, I guess.



"Just to make sure you get there," my ther said, "let us help toward your fare tried to take my hand away, but he p folded bill into it and I had to take it. "I h someday," he said, "that someone will d much for our Louisa."

"Good-by, my dear," my mother s and she reached up and patted my ch "Very good luck to you."

"I hope your daughter comes back so day," I told them. "Good-by."

The bill was a twenty, and I gave it to I It seemed little enough for all the troubl had taken and, after all, I could go back t job in the stationery store. My mother talks to me on the radio, once a year, o anniversary of the day I ran away.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

operations fails to save an already dying patient, he is haunted for weeks. He thinks of a million different procedures he might have used. He won't excuse himself; he can't accept the inevitable, or even the law of averages.

"When Paul has lost a patient and I know it—he is secretive about such matters—I go all out to be of help. I put his favorite records on the hi-fi that evening, I order his favorite food, I show him a cheerful face, I speak cheerful words. I do my best to keep the children under control and out of his way. It isn't simple.

"Our children, three boys, one girl, stairstep down from eight-year-old John to three-year-old Sue and are young and strenuous for a couple our age. I need Paul's help in handling our sons, but I've received no help. Perhaps I never will.

"The appalling fact, the new fact, the crushing fact is that Paul is now interested in another woman. I'm still punchy from the news. I hardly know which way to turn. I want to do what is best for Paul as well as for the youngsters. I can't believe his conscience will ever let him rest if he leaves me in the lurch with children as young as ours. Obviously I have fallen down somewhere. I want to find out my mistakes.

"For a long while I've been aware of Paul's nerves and increasing moodiness. He has been sleeping wretchedly. He has often gone downstairs in his pajamas to the greenhouse and worked with the orchids he raises as a hobby. Or he's spent sleepless hours in his study tinkering with the model ships he builds. Many nights he slipped from his bed and left the house and took long walks. Several times I got up and offered to accompany him. He always rebuffed me. I didn't offer him companionship in the greenhouse or study. When he's busy with his hobbies he likes privacy. Paul likes privacy. Period. Our social life is nonexistent. We have no common friends.

"Last Thursday the situation reached a climax. Before dawn Paul dressed and left our bedroom. I was awake. He took along his instrument bag—in a transparent attempt to convince me that he was making an emergency call. The telephone hadn't rung. I knew the only emergency was his own unhappy restlessness.

"That evening he came home early. It was his first appearance at our dinner table in weeks. I was overjoyed. I hoped the children would do themselves proud. Our eldest son immediately provoked trouble; he grabbed Susie's milk and poured it in his brothers' bowls of soup. They yelled and Susie began to cry. Paul did nothing. He sat in the midst of the commotion like someone in a daze. I asked him if something was wrong. Paul mumbled 'Yes.'

"With that, he got up from his chair and went into his study. I followed him. He closed the door so the children couldn't hear us. He asked me to sit down. He sat down beside me and took my hands in his. Then he knocked my world to pieces. He told me of the other woman. He has seen her only a dozen times for an hour or so, always in the afternoon, but apparently she has captured his imagination. Her name is Margaret. Several months ago Paul and I stopped in a bookstore near the hospital and I saw Margaret without realizing her importance in my life. Margaret and her husband own the bookstore. That's where Paul met her.

"Margaret is younger than I am, probably in her middle thirties, but she isn't any prettier. According to Paul, she has two children; she doesn't stay home and take care of them, although it isn't necessary for her to work. Paul says their relationship has been aboveboard and I believe him. I gather, however, that Margaret is unhappily married and would willingly break up her home. Her husband is [illegible]

"What Paul intends to do I don't know. I doubt he himself knows. His attitude bewilders me. He says he is to blame for everything wrong in our marriage, but doesn't specify what is wrong. He says I have been an ideal wife, that he has been a miserable husband. I've questioned him about Margaret's attractions and heard a number of hazy generalities, but the only concrete statement he has volunteered is that she is easy to talk to.

"Perhaps Paul and I haven't talked enough together. I've often felt the need of closer communion with him. Maybe I've been dull to him all these years. I bore many people, I'm sure. I'm not like Margaret. I don't talk freely and easily to strangers. I've been shy and self-conscious as long as I can remember. All through my childhood I was big and gawky. The year I was eleven I grew five inches, which made me taller than my sister; she was seven years older, but small and cute. That same year my father's manufacturing business went bankrupt, and I was taken out of a small private school I adored and put in a huge public school that terrified me. I learned not to argue with anybody and finally managed to get by.

"I met Paul on a blind date in my second year in a Colorado college where I worked to earn my expenses. Paul's parents owned a ranch not far off, but he was a premed student in Pennsylvania. He was famous locally for his scholarship. I trembled at the thought of meeting him. By then I was nearly six feet tall and bending my knees to seem shorter. Paul turned out to be four inches taller than myself. The date was a marvelous success. I saw him the next day too. Then he had to go east to get back to his classes. To my astonishment and delight, he wrote to me. His letters were wonderful. Our correspondence gave me the courage to let him realize how much I admired him. Sometimes I think I almost felt closer to Paul reading his letters than I felt when we were together.

"We corresponded until I was graduated from college, and then were married. Our honeymoon was the trip back to Pennsylvania where Paul was wrestling with the long grind of medical school. To me our adjustment, sexual and otherwise, seemed perfect. There was only one flaw. We had very little time to spend together. Paul was either busy with his books or busy at school. I took a job right off. One time in those early days Paul and I figured it out that in six weeks we had eaten dinner together only twice. I didn't complain. I've always stood in awe of Paul's profession and his brains. He graduated among the top ten in his class.

"His internship was tougher than medical school. He lived in the hospital and I lived in a room nearby so he could concentrate wholeheartedly on his work. We saw each other weekends. His internship was ended by his call to the service. His three-year absence was hard on us both. By the time he was discharged—we'd been married almost seven years—I desperately wanted the children we'd postponed so long. After I had a couple of minor operations our first son was born, and then in a pell-mell rush came the others.

"I had supposed Paul wanted children as much as I did, that children would bring him and me closer, complete us as a family. Our children seemed to drive us apart. All our boys have been light sleepers. I saw to it that Paul got his rest, but my own sleep was broken every night while my sons were small. As a result, my nerves were on edge all day. Seemingly I couldn't cope with anything. I suspect Paul thinks I've been a crashingly inefficient mother, although he never said so. Ever since Susie joined her brothers I've been chronically tired. It doesn't show on the surface and I fight against it, but underneath I feel exhausted. I've been too weary and too snarled up in the children's emotional and physical needs to notice that Paul and I were drifting farther and farther apart. Oh, I guess I noticed, but I didn't know what to do about it.

"Perhaps it's wishful thinking, but I can't believe that Paul is really in love with Margaret. Indeed, I tell myself that maybe in the end Margaret may prove to be a blessing in disguise. Maybe she will help me to discover what has been wrong with my marriage."

PAUL TELLS HIS SIDE:

"I've made a hash of my marriage and my life," said Paul. His intelligent face was carved in lines of distress and perplexity. "For a man my age—I've passed the forty-year mark—I've advanced professionally much more slowly than I anticipated. In my student days my professors predicted I would make a big splash in research. I've been outstripped by a dozen of my classmates. Perhaps my professional dissatisfaction partially explains my dissatisfaction with my home and that fact, in turn, explains my present involvement and confusion of mind. I just don't know.

"I owe a great deal to Lynn, who has stood by me through many difficulties and whose devotion has been unfaltering. I am grateful to her. Nevertheless, Margaret's companionship has fed a hunger I've felt for years. I blame this whole painful situation on myself.

"My complaints of Lynn are trivia I should be ashamed to mention. It isn't her fault that she and our youngsters seem to be living in a different world from mine. My world, so long as it is circumscribed by the operating room and the laboratory, is ruled by order.

"My moments of greatest happiness in life come at the conclusion of a difficult surgical episode when I peel off my gloves knowing the patient will survive and benefit from my skill. Several months ago I went home in a mood to describe such a triumph to Lynn, but before I got my words together she launched on a tale of woe concerning the misdeeds of our third son that lasted until the dinner hour.

"Some time ago I put in a rotten day at t hospital—I'd made an error in judgment in terminal case which may have hastened t patient's death—and Lynn's bright, optimis welcome to me that afternoon was intolerab I muttered some excuse to her, went back my car, drove to the bookstore. Marga slipped on her coat and we walked for half hour and didn't exchange a word. I felt bet when we parted.

"I'm sure Lynn tries to maintain calm a peace in our household, but with four childr as rambunctious as ours the assignment virtually impossible. Our place is hardly home; it is a combined short-order restaura amusement parlor and torture chamber. O boys fill their stomachs, punch one another the nose, destroy their possessions, cre turmoil and noise. Maybe it's all natural, b it's tough on the morale. Lynn flutters a worries incessantly about our youngsters a it does no good. I worry too.

"Margaret takes her motherhood casual I have thoroughly enjoyed hearing Marga talk about her boys. In our house the talk either too serious or else to me it has a chee insincere ring. Half my pleasure in knowi Margaret has been to experience the way l thoughts, words and feelings broaden scope of mine. If I bring up an idea, bounces back a corollary idea. Or perhaps picks the weak points in the premise I advanced and thereby sharpens my thinki A steady diet of conciliation and agreem can be deadly. Lynn prefers to smile ple antly and echo my remarks, however unsou the position I assume. It makes me won what she actually thinks. Margaret an argue and wrangle. We can talk about a thing and everything. We can laugh and jo I feel alive in Margaret's company.

"Lynn has an almost Teutonic inability grasp my thoughts, tastes, feelings. At very instant I decide the room is chilly rises and pushes up the window. The ot night I was driven to my greenhouse to k warm enough. When I finally emerge brought Lynn a prize orchid as a sort apology for my unspoken criticism. She ga at my offering judiciously, decided it clas with the color of her dress. Then I suppose saw my chagrin, for she went and put another dress and pinned on the orchid. N day I carried an orchid to Margaret and would have thought I'd given her a diam necklace.

"The fact that Lynn is finicky about c shouldn't disturb me. But I can't help it. evening not long ago when I was leaving house, tense and concentrating on an portant speech, Lynn called me back from taxi and stood over me while I changed necktie. I'm sure my audience, a distinguis gathering of foreign surgeons, didn't no that the color of my necktie complemen the color of my suit. They did notice th stumbled in getting across several of points. Margaret, I'm sure, would have the speech ahead of the necktie.

"Six months ago I persuaded an East foundation to make a substantial grant subsidize a research project in an area cancer that particularly interests me. I pected to head the project. Another man, well qualified, was chosen by the hosp trustees. I blamed the chief of staff, who yet to put in a decent word about any of work. When Lynn heard the news she pa my shoulder and assured me I was imagi a conspiracy. She then added cheerily that loss of the project would spare me extra w Next day I spoke of my disappointment Margaret. Tears came to her eyes. Her u standing made the bitter pill easier for m swallow.

"I realize I may have set my professi sights too high. Maybe I made an unreali start in life. I was the fair-haired boy in high school, and later on at medical scho grew up on an isolated Colorado ranch, only child. I was closer to my parents than average youngster. They centered their a tions on me. My mother was a semi-inv from the time I was a small boy, but daunted by illness. Almost every evening

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

Not anything is more responsible for the good old days than the fact that the grownups in one generation always remember the world as it looked to them in their young days, not as it looked to their elders.

Overheard:
Child to parent: "I'll ask you until you say 'Yes.'"
Parent: "Here's a piece of paper. Start making marks; when you have fifty I will still say 'No.'"

The most important single factor making for success in marriage is the willingness to think double.

According to one authority, "Cosmetic use decreases dramatically within a short time after marriage, then rises again when women are in their forties" . . . and—men in the dangerous age?

Women seldom think alike unless it is what to do with leftovers, then they all follow the same rule: Save seven days before throwing away.

How new BAN guards against "nervous perspiration"

Vhat causes perspiration?

Why is the odor caused by nervous tension more offensive than the odor caused by physical exercise?

o deodorants have to ritate the skin?

BAN's lotion formula is gentle enough for the softest feminine skin.

Read the facts about a remarkable new deodorant—called BAN® —that stops odor all day—and is gentle to your skin, besides.

What causes perspiration?

dical science recognizes two different types erspiration.

. Thermal perspiration: This is caused by et or exercise—and comes from relatively ll, widely distributed glands.

. Nervous perspiration: This is caused by otional or nervous tension. The offensive r it produces comes primarily from larger, e powerful glands in the underarm area.

Why is the odor caused by nervous tension so offensive?

larger, more powerful glands that cause ous perspiration are constantly building ecretions that "spill over" at the slightest yday anxiety.

tting the kids off to school—hearing the cry suddenly—being caught in a traffic Any of these common situations can er nervous perspiration.

d nervous perspiration produces even more offensive odor than the hardest physical exercise!

How does new BAN guard against nervous perspiration?

Amazing Ban contains 22% more protective ingredients than the average leading deodorants. Ban protects against perspiration caused by heat, by exercise, and by nervous tension.

Ban helps keep underarms dry. Stops odor all day—even the offensive odor caused by nervous tension.

Do deodorants have to irritate the skin?

Many women feel that deodorants have to be harsh and irritating in order to be effective. This is simply not true. They don't. In fact, one of the ingredients in Ban is akin to the body's own soothing oils and emollients. Ban is gentle to all types of normal skin.

Today there are no less than forty-seven deodorants that look something like Ban—that have tried to copy its unique roll-on design. But Ban is still far and away the deodorant most Americans trust. No other deodorant has duplicated the formula of Ban.

You can purchase Ban at drug stores, most food, variety and department stores.

and dad and I would hold a get-together and talk about my future.

"In those days I was shy around everybody except my parents; the microscope was my first friend. People frightened me. My idea was to become a biological chemist. My father was a fairly prosperous rancher, but his funds were exhausted by mother's illnesses. There was little money for my education. When I won a national scholarship, a full scholarship to an Eastern university, my parents reacted—even though it meant our separation—as though I'd won the presidency of the United States. My Eastern professors, whom I had dreaded in advance, became warm friends and eased my path in every conceivable way.

"My mother died during examination week of my junior college year and I returned home. Copies of the examinations were airmailed to me. I took the examinations on the day after my mother's funeral, as she would have wanted me to do. My marks were the highest in the class. She would have liked that too.

"It was probably my mother's death that caused me to pass up biological chemistry and decide to specialize on cancer, the malady that ultimately killed her. I was still mourning my mother when I married Lynn. She helped me recover from my grief.

Until I was drafted everything seemed to go well for Lynn and me. During and after my military service everything seemed to go wrong. I began my internship at a top cancer hospital. The head of it, a former professor of mine, believed that I would take over from him someday. I believed the same. I reckoned without my draft board. I received a promise that I could complete my internship before being called to the service. The promise was broken.

GARDEN SPOT HOUSE

Garden is lush and cool, conveniently accessible.

BY JOHN BRENNEMAN,
ARCHITECTURAL EDITOR

In this compact three-level house every square inch is used to advantage. It has a south-facing bedroom scheme with an exceptional master bedroom/dressing room/bath arrangement. The bedrooms are opened to light and breezes by very practical, full ceiling-height dormer windows. High sloping ceilings lend spaciousness to the sitting room and family room.

The practical, durable family room has a cozy lounging area and a place near the garden where children can play without being underfoot. Because its working areas are planned as alcoves, this is one of the few family rooms we have seen which can double successfully as corridor.

But this house's crowning feature is perhaps its luxurious terrace and garden—a cool, intimate island in the house's sweeping prairie setting subtly wedded to the house by a well-proportioned, spacious glass wall.

Storage and mechanical equipment are neatly tucked away in a basement space under the sitting room.

Cost, depending on local conditions, $20,000 to $27,000 plus land.

Plans are available.

so successful a man. My surmise is that his parents may have expected too much of him, pushed him too hard. We didn't explore this aspect of his boyhood too far, but in talking over his work dissatisfactions I remarked on a commonplace that had escaped him. If a person is too intense about collecting kudos and receiving recognition, most people, being human and contrary, are likely to recoil. Paul compelled himself to become more relaxed and less an eager beaver at the hospital. To his surprise, the formidable chief of staff soon unbent and congratulated him on some of his work. Also, he learned why he hadn't been chosen to head the research project: nobody had known he wanted the post. He hadn't mentioned it. False modesty had closed his mouth.

"Both Lynn and Paul seemingly expected others to read their complex minds. Both were oversensitive and winced at imaginary slights. Both were perfectionists, ridden by compulsive ideas. Laboratory and operating-room conditions cannot be duplicated in ordinary life. When Lynn and Paul granted that the ideal is seldom achieved in a household where there are four active children, they stopped viewing their youngsters as a noisy crew of two-legged problems and found they could take pleasure in them.

"Lynn conquered her shyness and began to attend some of the medical meetings Paul so frequently addressed. She learned to discuss his work with him on equal terms or just to sit and listen—but with balance and understanding. Lynn's social life and Paul's is still rigidly restricted, a commonplace, of course, in physicians' families. But they have found two or three compatible couples, who are reconciled to making a bridge engagement or a dancing date which may be broken at the last moment. In the matter of developing mutual hobbies, Lynn and Paul were only moderately successful. They signed up for dancing lessons, but Paul is often obliged to miss a session. Lynn then goes by herself just as she goes to monthly concerts alone. Paul still enjoys pottering around his greenhouse, but he doesn't particularly welcome company. He is satisfied if Lynn is pleased with the corsages he provides. Nowadays she is knowledgeable about the prize specimens that come her way. Several afternoons of research on the raising of orchids turned the trick. Lynn tells me the hours she and Paul are able to share these days have acquired vitality and meaning. They meet in the evenings with enthusiasm, eager to talk to each other or perhaps just to sit together a few moments in companionable silence.

"Lynn and Paul counseled with me over a considerable period. Our progress wasn't continuously smooth, as was to be anticipated with two such highly organized, intellectualized people. It wasn't a simple task for Paul to rid himself entirely of his infatuation even though he no longer saw Margaret. There were occasions when Margaret still occupied his fantasies. In the seventh month of our counseling Margaret's husband sold the bookstore and the family left the state. One evening as Paul drove along the block on his way from the hospital he saw the 'For Rent' sign on the store front. He started to stop the car, then drove on as fast as the legal speed limit allowed. Abruptly he realized the old infatuation was gone and he was anxious to share that confidence with Lynn."

THE FIRE

By CHARLES G. BELL

The fire was slow kindling—it was damp wood,
Old, and moistened by the earth and rain.
Two times I rose to mend it from your side,
Stirred the wet sticks and blew
the smoldering ends.
Then in the clear cold night and clearing of the wood,
We two, under the stars, hearts not young,
And wet with time's worse rain, forgot the fire—

Until suddenly it was there, every kindled point
Enforcing another, to take us by surprise,
A brightness huge and fierce, a living flame,
That sent up sparks to coil
among the stars—
Earth's poor matter assaulting the night skies,
A trembling moment of immortality . . .
That was the constellation of our love.

We lay afterward a long time
On the plain ground—earth where we are bred,
And watched the lattice of transfigured wood
Slough films of gray ash and renew its glowing;
And in the cleared space of the dew-cold forest,
Saw now and then how a few last sparks would rise
To brief eternity among the stars.

LOOKING OVER THE PRESIDENT'S SHOULDER

business that sent me to the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston to take a graduate course in public-school music. However, I impressed the faculty and they suggested the artist's course.

In not too long a time my funds ran low. A new friend, Postello Jones, said that he would speak to his boss, Dr. Samuel W. Stratton, president of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, in Cambridge, about me. Despite the fact that, other than grocery clerking and music, there was little I was qualified for, Dr. Stratton and Morris Parris, his secretary, offered to help me. If I wanted to try being a butler, Mr. Parris said he would train me.

This gentleman from an old Georgetown family of high standing knew etiquette and society backward and forward as well as I knew my chromatic scales. I confess I didn't relish the thought of being a house servant, but Mr. Parris pointed out that, if I ever did reach the heights as a concert singer, these conventions he was teaching me would give me a background of good breeding. Dr. Stratton was a connoisseur of china, silver, cut glass, crystal and period furniture. With these surroundings and with time provided for study and permission to practice in the reception hall of the school's residence for the president, I did my best to master the job.

It was an education to know and to be able to appreciate these fine things of good living. Here I met men like Thomas Edison, Otto Kahn, Lessing Rosenwald, John D. Rockefeller, Gerard Swope, President Lowell of Harvard, and the famous lady, Hetty Green. One of the most important in landing me the job at the White House was Lieutenant Frederic Butler, long since a general. He made several trips to M.I.T. in studies of Army engineering and, being a friend of Mr. Parris, always stopped at the house.

When Dr. Stratton dropped dead while talking to a reporter about the death of Thomas Edison, Lieutenant Butler proved to be a real friend to me. At the time of Dr. Stratton's death I had an agreement with Arthur Wilson, of Boston, a voice teacher of wide reputation to prepare me for my concert debut. For one year after that he was to receive 10 per cent of my earnings and for the next two years 15 per cent. Tentative arrangements were made for the concert in Jordan Hall in April of 1932.

As fate would have it, a telephone call came for me from the White House. I was startled until I heard the voice of Lieutenant Butler. He was an aide to President Hoover and Mrs. Butler was Mrs. Hoover's secretary.

I had served tea to Mrs. Hoover and her son, Mr. Allan, at Dr. Stratton's when she had visited Mr. Allan while he was at Harvard. That fleeting moment was the only time I had ever seen the First Lady. However, the lieutenant said that Mrs. Hoover felt it would be best for me to come to work at the White House, as it was likely to be a hard winter. I am sure there are still a few people around who remember the winter of 1931.

Well, it was the best and only offer I had. So, with a wife and child depending on me, my ambitious pride to be a concert singer faded into the background. Food and shelter were the paramount issues for my family. I know I should have been elated and I knew, as most people told me, that I was lucky to have a job at the White House. But I had a premonition that this was going to be a very long winter for me and that somehow, regardless of my efforts, fate might be deciding my singing career. As you can see, the winter was twenty-one years and four months long.

I went by bus to Washington in order to save money. As I traveled through Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania I could see idle factories and soup lines. Just to see jobless men gave me a depressed feeling and also a thankful feeling for, except for the grace of God, I, too, could be one of those wanderers. I wondered what the White House would be like.

Lieutenant Butler had told me to arrive at 10:30 at the east entrance of the White House and to ask the officer on duty for him. So at the appointed time I arrived and gave my name to the guard. I had a suitcase packed with a tuxedo and full dress, ready to go to work. Shortly Lieutenant Butler arrived and off we went through the long corridor of the ground floor, into the east wing of the house and on through the corridor of the main house up a winding, spiral stairs to the butlers' pantry.

There were four or five men in the pantry. Lieutenant Butler inquired for Ellis. I was told that Ellis Sampson was the head man, but he wasn't in. Then Lieutenant Butler inquired for Connie. He said, "Encarnación is the second man in charge."

He was in the dining room and we went there. In the middle of the huge room two men were polishing a great, round mahogany table. The table was centered under a big silver chandelier with 100 or more candle bulb lights. The lieutenant introduced me to Encarnación and told him I would be working on the butlers' staff. He said to me, "Connie will take care of you."

Encarnación Rodriquez was a Puerto Rican, very polite and soft-spoken. He took me back into the pantry and introduced me to the other men. I could see a puzzled expression on his face. He turned to one of the men, Robert Neal, and said, "Neal, will you show this new man the locker room?"

I was assigned a locker and I changed clothes and reported back to the pantry. When I arrived the men were all in a huddle. I could feel the conversation was about me, because upon my appearance the huddle broke up. Connie assigned me to a big tray of flat silverware and a rouge pad. I had never seen so much flatware in my life and said, "Did you

How does a mother know which Antiseptic is best for everyday cuts, burns, scrapes?

Among the hundreds of antiseptics sold today, Mycitracin, with its 3 powerful antibiotics, gives you a new way to guard against skin infection in minor cuts, burns and scrapes.

Nearly every day, a young mother has to treat minor cuts, burns and scrapes. At this point, she has a problem. If she uses tincture of iodine, it's so harsh it may burn tender tissue—if enough is used to destroy all the bacteria. Should she use mild solutions or salves? Better than nothing, of course, but often not effective.

What, then, should be done?

For best protection, follow these simple steps:

1. If the wound is serious or fails to heal, a doctor should be consulted.

2. Minor cuts and scrapes should always be washed with water and mild soap. Most bacteria will wash out with the dirt. (Do not wash a burn.)

3. After washing, apply a nonirritating antiseptic agent to fight bacteria and cover the wound with a sterile dressing. The modern antiseptic should be a non-burning ointment containing antibiotics powerful enough to destroy bacteria promptly. Mycitracin, Upjohn's sting-free antiseptic, is just such a product.

No single antibiotic destroys all bacteria. Mycitracin contains 3 antibiotics—Neomycin, Bacitracin and Polymyxin B. The antibacterial action of the three combine to give you greater protection. Neomycin, for example, destroys 20 of the 22 bacteria most likely to cause infection in skin injuries. Bacitracin and Polymyxin B are included to protect against those bacteria on which Neomycin has no effect. In this way, Mycitracin creates a zone free of infectious bacteria around the injury, and keeps it that way as long as it is applied.

The ointment base is important, too, since it keeps the antibiotics in contact with the injured area much longer than a liquid. Mothers also appreciate the fact that Mycitracin's ointment base is stainless, odorless. Its triple antibiotic strength . . . its sting-proof, soothing formula, makes this new antiseptic a must for your medicine chest.

have a party last night?" Connie replied, "No, just a daily routine."

After I had my lunch Mr. Neal approached Mr. Rodriquez and said, "Since Fields has his uniform, you might as well take him into the dining room tonight for dinner. As you know, Mrs. Hoover doesn't like big men. You might as well get it over with so he can be on his way back to Boston tomorrow."

I kept my poker face and went about my assignments. At last the hour approached and I was assigned to Mrs. Hoover's side of the table. I could feel the tension and I imagined that they were anticipating Mrs. Hoover's saying, "Get that big galoot out of here." (Editors' note: Alonzo Fields is 6′ 3″.)

The dining-room doors were open. Candles on the table were lit and the heavy drapes at the windows were drawn. Soon the President and the First Lady would enter through the open door. We stood in our positions near the table. My back was toward the door and, of course, you are ordered not to turn to see who is entering after receiving the signal that the President is approaching.

Suddenly the quietness of the silence was broken by Mrs. Hoover's voice: "Fields, I heard that you were here. I'm so glad to see you." Mrs. Hoover went on, "Father, you remember my telling you about Fields, Dr. Stratton's man?" It was the family custom of the Hoovers to address each other as "Father" and "Mother."

The President, nodding, said, "Hello, Fields."

There was an expression of amazement on the faces of the other butlers. No one said a word when we returned to the pantry for a change of service for the next course. Well, the next day the rumors had it that I had been brought there to take over as head man. "So this is the White House," I thought. "The help gossips here just like any other place."

This White House was one busy place. Three days after my arrival I was assigned to the President's medicine-ball table, which sounds like a big promotion. It did not inflate my ego, for it meant that I had to be at work at 6:30 A.M. The President played medicine ball in the south grounds of the White House with several members of his Cabinet and one member of the Supreme Court, Justice Stone. The Cabinet members were Secretary of Interior Wilbur, Assistant Secretary of the Navy Jahncke, Secretary of War Hurley, Secretary of Commerce Chapin, Attorney General Mitchell. There were also Dr.—later Admiral—Boone, the President's personal doctor, and Secretaries Richey and Newton.

Breakfast was always served under the magnolia tree said to have been planted by President Jackson in memory of his wife, Rachel, unless it rained or after a heavy snowfall. In such cases breakfast would be in the China Room on the ground floor where the presidential china of different periods is exhibited. Serving breakfast in a jacket during the cool spring and fall mornings wasn't too pleasant, especially when just about as you started to pour a cup of coffee the weeping leaves of the magnolia would drip cold tears on the back of your neck. You had to anticipate those tears or else jump out of your skin.

The President and his ballplayers were wrapped up in blankets like so many Indians. Breakfast would consist of grapefruit, toast and coffee. You never knew just how many to prepare for. You would set up for fourteen or fifteen and, as they played, count noses from a distance to see who might have come in at the last minute with a guest. One guest we always depended on was Mark Sullivan, the newspaper columnist.

There would be fifteen or twenty minutes of discussion of the happenings on The Hill, advice from the Attorney General as to the legality of certain moves, and the feel of the public by Mr. Sullivan and members of the Cabinet, as well as Justice Stone. The President seldom led in these discussions, but listened and asked questions. Then he would leave after the second cup of coffee had been poured.

On leaving the table he would say to Mr. Sullivan, "Coming, Mark?" The President would go to his room and freshen up to join Mrs. Hoover for breakfast, usually in the Monroe Room on the second floor.

Breakfast was always on time at eight o'clock. In fact, the Hoovers were punctual with all meals and each detail had to be as precise as a ritual. Luncheon was at one o'clock and dinner at eight. The Hoovers were most formal. At dinner the President always wore a dinner jacket, and all meals except breakfast were served in the State Dining Room—even the very few times when the President would dine alone. Often just the President and First Lady would dine together in this formal setting.

Dinner always consisted of several courses—an entree, soup, fish, dinner, salad, dessert and a fruit course. After each service you took your position and stood at attention. Above all you must show no interest in the

The first state dinner I served was given by the President in honor of the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Grandi. Many people were excited over Il Duce Mussolini, Premier of Italy, and Grandi was making a state visit. The huge horseshoe table was set with the famous Monroe gold-mirrored plaque in seven sections, about twenty feet long and two and a half feet wide, with bowls of flowers reflected in the mirror. The tall gold candelabra each held a cluster of forty-four candles, and tall gold epergnes were filled with fruit, with luscious Belgian grapes in bunches draping over the sides. The gold table flatware was laid out on the finest white damask linen. Two high-backed chairs stood at the center of the table for the President and First Lady, across from each other. Small gold chairs were placed around the inside and outside of the table, with a cluster of palms forming a background in the open space of the horseshoe.

This was the White House dining room in all its glory. There were ninety guests for the dinner. Ten services were required to serve the party, nine guests to a service and two butlers at each service. The White House was then and still is inadequate for serving a large party because of the size of the pantry. It is so designed that there isn't much that can be done about this situation.

The horseshoe-type table was built by carpenters of different-sized tables according to the requirements of the dinner party. The smallest-type table seated 65 guests and the largest size seated 104. I understand that the Eisenhowers are using an E type table now on state occasions. We talked of such a table during the Roosevelt Administration, but that was as far as it went.

The largest table went within four feet of the walls on the outside of the horseshoe. Butlers serving on the far side of the table had to cross through the Red Room. Men rving the inside curve of the table had to ter the room first, with others following in tation. The pantry, at that time a long rrow room with an old-fashioned manual mb-waiter, was useless for a party. Platters food had to be passed up a spiral stairway a chain line of pantry crew, and some of the tlers also went down to the kitchen by the ck stairs for their service. It is a wonder at the food could be kept hot.

Well, the dinner started off with a crab-meat cktail, soup julienne, Melba toast, curled lery and olives, broiled fillet of sole with tar- e sauce, sliced tomatoes and whole-wheat- ead cucumber sandwiches, roast boned key, string beans and potatoes au gratin, een salad with Camembert cheese. For des- t there were replica ice-cream molds of the hite House, with the Belgian grapes served th the mints.

Then the ladies retired to the Green Room demitasses and the gentlemen to the Red oom for demitasses and smokes. The only sses on the table were for mineral water.

When you are invited to dine at the White ouse you can be certain at a state dinner at you will be at the same table with the esident, even if you are perhaps fifty or ninety ats removed from him. The President is ways first in the room, first to leave the ole, and first to be served at all meals—even e family meals. So the butlers are always in- ucted to watch for the signal from the head n to begin servings. Any infraction of this e would mean only one warning. Even the rst Lady keeps her eye on the head man r the end of the dinner for his signal to let know that all her guests have finished. th this signal she acquaints the President t he may lead the way for coffee.

Grandi had a suave, hand-kissing style and ladies appeared very excited. It was amus- to watch some of them flutter as he would s their hands. Of course he was slim, dark d I suppose handsome, and the Old World l-clicking style did give him a romantic r. On departing from a room, in the pres- e of ladies, he would back away about five es, click his heels and bow. And before he ssed through the doorway he would again k his heels and bow.

The gathering of a state dinner is very color- . Military aides from all the services in their ss uniforms escort the ladies to the East om. The husbands always look sort of ttended, tagging along while the ladies ng on the arm of an aide. In the East Room aide in charge announces their names and other introduces them to their dinner part- s. After all the guests have arrived the es line up on both sides of the red carpet ding from the elevator to the door of the te Dining Room. The dining-room doors opened, the uniformed butlers at their sta- ns, and the head man in the center of the rance.

Then the President and the First Lady, h their aides, proceed to the East Room ough the cordon of aides. The Marine Band the lobby strikes up Hail to the Chief until y arrive at the East Room and the aide charge announces the President and the st Lady.

Guests file around and when all of them e been received the entire procession re- ns down the red carpet to the dining room. ests are given cards showing the position their seats. After they are all seated the d man signals to start serving the meal.

Well, many such dinners were to follow, s receptions, teas, christenings, birthday ties and farewell dinners. I shall always re- mber a governors' convention held in Virginia, I believe in the spring of 1932. President Hoover had invited the governors to dine at the White House.

The man being mentioned as likely to be the Democratic candidate for President was the governor of New York, Franklin D. Roosevelt. We were instructed to have a different type of chair for him and a strong man to attend his chair. The head man said to me, "Fields, I am assigning you to Mr. Roosevelt's chair. They say he is going to be the Democratic candidate for the White House, so he may be the boss around here this time next year."

When the governor of New York arrived he created a sensation. He came by the south grounds because he would have to use the elevator. Ike Hoover, the chief usher, took his two top doormen, John Mays and Charles Green—one to help the governor out of his car and the other to man the elevator.

Ike Hoover greeted the governor and the governor greeted him like a long-lost friend, shaking hands. Then he turned to Mays and held out his hand, saying, "Well, John Mays, how are you?" You would have thought Mays was an old friend, too, and as they approached the elevator Governor Roosevelt kept up a running conversation.

On reaching the elevator and seeing Green, the governor gave the same greeting, laughing and talking all the way up. The men were flabbergasted because it had been nearly twenty years since any of them had seen Franklin Roosevelt and they were not prepared for such informality. Soon the White House buzzed with the news. President Hoover seldom spoke to anyone and of course orders were not to speak unless spoken to. When he did speak, it was news.

Next morning at the medicine-ball breakfast everyone chattered about the possibility of the governor from New York being a presidential candidate. Some thought the Democrats would not dare to nominate an invalid. Others thought he would be easy to defeat since the American people wouldn't elect a disabled man. Others said he had a marvelous torso and a fascinating, warm, sincere voice and smile and he might impress the radio and newsreel audiences. The breakfast ended with the thought that Franklin Roosevelt, despite his infirmities, was no doubt the most exciting among the possible candidates the Democrats might offer up for the slaughter in the 1932 election.

The time came when there was another medicine-ball breakfast. It was the morning after the all-night balloting at the Chicago convention. Breakfast was as usual under the magnolia tree. In the doctor's office there was a radio which had been placed in the window so that it could be heard during the breakfast. The Democrats had nominated the governor of New York, Franklin D. Roosevelt, as their candidate for President and, with some members of his family, he startled the country by flying to the convention to accept the nomination.

The renomination of President Hoover was merely a formality. The Literary Digest had the President away out in front in its prediction polls, but somehow the medicine-ball breakfast group showed signs of anxiety and an effort was made to get Mr. Coolidge to come out in defense of the party's economic program. The former President took his time before he committed himself to making a nationwide broadcast. Well, the former President made his speech and at the medicine-ball breakfast the next morning the table wasn't too enthused over his efforts. But, on the whole, they thought he had helped the cause.

It was rumored around the White House that ex-President Coolidge wasn't too fond of President Hoover. There were many stories about President Coolidge, how he was always nosing around the kitchen and the help's dining room. There is one such story of how, after one of these visits, he told Mrs. Coolidge, "Mamma, those white folks are eating up my maple syrup and the colored folks haven't any on their table."

Yes, the White House had two dining rooms for the help. From then on, for fear that the President might pay an unexpected visit, it was seen to that the colored help's table had the same food as appeared on the other dining-room table.

Separate dining rooms for the white and colored help existed until the Roosevelt Administration ended this by the simple process of eliminating white help in household capacities except for the housekeeper. The gardeners, carpenters and electricians did not have their meals in the White House. However, at Hyde Park, whenever the colored help went there to serve the President, they were not permitted to eat in the dining room for the help. They had to eat in the kitchen. Of course at the White House, with Virginia so nearby, the separate dining rooms could be attributed to the influence of that state's policy, but in New York you did not expect this. So I had my reservations concerning the White House as an example for the rest of the country.

The defeat of President Hoover was a shock to most of the people on the staff and of course The Literary Digest lost face for its poll-taking predictions. Somehow I was not too disturbed over the change of Administrations. I still had hopes of being able to return to Boston and to my singing. How, I didn't know, without a job. But I felt that as long as I had a job at the White House, I would not find time to sing or study. So the White House up to this time had not made much of an impression on me except for the Christmas following the election when I was invited to sing in the East Room for the party given for the help. Of course the President and First Lady were absent, but despite this I had my day and a very appreciative audience gave me reason to believe they enjoyed my renditions. To this day, that afternoon before Christmas Eve in 1932 was the most thrilling experience in all the twenty-one years in the White House.

It was my day off when Mrs. Roosevelt and a newspaper friend of hers, Miss Lorena Hickok, visited the White House, as it is the custom for the incoming First Lady to meet the present First Lady and be escorted over the house, to meet the help and decide about changes, if any. Of course the changes are later communicated to the chief usher.

When this list arrived it included the white chambermaids, chief cook, second cook and kitchen maids, all Irish girls who had come to the White House during the Coolidge Administration. Mrs. Roosevelt brought a housekeeper and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. Nesbitt. Mr. Nesbitt took over the storeroom where many of the personal presents for the first family and other materials were received. Mrs. Roosevelt also brought Miss Ida Allen as head cook; Mrs. Elizabeth Moore, second cook; McDuffie, a valet, and his wife, Mrs. Lizzie McDuffie, as a maid; and two butlers, James Mingo and James Reynolds. Ellis Sampson, the head butler, had been transferred and we all assumed that one of the men Mrs. Roosevelt was bringing would be the head butler.

On the morning of the inauguration Ellis served breakfast and told the President and Mrs. Hoover good-by. He had a job in the Treasury Department. No one, including Encarnación, the second man, knew exactly what to expect. He had no instructions to take over, yet we all expected him to take charge, at least for Inauguration Day.

March 4, 1933, my first inauguration, was not only a hard, long day but one filled with mixed emotions and confusion. No one had a plan of what to do except that we did have a menu from Mrs. Roosevelt. For luncheon she had ordered 50 covers, and bouillon, salmon salad, chicken salad, whole-wheat and white-bread-and-butter sandwiches, coffee and tea and plenty of milk. She added ice cream and cake.

There were to be 3000 covers for tea with assorted sandwiches, buttered nut bread, tea, coffee, punch, cake and cookies. The dinner menu was oyster stew, crackers, scrambled eggs and sausages, fried potatoes, creamed chicken, peas, buttered rolls, buttered biscuits, jellies and jams, charlotte russe and coffee.

For luncheon she didn't want any tables set up, but just to have a few tables nearby. We had a buffet in the center of the dining room. It was a sick-looking table with chicken salad, salmon salad, bouillon, bread-and-butter sandwiches, coffee, tea and plenty of milk.

The President came into the dining room on Mr. James Roosevelt's arm. We hustled a table to a spot he requested. Encarnación served the President his bouillon and I rushed over with Mrs. Roosevelt's, but when I reached her she merely smiled and moved away to the table and started serving tea and coffee to the guests.

I stood there holding her bouillon. Well, we were flabbergasted. A First Lady, with all the help we had, rushing off to serve the guests, and the help didn't know what to do! She was really in our way and the order of service was disrupted. No one gave any priority to the President. The guests took what they wanted and we just tried to do our best and acted as if we knew what it was all about.

Someone asked for ice cream before the bouillon had been finished. In fact, we never knew what was what after the First Lady started serving at the buffet table. The guests finished with their lunch and were leaving without waiting for the President to finish.

Encarnación said, "I don't understand these people. They eat ice cream with their bouillon."

If that luncheon was such confusion, how were we to set up the horseshoe table for 75 people to serve oyster stew, scrambled eggs and sausages, fried potatoes, creamed chicken, buttered rolls and biscuits and buttered peas?

BRIDE SONG

By ELIZABETH McFARLAND

I wear my best love every day.
"Extravagant!" the gossips say:
But love, like linen, smooths with care
And softer grows for daily wear.

Perhaps I seem to overdress—
It's just this trousseau-happiness
In which, at last, I've found my style.
Oh, nothing fits like one's own smile!

Encarnación asked Ike Hoover, "How do we serve such a dinner at a horseshoe table?"

Mr. Hoover said, "Your guess is just as good as mine."

I spoke up and said, "Connie, this isn't a formal dinner, even though they will all be in evening clothes. This is just a New England countryman's supper, so do not use the gold service. Use the silver. After we serve the oyster stew and crackers, serve the scrambled eggs, sausages, fried potatoes, creamed chicken, peas, hot rolls, biscuits, jellies and jams."

He said, "All on one plate?"

I said, "Yes; and do not expect to serve demitasses. Have coffee and tea and milk ready. After passing the bread and jams, place plates of bread and jams at intervals on the tables."

Before we had finished serving the oyster stew Mrs. Roosevelt said, "We will have the coffee and tea and milk with the dinner."

So Connie said to me, "Mr. Fields, you were right."

I said, "Yes, Connie, these people are going to throw Old Man Protocol and formality right out the window, from what little I have seen."

Well, the guests finished their dinners just as they willed, saying, "I must be going." Sometimes Mrs. Roosevelt would say, "Franklin, Joe"—or Jane—"is leaving now." The President would smile and say, "Well, Joe, it was good of you to come. We'll see you later. Have a good time."

This was going on all through the dinner—— And to think that just twenty-four hours earlier no one would have thought of leaving the table before the President!

I have told you about the luncheon and dinner, but to my mind the worst attempt at serving a party was the tea that afternoon for 3000. It was chaos. In the center of the State Dining Room was a table about twenty feet long and in the small dining room was another table not so long. In no time the tables were completely surrounded by guests, eight and ten deep. No one could get to the table and those who were there couldn't get out, nor could they drink their tea or coffee because the crowd was pinning them fast. The butlers couldn't get to the tables to replenish or remove the soiled dishes and many guests left in disgust. But to those in charge it was the best that could be done with a bad situation. Little did I realize that four years later on an inaugural day I would be given the chance to prove whether or not I could plan a better system of handling large parties at the White House.

Inauguration Day of 1933 was on Saturday, and from 6:30 A.M. until 1 A.M. Sunday had been our workday. Every room in the White House was filled and Mrs. Roosevelt had scheduled breakfast for eight o'clock the next morning. There were to be trays for the President and Mrs. Sara Roosevelt, the President's mother.

Right off we learned that being on time for meals was not one of the Roosevelts' virtues, and in all the twelve years, I can count on one hand the times that they were on time for a meal. Ida Allen, Mrs. Roosevelt's cook, took over for the breakfast and she seemed not to be in the least disturbed. She smiled when she was told that breakfast would be at eight o'clock. It was eight o'clock before she started the sausages.

Poor Encarnación was upset. He said, "We sure do not want to be late on their first morning."

She said, "Don't worry. You will be serving breakfast at twelve if I know these people." And she knew them, for we served our last breakfast at noon Sunday.

I had often thought what a relief it would be not to have to serve the medicine-ball breakfast. But after just one or two mornings of serving a Roosevelt breakfast you would sit back and say, "Oh, for the good old days!" However, one is lost if one isn't quick to adjust, and before you knew it you had become a part of what at first struck you as impossible. These Roosevelts were a fascinating family—they did not seem to give a hoot if you did or did not like them, for they were enjoying themselves.

The Roosevelts were not hard to please. You did not have to worry about noises in the pantry as in the Hoover Administration when you had to tiptoe while washing the dishes. In fact, you were told not to wash dishes during the serving of dinner. (The pantry crew would ease a few through, for, with dinner served at eight o'clock and seven courses, there would be quite a pile of dishes to clean up.) Well, the Roosevelts kept up so much noise in the dining room that washing dishes in the pantry did not create a problem.

The butlers did not have to stand in the dining room during a family meal or an informal guest dinner. Mrs. Roosevelt had a bell, but many a time we could hardly hear it in the pantry. We would peek through the glass in the dining room and keep our eyes on Mrs. Roosevelt to watch when she would ring. So within a few days this family had the old White House rocking with their gaiety and laughter.

On March 8 Ike Hoover called the staff of butlers together and said, "Encarnación, you have been acting as chief butler for these few days, as you are the assistant chief. You are still the assistant chief butler. Fields, you are the chief butler."

So on that day I took full charge of the White House staff of butlers. I had not expressed any desire for the job and was most surprised. I could not very well say no, for the extra money would help out the family, but, with the new job, I knew I would have no time for singing.

Encarnación was a most excellent assistant, but he was no longer a young man. He had served the Coolidges and Hoovers and, though these Administrations were busy, there was a quiet routine about the entertaining. He was bewildered by this new lack of routine when you had to anticipate last-minute changes. Nothing upsets help more than to disturb a table setting five or ten minutes before the time for the meal. You were likely to have to add five or six to the setting, or remove that number. Often the President and guests would be coming into the dining room before you could complete the changes.

The Roosevelts used the small dining room, better known as the breakfast room, for all meals except breakfast and for formal dinners of over thirty people. Of course all state affairs were held in the State Dining Room. Breakfast was served in the West Hall and each morning you moved furniture to set up for a number that could only be estimated from a note the ushers would post on a bulletin board, written by Mrs. Roosevelt. That is, if you could read her writing. Anyway you would take it, you were playing a guessing game as to how many to expect and what she meant for you to do.

The breakfast coffee cups were the oversized hunting breakfast cups and the traditional Roosevelt coffee was half coffee and half hot milk. Of course there was cream for those who took cream. Mrs. Roosevelt always poured the coffee and sometimes there would be so many of these huge cups that we had to place a side table near her, for we could not pile them on the table beside her. She used left- and right-hand pots to execute the pouring of coffee and milk.

The President always had a tray in his room which McDuffie, the valet, would take up. The coffee for the President was a deep black French roast, prepared in the kitchen. I mean we roasted the green coffee beans to any degree we wanted. However, the President's coffee was a much deeper roast than we used for the family, and it was freshly ground. The coffeemaker was placed on the tray so the President could control the brewing of the coffee.

Since breakfast was more or less a state of confusion, this was just the beginning. Each day was equally the same. In comparison with the Hoover Administration, it was like being used to dining in the Waldorf-Astoria and then in a cafeteria. Though the food was good and wholesome, let us say its presentation was poorly done, with no desire to please or excite the appetite.

As if the Roosevelt family was not large enough, from time to time we had others who required special care and attention, and often they were more difficult to please than the family. The first of these permanent guests was Mr. Louis Howe, the President's close adviser of political know-how. He was catered to by all the members of the family, admired and to all appearances loved and respected for his advice.

Mr. Howe was not a well man and most of the time kept to his room, which was the small Lincoln Room. He had the most unusual breakfast. I did not wonder at his not being too well. He would have cold codfish cakes with catchup and Tabasco sauce, and a meal pone made with white meal without shortening and so tight you could hardly break it with both hands. And he smoked as he ate.

This gentleman from Indiana had a way about him and he was just as gruff with the President as with anyone else. One day during the serving of tea to the President the British ambassador he neared the room and heard voices. He inquired, "Who is there with Franklin?"

I said it was the British ambassador.

He said, "I want to see Franklin. Tell him when he is through with that bloke to come to my room."

So I thought, "Me tell the President if you want him to come to your room?" When the ambassador left I told the President that Mr. Howe wanted to see him.

He said, "Louis wants to see me? What's he?"

I said, "In his room, sir."

The President said, "Get McDuffie." I called McDuffie and the President

JOY HAS A MILDNESS YOU CAN SEE ON YOUR HANDS

"Bring the chair, Mac. I got to go to Louis' room. He wants to see me."

So that was Louis Howe. When he sent for any member of the family, there was no hesitation. They went and they listened.

Another permanent guest was Miss LeHand, the President's personal secretary. She had quarters which had been the housekeeper's in the Hoover Administration. Miss LeHand was a very pleasant and ladylike person and was very easy to please. She remained, like Mr. Howe, until she lost her health, and she was loved by all of the servants.

One of Mrs. Roosevelt's first acts of social change was to lift the ban on ladies' smoking. Though Mrs. Roosevelt did not really smoke, she would ask for the cigarettes to be passed and would take one and go through the motions of smoking. Anyone knew she did not really know how to smoke. After she had established the custom of ladies' smoking in the White House she stopped taking the smokes when they were passed.

The first formal dinner was the Cabinet dinner. This proved to be quite a task for me to maneuver diplomatically for the type of dinner that would be expected in the White House. Mrs. Nesbitt, the housekeeper, Miss Allen, the cook, and myself would meet in the housekeeper's office and plan the meals. The housekeeper's idea of a state dinner was that of an inn's banquet, and the cook was going along with the idea. Food was to be plated up individually. I was told there would be no waste, as in the Hoover Administration, and that Mrs. Roosevelt did not believe in elaborate dinners.

I told them that the dinner they were planning would certainly greatly change what had usually been expected of the White House and that I was sure Mrs. Roosevelt had dined at the White House and knew the customs. Why not consult her before we submitted menus for her to select?

Mrs. Roosevelt did turn thumbs down on the banquet-type service where food was served in the kitchen on the plates, but she cut off two courses. If there was an entree, soup would usually be cut out. If there were an entree and soup, the fish course would be omitted. And no fruit course.

Soon the word got around that the White House food was terrible and of course the blame was put on Mrs. Nesbitt. The President said he could always tell by the day of the week what he would have for lunch. The Roosevelts could have been the easiest people in the world to plan meals for. They would try almost anything they had not eaten before, and they liked almost everything. So you could plan weeks ahead without repeating and always have a meal that would be exciting and appealing for them.

Mrs. Roosevelt was a moderate eater without any particular fondness for any one kind of food. The President also was a moderate eater, but he had a particular fondness for all wild game, curried chicken, and pigs' feet in a sweet-sour sauce. It was this type of pigs' feet that he requested to be served at luncheon for just the Prime Minister, Winston Churchill, and himself.

Princess Martha of Norway, who lived at Pookshill, Maryland, during the war, had a cook who often prepared pigs' feet in this style and she had brought the President this dish. He had a twinkle in his eye when he said, "Let's have them for luncheon tomorrow for the Prime Minister."

When luncheon was served and the Prime Minister started to help himself, he inquired, "What is this?"

He was told, "Sir, this is pigs' feet."

He said, "Pigs' feet? I never heard of them," and then heartily helped himself. After tasting them he said, "Very good, but sort of slimy."

The President laughed and said, "Yes, they are a bit, but I am fond of them. Sometime we will have some of them fried."

Whereupon the Prime Minister replied, "No, thank you. I do not believe I would care for them fried." Then they both had a hearty laugh.

Prohibition had been abolished, making it necessary to send for barrels of glassware which had been packed up and stored away when the prohibition amendment went into effect. We found some rare cut glass and crystal dating back to the Harrison Administration, including wineglasses of all descriptions. In no time at all gifts from wine manufacturers poured into the White House—even Japanese saki. Very little of it was palatable for the table, but we would serve a spiked punch and a fruit punch at receptions, so I experimented with combinations of wine to develop a punch to use up the gift wines.

The spiked punch always went over big. Even with the most sedate groups, when we served 35 to 45 gallons of fruit punch we would need an average of 110 gallons of spiked punch for a crowd of 1200, and most likely I would have to draw on a reserve supply. I first thought that, because of the newness of lifting the prohibition law, this consumption of spiked punch would wear off, but in the years to follow the averages kept steady.

There were five official receptions each social season—the Diplomatic, Judicial, Congressional, Departmental, and the Army and Navy. You could grade these receptions on estimates of quantities and qualities of food and drinks. The diplomats never eat much or drink too much because these people are continually on the go and, come tomorrow, they must do this same thing over. At the Judicial receptions the higher echelon, like the diplomats, eat little and drink lightly, but the lower echelon can sort of step it up for you. So the general pattern of Judicial, Congressional and Departmental receptions is that business will be slow around the punch bowls until after the bigwigs have been down the line. However, the Army and Navy must have had very few bigwigs or big brass, for within fifteen minutes after the line started moving the rush would be on until the end. For the newspaper and radio press parties and receptions you opened the doors and tried to keep the bowls filled.

So I made my estimates by what information the social room would supply. If it was a political club, church organization or delegates at a convention, you had to remember that any affair at the White House is really an outing plus the fact of taking home to little Ann or Mary a cooky from the White House. Eighty per cent will take two helpings, 75 per cent three helpings, and another 30 per cent four helpings. I have seen people load their plates with five and six sandwiches and cakes. The more varieties of cakes, cookies and sandwiches there are, the more some people just must sample each kind.

Mrs. Roosevelt invented the double-header teas. I am sure most First Ladies called it a day after receiving 400 or 500 people in an afternoon. However, Mrs. Roosevelt would schedule two different groups—one at 4:00 P.M. and another at 5:00 P.M. There would be 400 or 500 in each group.

This meant that after the first group was cleaned out, you had about thirty minutes to

The Opposite Sex and Your Perspiration

Q. Do you know there are two kinds of perspiration?

A. It's true! One is "physical," caused by work or exertion; the other is "nervous," stimulated by emotion. It's the kind that comes in those moments when you are tense or emotionally excited.

Q. Which perspiration is the worst offender?

A. The "emotional" kind. Doctors say it's the big offender in underarm stains and odor. This perspiration comes from bigger, more powerful glands—and it causes the most offensive odor.

Q. How can you overcome this "emotional" perspiration?

A. Science says a deodorant needs a special ingredient specifically formulated to overcome this emotional perspiration without irritation. And now it's here... exclusive Perstop*. So effective, yet so gentle.

Q. Why is ARRID CREAM America's most effective deodorant?

A. Because of Perstop*, the most remarkable anti-perspirant ever developed, ARRID CREAM Deodorant safely stops perspiration stains and odor without irritation to normal skin. Saves your pretty dresses from "Dress Rot."

Why be only Half Safe? use Arrid to be sure!

It's more effective than any cream, twice as effective as any roll-on or spray tested! Used daily, new antiseptic ARRID with Perstop* actually stops underarm dress stains, stops "Dress Rot," stops perspiration odor completely for 24 hours. Get ARRID CREAM Deodorant today.

Ground-in grime... or simply soiled...

you need CLOROX® to get out dirt that suds leave in!

No mistake. Ground-in grime, or simply soiled . . . part of the dirt in most every wash is suds-proof.

Show you suds-proof dirt? Look inside any shirt collar. Deposits of this same stubborn soil lock themselves into almost everything you launder. And it's a build-up of suds-proof dirt that makes a wash go gray.

Clorox takes over where suds leave off. Good detergent will loosen much of the dirt. Clorox goes after what's left . . . cleans in a way suds can't. Regular use of Clorox, with its special dissolving action, actually melts suds-proof dirt away . . . leaves your washes cleaner than even the best detergents alone can make them.

Next wash, ground-in grime, or simply soiled, see for yourself...

Clorox actually dissolves suds-proof dirt that makes clothes gray!

re-dress your table with fresh china, cloths and food. I was told by old-timers that it could not be done. I had the carpenters build a 40-foot table across the west wall in front of the fireplace in the State Dining Room. The table was filled with assortments of cookies, cakes, sandwiches, nuts and candy. All the serving tables at the sides and end of the dining room would also be filled with this assortment.

I had six services of trays, holding ten cups of tea or coffee. These were passed to the guests as they entered the dining room, with a crew of girls pouring tea and coffee in the small dining room which was used as a serving pantry. Each trip to the state room by the waiters meant 60 cups of tea and coffee and six trips could be made in twelve minutes and 360 guests served. This left only 70 cups of tea or coffee to be served at either end of the table, yet the guests were all served and had time to eat. As soon as they finished the aides and ushers moved them along, explaining there was another party waiting.

When the chief usher told me Mrs. Roosevelt's plans for these double-header teas he said she wanted the cost to be kept at the minimum. All sandwiches had to be prepared in the pantry. No buying from a caterer. Sandwiches that cost from $5 to $10 a hundred I found could be made by a pantry crew for $1.50 a hundred, including labor.

When I first went to M.I.T., I was told by Mr. Parris, "If you can prepare for six, you can prepare for six thousand. You merely multiply." During those days most anyone was being invited to the White House, and without a doubt this is the way it should be, for, after all, the White House belongs to the people. I am sure Mrs. Roosevelt didn't refuse any group admittance and nothing delighted her more than to give them a sip of tea, coffee or lemonade and cookies. But even just to hand 500 to 800 people a glass of water means work.

Mrs. Roosevelt had great stamina and a capacity for greeting people, and a big party today didn't mean that she would rest tomorrow. When you finished today's party, you merely crossed it off your list, for tomorrow there might be a formal luncheon for 50 or 60 ladies, a social family dinner at night with perhaps 25 to 30 guests, and a movie starting near ten o'clock with refreshments afterward. And again the next day another double-header tea, if she didn't take off on a trip somewhere and want a 6:30 breakfast. She seemed never to tire.

When I had finished a party, before leaving for home, I would check my orders for the next day, check the list of help required and assignments and make up the list for the Secret Service and police guards. You seldom hear a compliment, but just let something go wrong, and you will hear the bad news. So you checked and double-checked. Even if the President and the First Lady were pleased (and they were always the easiest to please), it was a day of real accomplishment when the help, too, were pleased with your efforts.

The mass production of teas and receptions created a souvenir seekers' problem. Mostly it was linen tea napkins and the less expensive electroplated silver used for such large parties. We were not in the least bit snobbish, but we had to face the facts of life.

It was really commendable of the First Lady to invite so many people of different walks of life to a tea or reception. Many of the Washington elite made snobbish remarks that everyone was going to the White House. One lady said that she had let her maid off for the afternoon, since she was invited to a tea at the White House. To her amazement, she saw the maid in the receiving line ahead of her. This was more than she could stand, so she feigned a sudden illness and left.

There is no truth in that story, I am sure, but people will talk.

Souvenir seekers posed a diplomatic problem. You dared not accuse anyone of taking a souvenir. Like the time when a lady guest had packed a silver tray in a bag to take with her. She was having trouble closing the bag and in the meantime breakfast was announced, so she asked the maid if she would fasten the bag.

The maid started to rearrange the clothing so that the bag would close and discovered a fourteen-inch silver tray bought for the White House in 1898 and inscribed "The President's House." She called me and asked what she must do.

She said, "Maybe Mrs. Roosevelt gave the tray to her. Should I tell the chief usher?"

I told her to say nothing to anyone and that I would take the tray back to the pantry. I was sure Mrs. Roosevelt had not given the lady the tray, for not even Mrs. Roosevelt could dispose of it. The White House and all its furnishings were merely being loaned to her by the people of the United States while the President was working for them.

HINT TO A BRAND-NEW HUSBAND

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

It isn't that wives are sneaky exactly.
It's just that they don't act matter-of-factly.
They ask for mink . . . oh, they ask quite clearly,
But do it when you're asleep or nearly,
Then take your nodding for kind assent.
They swear they yearn to sleep in a tent.
And camping with you is all they beseech.
Then they buy clothes for a month at the beach.

It isn't that wives are devious.
No, boy,
It's just that the men deliver the lowboy
Before they mention they happened to buy one,
And a lowboy's cheaper a lot than a high one.
Oh, certainly wives aren't underhanded.
The angels in heaven are not more candid
Than loving wives as they hug and thank you
For letting them once again outflank you!

The maid said, "What if she should look into her bag before she leaves and ask about it?"

I laughed and said, "The lady will never question you about this, and if she ever returns as a guest she will be ashamed to look you in your eyes."

The Roosevelts inaugurated so many social events, like the movie stars' luncheon and the luncheon the Cabinet ladies gave for the Senate ladies. I should like to tell about the Cabinet ladies' luncheon for the Senate ladies. This was always a garden-party luncheon, weather permitting.

First we would have a luncheon for the Cabinet ladies at which they planned the menu for the party for the Senate ladies and decided which part of the menu each Cabinet lady would donate. Here I must say these Cabinet ladies were no different from any group of church ladies getting ready for a church supper. Some ladies could always be depended on to supply quantity and quality, while with others you just did not know how much they would bring. I will not have to consult my diary to recall the ladies of the Cabinet who brought quantities and quality food nor to recall the ladies who more or less were a little sparing.

However, ladies like Mrs. Morgenthau, Mrs. Woodring, Mrs. Hull, Mrs. Garner, Mrs. Ickes and Mrs. Swanson always made up for the ladies who happened to be a wee bit sparing. The most sparing of the lot seemed to be Miss Perkins, the Secretary of Labor. Usually she would supply a spongecake, made by a local chain store with the brand name on it. After all, she was a Cabinet member, and a very busy lady.

After two or three years Mrs. Roosevelt suggested that she supply whatever menu the Cabinet ladies decided on, the cost to be shared equally. This worked out much better and it was easier for us.

The movie stars' luncheons started with the President's birthday ball for the March of Dimes. These luncheons always afforded the help a bit of excitement. They were more excited over them than over the visit of a king or queen. We all had our favorites among the stars and all of them at some time or other were luncheon guests. Melvyn Douglas and his wife, who was a congresslady from California, were often house guests. James Cagney, Errol Flynn, Robert Taylor, Ralph Bellamy, George Raft, Irene Dunne, Paulette Goddard and Edward G. Robinson—to tell the truth, there were too many to mention. The ones that impressed me most were Wallace Beery, who kept complaining that his feet hurt, and Marie Dressler, who remarked that she thought me handsome and that I should be in Hollywood. I was flattered and she will always live in my memory.

Edward G. Robinson, when he was a guest for an inaugural affair, came behind the scenes and met the help in the pantry.

Mrs. Roosevelt and members of the family would attend the March of Dimes balls at the different hotels after a birthday dinner for the President at the White House. This dinner usually brought most of the Roosevelt clan together, plus old Hyde Park and Albany friends—a group which always included the Morgenthaus. Presents would be piled on the table, on the floor, and under the table at the President's chair.

Many politicians often spoke of the President as being a money spender. Perhaps so with other people's money, but a party of this type came out of the family budget and when I would inquire of the President if he wanted champagne he would say, "How many do we expect?"

He could estimate to a drink how many bottles to use and he would add, "Do not pour too often and be sure to have enough left to fill the glasses for the toasts."

He had the frugality of a Vermont Yankee. He usually made his own cocktails and never made any more than enough to go around. If he made seconds, he would get the count needed. You never found even the essence of a drink left in a cocktail shaker.

The President was a very able carver of all kinds of wild game. He delighted in carving for all family parties and no man could get more off a pheasant, duck or turkey. He would scrape the carcass of a bird white before he would ask for another. Many times we would have birds for the boys of the family to carve as well as the President when the parties were so large, because, the way the President shaved a bird, dinner would be slow in coming if only one person carved.

The family always got a kick out of comparing the number of guests the President could serve from one turkey with the number any of the boys could serve. As I have said before, the Roosevelts were a fun-loving family and they always had a lot of fun at their family parties and no guest could stand back and not take part.

June of 1939 started the big parade of international entertaining. I like to think of the important men and women for whose comfort and services I was responsible during their visits at the White House. The premier attraction in 1939 was the visit of the King and Queen of England.

SIX UNDER 6

By NELLE KEYS BELL PHOTOGRAPHS By JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Preparing for a family outing requires joint effort. Tom starts with the triplets while Marian gets the older children ready in the order in which they can be depended upon to stay clean: Terrie first, Connie next, and Sammy—"always into everything"—last.

One day's supply of diapers.

The Hutchisons' family doubled overnight when their triplets were born

Manawa, Wisconsin

Dear Editors: Not long ago, we were just an average family, not very different from anyone else. But on February thirteenth I had triplet baby girls, and since that time life has been very different. We now have six children under six, with four in diapers.

My husband, Tom, and I are twenty-eight years old. Terrie is almost six and goes to kindergarten; Connie will soon be four; Sammy (our one and only boy) will be two in July. Before, there didn't seem to be enough hours in the day for all that had to be done. Now that I have three additional babies to care for, things seem to get done just as well. There isn't much chance to sit down and relax, but I'm having a wonderful time.

We have lots of kids, bills and problems, but lots of fun and love in our house too. Tom and I are a proud pair of parents and think we have a pretty wonderful family. Maybe we'd both like to boast a little.

MARIAN HUTCHISON

Petite, brown-eyed Marian Hutchison remembers the first day of February, 1959, as clearly as if it were yesterday. "That was the day we found out," she explains.

The first was a Sunday, Marian recalls, and a blizzard was blowing outside the big frame house at 787 Depot Street, Manawa, Wisconsin. The Hutchisons were expecting another baby about March twentieth, and Marian had been feeling extremely tired and ungainly. At her regular checkup the week before, her doctor had told her to get more rest; he'd also said severely that she was gaining too much weight.

"I'll bet I'm going to have twins," Marian had laughed, and had agreed to X rays, from which there had been no report as yet.

Now, dutifully resting on the living-room couch, she listened idly as Tom read A Visit From Saint Nicholas ("A perennial favorite") to Terrie, Connie Marian, 5′1″ tall, 105 lbs., tried at first to sterilize all the bottles, make all the formula, in one operation. She couldn't lift the full pan from sink to stove, changed to twice a day.

"Having the first baby is the biggest adjustment a couple has to make—thank goodness we didn't have the triplets first!"

"I never get mixed up about which ones have been fed," says Marian, "but I can never remember which has had drops and which hasn't." So drops are administered at one time.

and future football star Sammy. Then the telephone rang. "Tom came to answer it," Marian remembers. "He said, 'Yes. . . . Yes. . . . Oh, my gosh. . . . My gosh!' Then he turned to me—he was pale and absolutely past speech—and held up three fingers!"

That was how Marian learned that the baby they were expecting would be triplets.

Tom says, "It really shook me up at first. Just imagine, you're going along with three nice children, and thinking easily of four—and then, suddenly, it's six. You start worrying. Will they be all right? Where are we going to put them? How can I manage college for six?"

"The doctor said the babies would probably be born prematurely, and that worried me," Marian says. "Between Connie and Sammy I'd had a miscarriage—they would have been twin boys if they had been born, and we were so sad—and I kept remembering that premature babies don't have as good a chance. And then—you know how the word gets around in a small town—one woman said, 'Oh, you poor thing—but maybe they won't live.' That really hurt me, and I just couldn't get it out of my mind."

The children love to go for rides: Terrie up front with daddy; Sammy, Connie with Marian; Kristy, Kathy and Kelly in comfort in their car seats. Or is it Kelly, Kathy and Kristy? Anyway, that's Kathy in the middle.

One night after Sammy's bath, Tom turned to hang up a towel, caught up with Sammy half a block away, sans clothing but waving his diaper. Now Tom keeps a firm grip on the situation.

The "editor, advertising salesman, photographer, janitor and co-owner" of the Manawa Advocate pulls a proof copy. "Once I wrote up three weddings and two funerals in a hurry," Tom admits, "and one story read, 'Pallbearers at the wedding were ——' But I was on another newspaper then."

Forewarned, the hospital in Clintonville, eighteen miles north, prepared for the multiple birth. One of their two "isolets" was already in use for another "preemie"; they borrowed from the hospital in nearby Marion and from the one in New London. Marian's blood was typed and a supply held ready. Her doctor invited another doctor from Marion to assist in the delivery.

Unwilling to chance hazards of icy roads and snowdrifts, the doctor insisted that Marian must stay in Clintonville near the hospital. Luckily her parents lived there, so the whole Hutchison family moved up "for the duration." Tom drove daily to his work as editor and co-owner of the weekly Manawa Advocate, and the children reveled in the extended visit to Grandpa and Grandma Rulseh.

"It was a tense time for the grownups, though," says Marian. "As far as we could find out, these would be the first triplets ever born in Waupaca County. My parents, Tom's parents, my two brothers and Tom's eight brothers and sisters were all so concerned."

A little after midnight on February thirteenth, Marian shook Tom and said quietly, "It's time to go."

"Ever since we had the tornado a couple of years ago, a high wind or a big cloud can scare Marian sick, but in a real crisis she doesn't turn a hair," Tom remarks. "There I was, so nervous I couldn't dial the hospital's number, and her mother's teeth were actually chattering; but Marian was as calm as an old lady starting to the grocery store!"

At 1:07 A.M., less than an hour after Marian had her first pains, Kathleen, 4 pounds, was born; Kolleen, 3 pounds, 15 ounces, followed four minutes later; and Kristine, 3 pounds, 2 ounces, was only two minutes behind Kolleen (Kelly).

Except for the difference in weight (which is still apparent at seven months), Kelly and Kristy were identical; they were born with heavy hair and with not one mole or other mark by which to tell them apart. Kathy, first-born, was heavier and blonder than her siblings, and had almost no hair. ("All my other babies were baldies, too," says Marian.) The doctor had to breathe into Kristy's mouth to start her breathing; otherwise the births were without unusual incident.

For mother and babies, that is. The father went out like a light. Tom had lost twelve pounds in the last two nervous weeks, worried about Marian, tormented by fears that the triplets wouldn't live, driving back and forth through almost continuous snowstorms. He was exhausted; he says sheepishly, "When they told me Marian was fine and the babies all right. I felt like a millionaire. And then I just fainted away. First time in my life I ever did that!"

Thankful her babies were healthy, Marian still had one small regret: "I'm not superstitious, but I did wish they'd waited just one more day and been born on Valentine's Day, rather than Friday the thirteenth."

Tom, who follows a firm rule for his paper that news should be written impersonally, managed to keep from bragging about the triplets in the Advocate. He wrote the story of their birth "to Mr. and Mrs. Thomas A. Hutchison" as a straight news story. At the end, however, he succumbed to temptation and added one sly personal note: "All the babies look like their father and sound like their mother." And the story appeared at the top of the first column, front page.

The triplets, thriving in their isolets, were unaware of the reporters and photographers who thronged to see them. But, says Marian, "They made me feel like a celebrity. The Clintonville Chamber of Commerce gave each of the babies a Government bond and a bunch of diapers; and the Altar Society in Manawa sponsored a coin shower for them—the whole town turned out. I was a little embarrassed by that at first—I'd never heard of a coin shower; but it was a lovely, practical way to honor the triplets. The money came in mighty handy for cribs and other nursery equipment. Oh, another thing: I'd ordered one layette; it turned out the company provided 'twin insurance,' so we got three for the price of one."

Marian was back home in Manawa in a few days, but the babies had to remain in the hospital until they reached five pounds. This gave the Hutchisons time to make some necessary arrangements for which there had been no time earlier. "Somebody had asked me at the hospital, 'What are you going to do with them?'" Marian relates, "and I'd said, 'What can you do? We're going to take them home and care for them and love them.' But when we got home I looked around the house and said to Tom, 'What are we going to do with them?'"

In the Hutchisons' nine-room house, which has a bath on each floor, all the bedrooms were upstairs. On the lower floor was the big, central living room, from which opened off the kitchen, dining room, large playroom and Tom's office-den. "Well," said Tom philosophically, "no more playroom, no more den."

They decided to convert the den into a bedroom for themselves, and to make the playroom into a nursery. ("When they get old enough," Marian planned, "we'll move them upstairs; we'll take the nursery for our room, and you can have your den back.") The airy playroom gave ample space for the three cribs, daintily painted chests, bath table, scales and other addenda necessary to the health and happiness of three tiny girls, who were still in the hospital trying to grow up to five pounds.

Several days after she came home, Marian began to hemorrhage profusely. By the time they got her back to the hospital, she was so weak from pain and loss of blood that she could not stand. She was rushed to the operating table, where it was discovered that there was still another placenta. A two-hour operation, transfusions and another stay in the hospital resulted.

Hospitalization insurance covered most of this second time in the hospital, but Tom says wryly, "It doesn't cover maternity, and that's really all we need it for. We've never had a hospital bill that wasn't connected with maternity—the triplets cost us $800. Hospital bills have been our downfall."

When Marian came home this time, Tom's sister Mary came along to help out. Marian, tired and weak, was experiencing a sort of delayed shock in relation to the triplets. "I'd imagine them all awake and crying in the middle of the night," she says, "and it would simply scare me to death. I just couldn't see how in the world I could cope with all of them. But do you know," she adds proudly, "except for two-o'clock feedings, we've never been up with them at night! I had a letter from another woman who'd had triplets, and she said she and her husband hadn't had more than two or three hours' sleep any night since hers were born. Mine are such good babies!"

Terrie, Connie and Sammy, who had again stayed with their grandparents while Marian was in the hospital, were growing impatient. Marian had told them some time before the births that she would be going to the hospital to get a new baby; but she'd been to the hospital twice—and still no baby! Tom had explained about the triplets, of course, but the unfamiliar term had little meaning for them. Terrie reported at kindergarten, "My mamma had three little tablets."

In one sense, the babies' stay in the isolets turned out to be a blessing. Kathy, largest at birth, reached the requisite five pounds in four weeks and was brought home; Kelly came home a week later, and Kristy a week after Kelly. Thus Marian had a chance to regain her strength while she got used to caring for them by degrees. The older children, still conditioned to the idea of one baby, were a bit bewildered by three. A few days after Kristy came home, Connie asked, "Mamma, have you decided yet which one we'll keep?" She was delighted to learn they'd decided to keep all three.

The children enjoyed the spotlight of publicity—at least for a while. "But one day someone asked Terrie about the babies," Marian says penitently, "and she turned away and said, 'Oh, let's just drop it, shall we?' It made me feel terrible. We'd been so busy with the triplets that I guess we'd let the other children feel a little neglected. But I think it's all right now—we've tried hard not to let the babies take time or attention from the other children." She adds reflectively, "I suppose the triplets will always get a lot of notice, but I don't want them or the others to feel it too much. And I don't want the babies to be just 'the triplets.' I want them to be Kathy and Kelly and Kristy—individual personalities in their own right.

"Connie worried me for a while, too," Marian continues. "Each of the others has some special distinction: Terrie is the oldest; Sammy is the only boy; and the triplets have the double distinction of being babies and triplets; I was afraid Connie would be sort of lost in the crowd. But I needn't have worried; Connie's so outgoing and energetic, she makes her own distinction." Marian laughs. "You'll never believe what that child's first words were. She was nine months old and had never said a thing you could understand. Then, one day, she said very clearly, 'See you later, alligator'! She'd picked that up from her father."

Although Kristy and Kelly are identical, it is hard for a casual observer to spot any difference among the three; they all look very much alike. But Terrie and Connie know them apart as well as their parents do. Sammy grandly calls them all "Kelly." Proud of his ability to climb out of his crib, Sammy is given to roaming quietly about the house in the early dawn. One morning he ventured into the nursery and wakened the three babies, who started to whimper in chorus. Sammy beat it out of there and dashed to his parents' bedroom, where he shook his mother awake. "Mamma," he said urgently, "come and do something with all them Kellys!"

Marian insists that taking care of the triplets has been no problem, but it still takes time. "I've pretty well readjusted my whole system," she remarks. "I had to learn to let a lot of things go—sometimes I don't get upstairs to make the beds until it's time for the children to get in them again. I don't like not having the house straight," she says, looking with disfavor about the immaculate living room. She is an unobtrusive housekeeper who appears to wander casually through the house, trim in tailored slacks, pausing to hug a child or sip a cup of coffee standing up, and never seeming bothered or rushed. But suddenly dishes are clean, the daily load of laundry washed, dried and folded, the whole downstairs vacuumed, babies bathed and fed, and lunch preparations under way.

Marian sends the ironing out to a woman who does a big basketful for a dollar; but except for the few days Mary stayed with them, and a cleaning woman who comes for three hours a week, she has had no help since the babies came. "So many women say they're bored stiff with housework," she remarks, "but I get a lot of satisfaction from it. I love washing, love hanging up clothes in the sunshine—although I dry only the sheets outside now and do the other things in the dryer. And I like vacuuming—it's so restful; I guess I vacuum two or three times a day. I even like to scrub floors, but the cleaning lady does the floors and woodwork now; I just don't have time.

"My biggest frustration," declares Marian, "is not being able to cuddle my babies more. I'd love to hold them while I feed them—but I need another lap and an extra pair of arms! We all love them so much, though, that I hope they feel loved without as much cuddling as I'd like to give them." She feeds the triplets in their cribs, strapping the bottles, at the proper angle, to their favorite stuffed animals. For puréed foods, she uses a wide-mouthed bottle with a plunger at the base, by which she can regulate the amount taken. This is an enormous timesaver, but Marian says, "I've got to work out a way to spoon-feed them more; they need the practice."

Frequently she puts all three babies together in one crib; they lie and watch one another with wide-eyed interest, reaching out hands and feet for a friendly touch. Kathy and Kristy can turn themselves over, but Kelly is still trying to achieve that skill.

Every afternoon Marian spreads a blanket on the living-room floor and puts the three down, usually on their stomachs. They lift themselves on their arms to coo and gurgle their approval of this wider world; crawl awkwardly about; and, given a bit of help, try valiantly to stand up. Marian sits cross-legged on the floor with them, talking, playing and impartially cuddling first one and then another—and sometimes all three at once. Sometimes, even, all six—which is quite a trick.

Holding Kelly and Kristy, Marian points out infinitesimal differences: "See, Kristy's face is a little smaller; Kelly has fatter cheeks. And Kristy has a temper! When we brought her home, she was so tiny, but she had—and still has—the loudest yell. And I almost think she's the strongest; she was the first one who tried to stand up." She adds, anxious that her prodigies be equally admired, "But Kathy has a tooth."

"The hardest thing at first was fixing formula and sterilizing bottles," says Marian. "I tried doing them all at once, but the pan was so heavy I couldn't lift it from sink to stove so I changed to twice a day. I stopped sterilizing at three months; and now they've switched from formula to homogenized milk—we use about five quarts a day—so that simplifies matters too.

"Tom's a big help," she goes on. "He changes the babies and gives them their first bottle in the morning while I'm fixing breakfast. And he usually dresses Sammy—Terrie and Connie dress themselves. At night he bathes the older children and gets them ready for bed while I'm bedding down the babies and clearing up the kitchen and doing a load of diapers—there's no diaper service in Manawa and I have to do them every day."

"I still can't understand how Marian manages when she's here alone," Tom remarks, "because all the time I'm here we're both busy. But don't believe what she says about letting

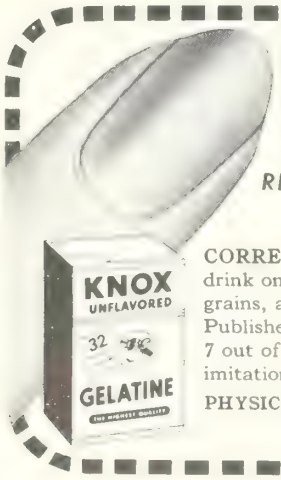
"NOW-- I EAT BETTER, FASTER AND MORE COMFORTABLY WITH MY FALSE TEETH BY RAISING MY BITING POWER"

Mr. K. McM., Rye, N.Y.



Dental plates give only 26% average biting power of natural teeth. FASTEETH raises biting force—cushions sensitive gums—holds teeth more securely.

Be happy with your false teeth. Laugh, talk, eat without embarrassment. Wear teeth all day long with more comfort. Use FASTEETH — the special powder thousands of dentists give patients to hold plates more firmly in place. You may speak more clearly—eat faster. FASTEETH soothes and protects tender gums when chewing. You can bite harder — enjoy the hard-to-eat foods you need. FASTEETH checks "plate odor" (denture breath). No gummy, gooey, "pasty" feel. At drug counters everywhere. FASTEETH Outsells all Others.

the house go; she's always kept a clean house, and clean children—as children go. She's a good housekeeper, a wonderful mother and a perfect hostess. I don't know how she does it."

Both Tom and Marian enjoy having friends come for dinner, but Marian says, "We don't entertain at all now; we can't with everything so hectic. But we will again when the babies get older. I usually serve something like a roast, potatoes, vegetable, salad and dessert. I'm not really an inspired cook—I learned after we were married, and it will never be a major talent." She twinkles. "I guess my only real talent is having babies—I love 'em! My mother is horrified by the speed with which we've had our family—I've been pregnant for five of the first six years we've been married."

Tom Hutchison and Marian Rulseh had "seen each other on campus" at Stevens Point State Teachers' College. But, says Marian, "We didn't really notice each other until a dance in Waupaca in August of 1952. I'd gone with another girl, and when Tom asked me to dance I immediately remembered that nice grin."

"Speak for yourself," Tom puts in. "I'd been interested in you for three years!"

They became engaged at Thanksgiving and wanted to be married soon, but there were problems. Marian was a Congregationalist, Tom a Catholic; and he still had one semester to go at the University of Wisconsin for his degree in journalism. Marian became a Catholic; and Tom's parents offered to pay his school expenses for the last term—as they would have done anyway. They were married on January 31, 1953, and spent their honeymoon in Madison looking for a place to live and a job for Marian.

"The rent on our little apartment was $75," Marian remembers, "and my salary, as typist in a garage, was nothing to speak of. Luckily, we'd had $500 in wedding gifts, but for the last month's rent we had to hit the piggy bank. We had so much fun, even though we almost never went out. Evenings meant housework for me and homework for Tom. He has a good mind—he graduated with high marks, except for one lone D."

"That D," Tom remarks smugly, "was in a course called 'Marriage and the Family'—and look at me now!"

He goes on, "We're still in debt, but it amazes me now to remember how little we managed on in those days. When I graduated we had $10 in the world. I got a job as reporter on the Oconto paper, at $50 a week—later $75, because Marian prodded me to ask for a raise. We used the $10 as down payment on a small stove and an old refrigerator, and bought a dilapidated car on a $165 bank loan—I had to have a car for work."

"Before Terrie was born," Marian says, "I made all her things—we couldn't buy anything for her except two dozen diapers. And for our first wedding anniversary Tom gave me a badly needed dress and I gave him a pair of slacks—we couldn't afford either. . . . Excuse me, Kathy's crying. Kathy I can always tell, but Kristy and Kelly sound exactly alike—except if it sounds angry, it's Kristy."

She resumes, holding Kathy in her arms, "Kelly and Kristy are still asleep. You know, I am constantly thankful that we didn't have the triplets first—I'd have gone out of my mind! I'd never been around babies, and with Terrie everything was a major problem. It took me two hours to make formula—if I touched anything I'd have to scrub and sterilize it again—and I spent all morning bathing her. Now I just dunk the babies in the sink. Once I actually called the doctor because Terrie had diaper rash! And with just one baby, I couldn't get anything done. Tom would come home; I'd be crying, the baby would be crying, there'd be no supper, the house would be a mess. I don't know how he stood it! Or Terrie either. I do think having the first baby is the major adjustment a married couple has to make."

"The house was never a mess," Tom asseverates; but Marian goes on, "And I couldn't cook—it took me three years to learn how to make gravy. The first chicken I put on the table was practically raw, and Tom sitting there insisting it was good! For that first wedding anniversary, we couldn't afford to go out, so we asked Tom's dad and mother and Nancy and David for dinner; I baked a cake, and it was just awful. But in spite of everything, I wrote in my diary that night, 'Hope all our other years will be as good as the first.'"

Dashing to a story one evening, Tom was arrested for exceeding a 25-mph limit. He paid a fine of $10 and costs of $7.65; he still remembers the exact amounts because "that wasn't only my pocket money—that was food money and milk-for-Terrie money."

"They have three mice over in Tent I," Susan wrote home; "I do hope we'll get mice in our tent." . . . "I have a blood blister. I was holding a tent stake when Suzanne hit it." . . . "Our tent didn't pass inspection this morning because Bones didn't clean her orange crate." . . . "I passed as a swimmer. Now I can go to the raft!" Days are not long enough for all the exciting things there are to do in a Girl Scout camp!

SHE'S A

GOOD SCOUT

By NELLE KEYS BELL

HOW AMERICA LIVES
in the June JOURNAL

Tom, an ROTC alumnus, entered the Army Engineers as a second lieutenant in May, 1954. He says now, "I'm glad we had our family early—Connie was born in the Great Lakes hospital—but if I had it to do over I'd get my military service out of the way before marriage. All that moving around wasn't fair to Marian and the children. But the only other thing I'd do differently would be to have maternity insurance!"

Marian's diary entry for March 1, 1956, reads: "This was really a happy day. Moved to Manawa and settled down to a normal civilian life. Life was so hectic for a while; I was sick, and unhappily we lost our twin boys. But Tom likes the Advocate—we are happy—life is good again!"

Upon leaving the Army (as a first lieutenant) Tom had taken the job of "editor, advertising salesman, photographer and janitor" of the Manawa Advocate, at a salary of $85 per week plus $10 for expenses. He borrowed money to buy a ninth interest in the paper, paying it off at $50 a month. Gregarious, ambitious, interested in everything and everybody, he knew ery person in town in almost no time; soon e had built up circulation and advertising.

Then the owner of the paper decided that e would like to sell out. Tom talked it over ith Maurice Stevens, the Linotyper who had orked for the Advocate for twenty years; ey decided that, between them, they could ing it—they would buy the paper. Maury d the money; but Tom had to borrow his lf. Tom works practically round the clock; ter a few months of similar effort, Maury eclared that he would like to go back to work- g a forty-hour week. So they formed a cor- oration, and Tom now leases the business om the corporation, paying Maury a flat lary. "The first month after the changeover, e had only $198 to live on," Tom says. "The cond month was considerably better—$511. hat runs about our average. We figure to live $6000 a year, and put everything else back to the business."

Half the paper's income comes from adver- sing, Tom estimates, and the rest from sub- riptions and job printing. Present circula- on runs about 1250 per issue, mostly de- ered in Manawa or mailed out to rural eas. "There are 168 boxes at the post office," says proudly, "and 163 Advocates go in." he paper sells for $3 per year, or 7 cents per py on the newsstands.

Tom feels strongly that a newspaper must ke an active part in the community. "If mething needs doing, you have to try to get done. We report the news straight, but I und off on issues in editorials and in my own lumn—and invite people who differ to write ; we'll print whatever they have to say."

For a town of its size (1200) Manawa has a rprising number of active civic organiza- ns, and Tom is a working member of most them. He is especially proud of the Busi- ss Men's Club, which he helped to organize d of which he is president; in support of its uy in Manawa" policy, he and Marian buy thing outside that can be obtained in anawa. And Tom, as editor of the Advocate, onsors a Little League team, a bowling team d the annual football banquet.

Wednesday night is press night, but most other evenings are filled with meetings, which Tom considers part of his work. He is one of the town's twenty volunteer firemen, always on call for trouble in the town and on surround- ing farms. Firemen are paid a small fee, "by the hour," Tom laughs, "which makes it a kind of incentive program. We get about $2 for a grass fire, but if we let a house burn down it's worth $8. And if we have a good barn fire, we usually get a case of beer and sandwiches after it's over too!" ("He's teasing again," says Marian. "He usually brags that they're so efficient the state has cut insurance rates for this area.")

The firemen go on an average of 30 calls per year, for which total payment comes to about $80. "It's really meant for cleaning money," Tom says, "but it's paid in one lump right be- fore Christmas, so mine always goes for Christmas toys."

Tom is also active in the fish-and-game club, Knights of Columbus and Lions Club; but his favorite organization, says Marian, is the In- vestment Club, whose nine members meet once a month in their homes. "Tom is the world's worst tease," Marian laughs, "and he really had me fooled. They each invest five dollars a month in stocks—they've never made any money yet—plus a dollar for refreshments, and Tom never gets home before midnight. I thought they must really be sweating out their investments; but when they met here I found out that the whole thing is just an elaborate cover-up for a low-stakes poker game!"

At least one night a week Tom and Marian put the children to bed, hire a baby sitter and go out for dinner, to a movie or to visit friends. Their No. 1 sitter is Tom's cousin, Lynn, a high-school sophomore. "Lynn's wonderful with the children," says Marian. "The only thing wrong with her as a sitter is that she will not sit for football games. Tom's a football maniac, and I love the games too."

Marian used to work in women's organiza- tions: the Futurae Club, the Altar Society; and she wrote a shopping column, "The Feminine Hutch," for the paper ("She was al- ways asking for a raise!" says Tom). But the advent of the triplets put an end to all that, at least for the present. "I may go back to work later," says Marian. "I'll probably have to, when they're all in college. Tom's mother did that; she used to be a teacher, and went back to teaching to see her children through college. She's still teaching."

When the Hutchisons first came to Manawa, they rented the downstairs portion of a house. They had no furniture except lamps and a tele- vision set, but they did have Tom's discharge money from the Army. They decided to use it for good appliances and make do with second- hand furniture, some bought, some picked up from their families. Marian did a handsome job of reupholstering the old chairs, which they are still using; but she "made a bust" of refinishing a table. The money stretched to cover a range, washer and dryer, vacuum cleaner, and a rug for the living room.

In the summer of '57 with Sammy on the way, they needed more room. Again they bor- rowed money, to buy the house on Depot Street. Says Tom, "One of my classmates came through town and asked me how we were do- ing. I told him we must be doing pretty well— I didn't know of anybody else in our class who was $30,000 in debt!"

They bought their station wagon in 1957 also. "It seems we did everything right," Marian remarks proudly. "You'd almost think we were planning for the triplets—we have plenty of room in the house and the car, and the appliances make taking care of them so much easier. I don't know what in the world I'd do without my appliances.

"The dishwasher and garbage-disposal unit came with the house," she adds. "Not long after we moved in, I stopped up the disposal unit, and Tom undertook to fix it himself. He broke two pipes, and got so furious. He knows how now, though, and he's learned to do a lot of things around the house—building book- cases, painting, making repairs.

"Tom's a gentle soul," says his wife. "That's almost the only time I've ever seen him angry. And it's so good to have someone who's ap- preciative; Tom notices everything—if I've washed my hair, cleaned the bathroom, any- thing."

Both Tom and Marian are avid readers, "books, magazines, twenty-two newspapers, anything." Nights after the children are asleep they sit and read together till all hours. "It's so quiet and peaceful then that Marian hates to go to bed," says Tom, "and even after she's in bed she loves to keep on reading. One night she flicked a page of the JOURNAL and hit me in the eye with it. I had to go to the doctor next day—cost me $14!"

The Hutchisons' big tree-shaded yard is a fine place for games, and Connie and Sammy spend much of their time playing outside. The back yard has ample space for a flower-and- vegetable garden, swings, a drying area and a portable charcoal grill. "I just love living here," Marian says. "Everywhere we lived be- fore, we knew it was only temporary. It's so good to be settled down permanently and feel that Manawa is our home."

"Sure we're in debt," says Tom sturdily, "but we'll get out. We have confidence in our- selves and in the future. I don't understand why more young people don't go into business for themselves—there'll never be a better time. And there is so much challenge and satisfac- tion in building your own business, putting your whole self into it, knowing you sink or swim only by your own ability and effort."

Of the long-range future, Tom says, "I grew up on a farm and I like farming. Someday, if we ever have money enough, I'd like to man- age a farm and do free-lance writing for maga- zines. But there are lots of things to think about first; the children are all going to college— Sammy to get a degree, and the girls to get rich husbands for their old daddy."

As for the immediate future, Marian is now preparing an advertisement to appear in the want-ad columns of the Advocate: "Wanted to buy: Two high chairs and a triplet stroller. Mrs. Tom Hutchison, 787 Depot Street, Manawa." END on the front steps. I could hear your soft aughter at her quick, strange words. You adn't taught us Gaelic. Except for the songs. There was no wind blowing in through the ong curtains at my window, and the dim ight from the street lamp made everything in he room a mixture of blacks and grays. The nantel above the bed was a long shadow, and here was a silvery look to the plaster Indian nd the china owl that stood one on either end f it, the Indian with his arms folded across is chest and his narrowed eyes scorning the larkness, the owl with its pinched empty face.

I remember I pulled the covers up over my ose and tried to sleep. The same way you alays pulled them up over yours and slept.

In the bedroom down the hall, I could hear ny sisters Vera and Julie whispering and gigling about school and friends. And suddenly ny room seemed very lonely. I called for you hen. But it was Delia who answered.

"Sit still, Mary," I heard her say. "You've been going it all day."

"But I always tell her a bit of a story or a ong," you said.

"And she five!" Delia bit out the words. 'Tis time she bedded without coddlin'."

"All the same ——" you began. I could hear ou start to get up.

"Wait!" Delia stopped you. "We'll get nothing talked out this night if you go. I'll ake care of her."

I guess by then I was really fussing.

Delia must have seen the cover on the way o the bedroom. The green velours cover you kept over the hall trunk. It had long ball fringe on it. I'd seen it all my life. There was nothing in it to frighten me. But thrown over Delia's head the way it was, and her arms swaying, and her growling and hissing, I guess I went nearly hysterical.

That was when you came running into the room. Even in the dark I could see the whiteness of your face.

"Delia!" For the first time the soft blur was gone from your voice. "What kind of madness is this?"

Delia tossed the cover away. "There's more ways than one to stop a bawlin' calf," she said. "And you knowin' how nanny would fix us, and we little."

"I know all right," you said. "But it's gravecertain I am my children never will."

"Indeed!" Delia snorted. "We survived."

"We'll finish the talk later," you said. And when she'd gone you let the breath slip out of you in a little sigh. You were trembling almost as much as I was when you put your arms around me, and your face was cold against mine though the room was so hot.

"Hush, love," you whispered then. "Hush."

And with the words the first strange ice of fear thawed and trickled away.

St. Patrick's Day came on a warm springlike day, the year I was seven. It was the third year that Vera and Julie were going to be in the night entertainment at Cory Hall. All that afternoon you pressed the white dresses and petticoats and the green ribbons, while Vera and Julie sewed the last of the spangles on the red tarlatan Spanish costumes. You had washed my hair and pinned a towel around my shoulders, and I was sitting with my back to the big iron stove.

There was a good deal of talking and laughing going on in the kitchen, but soon you noticed only Vera and Julie were doing it.

"I suppose," you said then, "this time next year Francie will be in the entertainment."

"She's too little," Julie said, tying the spangle-edged kerchief over her black hair.

"Too little to sing and dance?" Your brows lifted as you set the iron hard on the board.

You knew I'd memorized every word of the songs, and you'd watched me shadow Vera and Julie till I could do the Spanish dance in my sleep. The jigs, of course, I'd known as long as my prayers.

We had supper early because Vera and Julie had to be at the hall by six o'clock. And you were careful not to look at me pushing the food untasted back and forth across my plate. We had the white dresses on, then, and the green bows, and you wore your best shirtwaist with your little gold watch pinned in among the tucks.

"Francie and I needn't leave till seven," you said. "We'll have more than enough time to get a front seat."

Each year, from the time I could remember, we'd sat in the front row, and I'd beat my feet to the quick music and long to be up with the others in the red glow of the spotlight. And you seemed to know it got harder and harder, and I could scarcely wait for the years.

After Vera and Julie left, you pushed the table against the kitchen wall and drew out the rocker

"Francie," you said, looking down at the little watch, "we've the best part of an hour. What do you say we have a little show of our own?"

And when I looked at you, puzzled, you added, "I don't half get the words of a song with so many of them bawlin' it out. I'd like you to sing me a verse or two now, and we alone."

I didn't want to at first. It didn't seem like much fun. And then you said, "Wait! We've the stage yet to fix."

And you went over and opened the fire door of the stove where the coals lay in a glowing bed, and the rosy light flashed into a pink square on the wall. And you reached up and turned down the lamp.

"Now," you said, settling into the rocker. "How does Tipperary go?"

I sang them all, the joy of it growing with each verse: The Low-Backed Car; The Minstrel Boy; It's a Great Night Tonight for the Irish. And after each song your hands would clap into a flutter, and you'd cry, "Oh, grand! Grand!"

And when the songs were done, you said, "Let's see a bit of that Spanish dance, now."

And I stepped and twirled, giddy as the dancing shadow on the wall behind me. Last of all came the jigs. You got up when I started on the reels, and you took my two hands and we circled and turned and stamped at the breakdown. And we laughed till the walls sang with the sound. I was flushed and breathless, lightheaded with the happiness when we finally spun to a stop.

"Well!" you said then, smoothing the loosened hair back over your temples. "Well! 'Twill have to be a fine show they give us this night to top that!"

And when I hugged you, and tried in a tumble of words to tell you how much I loved you, and how much I wanted to be like you—just like you—and how sorry I was for the envy brewing in me all the day, your arms tightened around me.

"'Tisn't always easy to be the littlest one," you said. "Come now, hush, love."

And with the words the last of the envy was gone, and I could wait for the years.

It was a bright Saturday morning just before my tenth birthday when I came into the kitchen with the kite. You were hanging newly starched curtains at the window. Yellow curtains they were. You always loved yellow. "It holds the sun," you used to say. "And the sun's a grand thing to hold."

I'd been kite flying with Billy Crowley, and I was wild because he'd got mine snagged on one of the limbs of their oak tree.

"I pulled the whole side of it off getting it down," I wailed. "Just look at it!"

You finished pushing the gathers evenly along the curtain rod, and then turned around. "Sure, a yard is no place to send up a kite," you said, picking up the tattered red tissue. "'Tis a hill makes the finest flyin'. When I was a girl, my favorite Uncle Matt would take me to the side of one of our Kerry hills. And do you know, my kite, and it only a bit of newsprint, would sail off like a bird till it was just a dot in the heavens."

"The string must have been miles and miles long," I said, slipping into the chair beside you.

You laughed. "Oh, I'd let the string go. I'd not the heart to keep holt to it, and that great paper bird beggin' to be off and on its way to the clouds."

You looked up at the sky through the window, and you smiled as if you could still see that little long-ago kite bobbing above you. And then your glance dropped and suddenly the smile vanished. A moment later you were out the door and running along the narrow bricked walk to the Crowleys' yard. You had your hand on the gate latch when we heard the hollow thud and the "whoosh" like air leaving a big paper bag.

Billy Crowley still had the kite string in his hand when you got to him, but the kite he was trying to reach was caught tight on the highest limb of the oak. You didn't touch him, just put your head down close to his and listened. Then you looked up, and the grayness seemed to have slipped from Billy's face to your own.

"Run for the doctor, Francie," you said. "Run fast!"

And when we came back, old Doctor Shea still in his white office coat and clutching his scuffed black bag, the crowd had gathered. Billy's mother was there, too, a great fleshy woman who somehow seemed shrunken as she leaned against you and with each sob drew a little of your quiet compassion. You'd taken off yo white apron and covered Billy with Only it wasn't white any more. Ar your arm tightened around Mr Crowley as the doctor knelt and turn back the covering.

In that moment I saw the bleach whiteness of death for the first tim and the scream was out of me befo I could swallow it. Your arms widen for me then, and I ran into them. Y always had room in your arms for o more.

And above the sobbing of Billy mother, and above the wild beati of my own heart, I heard your wh pered, "Hush, love."

And slowly the gray horror slipp out of the day.

You were waiting the supper th June afternoon when I came ho late from school. The afternoon t results of the eighth-grade examin tion were read. You looked at me a raced up the stairs, but all you sa was, "You're late, Francie."

I'd sunk onto the big brass bed, a was darkening your log-cabin qu with the tears when you opened t door. I heard you pull the rocker to the bed.

"'Tis the medal," you said, befor could tell you. You always kn things before I could tell them. T glad things or the sad ones.

It was the medal, of course. T gold medal, given to the honor pu after eight years of effort. Vera go the year she graduated. And so Julie. No one ever was as smart Julie, but I had tried. And come second. But second wasn't first, a there'd be no medal of mine for y to pin up on the strip of ribbon bes the diplomas.

"Was it Margaret took it?" y asked. And when I nodded, you sa "Margaret's a fine lass, and a qu one. Think a minute now of the she's bringing home with her. Yo not deny her that, and we with t medals already in the house?"

I thought of that, and of Margar thin face with the silver-rimmed gla that were always sliding down bone of her nose. I thought of studying. Even through the re time. And the days I'd gone to house, and her mother with the sa sort of thin face and silver-rimm glasses had come to the door and t me Margaret wasn't to come out, had to be busy with her book thought of how awful it would h been for Margaret if she hadn't the medal. If her mother —— A then I thought of you. And how m I'd wanted to win it for you. And h hard I'd tried too. And I found my smothering the words in the pill

And when the tears came fresh to y eyes at the thought that you eren't ashamed of or disappointed me, you brushed them away.
"Hush, love," you whispered then,
ush."
And all the bitterness was gone om the first defeat.

The week before my wedding you ept so busy. You had old Tim, the oodman, make a new leaf for the ning-room table. And you got out e ivory-colored linen cloth that had ghteen napkins to the set, and you ashed it free of the camphor leaves nd pressed it till it shone. And Mrs. rowley brought over her silver which as Rose of Sharon like your own, nd you sorted and rubbed the glow-
g pieces over countless cups of tea.
"'Twill be only a small wedding," ou told her. "Francie's not one for alls and things. Nor is Dan."
And by the eve of my wedding the d walnut wainscoting in our kitchen as glowing with new varnish, and e iron stove blacked into a dazzle.
he rosewood in the parlor smelled weetly of cedar oil, and the long hite curtains at the windows were iff as thin sheets of ice.
All that afternoon we shopped at ak's Corner for the pickles and little lver-skinned onions, and oh, great sseled bunches of celery and plump hite chickens. And coming home ith our arms filled with bundles you id, "We've enough food bought to ed Finn MacCoul."

And we laughed aloud on the sun-street. And I asked you again who nn MacCoul was, though I knew e story so well.
"A giant," you said, warming up to e tale as you always did about tales home. "He was a great giant of a an who could eat the like of a huned. And the coat of him could cover army."
And when I giggled you said, "Somey, my smart young lass, I'll take u to County Antrim in Ireland, and ow you the selfsame pathway Finn acCoul made on his way to Scot-nd. Rocks and stone squares the like u've never seen. You and I ——" nd suddenly you stopped. "Well, on't be you and I but you and Dan ll see them, now," you added.
"Dan wouldn't put a foot in Ireland thout you," I said.
"You've a grand man in Dan."
ur voice sobered. "And 'tis twice love you'll need give him, and he h no one but himself, God help n."
I think that's why you always loved
n. Because he was all alone, and ur heart was always waiting for ngs alone.
Before you went to bed that night
I set the pans of sweet dough on stove ledge. There'd be crisp ntons on the wedding table because I knew they were Dan's favorite l, and because he said no one could ke or even pronounce them but you.
t was almost midnight when you ened my door. You must have own how hard the last night in that room would be. You looked at the e big brass bed, with the log-cabin lt still smooth and unrumpled, and n you came over to the window ide me.

I remember the sky was almost white with stars and there was a sliver of a moon lost among them.

"'Tis a grand day you'll have tomorrow," you said.

You didn't tell me I'd be tired if I didn't get to bed. You didn't remind me that my wedding morning was only minutes away. You just seemed to know I wanted the night to last a little longer. And when the clock on St. Mary's struck the last note of twelve you sighed ever so lightly and you said, "Happy wedding day, love."

And when I looked at you the starlight was pale on your face, and I went into your arms as I had when I was a little girl. And you knew my heart was full to bursting with the wonder of the new love, but heavy with the memories of the old.

"You've a wide, beautiful road ahead," you said. "And a good man to walk it with. And that's as God planned it."

And when the quick tears came, the balm of the old words was there in your whispered, "Hush, love."

And all the vague uncertainties fled, and there was only joy in my wedding morning.

It was in the second year of my marriage, a gray February afternoon, when I brought the bundle of baby flannel to seam. You'd offered the machine twice to Dan and me, saying, "'Tis little use I have for it now." But somehow the oak-finished drop-top with its brass-ringed drawers belonged in your kitchen. It was as much a part of it as the old Seth Thomas that bonged away each half hour on the mantel.

Your eyes went dark with concern as you drew me into the warmth of the kitchen.

"'Twasn't wise for you to be out in this wind. And ice still on the walks," you said, rubbing the color back into my hands.

And when I told you I had to sew or do something with those last days so long and endless, you nodded.

"I know, I know," you said. And then you smiled. "They do have a way of draggin' on at the last like one of Father Downey's sermons," you told me.

And we laughed. And I forgot the cold and the length of the days, and everything but the familiar comfort of the old room and you in it. You slid the kettle to the front of the stove and took down the teabox.

"You'll have two hot cups inside you, now, before you'll ever start at the sewin'," you said.

And I got out one of the round loaves of currant bread you always made, and cut great slices of its fragrant sweetness.

"What do you suppose"—I asked the question that had troubled me so often those last days—"what do you suppose young Doctor Shea thinks of me being a full week late, this way?"

"The same thing he thought when Vera was two, and Julie, for all her grand grades in mathematics, almost the full month." You always had a way of laughing the mountain back into the molehill.

The old Seth Thomas had bonged four times and I'd finished all but one seam when the first pain grabbed like a hot tight band.

How quickly you got the cot ready.

"Stretch out a minute here," you said, careful to keep your voice calm.

And when I slipped between the welcome covers, you laid your hands over that new life that was straining to be freed, and you waited and you weighed.

And then you said, "'Twill be a while yet, love, but I'm going after Dan."

And you pulled on your wool coat and anchored your little hat with the same pansy-topped hatpins. And you came over to the side of the cot, and your voice with the soft blur you'd never lost flowed into the cold that was tight inside me.

"I'd not leave you had I a minute's doubt," you said.

And as the low cry slipped from me, you put your face down against mine.

"Hush, love," you whispered. "'Tis but God's way of making a miracle."

And the pain blurred and dulled, and there was only wonder left in the moment.

It was the Thanksgiving Matt (we named him after your favorite uncle) was two years old. The Thanksgiving that my Dan heard at last he was getting the promotion. We had all come to the old house for the holiday—Vera and Sam and their girls, Julie and Bill and their boy, and Dan and Matt and me. I remember each little detail of that day. As if deep inside me something whispered, "Remember it all. Every little thing."

You were basting the turkey when we got there. Great spoonfuls of dark gravy hissed and steamed as they splashed over the golden bird. And you smiled up at us over the pan, and your face was moist and rosy and there were damp feathers of hair across your forehead. I remember thinking how pretty you were. How dear. I remember thinking how wonderful you always made Thanksgiving for us all.

I wonder if ever again in this world there will be smells like the smells that filled that kitchen. Sage and pepper and onion mixing magically with the sweetness of mincemeat and the rich, heady scent of the puddings.

You had Dan carry up the jugs of chilled cider from the cellar, and Julie and I took down the cut-glass pitchers and set them at each end of the long table. Julie had spread the great linen cloth and laid out the old Rose of Sharon silver that richened with the years. And Vera had shined to a sparkle Grannie Dolan's crystal goblets that rang like little silver bells when you touched them with your nail tip. We put walnuts and butternuts and cashews into the polished wooden bowls that were themselves as smooth and slippery as the shells of chestnuts in the fall of the year. And you carried your prized Wedgwood dish to the table center and piled it high with red and golden fruit.

The fruit had dwindled and there were only broken bits of shells beside the nut bowl when Dan finally pushed back his chair and asked, "Shall we tell them the good news now, Francie?" He was bursting with happiness and pride, and I was too. Or I would have been, but the promotion meant the new branch, and the new branch meant the other coast, three thousand miles away.

I watched your face as you listened, and when Dan came to the part about Los Angeles, you put your cup down on the saucer carefully.

"Will it be always Los Angeles?" you asked then.

"I don't know." Dan didn't notice the white tightness of your finger hooked around the cup handle. "But I may get a chance at a branch back here in a few years."

"Years." Your lips formed rather than said the word.

We can't go, I thought. Oh, Dan dearest, we can't go and leave her. We just can't.

The snow came down before dark, a few feathery flakes at first, and then a thick white blanket that covered walks and fences.

"There's no need any of you going off in this storm," you said, while the children shouted their delight. "There's more beds than enough for us all here."

And so we stayed. And we sat around the fire, and we peeled fat little tangerines and sucked at the bursting sections. And you sang to the children. The same little song you sang to us when we were their ages.

> "'Twas a Thanksgivin' Day
> That a turkey ran away
> And an orange in his pocket
> On a Thanksgivin' Day."

And finally the children were put to bed. And then one by one the others went up, even my Dan. But we stayed. You and I. And we talked of everything but the thing that was heaviest in our hearts.

And finally you said, "Dan's been given a fine chance. And he long deservin' it."

"I know," I said. "And I want this chance for him too. It's—it's just leaving you ——"

"'Tis by a man's side his wife belongs," you said quietly.

And when I pressed my hands against my burning face, you drew them gently away.

"We'll not dampen this joy with tears," you said. "A mile or a thousand—we'll be no farther apart than the next prayer. Come—hush, love."

And all the miles became moments spanned with your love.

It was almost ten years before I got home again. That first year young Danny came along, and then in quick succession Mary and Theresa. The letters helped. And the telephone calls. Mostly from you. You'd wait till Vera and Julie were both at the old house, and then you'd get Julie to put the call through so we'd all have the chance to visit together. Dan and I would manage the holiday calls. And always the call on your birthday. But this year there was no answer to our birthday call. Each hour the whole day I gave the number to the operator.

She's at Vera's, I consoled myself. Or Julie's. They're having a celebration. But when ten o'clock came that night, I knew something was wrong.

"Maybe," Dan said, "there's snow back there. Maybe it's stormed and Julie's making her stay over."

So we called Julie's. And the phone rang over the long quiet miles. Finally I heard my sister's voice, wide-awake but heavy. And she told me. You didn't want to alarm us. You'd gone to the hospital four days before. "A bad sort of flu," Julie said. But I knew it was more than that, if you'd gone to the hospital.

"I'm coming home," I told Julie. And hung up.

Dan and I sat there for a long time. We counted the money on hand. Not very much. Our little Mary (so much like you) had had her tonsils out the month before, and Danny had fallen from the playground swing and broken an ankle. There just wasn't enough for plane fare. Not both ways.

"But you've got to take the plane," Dan said. "It's the only way if anything is serious. I'll get the rest somehow and send it."

Yes, indeed, Dan's what you always called him—a grand man.

I went to the hospital right from the airport. It was nine at night, but they let me into your room. You were asleep with the covers up over your nose, as I always remembered them. And as I always pull them up over mine too. Dan used to laugh about it when we first were married. He'd wake me in the morning and say I slept like a bandit. And I'd say, "Naturally. My mother is a bandit too."

I looked down at you and my heart tightened at the white that had frosted your hair. And your forehead was pale as the coverlet. Only the black fans of lashes gave color to the pillow.

I didn't speak. I tried to quiet my quick breathing. But you knew. As you always knew. And the black fans stirred and fluttered open, and even in the dim light there never was blue the color of your eyes.

"Francie!" you said. First in wonder. And then, "Francie," on a little sigh of disbelief.

The nurse turned up the light, and I could see the moisture standing in drops at your temples.

"Is it really you, Francie?" you whispered again.

"It's really me." I wiped the moisture carefully away.

"I'll skin Vera and Julie. Draggin' you over all those long miles and me with nothin' but cold," you said.

"Vera and Julie are innocent as lambs." I grinned. "And don't start skinning them in the dead of winter."

Your laugh was like a silver bell. "You're the quick one," you said. "Come close till I get a good look at you. My! You've grown into a grand woman!"

"I've grown, all right," I said, shifting the heaviness of a sixth-month pregnancy in the chair.

"Another babeen." You smiled. "And three I've never set my two eyes on." Your voice weakened.

The nurse motioned to me.

"I've enough pictures with me to fill an album," I said. "Now close your eyes and get some sleep. I'll be here first thing in the morning."

I stayed two weeks. You came home on the tenth day. You looked so fragile, but your smile was brave and certain. You were still at Julie's the day I left.

"I'll humor her," you said, "and play delicate a while longer."

"We're all coming back home after the baby is born," I said, "if we have to rob the crow's nest for the gold."

You smiled. "That kind of thievin' won't worry me none," you said. "And I all the years waitin' to hug my little Matt."

"Little!" I said. I was talking to much cover up the trembling inside me. "Wait till you see him! He's as big as—as Finn MacCoul!"

Oh, it was good to hear your laughter.

"So! You remember Finn MacCoul, do you?" You glanced into the other room where Julie was busy with a lunch large enough to take me to Egypt and back. "You know, Francie"—your voice had all the old magic—"you're so much like me. Do you suppose it's the vanity in me has made me love you so dearly all the years?"

I went into your arms. Me like you! Like you! Dear God—if I ever could be!

My tears were on both our cheeks as I heard your whispered "Hush, love."

You didn't come to the phone when Julie's long-distance call came this morning. Other times Julia would say, "Hold the line now, Francie, mamma wants to talk to you." But this morning Julie didn't say that. Julie said, "Francie, mamma's gone. She slipped away quietly in her sleep."

I stared at the bare black receiver. In just a moment now, I thought, I'll put it back on the hook and I'll go up the long stairs to my room and sink onto the bed. Not the old brass bed but a modern bed of a wood called blond birch or some such name, and I'd pull up the quilt—not the log-cabin one—and I'd let the numbness. the killing numbness ——

"Francie!" Julie's sob tore through the wall of pain. "Oh, Francie! How can I bear it ——"

And suddenly I heard my own voice, immeasurably, unbelievably calm, whisper the old words into the mouthpiece. And I knew: God love you, and God sustain us—I knew we'd have the rest of our lives to live them.

"Hush, love."

"This is irresponsible! You're spending more money than I earn. What do you think we are, the Federal Government or something?"

WANTED: Dinners

"What I really need are quick-and-easy dishes my whole family will eat—and enjoy. A really fabulous—but fast—spaghetti, for example."

Marian Hutchison admits that one of her biggest problems is simply feeding her family. Serving meals isn't so simple, however, with six little children and a hungry husband to keep happy. The triplets are the easiest of all: three bottles a day and two feedings of puréed baby food.

But lunch for the three older children (Terrie, Connie and Sammy) and husband Tom is a sit-down affair at the kitchen table. Time: 11:30 A.M.—"which doesn't leave me much time after clearing away the breakfast dishes. I try to serve a lunch that isn't just soup and sandwiches. But that's hard too. If only I knew how to make good casseroles—how wonderful it would be to get lunch into one dish to save on cooking and dishwashing time!"

Marian, who never cooked until after she was married, would really like to be a good cook, to know how to use herbs and spices. "But I don't have time to experiment," she says, "and I just don't trust myself to try it every day—I've had too many flops already. If only I could learn some new simple recipes my family would like."

HOW AMERICA LIVES

in a Dish and a Dash

"I'd love a casserole I can just pop into the oven!"

AM, CHEESE AND ASPARAGUS CASSEROLE

tablespoons butter
onion, peeled and minced
¼ teaspoon garlic salt teaspoon paprika
⅛ teaspoon marjoram
⅛ teaspoon tarragon
½ teaspoon salt
epper to taste
tablespoons flour
cups milk
cups grated Cheddar cheese
10-oz. packages frozen asparagus ackaged dry poultry stuffing quart cooked ham, cubed

Melt 2 tablespoons butter and sauté onion until tender. Blend in all seasonings and flour. Slowly add milk and heat, stirring constantly, until thickened. Add cheese and heat, stirring until cheese is melted. Cook asparagus by package directions; drain and cut spears into 1″ lengths. In the bottom of a buttered 10-cup casserole sprinkle a layer of the dry stuffing. Add a layer of ham, then one of asparagus. Pour part of cheese sauce over. Repeat until all ingredients are used up. Top with more stuffing crumbs, dot with remaining butter and bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 45 minutes or until sauce is bubbly and crumbs browned. Makes 6 servings.

Fridays are a real problem with us—there are so few fish y family will eat. We do like tuna, but what can I do with it?"

UNA-ALMOND BAKE

cups chopped celery cup toasted slivered almonds onions, peeled and minced
7-oz. cans tuna
½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce cups evaporated milk
10½-oz. cans cream-of-celery soup
3-oz. can Chinese noodles ooked rice (if you like) y Sauce

Mix together celery, almonds, onions, tuna (drained and broken into bite-sized pieces) and Worcestershire sauce. Also combine milk and celery soup and fold into tuna mixture. In the bottom of a 3-quart casserole make a layer of Chinese noodles—just enough to cover the bottom. Now pour in the tuna mixture and top with a layer of Chinese noodles. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for about 45 minutes or until bubbly. Makes 6 hearty servings. Serve with soy sauce and, if you like, over rice.

Once we've reached the age when dating in cars is allowed, we are more on our own and more responsible for our conduct than we have ever been before. You, and only you, can decide on your car conduct, but since you've asked me I'll tell you what Shirley and I will one day tell our little lambs. Cars are a method of transportation. When they're not getting you around, they're getting you into trouble. If you want to "set awhile," use your own living room or porch. I'll guarantee mom and pop will make themselves scarce if you'll explain this decision.

Next to the technique of actually getting a date, the second biggest item in the May mailbag is kissing. Now. There is "kissing," and kissing, and KISSING. Mixed up? Yes. Crazy? No. I'm for two of them at the right time and in the right place and with the right person. "Kissing" is what 'tween-agers do as a mark of affection, or as a forfeit in a game like spin-the-bottle. It shouldn't be an easy thing to get, ever.

Kissing, and my 'tween-age readers will dig what I mean, is an important part of "making out" and is not remarkably sweet or innocent, nor is it all right in view of KISSING.

KISSING is something that belongs to that One-and-Only, that one you hope to love someday both wisely and well—and you'd better start right now taking care of you for that ONE. Don't accept a cheap substitute that might spoil the real thing when it comes along. "Making out" in all its forms spells danger to the lightheartedness, the gaiety, the fun of young love, and I can promise you girls that it is not a real addition to your popularity, present or future.

Now we'll zero in on two last areas where you've asked my ideas about specific rules: Blind Dates and Pickups. My ideas go like this. Pickups—NEVER! Are you kidding?! Blind Dates—with discretion. A date you haven't met, arranged by a friend you trust, to go someplace or do something your good sense tells you is fun, can enlarge your circle of friends. "Pickups NEVER!" means just that. No pickups in a car. No telephone pickups. You never heard of that? Well, one jokester got a real shock when he dialed a number and said, "Hello, Mabel, can I see you tonight?" And a girl's voice said, "Sure thing, Bill, come on over." Our pal gulped, "Hey, this isn't Bill." And the girl said, "And I'm not Mabel, but come anyway."

From my memory these seem like the safety-first rules I'd want to pass on to anyone who's just beginning that up-and-down trek through dateland, who wants to give it dignity and importance while still having all the gaiety and fun. But suppose you—if you're a girl—notice the boys but the boys never notice you? Or the other way round. Then these rules are pretty useless, aren't they? But there are techniques for getting noticed at the right time by the right guy or gal.

ARE YOU DATE-BAIT?

Appearance is certainly one factor in attracting a boy's or girl's attention in the first place—and trying to be always well groomed, neatly and appropriately dressed will make a date proud to be seen with you.

But appearance isn't all.

Except for a fortunate few (who just naturally have it made from the moment they first smile), in the early, delicate days of first dating everybody is a little awkward and self-conscious in some way. It takes different forms, but most of them are in that beginning phase where they say defensively, "I love me and I'm going to take good care of myself."

The most attractive thing you can do is to recognize that, get your mind off you and be the one to penetrate that wall of self-defense. A warm outgoing friendliness an honest kindness, is a better magnet than glamour appeal. Too much glamour and too high a tone scares away all but the most self-assured young men. And if I remember my early teens there wasn't a self-assured one among us—myself included.

I remember the first girl I noticed in high school. She wasn't a real doll but she was bright. We had an English class together and she was bright enough always to laugh at my jokes (all real killers, because I stole them regularly from the Bob Hope show). She was always interested in the grades I got, cheered if they were good, sympathized if they were bad. I liked her because she liked me. She wasn't my O-A-O. She wasn't even a potential steady. We were a lot too young and she wasn't it anyway. But I liked her a lot. And that's how dating starts.

Now I know both from my own experience and from talking to my buddies what fellows look for in a date. And I've conned the most attractive girl I know (my O-A-O) into cooperating on what she and her girl friends liked.

Here's a guide test so you can evaluate where you stand.

DATE-BAIT TEST

Boys and Girls Answer

1. Are you enthusiastic about most activities, be they shows, parties, the bowling alley or a Sunday hike? Do you expect to have a good time?

Yes ☐ No ☐

2. Do you take pains to look your best and dress as neatly and appropriately for a movie as for a party, for a hike as for ice skating?

Yes ☐ No ☐

3. Are you considerate of the gal or guy who brought you? Do you hide your feelings even if you wish you were there with the little redhead or the new football star?

Yes ☐ No ☐

4. Do you listen? Are you honestly interested in what your date has to say instead of trying to overhear what they're laughing about in the corner?

Yes ☐ No ☐

5. Are you informed? Can you talk intelligently about things that interest the opposite sex (or both sexes) such as music—cars—sports—school politics—world affairs, etc.?

Yes ☐ No ☐

6. How are your manners? Do you treat your date as someone special to you for the evening? Do you treat others as you would have them treat you? Are you prompt? (I bomb out here!)

Yes ☐ No ☐

7. Are you trusting and trustworthy? No jealousy and no possessiveness, no flirting on someone else's time. No using this date as a steppingstone to bigger things.

Yes ☐ No ☐

8. Are you a good sport? Do you join in willingly no matter what's going on so long as it doesn't violate your personal principles?

Yes ☐ No ☐

9. Are you willing to place principles above personalities and temporary popularity even if it seems to hurt at the time? (This is an important one if you mean to have any solid, worth-while admiration over the long pull.)

Yes ☐ No ☐

10. Do you refrain from gossiping about, making fun of or criticizing others to your date? (Because he or she can't help suspecting they'll be next.)

Yes ☐ No ☐

FOR GIRLS ONLY

11. When you have a choice do you choose the boy you like best instead of the biggest spender or the owner of the flashiest car or the one who invites you to the best social event?

Yes ☐ No ☐

12. Are you budget-kind? Will you smile as sweetly if taken by bus to a neighborhood theater to see a movie as if you were taken in a car to see the same movie at a plush downtown palace? Do you watch for that worried look at the drive-in and take a cherry Coke instead of a banana split?

Yes ☐ No ☐

13. Do you make the boy feel comfortable and presentable by proudly introducing him to your folks?

Yes ☐ No ☐

FOR BOYS ONLY

11. Do you try to think up interesting different things to do? Listening to records or watching TV is fine part of the time. It's O.K., too, if you've taken a girl out several times to ask her once in a while what she wants to do. But generally speaking, it's up to you. Find out the girl's tastes and follow them within the limits of your available transportation and ready cash.

Yes ☐ No ☐

12. Do you treat your dates like grown ladies—with that extra bit of courtesy? (Even if she's only half an hour out of pony tail and saddle shoes? Even if she isn't out of them yet?) Man, they eat it up!

Yes ☐ No ☐

"Dear Contest Editor: I like Magnetic perfume because . . ."

13. Do you remember that day before yesterday teasing was the best way you knew to get a girl's attention? Do you try to control the urge now?

Yes ☐ No ☐

Now for your Date Rate.

If you've answered "Yes" to twelve or more, you've got what it takes. You'll rate high with the opposite sex.

If you've answered "Yes" to 9–11, you're still in the safety zone.

If you've answered "Yes" to 5–8, you'd better try a little harder.

If you've only managed a "Yes" to 1–4 . . . well, get busy on an inventory. See why you feel as you do—and do something about it, pronto!

THE STEADY PICTURE

Now we come to the all-important question—is this love? And if so, what should we do about it?

Old saw to the contrary, I don't believe we "fall in love" so much as we grow into love. It starts with that spark of attraction and grows more meaningful as we get to know each other. At least that was the way it happened with Mrs. B. and me.

Now going steady can be a late-teenage method of trying to find out if this growth is really taking place. (In the early teens it's usually a game, real at the time, but short lived.)

There are pros and cons to the "steady" picture. The "pros" seem to me to revolve entirely around a situation for teenagers old enough to think they might almost be ready for a formal engagement to marry. They may believe they have found that all-important one.

If this is true, then it should really be a testing time. A time to test the quality of your companionship, your quarrel rate, your ability to adjust to differences, your similarities in vital areas like aims, ideals, religion, family life. Then it has point and purpose. Shirley and I went "serious-steady" before we were married.

But going steady can be based on other motives—and here, to me, is where the "cons" come in. It is true, as so many adults argue, that going steady keeps you from making other contacts. You don't meet others and get into the general stream of activity. In other words, you're out of it, man!

The yardstick I'd use to decide this question would be based on motive. If you must admit to one of these as your honest reason for going steady, my advice is—BEWARE!

1. Is it laziness or fear? Are you too tired or too afraid to compete? Do you just like the security of always having a ready-made well-trained date on hand?

2. Are you a reformer? Do you feel that going steady will be a "good influence" on him or her? Help "change" them? If you feel someone needs changing, it's a poor foundation for a loving relationship.

3. Are you a scalp collector? Do you go steady with this one, that one, and maybe three at a time?

4. Do you like the feeling of possessiveness or domination? "This girl is mine! All mine." "I can make my boy friend do anything I want."

5. Are you grateful? Gratitude is a wonderful emotion. But just because he or she "has been so kind to me" doesn't make that one the love of your life.

The best recipe I could offer for the ideal teenage relationship during the budding of romance would not be to "go steady." It has a heavy feel—an almost-married attitude. Marriage is beautiful when it comes marry-time! No one recommends it more heartily than I. And next month we'll talk about marriage. But to have all the joy of teen-time dating we need a lighter touch—a touch of youth! Don't rush through your romance springtime.

It's a lovely trip and you can never make it again.

Baked Spareribs "Aloha"

Juicy, tender, sweet-'n'-sour spareribs—barbecued in your oven with Hunt's Tomato Sauce

This wonderful new spareribs recipe has a "double" life. It's so easy you'll make it for the family often. And it's so different — so Hawaiian — you'll want to plan a whole party menu around it, too.

Tart-sweet pineapple teams up with tangy Hunt's Tomato Sauce to give these spareribs exciting new flavor.

And there's a special reason Hunt's works so well in this recipe.

It's all tomato through and through. Kettle-simmered to rich, thick sauce consistency. It really clings to the spareribs, gives them a deep, true tomato color and flavor.

And because we season it so carefully, Hunt's Tomato Sauce blends better with other flavors.

That's why Hunt's is the perfect partner for creative cooking. Try it over meat loaf. Add it to stews or leftovers. And for a new taste treat, try this spareribs recipe.

3 lbs. (2 strips) lean spareribs
Salt and pepper
½ cup finely chopped onion
¼ cup chopped green pepper
2 8-oz. cans Hunt's Tomato Sauce
1 tablesp. Worcestershire Sauce
⅓ cup vinegar
1 No. 2 can (2½ cups) pineapple tidbits
(Use tidbits and syrup)
¼ cup brown sugar
½ teasp. dry mustard

Cut after every third rib, about halfway through the strip. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Place in shallow roasting pan. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) 1¼ hours. Carefully pour off all excess fat. While ribs are roasting, mix remaining ingredients, and let stand to blend flavor. Pour over ribs after 1¼ hours' baking. Bake 45 to 50 minutes longer, basting frequently to glaze the ribs with the flavorful sauce. Makes 4 servings.

SHOULD MOVIE STARS MARRY?

bruised egos by looming larger than life on a silver screen, who push their way to the top of the fantastic world that is Hollywood, face extra occupational hazards. The profession of movie star is probably the world's worst choice for those who need help in growing up.

Dr. Merril B. Friend, a Hollywood psychiatrist who has worked with film stars for a decade, says, "The stars live in the unreal world of the movies. It is only natural that they should come to confuse their real selves with the romantic characters they portray on the screen."

He believes that many stars—most of whom, after all, have made themselves symbols of sexual attraction—fall prey to a delusion fostered by the movies: that there is a connection between great beauty and romantic love. There is no connection, says Dr. Friend. Actually, overpowering beauty often inhibits true understanding of the beautiful person, on which real love must be based.

So the deluded stars enter marriage and there find a truth so basic and frightening that they cannot face it. When the film gods and goddesses make love to each other, the experience falls far short of what they have acted out on the screen. It is probably less exciting, warm and emotionally fulfilling than the love of the average couple that, enthralled, has watched them from the back row of a darkened movie theater.

Another occupational hazard is egotism. Top movie stars exercise enormous power. The adulation of the public keeps them in a perpetual state of self-consciousness. No wonder they lose all balance. Many of Hollywood's handsome men and beautiful women are so self-centered that they cannot possibly be interested in another human being. The only love affair of which they are capable is with a mirror. They enter into relationships with members of the opposite sex because of their itch to be adored, not to adore. They cannot help it. Without this narcissism, this fascination with their own beauty, they would lack the driving force that makes them successful as actors.

The French philosopher Jean Guitton writes that "The loftiest act of love is not in receiving but in giving. Here, moreover, lies the difference between love and passion; the latter is nothing but love without sacrifice and consequently without gift. It is the essence of love to be reciprocal."

It is ironic that few stars can give in this sense. On the screen—with the help of writers, directors and their own acting skills—they are able to project images of warmth and humanity—of true love. Yet they cannot experience it themselves.

Another reason most actors should not marry is that they are already married—to their careers. Ed Wynn said it long ago: "If an actor wants to stay successful he has to marry the public and stay married to it."

Few people are aware of how hard actors must work. Here's a typical day's schedule: up at dawn or earlier for wardrobe or make-up call, on the set by nine, work until five or six o'clock. Then back to wardrobe, home by eight for a quick dinner and several hours of study of the next day's lines. It's a full, hard schedule—one that requires complete devotion.

When a star is working, he rarely sees his children. The thought of making pleasant "chitchat" with his wife about something as intense as his job appalls him. By the weekend he is so exhausted that he tries to escape all family demands; he sleeps all day or relaxes on a golf course. If he is not working, things are even worse. He suffers agonies of insecurity; within a few weeks his family has become a millstone and a bore. It is the nature of an actor to be happy only when working; his life is purposeless without it.

When work and marriage conflict, the star will unhesitatingly sacrifice his married life. Here are some of the reasons which the stars themselves have given for their marriage failures.

James Arness, the Matt Dillon of Gunsmoke: "I guess I just couldn't give enough. I took Matt Dillon home with me. The pressure would build up, and I couldn't escape it. If I get home too late for dinner with Virginia and the children, then Virginia and I would quarrel." After their separation his pretty wife, who had helped him arrive as a star, tried to slash her wrists in Honolulu.

Jack Webb (his parents were divorced when he was two), after his first wife, Julie London, left him: "I never saw the kids except for a few minutes in the mornings and on Sundays. And sometimes I even spent Sundays at the studio. I can't stop working—or worrying about the show. I'd go crazy if I did."

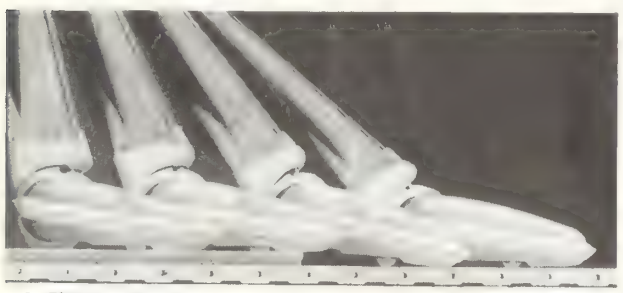
These are the reasons Joan Crawford gave the court for her three divorces—and the

GOETHE SAYS:

There is nothing in which people more betray their character than in what they find to laugh at.

The children of a family usually copy those members of a household who seem to live most happily, and most enjoy themselves.

A wife is a gift bestowed upon man to reconcile him to the loss of paradise.



It is a bad thing for a silent, serious-minded woman to marry a jovial man, but not for a serious man to marry a lighthearted woman.

It is a sad fact that our mixed-up stars earch for happiness through career success nstead of in their marriages. Yet it doesn't ork, because no amount of public acclaim an substitute for the private, fulfilling ties uman beings need. I once asked Marlon Brando if success as an actor—a thing he once ought very much—has brought him happi-
ess. At the time, he was in the midst of painful battle to gain rights to visit his ineteen month-old son. His answer was an mmediate "No."

I know of no star to whom professional uccess alone has brought peace of mind and ersonal happiness. When this becomes appar-nt to the actor, as it quickly does, he tries nce again to patch up his personal life with ome kind of human relationship. No doubt e enters each new one with hope. And when e fails in it he finds half a dozen reasons to ccount for the failure, and tries again. And , in a land where divorce is easy ("mental ruelty" is the usual charge), his private life gzags from divorce to affair to hasty mar-age to quick divorce again.

"By and large," said attorney Samuel Hahn, top Hollywood divorce lawyer until his eath last year, "most actors are a bunch of arnyard roosters."

Adultery is seldom mentioned as a cause r divorce—it makes bad publicity. But how any stars, at the time of a divorce, have a w partner ready and waiting for them out-de the courtroom door? Mickey Rooney nt to Mexico for a quick divorce from his urth wife, married his fifth on the same trip.
ght months later the latter bore him a child—ooney's fourth.

Deborah Kerr sought a divorce from Tony rtley after she met screenwriter Peter Vier-
. Eddie Fisher and Elizabeth Taylor first hit the headlines when they spent a week together at a Catskill resort. John Wayne was forty-six years old, married for the second time, and was the father of four children when he announced his engagement to his present wife, Pilar Palette. The wedding took place in Hawaii—timed for the day his California divorce became final. When Errol Flynn died, the status of the young girl with whom he had been traveling was so open that she felt qualified to wrangle with his third wife over the settlement of his estate.

These liaisons have all the elements of a desperate impulse. An "engagement" in Hollywood is almost unknown. Jeff Richards and his wife Vicki tried to make their marriage stick after the birth of their daughter Nina. They signed a twenty-two-page conciliation contract in court. But within months they broke up again, this time for good. They had met, fallen in love and were married within the space of a month. They had wasted no time getting to know each other first. Russ Tamblyn and Venetia Stevenson, youngsters following the Hollywood pattern of quick marriages, separated before their first year was out. Consider Lana Turner's stated reason for marrying Steve Crane, whom she had met six weeks before: "I was lonely. I have to have someone to love, and there was Steve." Or Elizabeth Taylor's famous last words before her brief marriage to Nicky Hilton: "We have so much in common. We both adore Ezio Pinza and oversize sweaters!"

As a Hollywood columnist for many years, I have learned to recognize the symptoms of a decaying marriage. Inevitably, the first sign is when a star goes on location for any length of time without his spouse. Stars who try to keep their marriages on a sure footing rarely accept such assignments.

Many actors consider "location" an excuse for hard drinking and hard playing. A recent picture was filmed on an island for three months. It resulted in the breakup of four marriages, three of which were considered "model" ones. One of them was that of a hairdresser who had an affair with a married actor.

In a society built on a foundation of sex—which spends its entire working day celebrating it—it is not surprising that there is a remarkable tolerance for sexual freedom. However, the star who is worried about his career has a special temptation to try new fields. Sex is the supreme test for the ego. The beautiful woman who is still able to interest a handsome, perhaps younger, man, convinces herself that she is still desirable. The aging, insecure actor requires constant assurance that he is as attractive as ever. Edward G. Robinson, in his sixties, married a woman in her thirties. Gregory Peck married a woman many years younger than his ex-wife. Bing Crosby's second wife, Kathryn Grant, is younger than his oldest son.

In either sexual excursions or marriage, actors tend to look for a symbol of security rather than a flesh-and-blood person whom they want to cherish and understand. Multi-married Hollywood stars tend to marry the same person over and over again. All of John Wayne's three wives have been small dark Latins similar in temperament. Mickey Rooney's five wives bear a remarkable physical similarity to one another. Ava Gardner once told me, "I fall in love with the same type of man every time."

Doctor Friend has described life for the average male movie star as "a continuous stag party. What he is looking for is a mother. Once he finds one to stay home with the children, he feels free again to go out and play with the boys."

I was reminded of this when I went to interview a top star at an exclusive golf club. The season was Christmastime. I was amazed at the number of other stars there—having lunch, playing cards or golf, standing at the bar and gossiping. Most of them were married men. Their wives and children were presumably at home—alone.

What is the answer to all this? Can movie stars possibly marry happily? If they marry each other they have the advantages of glamorous spouses who will add to their prestige and understand the pressures of their work. But here is the advice of Zsa Zsa Gabor, who, after three marriages, should be an authority. "It is practically impossible to have a successful marriage between movie actors. If the husband is working and the wife is not, she gets lonely and looks for someone to pass the time with. If one is more important than the other, there is jealousy."

And if they marry someone not "in the business," troubles multiply. It is an unfortunate fact that a nonprofessional wife has literally no place in Hollywood society. My own wife, for example, was a top model in New York before our marriage. Now, twelve years later, she is still a beautiful and intelligent woman. I long ago stopped taking her to Hollywood cocktail parties because of the impact on her ego. "Are you in the business?" asks a cheerful actor prepared to make small talk. When the answer is "No," his smile quickly fades and he wanders off as soon as he can. She is no one worth wasting time on.

The mere wife of a star is condemned to live in her husband's reflected glory. Her social and home lives are equally self-effacing. Nothing that happens to her during her day can come up to the events of her husband's day, no identity she can muster can match his for dramatic personality, no beauty she has can match the professional beauties he works with daily. The history of Hollywood wives is one of empty lives and sad-eyed secret drinkers. Virginia Arness, who had reason to know, told a reporter grimly, "They are forlorn creatures."

An old Hollywood argument runs that if the press would only "leave the stars alone," they might work out their domestic problems with more decency and maturity. I doubt it. Newspaper and magazine exposures have done more to make the stars watch their steps than any privacy has ever done. The pressures for divorce, for erratic questing, for the frantic, immature pursuit of an elusive "happiness," come not from the public but from within the stars themselves. END

THE CHANGING OF THE GUARD

He wasn't interested in the Princess—he'd seen her only from a distance and didn't want a close-up. His record here at the plant was written plain and open enough for anybody to read, any time.

On the other hand, he was no Lubera on twenty-four-hour duty. He'd given his day to Strafton Steel. Full measure. He was tired and hot and sticky. The air conditioner in his office window had conked out during the afternoon. The place was an oven. He'd intended, after he wound up the work schedule, going straight home to his two rooms and bath, into a big tub of lukewarm water, and gradually running it as cold as he could get it. Then into his bib and tucker, to the Elite Grill for a steak and a salad as big as his head, and on to the square-dancing class in the new City Recreation Building where there was a good chance he'd meet up again with a nice, brown-haired, blue-eyed girl, Betty McCalmers, who he was earnestly hoping would help him stay away from a certain roadhouse and its red-haired hostess, Little Nell—a hankering after sugar-mouthed "nobody" girls was the one trait he admitted sharing with the late Jerry Valin—who wasn't going to do Mike Fannin any lasting good and might do him plenty of harm.

A nice clean recreational evening. That was what he'd been, if not feverishly looking forward to, at least planning. So now the old man demanded a ride home.

Mike lifted his head. Words were on his tongue, balanced between the respect for his elders which he'd learned, sometimes painfully, from his dad and mamma, and the blunt honesty he'd learned in his five years with the old man. Why me, sir? What's the matter with Lubera?

Then he remembered the gorgeous ape-man was gone. Resigned? Fired? He never gave much ear to gossip, but now he remembered a rumor that Lubera had been booted out. For the past week the old man had been driving his own Cadillac. Now he stood looking at Mike—"I'm parked out front"—wanting Mike to drive it. How come?

He got his answer from the massive, charging-buffalo face. Under a film of sweat it glistened greenish white. Sick. Maybe his air conditioner had conked out too. Shoveling the papers from his desk into the drawer, Mike said, "I'll run you home in my car, sir. I never drove a Cadillac." Had to let the old man know, quick and blunt, what you would and wouldn't do. Otherwise, you could be flattened to a battercake under the old man's forward charge. Mike had a thing about battercakes—he didn't want to be one. And, by driving his own car he'd cut the interim between him and that tubful of cold water

The old man looked as if he were going to protest. Then he nodded. "Let's go." Under the heavy authority of his voice there was a tremor, a series of tremors inside the imposing mountain of flesh. But as they walked out into the blast furnace of late day, Texas August, the dry stale bounce of heat up from the pavement taking the moisture of nostril and eyeball, Mike didn't offer so much as an assisting finger. You didn't; you waited until the old man asked for help—ordered it. The latter had a hard time with the unfamiliar door handle, but finally got the door open and heaved himself in, sweating faster than the searing breeze could dry it.

Sick as a horse. But Mike didn't ask questions. He just drove smartly across town through the quitting-time traffic, between the brick pillars and up the long winding drive to the house. Close-up for the first time, he saw it was just an ugly old two-story house with added wings, not so majestic as it looked from a distance, not so high up as it seemed from the town. Still, it had the old man's power to intimidate. The Strafton castle.

Turning, Mike looked at his passenger. The old man's breathing was less labored. A int of florid color had returned to his face. His relief Mike, not given to unnecessary rem ks. said the first thing that came to mind: "'ell here we are, sir."

"Yes." Suddenly the old man was loc ing at him, square-on, at once commanding no pleading. Pleading—the old man? "Com in Mike. I want to talk to you."

Disagreeably, Mike was again remind of Lubera. His skin was sticky under his shirt and suit coat. He'd slipped it on automat ally when he got up from his desk—respect fo the old man, or just imitating him? The desi to strip and slide into that cool tub was a li ing crying thing inside him. Look, I drove you home—gave my day to Strafton Steel—gimme it, I want a bath!

But he heard himself saying, "Leave m car here, sir, or pull in over there?"

"Pull in over there." The old man's voice was stronger.

Inside the humming, air-conditioned co l of the house Mike caught glimpses of furn ure as massive as its owner, pictures hung in h vy frames, painted eyes which inspected him coldly as he followed the old man do a wide hall, turning in finally to a roo he guessed would be a library or study. The irst library (study?) Mike Fannin had eve set foot in.

His parents still lived in East Texas i the house he had been born in, twenty-nine ars ago. With his help and time payments, they had some conveniences, but that was as it went. His dad was always saying he'd a 'tater patch, a few head of cattle and few acres of cotton, and that was all he mea to ask for. It was, anyway, all he had end up with after sixty-four years of grubbing.

Mike intended to have more. He w isn't ashamed of his dad, but he wasn't proud His pride was for himself, what he had done with the raw material. By working, physically and mentally, like a hound on a perpetual hunt since age nine he had just two thin s: a lean tough body as resistant to disease as the crossbred cattle developed in Texas, an in side his head the engineering know-how which came from formal education and practic ex perience. There'd been no time for fri on excursions into genuine leather-upholstered studies.

When the old man sank into a chai and motioned him to an adjoining one, Mike took a look around to satisfy his curiosity. The surprise, more than his curiosity was sat fied by the shelves full of books, the glowing wood of an old desk, a hearth blackened by many fires. Even the leather of the chairs, wor and softened by time, filled him with satisfa ion.

LINES ON A SON'S TWELFTH BIRTHDAY

By NEAL GILKYSON STUART

One was mainly made of charming bubbles,
Two was rosy with baby lamb and applesauce (strained),
The kiss of three was sweet with candy (sticky),
Four was suddenly unsweet—
turning to mud and hammers.
Five was a jumbled box of fifty broken crayons (the arts entered here).
Six owned a frightful arsenal of guns,
Seven had seventy-seven comic books in his closet,
Eight journeyed forth from home to find his best friend.
Nine thought conversation should ideally consist of jokes and riddles,
Ten would lay down his life for the glory of the team,
Eleven had ink blots on his page and fingers (serious homework furrowed the budding brow).
Now you are twelve. You have most of the necessary equipment ready:
Thought, awareness of others, a past to draw on, some ardent admirations of your own.
Amazingly, you have not discarded yet a certain foolish old thing,
Like an outgrown Teddy bear ready for the shelf—a little boy's need for his mother.
At thirteen you will probably have it tucked out of sight,
So I think I had better start putting it away properly myself.

A big man's room. A place to sit and think and plan, grow bigger than the competition.

A knock sounded on the closed door. Immediately it opened, framing a girl in a blue full-skirted dress, chestnut hair smooth around her face, belling at her neck. He hadn't pictured her tall, hadn't realized until now that he'd pictured her at all. Their eyes held in mutual startlement. "Princess" Strafton. He'd given no ear to the stories, but bits of them came to him now. "Her mother died when she was a baby." . . . "Old man Strafton won't let a fly light on her." . . . "Nothing here's good enough for her: winters, it's that girls' school where they lock the gates, day and night; summers, he keeps her up on the hill." . . . "Nobody here good enough, either, has to send down to Houston for her a fellow." . . . "That no-count Jerry Valin. Guess that'll teach him, but, again, I guess it won't." . . . "They say she's sickly ——"

The stories were untrue in part, at least, for Princess Strafton was anything but imperfect. In that first startled instant Mike couldn't have said whether she was young or old, beautiful or ugly. All he saw was the gloss and perfection like a fine horse after grooming, every detail of her articulated with the other details. Her eyes held his with a directness, a lack of intimidation which came from having more than enough of everything, always.

Abruptly, he turned his eyes from her. She was the princess who lived in the castle. He had no time or hankering for princesses. He just wanted to cease hankering for the no-good Little Nells—find himself a nice plain girl and buy a house big enough for the two of them and a reasonable number of kids, and settle down. That was all he wanted or expected in the nonbusiness line.

As for business, he expected someday—determined to become manager of Strafton Steel. For that, he had been proving himself for five years. A day would come when the old man would be forced to shuck some of his responsibilities. The day he shucked Steel, Mike would be there, ready and willing and able to take over.

He scarcely heard the introductions. He was looking at the old man, the main obstacle between him and his goal, the one instrument by which he could gain it. The old man, in turn, had eyes only for the girl. Her name was Meredith. Mike saw now with a half disinterested eye that she was young, probably eighteen, and pretty. Under her unconscious arrogance she was shy, standing like a shy, mannered child in the presence of elders. She asked the old man if he was all right. "Aunt Clara and I saw you being driven up in a strange car." Her dark eyes flicked Mike. "We worried."

"I'm fine, Merrie." The old man held his bulk erect. Made her a big smile which almost hid the fact that he was still sweating, still pale. "Fine and dandy."

Watching, Mike had a small, sinking intimation of what it was going to be like, being a father, especially the father of a girl child. Then the old man said, "I want to talk business with Mike. The only way I could corner him was to have him drive me home. I'll see you later at dinner." Dismissed, the girl went out quietly, closing the door.

Talk business —— Mike met the old man's eyes. Suddenly his mouth went dry and all intimations of fatherhood fled his mind. There was a clanging inside him. He's going to do it now—shuck Steel and name me manager. Actually, he hadn't expected it so soon. In two years, maybe even three ——

Then the old man made him know that his big guess was a puny one. "Mike, I'm promoting you to manager of Enterprises. The whole shebang."

Breath hung suspended in Mike's throat. More than he had expected—too much, too soon! Like being told to run the locomotive when he knew only how to fire the boiler. He let the old man see his shock. Voiced it, bluntly. "Why me? Pete Harter knows the mills—could learn the rest. He's older, more experienced. Or Bill Valey—he's been with you for twenty years. Why me?"

The old man's impatience was tangible. "Mike, if I had a son he wouldn't be the age or the temperament of Pete or Bill. You ——"

"Not me, Mr. Strafton!" He made lurching gestures toward the genuine leather and mahogany which surrounded him. "I told you, I'm straight out of a 'tater patch in East Texas ——"

"Mike, Mike. When I was born out in the Panhandle my folks would have counted themselves lucky to have a 'tater patch. But that's beside the point. I'm not looking for a son. I tried that." The massive face held a bleak memory of Jerry Valin, surprising to Mike in its violent bitterness.

Then, remembering the way the old man had looked at the girl, laying down soft carpets with his eyes—remembering the gossip that Valin had been almost a son-in-law when he crashed with that other girl in his car—Mike understood the bitterness. The surprise was the girl, as smooth and untouched as a chestnut filly in the sun. An unreasoning dislike stirred him. She didn't look as if she'd ever lost an earring, much less a fiancé.

"This time," the old man continued, "I'm just looking for a good manager. I said good, Mike. To me, that means you. As of tomorrow, I'm giving you the title and salary. I know you'll attend to the rest of it."

"Tomorrow —— Why the hurry, sir?"

The big face was gray again, glistening with sweat. "Dammit-all, Mike, I'm going to die!"

The words stomped around the room like choleric ghosts. Mike wanted to laugh. My word, he's just now realizing he can't live forever. But it was more than that.

"This afternoon was a preliminary bout. There've been others. The main one's coming, I don't know when—that's my hurry!" The big hands spread. "A man's helpless, even with money. I can buy doctors—I've bought a few—and pills by the carload, but I can't buy a son to carry on where I leave off—I can't buy life—I can't even buy time to find another man if you won't take the job! The time that's left I'd best use showing you the ropes, Mike. I need you. Now. I'm asking."

The measure of need was in the asking, not ordering. Mike's throat ached. But he still had to know. "Why me?"

"Because you're young—you'll last. You bite off more than you can chew, and damned if you don't chew it! You're tough and mean and stubborn with ambition—that panther on your back won't let you rest until you're standing in my shoes! But you're honest. I trust you." The old man was breathing hard. "Is that enough?"

Mike nodded slowly. When the old man leveled, he really leveled. That panther . . . even in shock Mike felt the claws digging into him, urging him. Manager of Enterprises. Only a fool would turn it down. "I'll take the job, sir." The occasion demanded more. "I'll do my best for you."

The old man rose. "Not for me, Mike. For her. Meredith. She's only nineteen, you saw her. She's not like us, she wouldn't know a 'tater patch from a goober patch. Maybe I raised her wrong, maybe not—whichever, it's done." Now the old man's real need, his fear and hope were naked in his eyes. "Mike, I want her to continue as safe and happy and innocent as she is today. Marvin Pline will administer the estate for her. Your job will be to keep Enterprises in the black. It's all I can leave to keep her. If money can't do it —— Dammit-all, why does a man have to die before he's ready!"

t wasn't a question Mike could answer. He od awkwardly, staring at the old man. The man stared back at him. Dusk had fallen. the unlighted room the big head, disem- lied, thrust itself forward out of the shad- s. The eyes bored into Mike, searchingly, cely. Mike remembered a hawk with a ken wing that he had come on once in a ture. The hawk's eyes had questioned him he same way. But, unlike the hawk which l made off in the brush on one wing, the old n was apparently satisfied. His glare faded. 'Stay for dinner, Mike."

t was an order. Any other time Mike would e resented it. Would have wondered why was wanted in his sticky shirt and rumpled , with no manners and graces except the ryday ones pounded into him by his mma. Any other time he would have said ntly that he was going home and take a h and go square dancing. Might have led that he was going to hunt up an every- girl named Betty McCalmers and find out v she felt about do-si-do-ing with Enter- ses' new manager.

ll of it flashed through his mind. Then he rd himself saying, "Thank you for the invi- on, sir." Couldn't walk out on the old man ight. He's lonesome, wants somebody else und who knows the score.

t the dinner table, it was obvious that e-haired, high-nosed Miss Clara didn't w the score. The girl didn't have an inkling. talked lightly, shyly, arrogantly, about hing. The heat, a book Mike had never rd of, a letter from some girl in Paris. To e, they were five at the table—himself out that East Texas 'tater patch, the three ftons, and the girl's big innocence.

ll right, so the old man wanted her this , sitting there with a smile on his face, ating inside, making rocks out of his din- because he couldn't stick around to wrap in cotton batting the rest of her life. But e had a drop of everyday human blood in she'd know something was wrong!

ut who was Mike Fannin to judge a prin- in her castle? Especially when she wasn't judging him—so nice and polite and friendly. Eating with what he hoped was the right fork, he felt a trickle of sweat between the inside of his arm and his shirt sleeve. The shock was wearing off, any minute the whole business would hit him and he'd be shaking like a dog in a hailstorm. Got to get out of here. After dinner he'd say he'd forgotten a date. He'd go home and stick his head under a cold hard shower—could still make the last half of that square-dancing class.

But after dinner the old man brushed aside the feeble beginnings of his lie. "Stay awhile, Mike." Again it was an order. "Maybe you and Meredith would like to play a little tennis. There's a lighted court out back. Weather's cooled off. Clara and I'll watch."

Mike was whirled about between ignorance, white glittering pride and the prod of stubborn honesty. "Sir, I don't play tennis. I never had time to learn."

"Then you'll teach him, won't you, Merrie?"

Mike hated them all, even vague gentle Miss Clara. "I'm not dressed for tennis." Standing there in his sticky, rumpled clothes, suddenly aware with a prickling chill that he and the old man were engaged in a contest. A very important contest, not concerning tennis at all.

"That's all right. Believe it or not, I used to be about your size. Clara, take him up to my room, open that bag in the back of my closet and let him find something to play tennis in." The old man's eyes were relentless.

Suddenly the girl laughed. "Don't look so frightened! Really, I'm a very good teacher. If I could teach George, I know I could teach you." The laugh became a giggle. "George had two left feet and he was muscle-bound."

There was a sudden silence in the room. A black and bitter anguish came: not from the girl who stood smiling like a bewitched princess in a fairy tale; not from Miss Clara, also smiling, but from the old man.

Lubera. The princess was teaching the chauffeur tennis. Maybe Lubera's crime had been no more than letting her teach him, letting his eyes rest too long on her legs where they emerged tenderly from her shorts, but with the old man it wouldn't have taken much. The gorgeous ape-man was—phftt—gone. By the same power, Mike Fannin was—phftt—manager of Enterprises. And the reason for all of it stood smiling, as innocent as the new-risen dawn.

Mike wanted to laugh. Then, picturing Lubera's round bulging black eyes testing that innocence, he felt an anguish of his own. He felt like crying. All right, dress me up like a Jerry Valin and teach me tennis. He was going to say it, he was going to do it. Not for the old man. Not for her. For himself—to make up for the Luberas and what they did to a man's pride in his sex.

But just then his eyes met the old man's. Something in them stopped him cold. It was gone in an instant, but he had seen it—knew now what had been in the old man's mind, behind the fierce silent questioning, back there in the study. He's setting me up for her. The knowledge ran through him on hot and cold feet. He's afraid the money's not going to be enough for her; he wants me in the package.

He rocked, briefly, that wild inward laughter because a "nobody" from East Texas was getting the princess as a bonus. Then he knew she wouldn't be a bonus; she would be a sacred trust, and he the new guard at the castle gates, the faithful guard who would keep the world, the Luberas, away. You can't do this to me, sir. But the old man stared him down. He was going to try.

Mike's eyes plunged to the girl's face. He used desperate telepathy. Look, baby, he's setting us up for each other. If you have other plans—you must have other plans—I've got plans! I've got a girl—no princess, but she's my speed. Help me, baby.

But she only smiled back at him, terrible in her innocence, politely waiting for him to make up his mind about the tennis.

Then the old man—maybe because he was sick, maybe because he was in a hurry—made one of the few mistakes Mike had ever known him to make. He piled too much on too much. He showed his hand. "There's a swimming pool back there, too, Mike. If you can't swim, Merrie can teach you. And when you get out she'll mix you the tallest, smoothest, frostiest Tom Collins you ever tasted."

The old man conked it.

Mike was looking at the girl. He saw innocence die. One minute she was just a kid princess in a Texas castle. The next, she was a woman, her eyes shocked and vulnerable in a white face, aware of the block the old man had set her on.

But she had pride. Her chin lifted. "Yes, Mr. Fannin, as a reward after your tennis and swimming lessons, I'll make you the finest Tom Collins you ever drank. I can't cook or sew and I never washed a dish, but I'm a whiz behind a bar. That's something to look forward to at the end of a long hot day, isn't it?"

Stricken, he saw her small proud smile, a woman's smile on childish trembling lips. His heart split suddenly inside him like a sweet potato baking in too hot an oven. The tough leathery skin popped and the sweetness spilled out. A voice cautioned, Mike, Mike, this is fairy-tale stuff; it doesn't happen this way. The rest of him knew only that it had happened.

But it was no good. Under the spilling, hurting sweetness he knew he'd always remember that the old man had set it up for him. He was afraid of her proud closed face. She could be hating him and he'd never know! He had a sudden violent hunger for Betty McCalmers' plain open face—Little Nell's sleepy, full-mouthed smile ——

In his sweaty haste to be out of it, he risked the old man's anger. Risked the one prize the old man had offered him which he had the right and the guts to take, the managership of Strafton Enterprises. He blurted, "I'm sorry sir, I can't stay. I have to be going now." The truth. No softening lie about having forgotten a date.

The old man's head lowered, his eyes were glacial. Then they thawed with shock and shame at his own highhandedness. They admitted that even an East Texas mule had the option of drinking or not drinking when he was forced to the water. "Then I'll see you in the morning, Mike," he told him. "Be in my office at eight o'clock and we'll work out the details."

The details. So he had won. He had sprung himself from the trap, and he was still Enterprises' new manager. It hit him at last, a solid whammy with fireworks. He tried to make his manners and good-bys decently. "I enjoyed the dinner and I'm pleased to have met you, Miss Clara. Pleased to have met you, Miss Strafton."

He had it made, and then he threw it away. Looking into her face, he felt something turn in him, an unbearable sweetness and pain. Out of the unbearableness, the pain and the sweetness, came his voice—too loud, too rough, but all that he could make it at the moment of pleading.

"I can't play tennis and I don't swim worth a shuck, but I do square dance a little. I'm going to a square dance now, down at the City Recreation Building—really, it's a class and we're all just learning, me and Joe Bardy, the plumber, and Sam who clerks in the liquor store and Royce Peters who barbers and a bunch that come across from the pool hall—you'll end up dancing with all of us. Will you come with me?"

He saw his plea shatter, visibly, against her smooth closed face, her small proud smile. He heard behind him the outraged bovine whistle of the old man's breath, and knew he had thrown it away. All of it. Pete Harter would be Enterprises' new manager. The old man had forgiven him once tonight, but he'd never forgive him for this, a boorishness, an impudence worse than Lubera's.

Maybe, tomorrow, he wouldn't forgive himself. But at this moment it was worth whatever it cost to offer her his love, pure and simple, held out in his two hands. To let her know it wasn't her he didn't want—it was the castle, the setup, the guard duty. Will you come with me? You, Miss Meredith Strafton—you—you ——

If she refused, he would lose an entire, sweet, new-found world. His sweet new world was lost. He saw it in her frozen face. He had thrown it all away, love included. Wouldn't you just know a 'tater-patch mule would louse it up?

They might have stood there for a hundred years, fairy-tale stuff, she with her frozen face and Mike with the frozen tears inside him, but the old man conked it again. "Meredith, show the young man out." It was an order.

Like a reflection seen in a cracking mirror, her face came to pieces. When it reassembled, it was a far cry, as Mike's mamma would have said, from the smooth innocent face of Texas royalty. She was just another pretty girl—not as pretty as some, prettier than others—with her chin squared and a glare in her eyes which even the old man must hav envied.

"I'll be delighted to go with you, Mike Far nin, if you'll tell me what's usually worn to square-dancing class in the City Recreatio Hall."

"Building," said Mike. "I think wha you're wearing is fine." And he stuck out shaky arm, and after a little hesitation sh took it. Not paying any attention at all to th orders being given and the murmurs bein murmured behind them, he walked the prin cess out of the castle and drove her down int the town where the rest of the people were.

He was no fool. He didn't know whethe they'd make it or not. Nineteen years of beir a princess was a hard thing to get over, as we as twenty-nine years of not being born to th purple. She had come with him mostly b cause she was mad at the old man, and he ha asked her partly because he was mad at th old man—he admitted it now. But she wa trying and he was trying, and if the old ma would give them time to work it out their ow way, and if the Lord gave the old man time give them time, they might make it. He hope with all his heart that they did because he kne he would never love any other girl as much he loved Meredith Strafton, or in quite th same sweet, hurting way.

With her beside him, even the tired old h Texas-in-August evening had a fragrance.

PUBLIC CONCERN FOR ALL AMERICAN YOUTH

from what I have seen in my visits to many comprehensive high schools that the students enrolled in these courses are keenly interested and their sense of purpose is carried over to the general education courses in English and history taken at the same time.

The practical courses, however, are not suitable for pupils who have great difficulty with their studies; and a certain fraction of the pupils in every high school with which I am familiar do have great difficulties with their academic work. Such troubles become noticeable in grades seven, eight and nine (the junior-high-school years). In many cases they are the result of the failure of the child to develop a speed and comprehension in reading on a par with that of his classmates. (Let me note that, in spite of what some critics have been writing about learning to read, American children do learn to read and many of them with a high degree of speed and accuracy!) The very slow reader may be helped somewhat by remedial measures. But these should come early. Small classes, skilled remedial teachers in third, fourth and fifth grades giving help to those who have difficulty, might salvage many. Relatively little can be done if, by the time the ninth grade is reached, the pupil is reading at the fifth- or sixth-grade level. How much such difficulty is a result of early instructional failures, how much it is due to a lack of interest in books and a general slowness of intellectual responses, no one can say with certainty.

I have been in schools where as many as 30 per cent of the boys and girls in the ninth grade were in the category I have just described. Such pupils were at the other end of the normal spectrum from the academically talented. (I speak of the "normal spectrum of ability," for I am leaving out of account the mentally handicapped, who present still another problem.) It would be worse than useless to urge the very slow readers to study algebra, chemistry, foreign languages or other courses which should be on the bill of fare for their more academically talented contemporaries. Even the courses in English, history, social studies, general science and general mathematics are too difficult for the very slow readers.

In the eleventh and twelfth grades the very slow readers may obtain only slight benefit from full-time attendance at school. They are debarred from the practical courses by their slowness with the printed word and their lack of skill with numbers. In general, schoolwork does not appeal to them, and a sense of frustration gradually develops. This is particularly so if the frustration is coupled with a desire to get out into the real world and earn money. The question arises whether a full school day in grades eleven and twelve is desirable for such pupils or whether it often engenders a rebellious spirit toward both schoolwork and the community.

Educational reformers of the World War I era recommended continuation schools for those who desired to terminate their full-time schooling before graduation from high school. These schools were well attended in certain cities (particularly New York) by youths who had paying jobs and continued their academic studies on a part-time basis. The depression of the '30's killed these schools. It would impossible to re-establish them today—r only impossible but undesirable, for many the present-day equivalent of the continu tion-school pupils are receiving a bet education now by completing high-sch work. The continuation schools, however, gether with the employment practices in t 1920's, did provide relatively satisfactorily that small portion of youths who, for one re son or another, were not adjusted to seni high-school work. Are new developments this area of education in need of exploratio My answer would be an emphatic "Yes."

Already some high schools are trying procedures by which some students are p mitted to be absent from school for the wh afternoon so that they may take a half-ti job. In New York State such an arrangem has been formalized fairly recently as a operative work program. Clearly, its succ depends not only on the attitude of the sch people, but on that of the potential employ This latter fact needs to be underlined.

If the problems of educating (using the w in its widest sense) certain types of youths ar be solved in our cities, consideration of empl ment opportunities as well as school facili must be kept in the forefront of the discuss

Solution of these problems will req money and imagination on the part of adn istrators, skillful and devoted teachers, above all an understanding public. There is use in looking backward to 1910 when 18 cent of children of ten to fifteen were gainf employed. Those days have gone; and I one am glad they have. We have all abolished child labor, we are committe education for all American youth. This c mitment does not preclude a sympathetic realistic appraisal of what our schools doing for boys and girls sixteen years over, whose general education for citizen might be better conducted on a part-t rather than a full-time basis, or for a very whose formal education might terminate the completion of grade ten or eleven, vided satisfying jobs were readily at hand

So I close with an appeal to parents t aware of false prestige values which ari taking the length of education as a measu its value, and an appeal to citizens to con the entire youth problem of our citi schools and employment opportunities. should not let our proper concern for the cation of the bright pupil in school and versity blind us to the social consequences democracy of producing, through neglect, a small number of thwarted and resentful y In the decades ahead we need well-tra technologists and imaginative scientists, above all we need a healthy body politi

A certain king went to visit a madhouse, and found there a youth who after replying sensibly to a number of questions asked by his sovereign, said to the latter, "You have asked me many things. I will now ask you one: at what period does a sleeper enjoy his sleep most?"

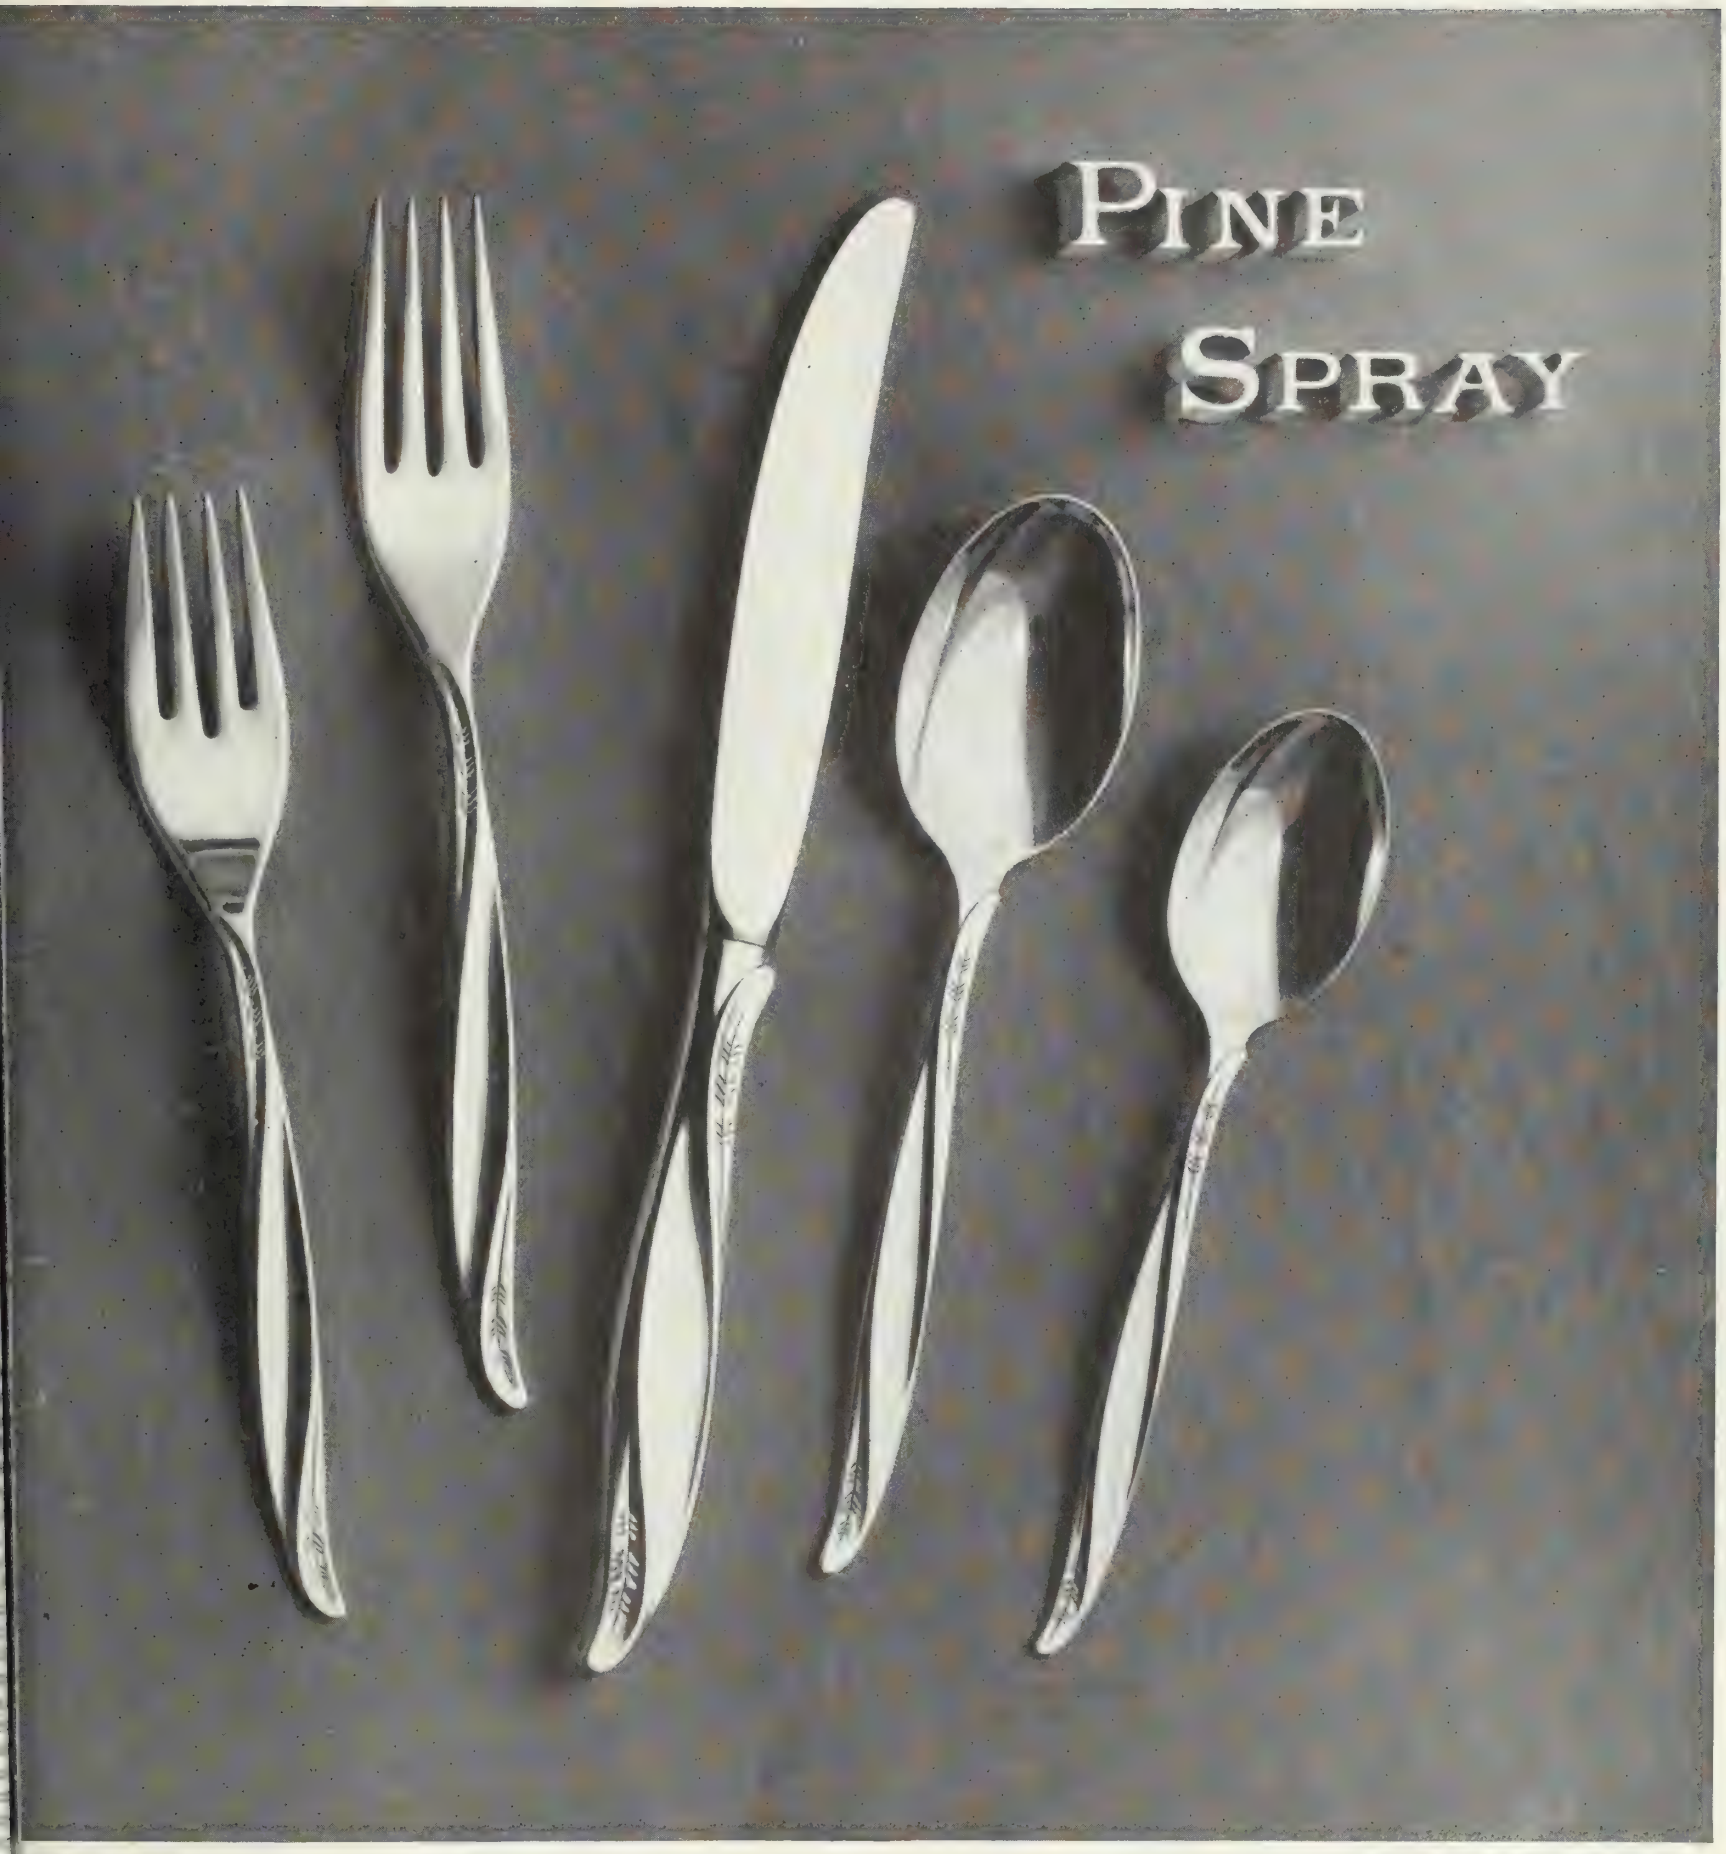
The king reflected and then said, "While he is actually sleeping."

"That cannot be," said the madman, "for he has no perception while asleep."

"Then, before he goes to sleep," said the king.

"How can one enjoy anything before it comes?"

"Then," said the king, "after he has been asleep."



"Nay," said the madman, "a man cannot be said to enjoy a thing that has passed away."

So pleased was the king that he determined to make a companion of the madman, had a table set out in front of the window of the madhouse, and bade his attendants hand a cup of wine to himself and his mad friend.

"You drink your cup," said the latter, "that you may become like me; but if I drink mine whom shall I be like?"

The king on hearing this threw away his cup, and remained an abstainer the rest of his days.

10 Great Dishes Made With Veal

Veal has been the favorite of generations of gourmets. (The last words of Britain' great statesman, William Pitt, are said to have been "I think I'd like a veal pie!" Try our tender Neapolitan veal roast, or veal stew Marengo, which simmers slowly t perfection, accompanied by the first shoots of asparagus from the garden. And plum strawberries, and cream, for dessert!

Veal Parmigiana

8 loin or rib veal chops cut ¾" to 1" thick
1½ cups toasted bread crumbs
1 cup grated Parmesan cheese
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
¼ teaspoon paprika
2 eggs, slightly beaten
Seasoned flour
¼ cup olive oil for sautéing chops
14–16 thin slices Mozzarella cheese (about 1½ pounds)

SAUCE
½ cup olive oil
6 or 7 cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
2 cups tomato purée
2 cups canned Italian plum tomatoes
1 tablespoon basil
1 teaspoon sugar
1 teaspoon orégano
1½ teaspoons salt
½ teaspoon pepper
Dash monosodium glutamate
Pinch crushed dried red Mexican pepper

Trim fat from chops and remove bones. Curl tail of each chop round center piece, a secure with toothpicks or skewers. Mix together bread crumbs, cheese, salt, pepper a paprika. Roll chops first in seasoned flour, then in beaten egg and lastly in brea crumb mixture. Refrigerate while you prepare the sauce. Heat the olive oil in a skill and sauté the garlic until golden. Add tomato purée and canned Italian plum tomato basil, sugar, orégano, salt, pepper, monosodium glutamate and Mexican peppers. M well. Cover and simmer 10 to 15 minutes. Heat olive oil in a skillet and sauté the cho a few at a time until golden on both sides and almost cooked through. Drain on pap towels. Remove skewers. Arrange in the bottom of two 2-quart shallow casserol Pour ¾ cup sauce round the meat in each casserole. Cover the chops in each dish wi 7 or 8 slices Mozzarella cheese. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 15 minutes until cheese is melted and chops are fork-tender. Brown lightly under broiler. He and pass remaining sauce. Makes 8 servings.

Sauerkraut-stuffed Veal Roll

6-pound piece boned shoulder of veal cut open and laid flat (butterflied)

STUFFING
2 medium-size onions, peeled and finely chopped

Gravy. Add 2 more cans consommé and 1 cup water to the baking pan. Bring t boil, scraping all the brown bits from the bottom of the pan. Thicken slightly wi thin paste made with flour and water. Cook and stir until well blended. Taste for pep Makes 10–12 servings and 5 cups gravy.

Veal Marengo

6 tablespoons olive oil
3 pounds lean veal, cut into 1" cubes
2 small onions, peeled and chopped fine
9 tomatoes, peeled, seeded and coarsely chopped
5½ teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
Generous dash paprika
5 teaspoons flour
4½ cups chicken broth or, if you like, 3½ c chicken broth and 1 cup white wine
12–14 small whole carrots, scraped
8 whole white onions, peeled
18–20 whole button-size mushrooms, wiped
10-ounce package frozen peas
Chopped parsley
Garlic French bread, toasted

Heat the olive oil in a large heavy kettle. Add the veal and brown rapidly over h heat. Add the chopped onions, tomatoes, salt, pepper and paprika. Stir in the fl and chicken broth (or broth and white wine). Cover and simmer 30 minutes. Add carrots and white onions. Continue simmering, covered, another 30 minutes. Add mushrooms and simmer another 30 minutes, when the meat should be fork-ten Five minutes before serving, add the frozen peas. Be careful not to overcook the p Serve sprinkled with chopped parsley and surrounded by wedges of toasted ga French bread. Makes 8 servings.

Horse-Radish-Stuffed Veal Patties

1 pound veal } ground together
½ pound pork }
1 cup milk
1 cup dry white bread crumbs
1 small onion, peeled and grated
1½ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 egg, slightly beaten
¼ cup butter for sautéing

STUFFING
⅓ cup prepared horse-radish
2 hard-cooked egg yolks, sieved
2 tablespoons soft butter
2 tablespoons white bread crumbs
¼ teaspoon salt

SAUCE
2 tablespoons butter
3 tablespoons flour
1 cup chicken broth
½ cup commercial sour cream
½ to ¾ teaspoon paprika

Add milk to crumbs and let stand 10 minutes. Mix meat and crumb-milk mixture together. Add onion, salt, pepper and egg; mix thoroughly. Using ¼ cup as a measure, form into balls. Shape with hands and flatten slightly into patties. Refrigerate while you prepare the stuffing.

Stuffing: Mix horse-radish, egg yolk, 2 tablespoons soft butter, bread crumbs and salt. Place 1 rounded teaspoon stuffing in the center of each patty. Turn up the edges over stuffing and shape into patties again. Be sure no stuffing shows through the meat. Sauté in ¼ cup butter until golden. Drain on paper towels. Arrange in a 2½-quart casserole. In a saucepan make a cream sauce, using the butter, the flour and chicken broth. Cook and stir until smooth and thickened. Add the sour cream and paprika. Mix well. Remove from the heat immediately. Pour the sauce over the meat patties. Cover and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 30 minutes. Sprinkle the surface with paprika. Makes 8 servings—about 16 or 17 patties.

Neapolitan Veal Roast

Rump of veal, boned, about 8 pounds (reserve bones)

STUFFING
1½ cups prepared stuffing mix
2 eggs, lightly beaten
2 tablespoons chopped parsley
3 tablespoons peeled, chopped onion
3 tablespoons chopped green pepper
1 chicken-bouillon cube
¼ cup hot water
1 teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
¼ teaspoon monosodium glutamate

SAUCE—SALSA DIAVOLA
1 onion, peeled and chopped
½ green pepper, seeded and chopped
¼ cup chopped celery leaves
¼ cup olive oil
4 cups Italian plum tomatoes
2½ teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
Pinch pepper, paprika, saffron
1½ tablespoons chopped chives
2 cups veal stock
2 tablespoons dry vermouth, if you like
1 teaspoon sugar
Flour-and-water thickening

Early in the day, make the veal stock and the sauce. Put bones and 2 quarts water into a kettle. Cover and bring to a boil. Skim the surface. Simmer 3 to 4 hours. Strain and reserve liquid to use in sauce.

Sauce: Sauté the onion, green pepper and celery leaves in the olive oil for 5 minutes; do not allow to brown. Add the canned tomatoes, 1 teaspoon salt, pepper, paprika, saffron and chives. Simmer 30 to 40 minutes. Put through a food mill. Add veal stock (and the vermouth, if you like). Mix well. Reserve 2 cups of this mixture to pour over veal while roasting. Put the rest into a saucepan. Add 1½ teaspoons salt and the sugar. Set aside. Wipe the veal with a clean damp cloth. Mix prepared stuffing, eggs, parsley, onion, green pepper, salt, pepper, monosodium glutamate, and chicken-bouillon cube dissolved in the hot water. Stuff the pockets in the rump with the mixture. Tie securely with string. Place on rack in large roasting pan. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Pour ½ cup water into the bottom of the pan. Roast in a very hot oven, 450° F., for 1 hour, turning once. At the end of 1 hour pour 2 cups salsa diavola over the veal and continue roasting in a moderate oven, 350° F., until meat is fork-tender, about 3 hours. Baste frequently. Transfer to a warm platter. Reheat sauce previously set aside. Thicken with a flour-and-water paste. Cook and stir until smooth and thickened. Pour a little sauce over the veal. Serve the rest in a sauceboat. Ample for 8 servings with plenty left for seconds. Makes about 4 cups sauce.

Noisettes of Veal Gruyère

2 pounds veal cutlet cut 1" thick and divided into 8 equal pieces (or 8 loin veal chops, cut 1" thick, remove bone and excess fat)
2 eggs, slightly beaten
Seasoned flour
½ cup butter for sautéing

SAUCE
¾ cup butter
3 cups peeled and chopped onion
1⅓ cups heavy cream
¾ pound Gruyère cheese, grated
⅛ teaspoon nutmeg
2 14-ounce cans hearts of palm.

If you use chops, curl the tail of each around the center part, and secure with toothpicks or skewers. Coat each cutlet or chop with egg and seasoned flour. Refrigerate while you prepare the sauce. Melt butter in a saucepan. Add onion. Cover and simmer until onion is transparent. Stir occasionally; do not allow to brown. Buzz contents of saucepan in a blender or purée in a food mill until very smooth. Transfer to the top of a double boiler over simmering water. Add heavy cream, cheese and nutmeg. Cook and stir until cheese melts and sauce is smooth and thick. Drain all liquid from canned hearts of palm. Cut each "heart" into 2 or 3 pieces. Add to cheese sauce. Continue heating until palm is warm. Do not stir. Heat the butter in a large skillet and sauté the chops a few at a time until golden on both sides and fork-tender. Drain on paper towels. Remove skewers. Cover and keep warm while you sauté the remaining chops. Arrange on a large platter. Garnish with the hearts of palm and pour some of the sauce over the chops and palm. Serve the rest in a sauceboat. Makes 8 servings.

Veal Roll-Ups Continental

8 pieces of veal cut as for scaloppine (about 7" x 4")
Pepper
1 4½-ounce can deviled ham
8 tablespoons ricotta or pot cheese
4 teaspoons grated onion
2 eggs, slightly beaten
Toasted bread crumbs
4 tablespoons butter
¼ cup undiluted beef consommé

SAUCE
1 tablespoon butter
8 scallions, chopped
1 cup sliced mushrooms
2 cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
1 cup undiluted beef consommé
3 drops liquid pepper seasoning
1 tablespoon cornstarch
2 tablespoons cold water
2 tablespoons dry Marsala, if you like

Sprinkle each piece of veal with pepper. Spread with the deviled ham, leaving ¼" border all the way around. Next spread each piece with 1 tablespoon ricotta or pot cheese and ½ teaspoon grated onion. Roll up jelly-roll fashion and secure with toothpicks. Dip in egg and coat with the bread crumbs. Heat the butter in a skillet and sauté the rolls until golden all over. Drain on paper towels. Remove toothpicks. Transfer to a shallow casserole. Add consommé. Cover and bake in a moderately low oven, 325° F., for 45 minutes. For the sauce: Melt the butter in a saucepan. Add the scallions, mushrooms and garlic. Cook 5 to 7 minutes. Add consommé, cover and simmer until vegetables are tender. Season with liquid pepper seasoning. Mix cornstarch and cold water to a smooth paste. Add to vegetable mixture. Cook and stir until smooth and thickened. When veal rolls are tender, drain liquid from casserole into sauce. Add Marsala, if you like. Pour over the rolls. Makes 8 servings.

Veal Battuto

6–7 pound boned rump of veal (reserve bones)

BATTUTO PASTE
1 tablespoon lemon juice
½ teaspoon dry mustard
3 tablespoons anchovy paste
3 cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
½ teaspoon pepper
2 teaspoons grated lemon rind
10 slices bacon
Flour-and-water thickening

Mix mustard with lemon juice. Add anchovy paste, garlic, pepper and lemon rind. Mix well. Spread ⅓ of paste inside meat. Roll up and fasten securely with string. Spread remaining paste all over outside of veal. Cover and let stand 1–2 hours at room temperature. Place bacon over surface of meat. Roast, uncovered, on a rack in a roasting pan in a moderate oven, 350° F., 25–35 minutes per pound or until meat thermometer registers 170° F. (internal temperature). Remove bacon 15 minutes before the end of roasting time. Transfer meat to platter. For the gravy, remove as much fat as possible from liquid in roasting pan. Add 3 cups seasoned veal stock, made with veal bones. Stir, heat, and thicken slightly with flour-and-water paste. Makes 8 servings—3½ cups gravy.

Poached Veal With Green Sauce

4–4½ pounds boned rump of veal (reserve bones)
2 teaspoons salt
1 teaspoon pepper
1 large clove garlic, peeled and crushed

GREEN SAUCE
5 tablespoons finely chopped chives
5 tablespoons finely chopped green pepper
3 tablespoons finely chopped dill pickle
¼ cup capers
4–5 tablespoons lemon juice
1 clove garlic, peeled and crushed
¼ cup salad oil
1 cup veal broth
⅛ teaspoon sugar
2 good dashes liquid pepper seasoning
Salt and pepper

Place meat and bones in as small a kettle as possible so that the minimum of water may be used. Cover meat ¾ with water. Add salt, pepper and garlic. Bring to a boil. Cover and continue simmering until meat is fork-tender—about 2 to 2½ hours, or 30 minutes to the pound. Turn meat occasionally during cooking. Cook meat conveniently in advance; let it stand in the broth and reheat before serving. Place all the ingredients for the green sauce in a saucepan. Heat slowly to boiling point, stirring occasionally. Arrange slices of poached veal on a warm platter and garnish with parsley. Spoon some of the green sauce over each slice and serve the rest in a separate bowl. Makes 6–8 servings—2 cups sauce.

Terrines of Veal

1½ pounds veal, cut as for scaloppine
1⅓ cups finely sliced scallions
¼ cup finely chopped parsley
Fresh-ground pepper
Powdered thyme
Bay leaves, crumbled
1½ pounds thin-sliced cooked ham
1 cup chicken broth
3 cups undiluted beef consommé
2 envelopes unflavored gelatin
1 ⅞-ounce can black truffles
½ green pepper
1 tomato
2 stalks celery

Put eight 4¼"x2¼"x1½" loaf pans on a tray. Trim a piece of veal to fit the bottom of each pan. Sprinkle lightly with scallion and parsley, pepper, a dash of thyme and a little bay leaf. Add a layer of ham. Repeat until the pans are full. After the first layer of veal you need not worry about using uneven pieces. Put 2–3 tablespoons chicken broth in each pan. Cover tightly with aluminum foil. Bake in a slow oven, 300° F., 1½ hours. Remove from oven, allow to cool a little. Place a weight on the foil covering the meat in each pan (a can of soup will do). Cool. Refrigerate overnight. Turn out of pans. Trim to an even shape. Refrigerate while you make the aspic. Heat the consommé and gelatin until gelatin dissolves. Cool. Wash pans previously used and when dry put 2 or 3 tablespoons liquid aspic in each. Chill until firm. Cut fancy shapes from truffles, green pepper, tomato and celery. Dip in liquid aspic and place in pans. Chill until firm. Replace each veal-and-ham stack. Fill with aspic that is syrupy. Chill until firm. Unmold. Makes 8 servings.

By 1955, school officials were using every vice they could think of to stretch space. asement rooms were turned into classrooms, ades were combined, leftover children sent to other wards.

And then the ceiling fell in Webster.

It was not really the ceiling—only a bit of aster. Although it fell where a child might ve been sitting, it fell over a weekend, and one was hurt. But if the whole ceiling had llen, it is doubtful if the cumulative effects uld have been greater.

At nine o'clock the following Monday rning (the time was February, 1956), Mara Jane Lynn's kitchen telephone rang. She d her husband, Bob, had been away over e weekend. That morning she had seen the ler of her two children, Vicki Sue, off to ndergarten at Webster, and was already rting on her Monday washing. But it was indignant Webster mother on the line. e and a friend were spreading the news of fallen plaster. Could Martha Jane come to neeting at nine-thirty?

Martha Jane tucked her red-haired, freckled four-year-old, Steve, into his snow suit soon as she could and arrived in her neighr's living room at ten o'clock. Conversation s already buzzing.

Martha Jane remembers, "It was a regular fee hash-session." All those present were ng Webster mothers. Most of them had ned out to vote "yes" for the previous bond ues, and all were sympathetic to school offils who, they felt, had tried hard to keep d Webster in "pretty good repair" over the rs. They were in a crusading mood. Not n a bond issue that would pass seemed bed them.

We agreed we wanted to do something itive, even if we weren't sure what. But re were only fifteen of us, so we decided to e ourselves two weeks for each of us to find more people."

wo weeks later, seventy young women met he basement room of a Webster neighbor, ough this time some of the mothers were m other wards. Preschoolers swarmed ong the grownups. Rules of order were inmal to an extreme. Martha Jane says, "We er did get around to electing officers. Our n reason was that we wanted to avoid all sonal publicity because of the personal cks of the last bond-issue campaign. I k this was one of the wisest decisions we le." But Mrs. Leonard Spurgeon, then sident of the Webster P.T.A., says of ty, auburn-haired Martha Jane, "She was chairman."

Martha Jane declares that when she was a ntry girl coming from her father's farm to aloosa High School, she had as many kles on her face as Steve has now (hunds). But her red hair has deepened now, freckles have vanished and in their place look of sweetness and poise. She graduinto World War II, went on to Iowa e University where she majored in home omics, specializing in institutional cookBut in her senior year an old high-school smate, Bob Lynn, now a Navy veteran, ed up in the sophomore class. Martha was excited at being offered a job in Boson her graduation, but as Bob says, e never got there." They were married in ember, 1947.

ey spent two more years at Iowa State e Bob finished his degree in poultry husdry—years both speak of as sociable, imerished fun shared with other married ents. They came back to Oskaloosa in the g of '49, where Bob, an only son, joined mother and father in their dressed-poultry ness. The younger Lynns were the kind of le to do things in their community. Mara Jane's Sunday-school teaching has deed into serious church work. Blond, us-minded Bob had a Scout troop for s, is now district chairman of leadership ing. They became square-dance enthusiand Bob even took a course in calling.

Their resources were most tested, however, after the birth of Vicki Sue, in February, 1950. The birth was difficult, and the baby didn't breathe for almost half an hour. In the interval her brain was damaged, and she now has mild cerebral palsy. The good sense and courage of her parents have given Vicki Sue courage too. She is now an extra-thin little third-grader with fine gold hair and her father's blue eyes. Speech and physical-therapy classes at the University of Iowa, special tutoring by her beloved first-grade teacher help her keep up. She knows she can count on her family to listen attentively as she struggles to get out her flow of words at the family dinner table. On the other hand, she knows there is no exploiting her difficulties; she must tie her own shoes, make her own bed. Steve is her self-appointed protector at school. With a face like Tom Sawyer's he is a bringer home of A's, champ baseball player and riddle collector, but he helped argue his mother into letting Vicki join a dancing class this year.

The meeting of seventy mothers became a general discussion of how to promote a bond campaign, "with everyone throwing in every idea." Perhaps the most concrete result was a new feeling of excitement, for never before had so many supporters of building drawn together. "We discussed whether we were interested in just Webster, or the whole school setup. We agreed we didn't want to be tagged as just a Webster group. We laid down our no-personal-publicity rule and decided to send a delegation to the school board to see what they thought we could do."

Mr. Joe L. Gettys, Oskaloosa school superintendent, smiles now at his own underestimation of the power of aroused mothers. He says, "Frankly, I didn't think they could do a thing. The last campaign had developed into a really nasty situation. We were trying to meet emotions with facts and figures—too many—and it hadn't worked. What the mother's group was offering, of course, was emotion on our side."

The school board was still responsibly trying to give the public facts. That fall it had held open forums in each ward, hoping to find out what program the town would vote for. Says Martha Jane succinctly, "They fell with a flop. Hardly anybody came." Again in January, just a month before the plaster fell, it had scheduled a town meeting with all school-board members present to answer questions. "It was really discouraging. Twenty or thirty people came. I remember saying afterward, 'Somebody's going to have to do something awfully drastic.'"

It was not surprising, then, that the board's advice to the mothers was: wait. It was too early in the year. Spring or summer would be better. Having heard this advice, the mothers made up their own minds. "We thought no, let's act while the spark's there. The board was awfully nice—they said they'd support anything we did."

It was in these early meetings that Martha Jane was pushed into position of spokesman. She says, "It was because I wasn't afraid to talk," but Mrs. Spurgeon elaborates: "She was much our most interesting speaker, she was capable and attractive, and—you have to know Martha Jane—she would never make anybody mad. We needed her."

Decisions had to be made, and Martha Jane admits, "Mrs. Spurgeon and I made many of them. I don't know that we had the authority to do so, but we wanted to keep things moving quickly."

The next decision was to send out a call through all ward P.T.A. chairmen for another meeting of "just the pro votes. We stressed again that we didn't want to stop to argue with those who weren't with us. A hundred and five mothers came from every ward—and we'd had practically no publicity."

The meeting took place in the Farm Bureau basement. The high-school principal had sent over some high-school girls to take care of the preschoolers, and throughout the three-hour meeting the thumps of children at play sounded through the ceiling. "We described what we had been doing, and what we hoped to do," says Martha Jane (actually it was she who did the talking), "then we took a vote on what we wanted to support. We had two main choices—the big one and the little one. The big one was what the school board really wanted—to build a new high school and convert the old into a junior high. We were still on the old-fashioned eight-four system [eight years of elementary school, four of high], and the school people felt strongly the six-three-three system was better, and would relieve congestion in the elementary schools. Oskaloosa's bonding limit was over a million dollars, and if we went the whole way, we could do something about the elementary schools too—give Webster a new unit and add multipurpose rooms to several of the others that had absolutely no assembly room or play area for rainy days. The smaller plan was to put up just the Webster unit and the multipurpose rooms for about $300,000.

"We never dreamed how the vote would turn out. It was 103 to 2 in favor of the big one. We were overwhelmed. This generated all sorts of enthusiasm."

By now it was early March. Within two weeks, mothers in pairs had gone through every ward circulating a petition that Oskaloosa vote on a bond issue for $1,060,000. Thirty-five signatures were needed. The mothers got over a thousand.

One final meeting was held before Easter week at the end of the month. At this, tables were placarded with the names of committees, and committees were formed by the simple device of asking every mother to walk to the table of her choice. This meant every woman there would have a job to do during the campaign. As Mrs. Spurgeon puts it, "Never before have so many people from all parts of town been so friendly—and probably never will be."

The mothers wanted a quick vote while spirits were high, and had asked that voting day be May first, a Tuesday. They decided to do nothing during Holy Week. April, then, would be campaign month.

A few days before the petitions were circulated, Martha Jane and Mrs. Spurgeon had gone together to have a little chat with the man they regarded as the leader of the opposition during the earlier bond-issue fights. He had received them in his office. So sure was he that the mothers were harmless that he could afford to be totally benign. "All right, little lady," he told Martha Jane, "if you keep it in your own hands and don't let those other fellows [the school officials] run you, I'll give you a hundred dollars for your campaign."

Martha Jane smiles rather grimly. "He never did give us the money. A few weeks later he was fighting us as hard as ever. But I suppose at that stage it never occurred to him our campaign would amount to anything at all."

The Mothers' Crusade for Better Schools started that April with a cash debt of $150 already spent for campaign supplies (the money had been loaned by the Junior Chamber of Commerce). It had assets, too, however. It had a thorough, imaginative campaign program worked out from all the ideas mothers had thrown in at early meetings. It had eight committees totaling nearly 300 women to put the program into effect. And it had all the zest in the world.

Thanks to its zest, the campaign grew in impetus all during the month of April. The hundred women on the "campaign materials" committee, who were going to distribute placards among merchants, sell beanies, bumper strips and campaign buttons to raise money, started their work with practice sessions in how to handle hostility, had one rule drummed into them: Don't argue. By the end of the month, merchants who had earlier turned down placards were calling up and pleading for them. (Martha Jane says, "The rumor that we boycotted them wasn't true. It was just that nobody had time to shop.")

Preparations were careful. Martha Jane wrote a speech for her "organizations contact" committee, "so we'd all be saying the same thing—then we tore it up so we'd speak spontaneously. In all, fifteen of us talked to two hundred organizations in that one month. Many of us made two or three speeches a day. It got so if Bob wanted to see me, he'd have to come to a meeting where I was speaking."

The young mothers would arrive at meetings armed with campaign buttons ("I'll Vote for Better Schools"), bumper strips ("Vote Schools Now") and a device called the "wheel of truth" meant to show every property owner just how much his taxes would actually increase ($9 a year for Oskaloosa's average homeowner). The town's ministers gave them "wonderful support," invited them to speak to church groups where they hoped to reach older citizens. All the men's service organizations gave them resounding votes, in a few cases cheerfully circumventing their own by-laws to do so.

Three hundred women gave uncountable numbers of coffees. They were small ("no more than ten or fifteen people") with large aims: to capture 3000 "Yes" votes, the minimum needed to beat an all-out opposition estimated at 2000. (The bond issue would have to carry by 60 per cent). Hostesses invited two or three antis or fence-sitters, surrounded them with a dozen enthusiastic but tactful pros, tried diplomatically to ascertain what their husbands' sentiments were, wrote down on carefully kept lists such facts as whether they might need baby sitters on voting day.

The transportation committee offered their time and cars to any voters who wanted to take a firsthand look at the schools. One retired schoolteacher told her driver she didn't believe a word of this dire need for more school space, but she was so shocked when she actually saw children studying in hallways and cellars that she apologized for her doubts and went straight home to start calling up friends.

A day that had been scheduled for a massive sweep of downtown sidewalks to sell campaign buttons turned out to be a "nasty, blustering day—oh, nasty!" But 200 umbrella-carrying mothers covered the town anyway, because they heard that a feature writer from a Des Moines newspaper had come for the occasion. Oskaloosans had the satisfaction of reading a Sunday-feature story and two subsequent editorials in the newspapers of their state capital. Oskaloosa's awakening was state news.

ALARM CLOCK: an invention used to wake adults who have no babies. EASAR'S COMIC DICTIONARY

Oskaloosa's own newspaper, the Daily Herald, had offered full support from the first, and probably no influence outside the mothers themselves was quite so instrumental in building up a powerful, town-wide campaign fever. It worked closely with the mothers' publicity committee. Daily it presented the bond issue as though it were Christmas: "So many days left to register and vote!" It ran a series of question-and-answer boxes in which "the old, sore points" were fairly and objectively answered. It gave front-page space to a series written by one of its own reporters, taking up each ward's school situation, the benefit each would derive if the bond issue passed. Once again the point was made clear: that the whole town had a stake in better schools.

The opposition, of course, did not remain idle, but somehow this time those in favor of the bond issue had so much heart and verve that answering back became easy. Martha Jane says, "We mothers kept ourselves on a very clean level—no arguments, no personal attacks. But a few men's groups did raise some personal attacks that made the Daily Herald awfully lively reading the last few weeks." A "Taxpayers' League" that bought newspaper space to argue against the bond issue was countered by a "Little League Taxpayers' Association" that bought equal space to poke fun at the former's elusive membership. When a school official received an illiterate, misspelled anonymous letter, the letter was reprinted over the caption "Here's Why We Need Better Schools."

The town's social-service workers wore campaign buttons, countered the opposition's arguments to low-income renters and pensioners. After a leading opponent of the bond issue used personal attack over the radio, the radio station made a rule that all future scripts had to be submitted in advance. Martha Jane says, "This took all the fire out of them. They had the kind of speakers who liked to talk off the cuff." Both the newspaper and the rad station encouraged advertisers to insert "W support the Mothers' Crusade for Bet Schools" in their advertising, and the rush holdout merchants and professional groups make this public proclamation in the closi week of the campaign told volumes. "It got they began to feel they had to have that lit thing in there." As Martha Jane puts it, "Wh we got going, there wasn't any one pers the antis could attack. It was a kind of ov whelming tide. For the first time they were the defensive."

The day before election day, the moth held a parade. It was a parade such as Osk loosa had never seen. Only mothers and ch dren marched—over 2000 of them. Ten abrea they marched for eleven blocks through t downtown area. Some of the high-sch students had made floats. The children chant Mothers held preschoolers by the ha pushed babies in strollers. Says Martha Ja "It was very, very orderly and very, very i pressive." The state's superintendent of pu lic instruction happened to be driving throu Oskaloosa that day on his way to somewh else, and as the Daily Herald gleefully scribed it, "ran smack dab into the ho blowing parade traffic." Said the amazed perintendent, "I never saw anything like i wouldn't have missed it for the world."

The next day the mothers were still at wo They baby-sat, drove voters to the polls, set a network of poll watchers and telephoners make sure every known pro-vote did his c duty. But this was the day when a month devoted effort was rewarded. The vote wa record one (the mothers had brought over new voters to the rolls during April): 3504 the bond issue, 1241 against. This was m than double the highest number of "y votes in any of the previous elections. bond issue made a clean sweep in every sin ward, winning by a 74 per cent majority. Daily Herald put out an extra with a ban headline, and church bells rang.

All this was some four years ago. But r dents say that Oskaloosa hasn't been the s town since. The elementary-school additi are up now; last fall the handsome new h school, sitting on the crown of a hill beh the town, opened its doors. But Martha J says, "The best result of all was a new com nity feeling. Twice in the past we had lost industry because surveys showed we ha 'poor community attitude.' Since 1956 n new plants have come to town. People h got behind other town projects with a bo spirit. We've been chosen by the U.S. S Department as a 'typical American town' foreign visitors to see. Oskaloosa is just a ferent place to live in."

But what of Martha Jane? One of her h est offices this year is den mother; she steadily turned a deaf ear to suggestions she run for the school board. For a yo woman with above-average gifts of energy ability, her arguments sound suprisingly fashioned. But they are very firm. "There' ready one woman on the school board, that's enough. The Mothers' Crusade w once-in-a-lifetime thing and it's better t the men carry on now. Besides, I don't wa start anything like that while my children this age."

She still does extraordinary things. She Bob built a new house over a period of years, and clad in pedal pushers and s shirt she helped him do much of the lab from putting in wiring to laying down crete forms. She brings in extra family in with a part-time job ("My hours are own") as "hospitality hostess" exte greetings to newcomers. When hands are at the poultry-processing plant, she pitch She says, "I've never killed a chicken- I've driven a truck."

Nevertheless, when she and Mrs. Spur get together, there is a special bond of m ories between them. Some time after C loosa's school-bond election, the nearby of Perry, Iowa, held one, and Perry mo came to Oskaloosa mothers for advice. tha Jane says, "We told them everything done. After the election one of their mo telephoned us. She was crying, 'We won won!' I knew just how she felt."

TEENAGERS SPEAK FOR THEMSELVES

We're talking about when we're sixteen or seventeen, and are supposed to start thinking things out for ourselves. Many parents say they want us to, but they get frightened when we actually start to do it.

Take smoking. Hardly any parents approve, even for older teens. But we don't see anything wrong with it—so we smoke. Not everybody. Especially not all girls. But almost all of us have tried it, and don't feel guilty about it either.

Parents are apt to be narrow-minded about dates too. There's an awful lot of trouble about dating outside our religion. We agree that a girl's parents have a right to meet her date. But some parents are snobs who judge our friends unfairly and too quickly. Some girls play it cool, try bringing a boy around more often so their parents will have a chance to know what he's really like. Others date the boy anyhow—and friends cover for them, or their parents know and there's a perpetual war.

Then there's the question of where we're allowed to go. It annoys us that so many parents are against drive-in movies. Could be because we call them "passion pits." We forget how literal-minded parents can be, and that they are in such a sweat about anything that even sounds like sex.

We don't really mind bars and taverns being off-limits—they haven't much appeal anyhow. A wild party now and then is another thing. A number of us at one time or another have been on one, if only because we got carried along with a crowd that went in for them. But if girls ask their dates to take them home, the boys are generally willing to. If not, girls have been known to take a cab or even to go off with a date's car.

The important thing is that most crowds choose not to be wild most of the time. Most of us frown on heavy necking, smoking and drinking. We like to think these are our choices, not our parents'. But, as one teen put it, "Someday you have to make a choice between getting a bad reputation and being accused of being from Parentsville. You can't always be in the middle."

Usually our "wildness" is pretty innocent. Like deciding to go swimming at midnight on a hot summer night instead of minding the home curfew. We balance the swim against our parents' wrath. Sometimes we take the wrath.

On the other hand, there are some parents' and groups' rules we accept. Just about everybody, everywhere, agrees that a girl's parents have the right to set the rules for dating, that these shouldn't be broken. Everybody moans about early curfews (usually 10 to 10:30 for young teens, 11 to 12:30 for older ones), but boys don't question the right of the girl's parents to set them. Another rule determines whether a girl can date on a school night (it's generally no). All agree that a girl's parents have the right to meet her date and have something to say about where she's allowed to go. Boys are not apt to take a girl to the kind of place her parents disapprove of.

Boys agree their parents have rightful authority over the family car—and all rules governing its use. Most parents are generous about this, and to do us justice, we don't burn the rubber or go bombing around on dates. We think chaperons are dated except for large parties, and even then they shouldn't be in the middle of things. Our parties are milder than people think. The truth is, most of us are too well brought up, have too much sense of responsibility to go in for anything else. When we do get in trouble with our parents it's apt to be because, as one teen put it, "Actually, the group rules are more apt to conform with what I think is right."

[illegible]

Don't panic, but not one out of ten of us thinks our own parents are too strict or too lenient—but just about everyone thinks other kids' parents are either one or the other. We feel our own parents "let us do the things they can trust us to do," as one teen put it. Or another, "My friends think my parents extremely lenient, but I have a feeling that if I got into trouble my parents would crack down."

For some strange reason we're readier to classify other kids' parents. Some think others' parents are "too rough," others "all too lenient." But by and large most think "half are strict, and half are lenient, none are too lenient." A comment from Minneapolis is typical: "Most kids' parents treat them exactly as they deserve."

When we're punished we usually think we deserve it, but we think parents really goof when it comes to what they deal out. Punishments tend to be blown up out of all proportion, or just don't fit the crime. We're persecuted about little things—and the big things ride. If we're five minutes late because the guy at the gas station didn't have change, we're grounded for three weeks. Yet a kid can get drunk or rod it up and parents hardly notice it. Almost all teens feel parents act before they think—without giving us a chance to explain. And that punishments are silly—and ineffective. We think punishments alone aren't enough to make a person stop doing a thing—we have to understand why we shouldn't do it. Yet punishment is accepted with resignation—rarely with revolt.

[illegible]

People who think teenagers as a whole approve of boozing it up are really out to lunch.

Wives, like children, need to be loved most when they least deserve it.

Or if they think most of us haven't been exposed to it, likewise. The majority of us are worried about the amount of drinking that does go on. So much so we may give an impression that there's more drinking than there is.

Let's rule the young teens out first. They practically never come in contact with liquor except at home. This is true of some crowds too. You'd think they'd never heard of the stuff. But most kids have at least experimented with liquor. (By no means have we all tied one on.) This is not as much a question of where-we-live as you might think. There's the same amount of concern about drinking in small Kansas towns as there is in big cities.

The only areas in the country where teenage drinking even begins to be an accepted thing are San Francisco, Tucson, New York and their suburbs. Everywhere else, the pattern is pretty much the same: Very little drinking at parties, but a few boys may show up stony. On dates, the crowd sets the pace. The crowd's attitude influences us more than parents' (although a few teens who've seen excessive drinking at home have strong convictions against it). Most crowds frown on drinking too much. Not many girls drink, although a lot have sampled. Girls haven't much control over whether boys tie one on or not, although a boy will get a kick out of letting a girl feel noble about reforming him when he doesn't much care for drinking anyway.

Most drinking is among boys who want to find out what it's all about, see what it feels like to get plastered. They get together in small groups for the pure and simple purpose of getting smacked. But once they've proved they're men, there's no rush about doing it again.

WHAT IS THE TEENAGE STAND [illegible]

This may come as a shock, but we don't believe in teenage marriages. Even in the deep South, where marrying early is supposed to be customary, 98 per cent of the teenagers today say that teens are just not mature enough for a marriage that has much chance of success. As one boy put it: "We shouldn't get married unless we are emotionally mature and financially able, which is a hard combination to find in teens."

Around the rest of the country we feel even more strongly. Maybe the wave of reaction against the teenage-marriage fever has finally hit us. Some of us feel that if a girl is 18 or 19 and mature enough, she might make a go of it. But boys should be over 20 at least, highly responsible, and earning at least $80.00 a week. Most of us feel strongly that we still have a great deal of growing and living and learning to do before we're ready for marriage.

We think a forced marriage is a sad situation. Some question it altogether, feeling that if a girl gets p.g. it's evidence of irresponsibility, and love probably isn't involved. Most of us don't know personally of any forced marriages, or have only heard about them vaguely. It hardly ever happens to people you know well. Or else you're not sure.

We think mooning about "my ideal" marriage partner is kind of juvenile. We expect to marry people, not ideals. But all of us expect to marry for love. In fact, we look forward to marriage as a relationship of special understanding. As one Brain said: "The ideal wife is the one who'll love me."

Girls in general say a lot of money won't be important in choosing a husband—although they want him to be able to support a family. Boys say wives should be attractive, not a dish. Party girls needn't apply. And unless a whole generation changes its mind, the male is going to be the head of the house.

DO TEENS WHOSE MOTHERS WORK [illegible]

There are few wild parties while mothers are at work. Quite a number of teens got indignant at the very suggestion. All the teens whose mothers work testify this sort of thing simply doesn't happen. Wild parties seem to be a question of how you're brought up rather than whether your mother works or not.

We know what we're talking about, too, because it seems that at least half the mothers of teenagers work. We do have more freedom in this situation, but we have more responsibilities too. Practically none of us feels this extra work hurts us. We're rather proud to do our part. We're proud of our mothers too. A lot of us feel they are more interesting people because they have jobs—and that they're easier to talk to. We don't mind their working if they want to, and we appreciate their effort if they have to. Nobody hollers because the house is empty after school. We feel it's sad if a person in his teens can't do without mommy when he comes home.

WHAT ABOUT TEENAGE MANNERS AND CONSIDERATION OF OTHERS?

Teenagers all over the country are convinced that basically teens have good manners. Then we go on to admit that there's room for improvement. We think we're all right on small things—like saying thank you, opening doors, walking on the outside—but we're not so sure about the big ones—like consideration. Yet we hate to hurt people's feelings—and that's supposed to be the basis of courtesy, so maybe we'll catch on. We're particularly apt to forget manners when we're in a gang.

We find especially repulsive: eating with your mouth open, pushing in school halls, standing up a date, not including other people in conversation (especially your date), using dirty language, yelling out of cars, not respecting elders, bragging, rowdyism in general.

It comes as a painful revelation to most of us that we aren't considerate enough of our parents. We are very considerate of our dates. And reasonably so of our friends (as one cynic said, "We don't want to kill off any prospects"). We are pretty considerate of our friends' parents. But, it looks as though we take our parents for granted—or have an extradefensive relationship with them. We would like the situation to be better, and we're going to try to remember to gas this one.

BUT NOT ABOUT SEX!

Even in big cities where everyone's supposed to be more couth, teens find it very hard to have serious, heart-to-heart talks with their parents. Some of us feel it's our own fault—we could if we wanted to, but we don't want to. It's embarrassing. Some feel it's the parents—we'd like to talk but they're hard to reach. Most have one parent they can talk to more easily than the other—about some things. Our ambitions are the easiest subject. Parents really open up on this score and talk freely and helpfully. Talks about behavior are generally a one-sided conversation.

Sex is a real block. Very few—whether it's the parents or the teen who takes the initiative—get far in this department, though teens (mostly girls) wish they could. Some say their mothers freeze at the word. So they talk to their girl friends instead. Most boys say they don't like to talk to their parents about it. A good many report their mothers worry so much about it they just don't bring the subject up. Yet parents seem scared to death we'll get into "trouble." If they only knew how little cause they have to worry.

When a girl knows a boy, she can pretty much predict how he will act on a date, so she isn't apt to find herself in a car in the park wishing she knew judo. Of course everyone makes mistakes. One teen remembers a time when she misjudged a boy, and she was so nervous she banged her head trying to get out of the car. This made her so mad she really told him off, and he was so surprised he meekly drove her home.

But to sum up, most girls know enough not to get themselves in spots like that. They can size up—or handle the boys they know. Also, most of us frown on heavy necking—and ditto going all the way! Believe it or not, we're romantic. We'd rather think our date's the most. And don't forget—teens are shy. Many parents like us to double-date because they think it's some kind of morality insurance. Actually we like to because with four it's easier to keep the conversation rolling.

Pickups (and this should come as no surprise) are frowned on by teens as well as parents. One in a hundred girls thinks it's cute to go to a game or somewhere and pick up a boy she never saw before. But nobody thinks it's cool to be a tomato. As for straight sex—we think that's a panic. Who's anxious to get into trouble? The few who break the rules say they lived to regret it.

And here's a word for parents: we think being brought up to be responsible and informed is our best insurance.

BASIC INTEGRITY?

Most kids think school rules are not reasonable, though we suppose there are reasons for them. Many seem to us an insult to the dignity of decent teens (99 per cent, since hoods add up to 1 per cent in the average high school). We feel some are a first-class pain: needing a pass to go into the school corridor, keeping absolute silence when changing classes. We resent some of the rules about clothes: having to wear a belt (the new Continental pants are designed to be worn without one), girls' not being allowed to use a rinse on their hair or wear slacks to a game. And penalties are too severe, expulsion is used too freely.

So we abide by the rules when we must, but privately we have contempt for them (even the squirrels do) and we play a cat-and-mouse game of trying to break them without getting caught. None of us feels guilty about this (the way we do about breaking parents' rules), and on the whole it's considered cool. The crime consists in getting caught. When we have a part in making the rules we feel differently.

Cheating is something else again. We're ashamed of this. Every report, from every city and town, admits that cheating goes on—considerable." Most of us feel it's more common in the junior grades, and that kids just learn not to do it. But we're embarrassed that there's any. We all condemn it. Most teens say it can't be justified under any circumstances. Those who do alibi it give these reasons for cheating: when the volume of work is too great, when you can't date if you don't bring home good grades, when pressure about college from parents and teachers gets too heavy. Many teens think there's pressure on them all the time. The competition's keen.

Deception as a whole, of almost any other kind, is something a teen would rather die than stoop to. Lying, for instance, has absolutely no place in our book. Of course it would be stupid to balk at little white lies told in order to save someone's feelings—like telling a creep whom you don't want to date that you're going steady. But a deliberate lie is never justified, unless to protect others—our parents or friends. Never for our own benefit. We especially look down on the phony, the person who pretends to be something he's not, who talks about getting bombed and crashing cars and snowing girls.

Considering we take such a strong stand against deception, it's ironic that this is what most often gets us into trouble—mostly because loyalty to a friend has top place in our scheme of values. This can mean taking the blame, covering up in any number of ways, and—inevitably—lying. Most of us say this is the only circumstance under which we would lie to our parents. A girl will say a friend is staying at her house when the friend is on a date. A friend covers for someone who's cut a class. Or a girl at her friend's house, when the friend's mother comes into the room and smells smoke, will say she is the one who has been smoking. Girls sometimes regret protecting someone who doesn't deserve it.

Not so boys. They don't regret lying or covering for another boy, even if they get the full brunt of the blame themselves. They just don't squeal, even if the consequences might be serious. Here's a case: A school paper ran an editorial criticizing the school. A young teen on the staff was severely punished because he had taken it to the printer without having it O.K.'d by the faculty adviser. But the student managing editor had told him it had been O.K.'d. The younger boy didn't defend himself by explaining it, and the m.e. didn't come forward because he was a senior and thought trouble would hurt his chances for college. That was O.K. by the younger boy. He suffered a black eye with the faculty as a result. But he didn't regret not having squealed and would do the same thing again. And everyone felt he did the right thing.

[illegible]

In small Southern towns, in big Northern cities, from East Coast to West, more than half the teenagers are regular churchgoers. Even in a city like Chicago, 80 per cent of the teens have some sort of church affiliation.

Religion means a lot even to a great many teens who do not go to church often. To some it means a great deal indeed. They say it is something to set ideals and moral goals by, it gives them inner peace and security. They think of it as a stabilizing force in the world too. Others are puzzled because religion doesn't mean as much as it used to and they find it hard to put a finger on why. Still others are finding it hard to work out our true relationship with God.

MOTTOES OF THE SEVEN WISE MEN OF GREECE

(INSCRIBED IN THE LATER DAYS IN THE DELPHIAN TEMPLE)

SOLON: Know thyself.

CHILO: Consider the end.

PITTACUS: Know thy opportunity.

BIAS: Most men are bad.

PERIANDER: Nothing is impossible to industry.

CLEOBULUS: Avoid excess.

THALES: Suretyship is the precursor of ruin.

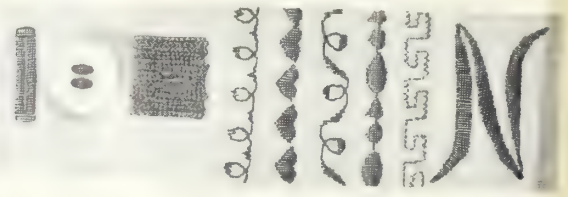
[illegible]

More than 90 per cent of the teenagers in the country are convinced that money isn't everything. Wherever we live—North, South, East or West, we're one on this. If there were a choice between two jobs—one we liked and one that was strictly for cabbage—we wouldn't have any trouble deciding which we'd take. We think personal satisfaction and happiness add up to much more through the years than plain money, period. We're just not interested in pursuing the mazoola for its own sake. What good's money if you're too unhappy to enjoy it? As for the you-gotta-play-the-angles gambit, that's strictly out of orbit.

No teen feels the world should be served up to us on an oyster. None of us feels the world owes us a living. We already like to earn our own date and car money, and we expect to do O.K. on our own. Moreover, we're full of hope, faith and optimism about our adult years. We're told it's a tough time ahead, a time of change and challenge, perhaps the biggest possible crisis in man's history. What an era to be part of! We're excited at the prospect.

NEW YORK TEENAGERS AREN'T [illegible]

In the biggest city in the country there are the biggest teenage problems. Maybe this is only natural, when you think how many people live in such a concentrated area. At any rate, it is hard to fit New York in anywhere. Some kids gave answers in such a way that it was just like not answering at all—being smart, that kind of thing. And the answers varied so much they couldn't be broken down into a category. Though some teens are concerned about drinking, others feel it is O.K.—"What's wrong in getting high now and then?" Some say they do it because it makes them feel good—"cool, daddy, cool." The subject of good manners is often laughed off. A few say their friends are all big slobs, and who cares anyway? Regarding allowances, one boy praised them because "You don't have to work for your dough." Several teens remarked they would rather work for money than do what they enjoy—"for with money you can do the things you want, anyway." When asked whether they would follow group rules or parents' rules, the answers ran from "I make up my own rules" to "I listen to whoever is stronger." There were many "Yes" answers to the question: Are teenagers more free if their mothers work? Some say they can never be too free. Others are glad their mothers work because (1) It gives them (mothers) something to do. (2) They bring home more money; (3) "I need the quiet to do my homework." Hardly anywhere in the city did teens show respect or pride in the fact that their mothers worked. As for cheating, some say it is O.K. if you don't know the answers; others admit (without much caring) that it goes on all the time. And when asked if they thought parents were too lenient, more than one teenager replied, "How do I know? It's none of my business."



I guess you can understand why New York is unique. However, there are some conscientious teens who are very worried about the delinquency problem in their city, and we have the feeling they would really like to polish themselves up—even if it would take a while to do it.

Editors' Note—The American Field Service does not place foreign teenage students in homes in Manhattan or in Chicago proper (only in the suburbs). The organization feels that there are not enough activities or associations to give the visiting teenagers an opportunity to know or take part in normal teenage life, characteristic of the U.S.

"Dark Purpose (page 42) is the outcome of living two years in Mexico," reports the author, DORIS HUME. "With two blond teenage daughters. Which guaranteed there would never be a dull moment. There wasn't! See that grin I'm wearing in the photo? It's been there ever since that grand moment I heard the JOURNAL was going to publish my novel."

HOLLYWOOD reporter JOE HYAMS (Should Movie Stars Be Parents? page 72) is a New York Herald-Tribune syndicated columnist. His column, This Is Hollywood, appears in some sixty papers across the country. He informs us that he and his wife, Elinore, and their two children live "in the most exclusive middle-class part of Hollywood on the wrong side of the San Fernando mountains."

JOE BOWLER, illustrator of Agatha, page 40, was born in Forest Hills, Long Island; now lives with his wife, Marilyn, and daughters, Jolyn and Brynne, in Briarcliff Manor. Attended evening classes of Art Students League in New York while holding full-time job as an office boy. Hobbies: "My family, painting, hunting, fishing, golf and loafing." Ambition: "To continue same indefinitely."

OH, IT'S DIN, DIN, DIN!

Dear Sirs: In the March JOURNAL you published:

Dinner is a major daily activity, which can be accomplished only by intelligent people. It is not enough to eat. To dine, there must be diversified, calm conversation. It should sparkle with the rubies of the wine between courses, be deliciously suave with the sweetness of dessert, and acquire true profundity with the coffee.

Must you remind me of all that I'm missing as I butter endless slices of bread for my three-year-old, and look away shuddering as the fifteen-month-old smears cottage cheese in her hair?

Sincerely,
Concord — BARBARA RUANO

P.S. But I still enjoy your magazine—and my family too.

WOMEN FOR WORLD DISARMAMENT

To the Editor: Since for the first time there are more American women voters than men, their responsibility is greater and so is their power. If they will, they can force an end to the threat of world-wide nuclear slaughter.

Across the country, women are writing to the Hon. Paul M. Butler, Chairman, Democratic National Committee, 1001 Connecticut Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D.C., or to the Hon. Thruston B. Morton, Chairman, Republican National Committee, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C., or both, to tell them that the women's vote which is now decisive will be cast only for the candidates who publicly endorse immediate world disarmament with reasonable verification, a world ban on tests, and an honest, responsible approach to co-operation with all nations.

This is admittedly a Rolling Pin for Peace operation. We urge your readers to join us. Sincerely,

BEN'S MOTHER

To the Editors: In the many articles I have read about Dr. Spock, I never feel that justice has been done to his mother, Mrs. Benjamin Spock, Sr.

Mrs. Spock is a lady—and I mean lady—of great wit and charm, behind which lie a brilliant mind and enormous interest in people and in living. It is not surprising that some of these qualities rubbed off on her famous son.

My affection for her has stood the test of years during which she has beaten me countless times at rapid games of Scrabble. Sincerely yours,

Chevy Chase — MRS. TALBOT M. ROGERS

IF I COULD BE A NEW MOTHER AGAIN

Dear Editors: My children are nearly grown now. They are beautiful, good, smart and happy. But I wonder how much more beautiful (etc.!) they could have been. What if I . . .

. . . had not been so concerned with each sneeze and with little damp feet—and had gone running in the rain with them?

. . . had ignored the grubby (germy, of course!) small fists—and had been more ecstatic over mud pies with jasmine petals sprinkled all over the "chocolate" frosting?

. . . had been less squeamish about newts, toads, spiders, emerald snakes—and had shared the wonder of Nature inherent in each child?

. . . had been less concerned about a balanced diet at every meal—and had occasionally enjoyed, with a whole-family abandon, the recklessness of lunching on banana splits, jelly roll and soda pop?

. . . had been blinded to litter—and had a clearer vision when they took friends elsewhere because I had just cleaned house?

. . . had excused the broken glassware, lumpy beds, the dust in corners—and had complimented the too-young child who lovingly wanted to help?

. . . had been less concerned about the scuffed shoes, the ripped skirt and tousled heads—and had seen only the eagerness in the telling of a wonderful adventure?

. . . had been braver about bucking crowds and traffic when there was a parade in town?

. . . had ignored some of the C's in math—to praise more a teacher's note on Mary's mannerliness, Pat's art talent, or Wendy's ability to win friends?

How I wish I had been less serious—more joyful! Children are tough; health rules and cleanliness are only partial necessities. The one essential is laughter: the plus ingredient in all our lives. Enjoy your children! Sincerely,

RUTH HAYWARD

ANSWER TO A FAT GIRL'S PRAYER

Ladies' Home Journal: For a long, long time I have wanted to protest. I like fat girls. I adore fat girls. I have known many girls, 200 pounds, even 340 pounds, who were very happy, who were loved and cherished by all, married happily, and whose husbands wouldn't want to lose an ounce of them. SORORITIES VS. CIVIL RIGHTS?

Dear Editors: No political candidate can hope to be elected today unless he makes a lot of noise about civil rights. In the light of this, it is appalling that we continue to allow our schools and colleges to sanction—even encourage—organizations which frankly exclude members of certain racial and religious groups.

So long as we can shut our eyes to this situation, our so-called concern about the moral values of our youth becomes a mockery. Yours,

MY FAVORITE DOCTOR

Dear Journal Friends: Adolph Dasler is a psychiatrist. He has increased my faith and enriched my life—not only by the help he gave me, but by being my friend.

When my second baby was born I had severe post-partum depression, and spent several months in a sanitarium. Coming out, I was assigned to him for treatment. Without meeting him, I had decided I wouldn't like him.

Then I met him. He looked alert, understanding. He said casually, "Hello, Barbara. I have a daughter your age. Her name is Barbara too." He was one of the few people to talk to me instead of about me since I'd been sick.

He is an excellent sportsman, and his office reflected this—guns, trophies, much-loved pipes. He seemed to have an interest in and a knowledge of almost every field. I felt comfortable with him, knowing he was more than a doctor. He was a person, and he treated me as a person, not just as a patient. You cannot fully understand what this means unless you have been mentally ill. He seemed to care if I got well.

I expected to shock him, as I said, "I'm a minister's wife, and I don't believe in God!"

He didn't raise an eyebrow as he said, "All of us doubt sometimes. Thomas doubted. Then he went on to do good work for the Lord. All the disciples let Him down, but when their true faith returned, they were all the stronger. You will be too."

From that time forward we talked. He listened, shared his views, guided my thinking, interpreted everything from a Christian point of view.

He said once, "You know, in the Bible it tells of the sins of the fathers being visited upon generations of children. That is true with mental illness. If the father is sick, he will have a bad effect on his children. Those children, in turn, will have an unstable relationship with their children."

There were many things I feared. I couldn't go shopping; I couldn't talk to people; I couldn't be left alone. He said firmly, "You can do it! Make yourself. Every time you do, it will be easier." He made me look at every fear as a challenge, a chance to be victorious. When I did make it, he was as glad as I was. Feeling his faith in me, I couldn't let him down. I began to believe in myself.

When I was feeling . . . not like my "old self," but better than I had ever felt in my life, his interest continued. I go in periodically to keep in touch, and he is always delighted that I am doing well. I wish there were more like him to bring calm to the many troubled people who seek it. A faithful reader,

WHY WE PUBLISH PAT BOONE

Gentlemen: I have read and enjoyed your magazine for many years. Now as a thoughtful, I hope, mother of three daughters to rear in today's environment, I note with approval your teen-age-directed trend. I think it good to interest youngsters in a magazine that also has adult values—good adult values, that is—rather than one slanted exclusively to their natural faddishness.

AFRAID OF SILENCE?

Dear Editors: What, in our world of the '60's, has become of the value that was once placed on silence?

The quiet child who would rather read a book than play a noisy game is not "adjusted." The adult who does not chatter about trivia is "withdrawn." We no longer hear such maxims as "Silence is golden" and "Think twice before you speak once." Why?

Very truly yours,
Leavenworth MRS. JOHN W. DAWSON

By BERNARDINE KIELTY

Clifton Fadiman is one who loves books. He makes a good living by them, true, but if he were a railroad engineer he'd still pick up a book to read at each whistle stop. Now he has compiled A Lifetime Reading Plan (World) which is sure to be a stimulating guide for bookish-minded people. His list is the equivalent of a college lit. major. What's more, he contributes just enough about each work to "set" it, to show how it figures. Then it's up to you. Mr. Fadiman says, "Take it easy, read what appeals." But my guess is you'll find yourself building your vacation around those books which for some long-forgotten prejudice you've always side-stepped.

If you feel strong enough to face one of the toughest international problems ahead of us, read The Death of Africa, by Peter Ritner (Macmillan). On the other hand, if you can forget the political whirlpool, take an hour or so off with Born Free, by Joy Adamson (Pantheon). It's delightful. About a young African lioness who lived for three years in a Kenya game warden's household, as free to come and go as our cat or mine. She might knock Mrs. Adamson down with one push of her big paw, but it was all in a spirit of good clean fun. Theirs was mutual adoration, and the parting as tragedy.

Such is the spirit of Africa. And it's the same thing in Westchester County. H. Allen Smith (Let the Crab Grass Grow) is so sentimental about his dog Rufus that he sprinkles Accent on his horse meat. Charles Goren's Contract Bridge Complete (Doubleday) has now sold 200,000 copies, as it deserves to do. Charlie is a nice modest man. He admits that his eyes aren't what they used to be. Bifocals aren't enough. When he plays cards he has to wear three-part glasses. . . . Another well-known figure, equally modest, describes himself: "Can't act. Slightly bald. Can dance a little." This is Fred Astaire, just past 61.

Probably the most fascinating book about the most fascinating figure in all English literature is The Heart of Hamlet, by Bernard Grebanier (Crowell). No Hamlet lover can afford to miss it.

And here are three fine novels: The Absence of a Cello, by Ira Wallach (Little, Brown), light, witty, sophisticated. . . . The Big Pink Kite, by Clyde Brion Davis (John Day), a lovely quiet turn-of-the-century story about an awfully nice guy. . . . The Sea Change, by Elizabeth Jane Howard (Harper), an English psychological novel, completely absorbing.

And two topnotch thrillers: Gideon's Risk, by J. J. Marric (Harper), another of that matchless series, and Blindfold, by Lucille Fletcher (Random), author of the famous Sorry, Wrong Number.

And the all-important Can This Marriage Be Saved? (Macmillan) by Paul Popenoe and Dorothy Cameron Disney, if you haven't saved the articles from this magazine.

Is America's Moral Code Breaking Down?

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

That the times we live in are immoral or amoral is a commonplace of speech borne out every time we open a newspaper or switch on radio or television for the news. Never has the crime rate been higher, and this is especially true of juvenile crime. One notes one thing about the latter: much of it appears to be completely without motive. When one combines senseless criminality with the enormously high rate of mental cases which fill our hospitals, one gets the notion that a considerable part of the nation, mature and immature, is suffering from nervous or psychic derangement.

The condition is not confined to this country. It is true to greater or lesser degree of all the advanced nations of Europe, and especially of the ones where the standard of living is highest. Although within this country the greatest number of offenders come from adults and youth living in slum or semislum conditions, murder, larceny, rape, vandalism are not confined to such areas. They occur in suburbia and white-spired small towns.

The first great question is, why this alarming breakdown of moral codes?

I should like to suggest that it follows upon a great expenditure of moral passion—perhaps the greatest, in the first half of the twentieth century, that the world has ever known.

It has, so far, been a century of great wars and revolutions each of which has held forth to its participants the promise of a "new and better world."

Modern wars are not fought by professional armies, but by whole peoples. To mobilize them, a moral issue is necessary. A whole population goes to arms to extirpate evil and to make the world "safe for democracy," or establish "the four freedoms."

The greater the idealism, the more ruthless the war. The American Civil War is a case in point. A larger proportion of our population was killed, or died of diseases resulting from it, than in all the rest of our wars put together. Every slave could have been purchased and freed for a fraction of what the war and the awful reconstruction period cost in actual money. But the moral revolt of the abolitionists was such that the end was lost sight of. The wicked slave-owning

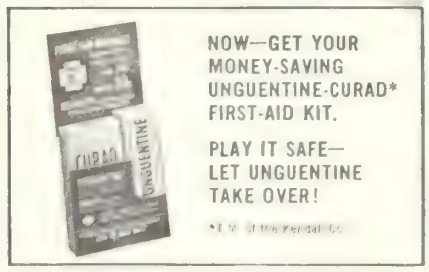
Now science finds Unguentine effective for all kinds of everyday skin injuries!

UNGUENTINE® BOOSTS NATURE'S HEALING POWER as no plain antiseptic can!

1. Nature sends its healing serum to the surface of a skin injury. But tension may keep serum droplets apart. As germs get through, healing slows down!



2. Unguentine instantly spreads this healing serum, creates a protective blanket to lock out germs and to promote healing more effectively than nature itself!

Unguentine gives instant aid to injured skin

Relieves pain, fights germs, promotes healing and forms a protective antiseptic dressing as no cream or liquid can! Nothing's safer for children, the whole family—for all kinds of skin injuries: cuts, scrapes, scratches, burns; painful sunburn, too!

South had to be punished; the evil had to be extirpated in blood; the grapes of wrath had to be trodden.

In World War I the German kaiser became the embodiment of all evil. Unless one goes back to the publications of that day, it is difficult to believe the fervor which made him the object of a moral crusade.

All we had to do was to get rid of the kaiser and democracy would rule, world without end, amen.

The Second World War was even more inflamed with moral passion. Hitlerism, we were taught, was the true and eternal face of Germany. The war had to be fought to unconditional surrender; war criminals put on trial by the victors; the country divided into many separate states (we forget that not only the Russians wanted to dismember Germany); all in order that by the extirpation of the evil nation, peace should reign forevermore.

Enormous faith was placed in the United Nations, especially by the United States. That it was and is merely a standing committee of the states of the world, all operating under the instructions of their separate foreign offices, each concerned with its own real or imagined interests, was lost sight of. It does not represent a "world rule of law," nor would it be possible for its members to agree on the basis for a universal law.

All great revolutions have been sparked by a similar moral fervor. Communism combined the idea of a scientifically planned society with an apocalyptic vision of the coming of heaven on earth, without the aid or intervention of a "mythical" God, and initially it attracted some of the most idealistic youth of Europe and America. It is another of the gods that failed.

Even the Nazi revolution appealed to moral fervor. In the late twenties and early thirties I spent many hours arguing with young Nazis. They were conscious of the very real evils in German society and looked upon National Socialism as a moral crusade to bring about social justice and purify the race and nation. They had come out of the German youth movement and were imbued with its romantic ideals of purity, simplicity, self-sacrifice and devotion.

All their ideals were perverted. To serve the end of creating what they thought would be the perfect Platonic state, any means were adjudged to be "true" and "good." The means (as they always do) determined the ends. Germany became ruled by murderous gangs. Russia became a vast slave camp ruled, during Stalin's later years, by a madman.

Mass moral passions always, I think, have something pathological about them. At any rate, when after a great expenditure of blood, destruction and horror in behalf of a moral crusade the millennium does not dawn, when yesterday's enemies become today's allies and another moral crusade is mounted as a cold war, there follows a period of disillusionment, marked less by immorality than by amorality and nihilism—a distrust of all established values. The whole Western world and, I am sure, the people of the Soviet Union are in that condition today. Then the sole aim of life becomes personal security, personal pleasure, personal success, personal self-indulgence.

In our society self-indulgence is encouraged by the fact that our industries produce more than we can easily consume. In a shortage economy, extravagance is obviously a vice and thrift a virtue. Where the problem is overproduction (or underconsumption), as it is in ours, spending today's dollar and tomorrow's before it is earned keeps up full employment, prevents depression, and leads to an increase of the gross national product, which along with technological advances in armaments has become the test, and apparently the only test, of the strength of a nation.

But the acquisition of things does not bring the anticipated happiness, and debt creates anxiety. In 1958 consumers spent 293 billion dollars, an increase of 120 per cent over 1945. Income, however, had increased by only 75 per cent, and in that period personal debts grew from 55 billion to 240 billion.

Success and status have come to be measured almost entirely in terms of material acquisitions, and quite regardless of the productive effort expended. This undoubtedly has an effect on the morals of youth, who hear every day (and ad nauseam) that ours is the richest nation in history and that these riches have a national and moral value. But the riches are by no means evenly or even equably distributed. Our people pour into the metropolitan areas faster than decent housing can be provided to accommodate them, and millions live in foul slums. Where the quest after material things is the main object of a society, contentment is practically impossible, for there is always something newer and better to be desired.

The disparity between the picture of life as it is painted for us in general and the picture as it appears to hundreds of thousands in particular creates in youth a desire for revenge. They are being deprived, they think, of something which is their "right." This is the evil side of the welfare state, which encourages all to believe in their rights without commensurate responsibilities—and in democracies to believe that they can determine their rights by mass political action. Revenge over frustrated "rights" takes the form of juvenile crime, or the milder misdemeanors of cheating and chiseling which to an appalling extent are treated as matters of course.

Under the influence of sociologists and psychiatrists we have also seen the decline of any absolute moral values. The sociologists are addicted to the statistical method, which leads them to describe as "normal" whatever is widespread. What "everybody is doing" is all right if it does not go too far. The psychiatrists attribute behavior to "trauma" acquired in childhood. Both tend to deprive the individual of responsibility for his own behavior. Many "beatniks" can quite learnedly explain how they came to be "mixed up," as if the explanation justified their behavior.

> Marry a man who is a fortune in himself. Houses, lands and large inheritance are well enough, but the wheel of fortune turns so rapidly that through some investment all these in a few years may be gone. There are some things, however, which are a perpetual fortune—good manners, geniality of soul, kindness, intelligence, sympathy, courage, perseverance, industry and wholeheartedness. Marry such a one and you have married a fortune, whether he has an income now of $50,000 a year or an income of $1000. TALMAGE

But actually it is increasingly difficult for the individual to be responsible for his own behavior. Most of us live not as individuals but as members of organizations which impose their own standards. Workers may think there is neither virtue nor sense in a strike which is, in fact, against the whole economy, resulting in higher prices for everyone, including workers, but the union bosses are stronger than they. A minor executive may have a positive distaste for having his life and the society in which he moves governed by the industry's concept of proper appearances. A teacher may think that a few sharp whacks with a ruler might be the best medicine for a child's unruly behavior. But one holds one's job by conforming to the organization or "cultural pattern." This invariably means a weakening of the moral fiber, an adjustment to the average and mediocre.

I have recently had an opportunity to talk with teenagers and college students about standards of value, posing a single question: "What virtues do you most admire?"

Invariably the leading virtues mentioned were friendliness, kindness and tolerance. A little prodding introduced honesty into the list. Duty was never mentioned, nor were dignity, modesty, perseverance, sincerity. Self-esteem was dismissed as no virtue at all—as equal to arrogance. I had to explain that "self-esteem" was an inhibition within oneself that caused one to maintain certain standards or suffer self-contempt, and was, therefore, a bulwark against temptation. If Charles van Doren had had more self-esteem he would not have been bribed into cheating and lying. But the attitude toward the Van Doren case—and to "payola" in general—was that it was much ado about nothing.

"After all, Van Doren didn't hurt anyone" was a common remark. Of course he did hurt all honest contestants and shook the faith of people around the world in the mores and morals of America.

Friendliness and kindness are certainly virtues. Tolerance, extended to toleration of or indifference to evil, is no virtue at all. And they are not the virtues that build a fortress for the soul, that lead people to make difficult choices and reject for moral reasons what may make them appear to be "different," and even unpopular.

When one thinks of the disillusionments that have followed mass-excited moral passions, and the technological and scientific revolution that has within less than two generations enveloped the whole world, changing all the forms of life and society, morally and intellectually, the wonder is not that human beings, both juvenile and adult, are unstable, but that they are as stable as they are!

Intellectual and moral guidance once came from our teachers, preachers and priests. Today the teacher is enmeshed in administration and the preachers bring less of a message to the individual soul than to the social order in general. Today's guides are the experts and the scientists, who are not concerned with moral values but assume that "progress" is good in and of itself.

Yet even they must question this, as they see that for every problem solved a new one arises. Epidemics are wiped out and the resultant population explosion threatens, we are told, the world's food supply. We are told one day, by one group of experts, that atomic explosions have had no serious effect on the amount of radiation in air, water and soil, and on the next, by another group, that parts of our country are already overradiated. With the expansion of industry our streams (and drinking water) are increasingly polluted with industrial sewage; the air of our car-crowded cities is poisoned with carbon-monoxide gas, our bodies, we are warned, are being chemicalized by poisonous sprays applied to fruits and commercial fertilizers to soil. Penicillin is given to cows to cure infections, but in their milk it causes illness in humans allergic to it. Medical science has prolonged the span of human life by wiping out epidemics, radically lowering infant mortality, and by more skillful surgery, but cancer is on the increase; so are diseases caused by tension.

All the crusades and "isms" of the century have let man down. Science, which involves constant interference with the processes of nature, creates new problems while seeming to solve others, and suggests that nature herself will take her own revenge.

This, then, is the human condition—one of moral and intellectual confusion—as we see it today.

But it is not the whole story

Wherever one looks one can discern alongside amorality and moral indifference a longing for moral regeneration. Americans are flocking into churches as never before; and if they do not always find what they seek, they are searching.

Man has always been a creature with a soul, and as long as we have any records of him he has asserted himself as a subject, not an object to serve the market or respond to psychological conditioning or fit himself into technology or adjust his whole life to a particular groove. He seeks a purpose in his life beyond the immediate, tangible and material, and he gropes for guidance that will help him find such a purpose.

The moral regeneration of a society never starts with masses, but among individuals and small groups. It can start in schools, which make a discussion of ethical values part of daily work and do not omit the more rigorous and austere.

Certainly the only way we shall save freedom, in a world from which it has steadily been retreating, is to make it synonymous with personal and national character. Luxury and ease are not its attendants. They have ever been its enemies. END

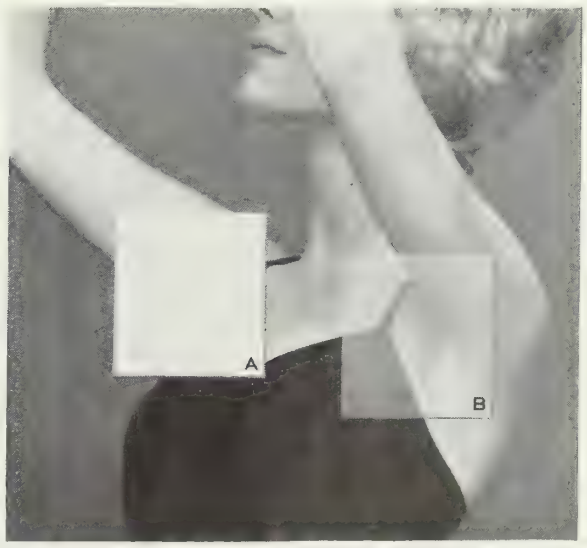
LETS YOUR SKIN "BREATHE"



! More natural protection . . . for the woman who wants to feel free as clean as air! In new formula Mum, Bristol-Myers gives you a way to stop d without "stopping up" pores. Remarkable new Mum does not depend on inum salts. It contains no harsh chemicals. Instead Mum works with hexa- ophene. So gentle, yet it destroys the active cause of odor more effectively.

It's the only leading deodorant that stops odor without "stopping up" pores

Leading medical authorities say that oxygen, carbon dioxide, fluids and other substances pass in and out of the skin. This is what we mean when we say the skin "breathes." All other leading deodorants interfere with the natural "breathing out" process. New Mum works in a different way.

Unlike other leading deodorants—cream or spray, ball-types or pads—new Mum does not interfere with the natural function of the skin. New formula Mum keeps your underarms wonderfully sweet and odor-free without "smothering" your pores. It gives you more natural protection.

New formula Mum lets your skin "breathe" freely, naturally. Nature never intended the pores of the skin to be "stopped up." Yet all other leading deodorants "smother" the normal "breathing out" action of the pores (Illustration A). But new formula Mum stops odor without "stopping up" pores (Illustration B).

Protects you every minute of the day! Even when you're on the go from morning to midnight, new Mum cream keeps on working—doesn't let you down. Effective as it is, new Mum is so safe for normal skin even a "beginning" teen-ager can use it daily. Mum is gentle to delicate underarm tissue—won't cause redness, itching or irritation.

So much softer, fluffier, whiter, new Mum is a pleasure to use. It vanishes the moment you smooth it on. Won't harm delicate fabrics—even cashmere or chiffon.

What You Can Do

By MARGARET HICKEY

No one knows exactly how many children are mistreated every year by sex offenders. Distraught parents, afraid of possible publicity, often help obscure these crimes by refusing to press charges.

But protection of children and effective treatment of offenders will never come about in the shadow of a revulsion so powerful that we turn our backs on the problem. Easy answers don't exist, but there are steps for parents to take.

Do's and Don'ts, such as those featured in the films and poster used by the Junior League of Abilene, Texas (whose program is described this month), stressed firmly and matter-of-factly, can help build into boys and girls one of the best safeguards. "We know such knowledge can save a child," says Mrs. Thomas W. Leach, a founder of the Tulsa, Oklahoma, Citizens' Protective Committee.

Since 1956, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has distributed more than 3,000,000 copies of its "child-molester poster," designed for coloring by youngsters, in response to requests from schools, police departments, citizen organizations, businesses, individuals. In Cincinnati the poster was sent home attached to the report card of every public-school student.

Even more important than posters and films, however, are secure, loving homes, adequate sex education, and citizen willingness to seek better laws, enforcement and treatment.

In Massachusetts, the state Congress of Parents and Teachers, wanting to stop the "revolving door of arrests, releases, offenses," won legislation for a special treatment center, now being built. Joined with others', its interest and efforts have helped provide psychiatric staff for each of the state prisons and the district courts, with diagnostic service available for all kinds of offenders, not just those booked on sex-offense charges.

Elementary-school children view with rapt attention the film "Dangerous Stranger."

If a stranger accosts this schoolgirl she'll know what to do.

Public schools in Abilene, Texas, set up roadblocks for molesters of children

One January afternoon in 1959 a fifth-grade girl was walking home alone from the Anson-Jones elementary school in Abilene, Texas. She lived only a matter of blocks from the school, but the school was in a newly developed part of town, and her way was along a road without sidewalks. A car drew up beside her, a man lowered his window and he called pleasantly, "Want a lift?"

The little girl knew better. She darted like a rabbit off her shoulder of road and into the adjoining field, putting good yards of mud and stubble between her and the driver. Slowly the car moved on.

When the little girl reached home, she told her mother about the incident. Her mother listened attentively, got a description of the car, and went to the telephone at once to notify young Mr. Craver, principal of Anson-Jones.

Mr. Craver had hardly put down his phone when a second call came. A mother of a sixth-grader thought Mr. Craver should know that a stranger had offered her daughter a lift not twenty minutes ago. Fortunately, the girl had quickly caught up with a group of school friends. Both girls' descriptions of the car were the same.

Mr. Craver then made two telephone calls. The first was to the police, who promised action at once. The car shouldn't be hard to spot. Plain-clothes detectives would keep it under surveillance beginning immediately.

The second was one he regarded as almost equally important. It was to Dr. James Roberson, head of the Abilene school system's large audio-visual department. "Hello, Jim," he said. "Remember those films the Junior League sent around last year? The ones warning kids not to go with strangers? I'd like to show my children the younger film again. If possible, starting tomorrow."

The film he was speaking of was Dangerous Stranger, a ten-minute movie designed for elementary-school-age children. It shows a neighborhood policeman joining a group of children in a ball game. In a reasonable, unfrightening voice (every now and then tossing the ball) he warns them against going alone into empty alleys, against hitchhiking or accepting car rides. The warnings apply to boys as well as girls. Highest spots are of a man being satisfyingly thrown out of a movie theater by the scruff of the neck (the little girl had known what to do: call an usher) and a car chase (of course the police catch up with the bad man). But its simple, vivid scenes make an impressive reinforcement for lessons learned at home.

This movie and its companion film, Name Unknown, for junior-high-school age, had recently been made a part of Abilene's school curriculum because a group of women—almost all of them young mothers—had heard of it, been impressed by its possibilities as an educational tool, and then followed through with practical action. The group was Abilene's Junior League. In 1957–58 the League, nine years old, was already well known in the fast-growing city, had won respect through its valuable clearing center for volunteers, its children's theater that staged two plays yearly for 14,000 school children. Its president in the fall of '57 was Mrs. Hudson Smart, slim and hazel-eyed, mother of two.

As president, part of Martha Smart's job was to keep alert to new projects the League might support. Not so long before, she had heard from an out-of-state friend about a "child protection" program against sex molesters that had been launched in several Northern cities. Her friend had spoken with particular enthusiasm of two films that were the basis of an education program in the schools. The memory had stayed sharp with Mrs. Smart, perhaps because of her daughter Marty, then thirteen, and her son Jim, nine. As she planned the year's work ahead with her board members she asked each of them what she thought of bringing the films to Abilene. All were immediately interested. Mrs. Smart next wrote her friend a letter. Did she know where the films could be rented?

The answer was that they couldn't. Every film-rental library was out of them. But Mrs. Smart was tenacious, and her friend offered to lend the League her own copies of the films as soon as they could be spared. Under Martha Smart's direction, the League quickly swung into action. If the films were to become a civic project, they would have to be sold first to school authorities and other interested groups. In view of their controversial subject matter, the wider the support for them, the better.

The League sent out thirty-five invitations to a showing of the films to a wide cross-section of the town. The guest list included school administrators and principals, P.T.A. officers, the chief of police and his juvenile officer, and members of the city government, the school board and the press. Mrs. Smart then went a step further. She went to see Dr. Donald McDonald, Abilene's then director of curriculum for the public schools, whose support would be essential. She told him what the films were about and the large hopes the Junior League had for them. Young Dr. McDonald, father of three children in Abilene schools, pricked up his ears.

The date for the showing was March 15, 1958, but the long-awaited films didn't arrive until the thirteenth. Mrs. Smart says, "We knew they'd won an endorsement from the FBI, but we were still shaking in our boots. We ran them right away—and thank heavens we weren't disappointed."

The League's august audience of fellow townspeople assembled two days later. This "premier" didn't take very long in the darkened auditorium, for the films were short. But Mrs. Smart began to worry. They had been made ten years before. The children looked contemporary, but the cars and women's hair styles looked a little bit dated. Furthermore, the film for junior-high-school youngsters, Name Unknown, packed a more explicit punch than the younger one. Narrated with dignity by a Los Angeles Juvenile Court judge, it cautioned both boys and girls against frequenting lonely lovers' lanes, baby-sitting for strangers, accepting pickups. Mrs. Smart wondered: were that man emerging from behind a bush on the lonely road, that headline screaming of a sex murder, too much to show to youngsters?

When the films were done there was a moment of silence. Then Doctor McDonald rose and said, "I'd like to start Monday morning showing these films to every school in the city." He was followed by Chief of Police Warren Dodson. Chief Dodson knew, perhaps better than anyone there, that the films had shown realities, that a small percentage of parents everywhere are incredibly negligent about teaching their children precautions, that many sex crimes needn't happen. Said he, "These films should be shown to every parent as well."

The cars may have been outdated, but the message evidently was not. Mrs. Smart says, "What a relief! We hadn't been wrong in thinking this was worth while. Now we could go ahead and make it a real project."

All the rest of that spring Dangerous Stranger and Name Unknown circulated among Abilene schools. Showings in nineteen different buildings were held in the first month alone. In between public-school schedules, Abilene's private and parochial schools, P.T.A. and other adult groups were invited to arrange

> The best way to keep good acts in memory is to refresh them with new.
> FRANCIS BACON

showings. League volunteers shuttled the boxed films to and fro, nervously conscious that the films were borrowed in the first place.

By May there was no longer any doubt about whether the films could make a place for themselves. Mrs. Smart says, "We had accumulated praise from principals. Teachers had stopped our volunteers in school corridors to add a good word. Before we elected a new president that month we took a vote at a meeting of the full membership: did we want to make the showing of these films a permanent project? The answer was a unanimous yes."

From now on, new League officers would be handling the films, although as the incoming president insisted, "The credit for their wonderful inauguration goes to Martha."

First, the League purchased for $70 apiece its own copies of the films from the California company that produced them—and thankfully returned the borrowed ones intact. Then they worked out with school officials long-range plans. Lively Ann Murphy (Mrs. James D.) was made the first chairman of the "Child Protection Film Project."

Says young Mrs. Murphy, "Well, I loved it. But we could have done nothing without the really positive interest of the school people. Martha Smart and I—Martha still kept her maternal interest in the films—went down to talk to Doctor Roberson, and he agreed to keep the films permanently in his library. We also talked about methods of showing. Doctor Roberson believes that a film means more when it is shown to a small group, with a discussion period around it. We have never tried to control how the individual teachers and principals manage this, but to encourage classroom discussions I wrote to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which I understood put out a simple drawing for children to color, with four little safety rules at the bottom." She laughs. "I asked for 10,000 drawings—very confidently. The FBI sent only 500 copies, but I got a lovely letter from Mr. J. Edgar Hoover congratulating us on our work. We had the drawings reprinted, and they now go out regularly with the film."

In the last two years the League has built up an extensive program that comes close to its aim: to give every child and parent in Abilene a chance to see the films. They are televised annually. The League will deliver them to any group wishing to show them. They are available to teachers or principals at all times, and regular school showings are being scheduled as well. As Doctor Roberson puts it, "There's a tendency of teachers not to reshow the films; they say, 'We saw them in '58—or last year—we don't need to bother again.' Yet they all believe in repetitive drill in their classwork!" The League believes that annual showings to new first and seventh grades are essential, but not enough. Says Mrs. Smart, "Every child should see them enough times during his twelve school years so that if a stranger makes advances to him his response will be unhesitating and educated. He should know enough not only to refuse but to call that usher or scratch down that license number in the dirt."

What are the results of this program? One is the look of respect on the face of Police Chief Dodson when he speaks of the films. Chief Dodson says, "We've never had a really bad problem. For us, this League program is a prevention, not a cure."

Comparative figures are hard to pin down in Abilene, which is growing at a rate of about 10 per cent a year. In 1950 its population was 45,000; today it is estimated at over 80,000—a small city with a city's crime problems. Yet its annual total of all sex crimes has remained about twenty for the last several years. And Chief Dodson says earnestly, "The number of children molested by strangers has definitely dropped since the League program began."

Chief Dodson, who took office in 1957, is a burly-chested graduate of the tough FBI school for police chiefs, but his basic attitude is, "The citizens are the police; we can only enforce what they want." Abilene citizens have long wanted good civic care taken of their children. Chief Dodson has a specially trained juvenile officer on his staff; a young "youth counselor" under the probation department helps youngsters keep out of trouble. Last winter police and citizens co-operated in a broad drive against pornography. (As one officer put it, "The League helped stimulate us all.") The police department has one main message for all Abilene children: "A policeman is always a friend."

If Chief Dodson supports such things, it is because he knows that some of the most brutal crimes on police records have happened to children. Then he gets to the heart of the matter, which faces law-enforcement officers, parents and every interested citizen the country over: "No, we haven't solved the problem of what to do with our perverts. No sir, I don't know who has. If the offense is minor, they get committed to the state hospital for ninety days, but no special treatment is given to them there. They're turned loose to do the same again, or a lot worse. This is why prevention is doubly important. As long as we simply cast these people back on society, educating our children is about the only weapon we have. I am one hundred per cent in favor of these films."

What do the children think of the films? Last year when Dangerous Stranger was recalled to Anson-Jones school, a third-grade room taught by a pretty young teacher named Miss Gay was among those who saw it in small groups. Miss Gay remembers, "They were just as quiet during the showing. You could tell the movie was touching on things they had thought about—perhaps had half-hidden fears about.

"No, I didn't have a single child who seemed to be made unduly anxious by it. What it did, after we got back to our home room, was release a lot of talk. Some of the children quoted what their mommies or daddies had told them. Others wanted to talk about it a lot—and these were the ones I felt hadn't talked about it enough at home. One of the children said, 'Let's draw the part we liked best.' So we did. Oh—the bad men in those pictures! They were done in black or deep-purple crayon and were simply loaded with guns. But I tell you what I think. I think any stranger who tried to pick up one of my third-graders—even if he offered a whole candy store full of candy—would have a tough time. I think every one of them would know exactly what to do." END

4-Decker Fruit Tart... new "what-to-serve" for a party, and so spectacular made with Del Monte Fruit Cocktail!

Make this version for fancy affairs—other times, skip the pastry and serve the filling as a pudding. The color and flavor of DEL MONTE Fruit Cocktail will make it a sparkling success either way.

DEL MONTE Fruit Cocktail shines just as brightly whether you use it in a recipe or spoon it straight from the can. Families welcome its happy colors, neat cuts and ideal flavor balance every time—in appetizers, salads, desserts. No wonder it's America's favorite!

4-DECKER FRUIT TART

From pastry dough based on 3 cups flour, roll out 4 10-in. rounds. Place on baking sheets or backs of 9-in. cake tins; fold under ½ in. around edges; flute. Prick well; bake in hot oven (475° F.) 8 to 10 min., till golden brown. Chill.

To make filling use following ingredients:

- 1 can (1 lb. 14 oz.) DEL MONTE Brand Fruit Cocktail, drained
- 2 envelopes unflavored gelatine
- ¾ cup sugar
- ½ teaspoon salt
- 1 cup syrup from fruit cocktail
- 3 eggs, separated
- 1 pint dairy sour cream
- 1 teaspoon grated lemon peel
- ¼ cup lemon juice
- ½ teaspoon almond extract

In saucepan, mix gelatine, ½ cup of the sugar, salt; add syrup and slightly beaten egg yolks. Cook and stir over moderate heat till thickened. Pour into large bowl; beat in sour cream. Add peel, juice, extract and 2 cups of the drained fruit cocktail. Chill, stirring occasionally, till consistency of soft whipped cream. Beat egg whites till foamy; gradually add remaining ¼ cup sugar, beating till firm peaks form. Fold into fruit mixture. Spread first pastry layer evenly with ¼ mixture; top with second layer and repeat as shown. Decorate with remaining DEL MONTE Fruit Cocktail; chill several hours. Serves 8 to 10.

Tell me, doctor...

There are many questions which women would like to ask a trusted physician, but there is not always the opportunity. In this series, Tell Me, Doctor, Doctor Schauffler discusses some of the problems which have been sent to him by readers. The situations are all real, but all the names used are fictitious.

"What's this Rh business going to do to our baby, Doctor? I want you to tell me frankly just what it is that we're facing, so that I can be the most help to my wife when the time comes."

"This is Dick Evans, Doctor. Marjorie Evans' husband." The voice on the phone sounded agitated. "Marjorie said you wanted me to go to the laboratory, let them take a sample of my blood to test. So I did. But when I called them just now to see what they had found out, they wouldn't tell me. What is this all about?"

ABBOT MILLS

"Nothing to be particularly excited over, Mr. Evans. We took a sample of your wife's blood on her first prenatal visit. She proved to be Rh negative. So we needed to find out whether you are Rh positive or negative. The laboratory report is on my desk right now. You are Rh positive. Yes, I'm afraid that means Rh incompatibility. I was planning to ask you to come in with Marjorie on her next visit, so we could talk it all over together."

There was a shocked exclamation. Then Dick Evans asked slowly, "Look, Doctor, before you say anything to Marjorie, could I talk to you? Alone?"

"Certainly." The doctor glanced at his engagement pad. "I see that we've had a cancellation. Would you like to come in an hour from now?"

"I certainly would, Doctor. Thanks a lot!" The receiver at the other end went down before the doctor could say anything more.

An hour later a prepossessing young man with tousled hair and a grim, set expression on his face was shown into the doctor's consulting room. "It's like this," Dick Evans said. "I figured that if you talk to Marjorie and me together, you will quote a lot of reassuring statistics, paint a rosy picture. That's what I want you to do—to Marjorie, that is. She has been the happiest girl in the world since she found out we're going to have a baby. I want her to stay that way just as long as she can. But I want you to give me the straight goods about what's ahead of us so I can be ready to be the most help to Marjorie when the time comes."

"I'll be glad to discuss the situation with you, as freely and frankly as you like. But honestly, Dick, there is very little to be concerned about in your case. I was going to tell you that when you rang off."

"I was pretty excited," Dick said apologetically. "I'll tell you why. One of the men in my office has a child in an institution—result of the Rh factor. It has come close to making his wife a mental case too."

"Tragedies still result from Rh incompatibility, in spite of the great advances that have been made in the last fifteen years or so," the doctor acknowledged. "But they aren't nearly as common as we used to think, and the great bulk of them can be avoided today with proper care. Suppose I tell you first of all why I believe there is little reason to worry about the baby Marjorie is carrying right now. Just how much do you know about the Rh factor, by the way?"

"I know it can cause a lot of trouble for the babies when a man and woman with opposite Rh factors happen to marry. But just how and why it comes about—I guess I'm pretty vague about that."

"It's true, as you say, that positive and negative Rh factors are antagonistic to each other, just as certain other blood types are antagonistic to each other. The Rh factor is transmitted by the father. So if an Rh-negative woman marries an Rh-positive man, their offspring will have to be Rh positive. Or so we have thought, until rather recently.

"The trouble comes, if it does, when some of the Rh-positive factor in the baby's blood gets across the placenta and mingles with the mother's Rh-negative blood. Substances we call antibodies develop in the mother's blood to fight off the invasion. If this sensitized blood crosses the placenta in its turn, and mingles with the baby's blood, the antibodies then attack the red corpuscles in the baby's blood. Is it clear so far?"

"Yes. Just what does this do to the baby?"

"With a first baby, there is almost never any difficulty. But in many instances, each succeeding pregnancy with an Rh-positive baby increases the amount of antibody in the mother's blood. We call this the antibody titer. After the titer reaches a certain concentration, it can bring about a disease in the baby called erythroblastosis. The baby is made anemic through destruction of its red blood cells. There is nearly always liver damage, probably caused by toxic products from the destroyed cells. And since it is the red cells that carry oxygen, there may also be damage to the baby's brain, due to oxygen deprivation. Unless, that is to say, the condition is corrected very quickly.

"In fact, before we learned to remove the baby's damaged blood in more serious cases and replace it with good, whole blood, erythroblastosis often was fatal. But the point of severe damage or death was seldom reached before the third or maybe the fourth baby of an Rh-incompatible couple, even in that day."

Young Mr. Evans was frowning. "It seems to me that this child I was telling you about, the one that is brain-damaged, was their first baby. Yes, I'm sure it was. How do you account for that?"

"There are several possible explanations. The wife might have been given a transfusion, or transfusions, of Rh-positive blood at some previous time. That would start the development of antibodies in her blood. In that case her first pregnancy—with an Rh-positive baby, that is—could raise them to the danger level. Another possibility is that it might not have been the wife's first pregnancy, even though it was the first by her present husband.

"For some reason or other, there must have been a fairly strong build-up of antibodies in her blood before she entered upon this particular pregnancy. But Marjorie has no antibodies in her blood. Her titer shows that. And if you will permit me just one little statistic, the chances are nineteen out of twenty that you and Marjorie will have no trouble from the Rh factor at any time."

"How do you figure that?"

"Because it is now stated reliably that only one out of twenty Rh-incompatible couples will have a baby who develops erythroblastosis. Why, Dick, I have had Rh-incompatible couples in my own practice who had as many as four, even five, babies without a sign of erythroblastosis. In many cases, the baby's Rh factor never seems to get across the placenta. In others, antibodies develop in the mother's blood, but don't seem to get back across the placenta. There is still another possibility. Your baby may not be Rh positive. It may be Rh negative like its mother. Though that's something we can't know about until it is born."

Dick Evans frowned again. "I don't understand. Doctor. If, as you say, the baby gets its Rh factor from me, and I'm Rh positive ——"

"But you may be heterozygous!" There was a twinkle in the doctor's eye.

Dick gave a low whistle. "They certainly picked tough names for this Rh business! What does that last one mean, in plain English?"

"It is one of the newer wrinkles in this Rh business, as you call it. We know now that a certain number of men have the ability to transmit either the positive or the negative Rh element to their offspring. This is a matter of tiny particles called zygotes. Men who can transmit either factor are therefore called heterozygous. Men who transmit only one element are called homozygous."

"What did my blood test say about me in that respect?"

"It's pretty hard to tell about this for sure from a blood test. But if your baby should prove to be Rh negative, then we will know that you are heterozygous. In that case, further babies might be Rh negative too."

"This is all very interesting, Doctor. But suppose I'm not hetero—— whatever you call it. Suppose the baby is Rh positive. Suppose its blood does get across the placenta and the antibodies start building up in Marjorie's blood. Can you do something to stop them?"

"Not at present. A number of scientists are working very hard to find a way of immunizing the mother's blood against the antagonistic factor in the baby's blood. When they find it—and I believe they will—the Rh threat can be done away with entirely. Unfortunately, that time hasn't come. But today we can keep track of what is going on. Throughout her pregnancy, and any succeeding ones, we will be testing Marjorie's blood. If the titer rises to dangerous levels, we will be prepared to start exchange transfusion after the baby is born. At the first moment it becomes evident transfusion is needed."

"That sounds good, Doctor. But the child I told you about had transfusions. They didn't keep its brain from being damaged."

"Of course I don't know what the circumstances were in that particular case. But we doctors are learning more about erythroblastosis all the time. Naturally, we don't want to subject a newborn baby to anything as drastic as an exchange transfusion unless it is necessary. Undoubtedly there have been cases where transfusion was started too late to prevent lasting injury.

"Nowadays, though, we have much more reliable tests to guide us in assessing the baby's condition than we used to have. We start testing as soon as the baby is born, by taking blood from the umbilical cord. First we find out whether the baby is Rh positive or negative. If it is Rh positive, we can apply a test which tells us whether or not antibodies in the mother's blood have mingled with the baby's blood. And if they have, there is still another test which tells us how much damage is being done to the baby's red cells. It enables us to start exchange transfusion before harm has been done."

"Are you saying that today, if all doctors are on the job, there needn't be any deaths or damage from the Rh factor?"

"No, I can't say that. We have found no way yet to prevent harm to a baby while it is still in the womb, when a mother's antibody titer has become extremely high. Nowadays, though, these cases appear mostly when couples have disregarded a warning against any more pregnancies."

"You mean a doctor can tell when a further pregnancy might raise the titer so high it would damage the baby in the womb?"

"Exactly. And the parents should be told. That is the best we can do under present circumstances."

"I appreciate your frankness, Doctor. I believe you now when you say there is no particular need to worry about this first baby of ours. But I still don't like to think of Marjorie's having to sweat it out for seven months, before we find out for sure. She knows that something is up, because of my blood test. Couldn't you tell her it was a false alarm?"

"Dick, I want to say in my turn that I appreciate your concern for Marjorie. It does you credit. I've given you the gloomier side, since you wanted it straight from the shoulder. The encouraging side is that when Rh babies are born alive and are not already badly damaged, their outlook today is close to one hundred per cent. Not just to survive, but to be completely normal.

"But there are incalculable factors in the way Rh antagonism may operate. The great advance that has been made in saving these babies comes from the fact that parents, as well as doctors, have been alert, have followed through faithfully. I've already mentioned the blood samplings we must take throughout Marjorie's pregnancy. If there is the slightest chance that the baby may become erythroblastotic after it is born, Marjorie shouldn't go to just any hospital. She should go to a hospital where there will be blood available at all times for transfusions—and the right kind of blood for her baby. It's not easy to find, there may be an unusual demand. Not all hospitals keep it in regular supply.

"There must be staff people who are trained to carry out the tests I mentioned. The hospital must be equipped to give the delicate exchange transfusions in the right way, if transfusions are needed. Of course doctors should see to these things. Nevertheless, it might be wise for the parents of a possible Rh baby to make some pretty sharp inquiries in advance as to what would be available in case of trouble. A hospital underprivileged in any of these respects is not a satisfactory place for childbirth, when there is a chance that erythroblastosis may develop.

"There is another thing. Marjorie needs to know the situation for her own sake. If her blood should become sensitized by an Rh-positive pregnancy and she were mistakenly given an Rh-positive blood transfusion at some future time, the reaction might be very bad. Even fatal."

"I didn't know that!"

"It's true. And so vital a point that we doctors give these women a card to carry at all times, stating the facts. Dick, I don't believe Marjorie is as fragile as you think. I believe that if erythroblastosis should develop in a baby of yours, you'll both be glad we were alerted and prepared. If it doesn't, you'll be extra happy because the worry was needless! That's the way I've seen it work with countless Rh-incompatible couples.

"Why don't you come in with Marjorie just the same, when I break the news to her? I believe you will find I'm right."

Next month Dr Schauffler will discuss breast lumps, and what to do about them

GIFT OF THE SUN

By ELIZA LOUISA DAWSON

By the little shack is the sweet fern
Tangled with black ivy berries; and wild fireweed
Grows where the old stable burned. The fences
Are down and grass is deep and green.

The day, with its quill-blue sky and gulls, shall pass
As the ones when the house was gay, the leghorn flocks
Cackling. And offered again with roses
In a Georgian breadbasket the memory of a sunny day.

FEMS IS A TRADEMARK OF KIMBERLY-CLARK CORP.

Now! A better-fitting napkin you can wear and forget!

You're carefree for an evening on the town, with Fems feminine napkins. The fit, absorbency and comfort of your napkin depends on having enough length for proper adjustment. Fems fit better and absorb better because they're long enough to fit securely. Yet there's not an ounce of extra bulk.

How your napkin stays put even under stress, thanks to the extra length of the tab ends. What a feeling of security!

Forget about stains. Wear your nicest things; there's a protective safety-fashion in Fems to prevent accidents, whether you're seated or moving about.

Forget about shifting and binding. Better-fitting Fems feminine napkins are made to adjust to your body without discomfort—no matter how active you may be. Now you can move freely through your most strenuous day.

Forget about chafing. Touch the chafe-free covering of a Fems napkin to the inside of your wrist, where your skin is extra sensitive. No wonder Fems bring welcome relief from chafing.

Fems absorb quickly. That's another protection against chafing. And both the covering and inner materials are designed to keep surfaces comfortably dry, even during the heaviest flow.

New Fems belt! The long-wearing elastic won't curl or cut. The modern slip-proof nylon clasp won't dig or break. Try a Fems belt with Fems to see how freedom feels!

DO YOU AGREE?

How long should a honeymoon be? I say a month, but John says a week.

Few honeymoons should extend longer than ten days or two weeks.

ASK YOURSELF:

Am I at Odds With My Daughter?

Many mothers worry about their teenage daughters and are distressed by their negative attitudes and undesirable ways of behaving. If you have a daughter of 14 to 16, answering these questions may help you see how she compares with other girls of her age and improve your understanding.

At times, does your daughter:

1. Flatly disregard your wishes?
2. Date boys of whom you disapprove?
3. Act rudely or disrespectfully?
4. Dress carelessly or in poor taste?
5. Have trouble with her teachers?
6. Deliberately deceive you?
7. Keep unreasonable, indiscreet hours?

Does she usually:

8. Do her share of home chores?
9. Take pride in her appearance?
10. Discuss her plans in advance with you?
11. Telephone when she will be late?
12. Get along well with her father?
13. Take real interest in her schoolwork?
14. Confide freely and frankly in you?

For each "No" answer to the first seven questions and for each "Yes" answer to the last seven, credit 1 point. If the total score is 11 or more, your daughter compares very favorably to other girls her age. (An average score is 9 or 10.) With a total of 8 or less, [illegible] trouble—either with her or with your training of her. Before discussing the situation with her, see what you can do to improve the relationship between you.

REPEATED ARGUMENTS CORRODE LOVE

"When Roy and I were married a year ago, I didn't dream two average people could be so different. There's nothing we agree on. We don't like the same food or TV programs; I like to dance, he hates it; he is a bridge fiend and I have no card sense. We tolerate these differences because we are still deeply in love, but when we talk about them we end up fighting. We both give in at times, but this constant bickering hurts our marriage. It will get worse now that I'm pregnant. We have firecracker tempers, so it's no use telling one of us to keep cool while the other blows his top. Is there any hope for us?"

No husband and wife, nor any two human beings, can expect to live together in unfailing agreement. When you consider the differences between men and women, biologically, temperamentally, and in responsibilities and circumstances, it is surprising that the typical young couple adapt to each other as well as they do.

Nevertheless, the young wife who wrote to us has cause for concern. There is indeed hope for her and her husband, because they recognize the danger; because they appreciate the need of compromise ("we both give in at times") and because they still love each other.

But note that word still. Repeated arguments ending in quarrels have a corrosive effect on love. She will do well to think out a program of corrective action and adopt it now. So will any young wife whose disagreements with her husband too frequently lead to quarrels.

These suggestions are certain to produce improvement if followed faithfully and with good will.

Recognize the danger signals. Has he had a hard day? Is he short on sleep, upset by an unexpected bill or an unwelcome social engagement, or just edgy? If so, a trifle may set off an explosion. Be on guard; avoid controversial topics; suggest some diversion; and count ten! And be just as alert to your own "storm warnings" as to his.

Choose a favorable time for discussing an issue that must be resolved. When something disturbs either or both of you, suggest waiting a bit to talk about it—until you've had dinner, or he's put the car away, or while you make coffee. The postponement will create a chance for tempers to cool, emotions to settle, thoughts to clear.

Consider the facts. Before discussing the matter, gather all the facts (not arguments) available to you. Did you exceed your food allowance? You may have reasons he doesn't know—extra entertaining, a chance to take advantage of specials. You may simply have miscalculated. Whatever the explanation, tell him honestly, but without trying to justify your action. And listen while he tells you what he knows of the situation. So long as either has information unknown to the other, you will be talking at cross purposes.

Agree on the facts. It isn't enough simply to recite the circumstances. Review together the information step by step. Establish the accuracy and relevance of each statement before going on to the next. Avoid discussing feelings and emotions except as necessary to understand the facts. And don't confuse the issue by referring to some earlier dispute or grievance—stick to the matter at hand.

Once you agree on the facts, many problems seem to solve themselves, because the answer becomes obvious. But if the issue remains unresolved, a final step remains:

Reach a compromise. This may be the time to give in. If the matter is vital to your husband, and of minor concern to you, by all means yield to him. But if you are both affected equally, each must concede on some points. The time-honored technique of "give and take" is invaluable here.

Abide by the decision. Once a settlement is agreed upon, stick to it, cheerfully and wholeheartedly, without reproaches or afterthoughts. Probably neither of you will be fully satisfied—but how often do both parties to a dispute get all they want, in any field? You have nothing to gain by reopening the discussion, and much to lose by shirking the bargain.

Many wives instinctively adopt a program like this. But opinionated, argumentative or hot-tempered individuals will have to make a deliberate effort. One couple, utterly unable to talk about a disagreement without getting into a fight, finally tried the counselor's last-resort suggestion of writing out what they wanted to say. It worked! After a few of these literary exchanges, they were able to discuss their problems peacefully. It wasn't easy, but it was worth the trouble. You will find it so as well.

LITTLE AMENITIES

"My husband says I'm too much of a stickler for manners, that I fuss too much over trifles, and that when I 'gush' over people I sound insincere. To me, small courtesies are important, and compliments can't do any harm. He's as polite as most husbands, in public, but I wish he were more mannerly at home. He's never really rude or unkind, but he overlooks little things that make life pleasant. Is it asking too much for him to help me with my coat, or to open the car door for me? Don't think we're unhappy—we're not—but this is a bone of contention. I feel that he should be just as polite and considerate when we are alone as when other people are around. He says that formality at home is phony and that I am a perfectionist and make everything a production. Which of us is right?"

Probably both are right, up to a point. She may be justified in thinking that her husband is too casual, if not actually negligent, in his behavior toward her when they are alone. Many husbands are. On the other hand, he may be justified in thinking that she makes too much of a fuss about trifles, about matters that have more to do with superficial appearances than with genuine courtesy. Many wives do.

In any event, this husband and wife, or any other couple, might find ways of making life more comfortable and agreeable if they spent a little time in analyzing the true basis of good manners. And parents who are concerned about their children's deportment might find clues to improvement by reviewing their own standards, and considering the example they set.

Kindness is fundamental. The wife who wrote us says her husband is never unkind. If so, she is fortunate, and he is a gentleman. For all good manners are based on kindness, or the ability to put the comfort, convenience and pleasure of others ahead of one's own. A kind remark, however crudely stated, can never be ill-mannered; a kind action may be unconventional, but it cannot be impolite.

Consideration, graciousness, generosity, appreciation—all are attributes of good manners, and all are aspects of kindness. The truly well-mannered person will also be self-forgetful, unassuming, unpretentious; will show respect to superiors and inferiors; toward those older and those younger. He (or she) will have too much self-respect to be servile in any company, but he will not let false pride prevent him from trying to adapt his speech and behavior to those of the ones around him.

The individual who genuinely and sincerely observes these principles will never disgrace himself—or his wife—by a breach of etiquette. He may commit a minor blunder, like using the wrong fork or performing a clumsy introduction, but he will not insult or hurt anyone.

This is not to belittle the forms and ceremonies of correct social behavior. The accepted rules—governing the use of silver, the form of introduction, the writing of thank-you notes—are based on common sense and consideration for others. To refuse to learn them and observe them is a form of arrogance and therefore, in itself, of bad manners.

By the same token, little amenities are important, because they reflect concern for the comfort and pleasure of another. Few wives need their husband's help to put on their coats, but they appreciate the gesture quite as much as they appreciate his carrying in the groceries.

Many a husband obscures major virtues by neglecting minor attentions. If your husband is one of these, be thankful for his good qualities—but showing your gratitude for any little courtesy he extends will encourage repetition.

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

I can hear the Duke of Edinburgh say to the Queen of England, "Let's have your brother-in-law over for Sunday dinner so he can snap some pictures of the baby at six months crawling on the palace lawn."

My loyal Dream Girl has invested some of her grocery money in a book called The Slim Gourmet. "You've lost twenty pounds," she decrees, "and I intend to keep you that way; fewer groceries, but tastier."

I've told three auto dealers I'd like for my next car a four-door automatic convertible. But they don't pay much attention; they think Detroit knows what's best for me.

My wife and I were first in our neighborhood to read two new best sellers by two famous novelists. We told our friends they were both tripe, and so far eleven different people want to borrow 'em.

Our most lovable bore is the baldish plumpy so comical about your waistline and his, and who notes you're both losing your hair. "Wanna weigh?" retorts a taut chum. "Wanna count hairs?"

In wooing, confirms a Japanese tale my young flyer sent me, it's often what's left unsaid that's the most fragrant bouquet.

Our town's most extravagant wife is aghast at a $1.50 bill for cleaning a pair of gloves. "Why," she exclaims, "I can save money by buying new ones!"

My favorite fourteen-year-old in our block resents adults blaming teenagers for all sins. "How do they know," he protests, "that it wasn't a kid of twelve or a college boy of twenty who stole the governor's hubcaps?"

After years of disdain, my Lady Love at last concedes the new artificial flowers aren't too dreadful. She even put a sprig of phony lily of the valley on my desk during the final snowstorm.

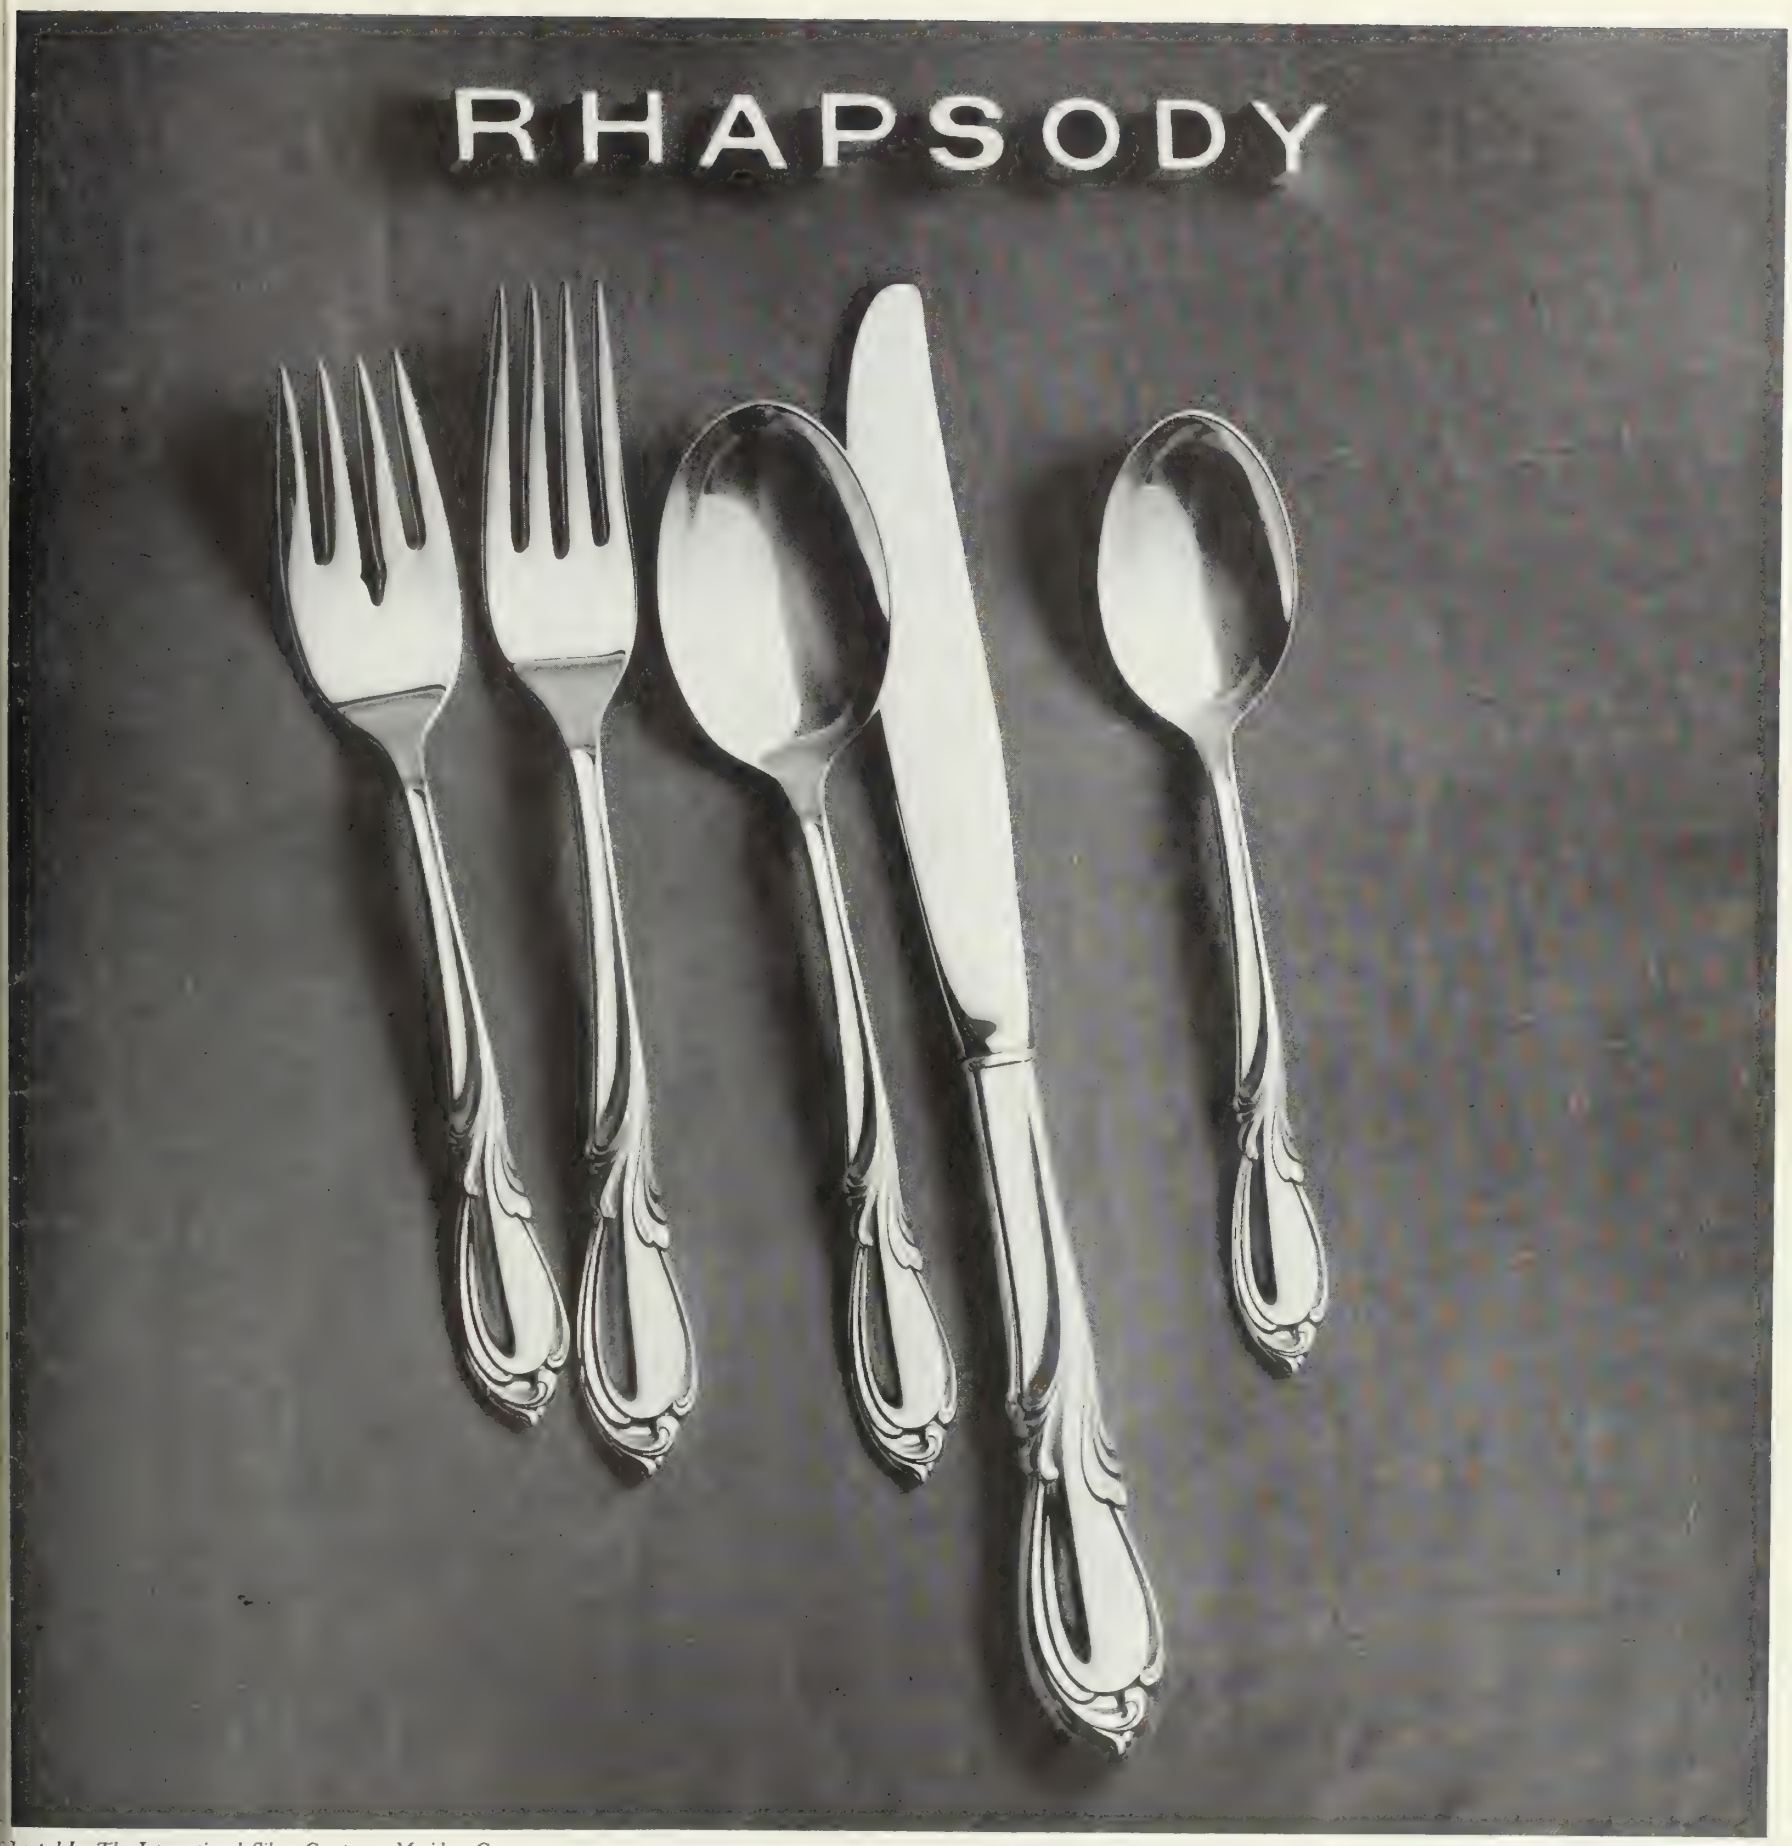
One of our cleverer young mothers taped her young daughter's yak-yak on the phone, to cure her. . . . Then her husband used the strategy on her thirty-minute chats. Both are half cured.

Our volunteer Autocrat of the Lunch Table has a new theory about why unlucky husbands die eight or ten years too soon: Wifely melodrama and exaggeration take the steam out of 'em, and they just wilt.

So far the new flower boxes on our downtown sidewalks haven't thrived. We're trying to incite brave-new-world rivalry among bevies of the green-thumb girls to tend 'em more expertly.

"If our wives suspected our bitter struggle downtown," muses Peter Comfort self-pityingly, hosing the garage floor, "they'd reduce the pressure and be sweeter!"

I've rescued a few rock-garden rocks from fifty foreign lands, and mementos from the fifty states and countless counties, and we're carving 'em into bookends. My new theory: scatter relevant books around the house like bunches of posies.



My stop watch caught my wife's chum monopolizing conversation with two hours of nonstop chatter. When interrupted she's graciously irked, but barges on bravely.

I've vowed not to play such sloppy golf this summer. I'll concentrate on each stroke and shoot a few 80's. If not, I can always return to dub tennis and my ball thrower.

My son and pals at the university rebel against hints that their quarters be inspected weekly by ROTC officers. Or how about letting coeds do it, with wrinkled noses?

My candidate for brave-new-world husband: he installs a washer and dryer in the bathroom so he can ensconce a tennis table or darts in the liberated laundry room.

When I get a fantastic scrawl from five-year-old Pat, his first letter,
. . . Or all our young ones forgive us for our riotous nude baby snapshots of 'em,
. . . And Junior snapshots the stone house where we lived when he was seven,
. . . Or our youngest urges me to see a new highbrow play in New York,
. . . And my Lady Love, when I stub my toe on it, says, "O'd rocking chair's got him"
Then I relish keenly the wild-herb and tame-garden-flower flavors of marriage:
more variety than a delicatessen.

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

"Our size and shape are largely determined by the genes we inherited at the moment we were conceived. But if children play outdoors regularly they will develop their muscles and vigor and posture to the degree that is expected by Nature."

Are our children getting enough exercise?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

SUZANNE SZASZ

"What can parents do to foster good physical development in their children?" the editors asked me. Other people are raising the question, too, now that physical educationists warn us that American children, whom we have liked to think of as the healthiest in the world, are actually lagging behind the young people of many other countries in their fitness.

The readiest explanation is that many of our children aren't getting much exercise any more. In simpler days they walked to school or wherever else they were going. Now they are taken by car or bus. In their free time they used to be actively playing, and they usually preferred to be racing around outdoors because there was so much more freedom and company there. Now television lures the young ones in and sits them down, for hours and hours every week. Some have the regular privilege of sitting all Saturday afternoon in the movies too.

The character of the bony framework inside each of us—whether heavy- or light-boned, whether broad-shouldered or slender, whether tall or short, whether pleasingly shaped in the face—is mainly determined by the genes we happened to inherit from our various ancestors at the moment we were conceived. A serious chronic illness or a drastic emotional strain in the family or a severe restriction of diet may slow down the growth of a child in height, but only to a moderate extent. Such misfortunes as these do not touch the great majority of American children.

The size and shape of the muscles that are attached to our bones are also largely determined by the germ cells which made each of us. To be sure, the amount of exercise we give to different muscles will influence their size to a degree. The ballet dancer's calves and thighs are slightly larger because of her hours of work each day. The eager boy who is exercising with dumbbells can increase the circumference of his biceps enough to measure the difference. But still there are ballerinas and figure skaters with slender legs. And the stringy youth who hopes to make his body a solid mass of lumps, like the strong man in the body-building advertisements, is doomed to disappointment. Another adolescent who has never made much of an effort in sport or hard labor may end up with a well-muscled body.

When it comes to the amount of soft tissue ("fat" is such an ugly word) which is distributed through the different zones of the body, it is probable that the strongest determining factor is the genes with which the individual is endowed (or handicapped) at conception. Dr. William Sheldon and his colleagues, who developed the system of body description called somatotyping, believe they would be able to recognize the bodily proportions of a person who was born with a natural tendency to be obese even if he were emaciated from starvation at the moment when they happened to measure him. The "endomorphs," the people of the extreme type who have the greatest liability to put on extra fat (in contrast to the extremely heavy-boned, heavy-muscled people, the "mesomorphs," and the extremely narrow, slender people, the "ectomorphs") are large and round in the middle, but have "ham-shaped" limbs which taper down to small hands and feet. Of course most of us are not predominately one or another type but have some combination of these three tendencies. Men on the average have more of the mesomorph in them and women have more of the endomorph.

But parents and doctors and physical educators have always known that many individuals don't maintain the same amount of fat all their lives. Dr. Sheldon noted that most individuals, whether fat or lean, come as close to ideal as possible at the beginning of adulthood, perhaps because Nature conspires to aid romance. The individual with a tendency to plumpness frequently shows it in the preadolescent period, becomes somewhat slenderer in adolescence, then begins to put on weight again in the 20's and 30's.

There are certainly environmental and emotional factors which affect a child's state of nutrition. In many parts of the world there are various kinds of malnutrition, because parents can't procure or don't know the right dietary essentials, but there is much less excuse for this in our country.

Probably the commonest type of unnatural thinness in America is caused by a chronic feeding problem. It most frequently starts when the child is going through a phase of picky eating at one or two years of age, or after an illness.

This creates anxiety and frustration in any mother who is not casual by nature. But the more she frets or cajoles or forces, the more it lowers her child's appetite and increases his obstinacy. It's a vicious circle all right, most prevalent here where food is plentiful and where mothers are conscientious in providing a well-balanced diet.

This kind of feeding problem keeps thousands of American children thinner than they would be otherwise. It is particularly likely to occur in those families in which the mother was herself a very poor eater in childhood. The worry about sufficient intake gets passed from generation to generation, and creates the very condition which it is trying to prevent. I mention it first because it shows the futility of trying to improve a child's physical development by anxious persuasion.

Another type of unnaturally thin child is the one whose constant nervous tension uses up an excessive amount of energy (and often holds down appetite at the same time). One such child is an unhappy worrier, but another may be a cheery dynamo.

Emotional factors can lead to overfeeding too. Though most of the children whose mothers are urging food will react with poor appetite and balkiness, a few submit docilely to stuffing and become fatter and fatter. You'd think that a mother who was forcing food because she has a deep anxiety about nutrition would be able to relax as soon as she saw the child becoming overweight. But, as the unhappy parent who has this worry knows, the fear persists, and she may even bring her obese child to a doctor still complaining that he doesn't eat enough.

Overeating may result from emotional factors in the individual himself, whether child or adult. There is the person who has never developed much independence or initiative but, like a baby, continues to get his main security from eating and being cared for by others. And there are quite a few people who notice that whenever life presents disappointments—in friendships or romance or work—their appetites and their weights go up. Overweight, however it starts, becomes a vicious circle, because it creates self-consciousness, restricts social life, increases unhappiness, and thus may lead to greater appetite. Obesity also decreases exercise and thereby conserves calories.

The different effects of emotional tension on nutrition once struck me most dramatically in the case of two excessively rivalrous brothers. The older boy was an unhappy person who was resentful toward all the other members of his family, had no friends, withdrew into himself. He was fat. The young one was sociable, tense, overactive, and insisted on every single privilege the older one had. He was thin. Because the older one was so miserable at home, it was eventually decided to send him to a very understanding boarding school. There he made an excellent adjustment, and in four months, without dieting, he lost twelve pounds. The thin one became much more relaxed at home and gained eight pounds in the same period.

The term "physical fitness" is used by physical educationists to cover a variety of traits such as strength, endurance, posture, skill and grace.

Strength has to be considered in relation to different parts of the body. A long, lanky individual may have strong legs for running and jumping and yet be so slender in the arms that he can barely "chin" himself once. (I feel sympathetic with these boys, who always get laughed at in a gym class, because I could never chin myself or do push-ups.) A weight lifter has to have a heavy, well-muscled body to start with, ever to be really good.

Regular exercise will increase the strength of any set of muscles to a considerable degree, but it won't change a person who is muscularly inadequate for some sport into a champion. And muscles which have acquired additional strength by deliberate exercise will lose part of this as soon as the exercise is abandoned.

> Refuse to be ill. Never tell people you are ill; never own to it yourself. Illness is one of those things which a man should resist on principle at the outset.
> WILLIAM HENRY BULWER-LYTTON

Endurance is even more dependent on exercise than is strength. Endurance comes partly from the strengthening and conditioning of the body muscles that are being used in a particular sport or work, and partly from the strengthening of the heart and breathing muscles that will improve the transportation of oxygen and carbon dioxide. Endurance, too, will promptly decrease as soon as vigorous exercise is given up.

It's disappointing, isn't it, to realize that strength and endurance will diminish when not being regularly called upon. But this is only the reverse side of our bodies' marvelous ability to respond to need. They are ingeniously adaptable in so many respects. They adjust to cold climates by learning to conserve heat, to high altitudes by enriching the blood and to low altitudes by thinning it again, to excessive sunshine by tanning the skin and to little sunshine by paling it, to hard use of the palms by laying down calluses which are shed when the work is over. You couldn't design a body that would respond positively to need unless it also responded negatively to lack of need.

What this all means—in terms of strength and endurance—is that there is little permanent gain in going in for vigorous exercise for short periods of time. It's the exercise that a person takes regularly through the week and throughout his life that maintains his level of fitness.

Most people who take regular exercise claim that they feel better—more bouncy, and at the same time more at peace with the world—and think that they look better. This is my opinion too. But it's hard to be sure about this because human beings are extremely suggestible. Experiments have proved that if a man believes that vaccine will diminish his colds, it will, whether the shots he receives contain bacteria or whether they contain only salt water.

Just what makes for co-ordination and posture and grace is a confusing matter to untangle. I remember well one of the first families for whom I became the pediatrician. The older child, a girl, was graceful from the start. From six months onward she picked up everything so delicately that the parents never had to put breakables out of her reach, and her toys lasted forever. The son in his early years lunged for whatever plaything he sought, grabbed it in his whole fist if he didn't knock it on the floor first, stumbled over something almost every time he crossed a room. Yet he was a happy, undestructive character. When differences like these come out so early in life you suspect that they are inborn, at least in part. But emotional factors certainly complicate the picture.

I think of athletic and graceful people as usually being the secure and outgoing type, but if that's true there are many exceptions. Some withdrawn people subject to the mental disease schizophrenia are unusually graceful. The great ballet dancer, Nijinsky, was a famous example. I remember a college friend who was such a natural athlete that he could become an expert in any sport in a quarter of the time it would take the average devotee, but who on the dance floor shuffled around miserably. One tennis player, when he sees victory in his grasp, does better and better. Another plays well when he is behind and then always goes to pieces when he gets ahead.

Posture is another area in which both the shape you were born with and your feelings about life play a part. The heavy-boned, heavy-muscled mesomorph has a tightly knit body which tends to maintain a good posture. A spindling ectomorph has a spine which readily slumps forward in the neck and in the small of the back, unless he has a proud spirit to buoy him up.

A slouched posture can neatly express a variety of attitudes: self-consciousness, shame, lack of confidence, discouragement, resentment, especially in the individual who can't easily vent his feelings in words. Childhood and adolescence is a period when it's hard to know what one's own feelings are and when it's often risky to express them, so posture is a handy outlet. An energetic mother is constantly bothered by the poor posture of her languid child. She hisses at him "Sit up straight!" twenty times a day. But of course such a child characteristically responds to prodding in a passive, obstinate way. As soon as attention is distracted, he slouches even more, without any conscious realization of it.

The most rewarding aspect of co-ordination and skill is that, once learned by hard practice in any activity—whether it's ice skating or piano playing or typing—the major part of it stays learned. To be sure, a person becomes rusty and he may feel quite discouraged about how much he has forgotten, but actually he can get back to nearly his former level in a very short time compared with the long struggle it took to achieve it in the first place.

This of course speaks in favor of children's learning, when young and adaptable, a sport or skill which they'll enjoy the rest of their lives. If only they had the sense to realize it! Of course they are full of enthusiasm when they first see an expert perform. They imagine, in their sublime innocence and egotism, that if they could just acquire a tennis racket or ballet costume or violin, they'd soon be performing to the cheers of the audience. Children will stick with great perseverance to acquiring skills which are almost within their power and which everyone else in the neighborhood is practicing (jacks or hoola hoops, for instance) but most of them quickly become discouraged as soon as they sense that real accomplishment is way beyond them. Then when the parent finds himself being more insistent than the child about practice, the latter's enthusiasm turns into rebellion.

It seems as if most of the thoughts I've expressed so far about physical development and fitness have been fatalistic or pessimistic: so much depends on the equipment our children happen to be born with, and parental efforts too often work in reverse. But the outlook is not that hopeless.

We have to accept our children's bony and muscular endowment, because we gave it to them and because we can't change it. But there are two different ways to accept it. One is reluctant. The other is serene. If we are miserable about our son's shortness or our daughter's tallness, we make them feel the same way, whether or not we try to hide our concern. If we show we think they are wonderful as they are, they'll feel good about themselves too.

In regard to fatness or thinness we have to admit that we have only a partial control. We can't make a child eat more, or less, by nagging—we're apt to produce the opposite effect. When a child is thin it's good to check with doctor and teacher to be sure that nothing more needs to be done in investigating health or adjustment.

If a child is only slightly plump in the seven-to-fifteen-year-old period, I think it's wise for parents to keep their mouths shut and their fingers crossed, since so many of these individuals will slender down by themselves later if no fuss is made.

Definite obesity is a much tougher nut to crack. The child faced with such a handicap is inclined to feel that his parents are persecuting him when they try to limit his diet. He should be encouraged to work on the problem with an outsider—a family doctor who inspires confidence, or a psychiatrist, or a supervised weight-reducing group in school. The mother can co-operate mightily by adjusting the family menus, and keeping cakes, cookies, candy out of the house most of the time, so that temptation is minimized.

As for exercise, I myself think that all children should stay outdoors (when it's not raining) at least a couple of hours a day—more when the weather is pleasant and when there is no school—so that they will develop their muscles and vigor and posture to the degree that is expected by Nature. This can be accomplished if the parents believe in it. The children take it for granted and enjoy it. If they later get the idea from friends that it would be fun to rush to television right after school, the parents only have to make it quite definite that there is no television and no coming indoors till five or five-thirty.

> Keep your face to the sunshine and you cannot see the shadow!
> HELEN KELLER

Through P.T.A.'s and other channels parents can campaign for supervised after-school games in playgrounds in the elementary grades, and in the high-school years for sports for all boys who are interested. (I'm not enthusiastic about highly competitive overemphasized athletics for a few individuals, especially before ninth grade.)

I have a prejudice against forcing girls to participate in competitive athletics, particularly after they enter adolescence. Many of them have no appetite for such battles, which were really invented by boys, for boys. But it's fine if they can be offered such activities as group dancing, swimming, tennis, golf, riding, skiing and skating.

Where such luxuries are impossible there are still walking and bicycling—for both sexes—and it's up to parents to see that their children get a reasonable amount of these healthful forms of transportation. (It bothers me to see high-school boys standing on corners trying to thumb rides for a half mile.)

In the final analysis it seems to me that the most important contribution parents make to their children's physical development is to bring them up so that they have confidence in themselves and love life. These attitudes can be counted on, better than other motivations to keep them active, set their appetites at the right level, make them stand up proudly. And it's the spirit glowing through that makes different shapes attractive. Audrey Hepburn and Marilyn Monroe both have great appeal. Abraham Lincoln's nobility made his very gauntness inspiring.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

JOURNAL about town

What we do Where we go Whom we meet

EDITED BY EILEEN SHARPE

50 years ago in the Journal

In June, 1910, President Taft was pushing a constitutional amendment for a Federal income tax (between sessions on the golf links). New Mexico and Arizona began forming state governments, and Ethel Barrymore became a suffragette. Popular American cars in 1910 were the Premier, Maxwell, Cino, Moline and the Ohio. World-renowned Helen Keller turned thirty, and multimillionairess Helen Gould could shoot a pistol with either hand.

In the June, 1910, JOURNAL, Editor Bok disapproves of the "horseplay" at weddings, such as the throwing of rice and old shoes. He also criticizes the new custom of women wearing their hats in hotel dining rooms as "bad manners" and "a mark of disrespect to their husbands who would never think of wearing their hats at the table."

Writes A Plain Country Woman to the parent of a girl who isn't popular socially: "It is a great mistake to imagine that because a girl is missing 'good times' in her youth they will never come to her. I had more happiness, more pure fun, and more heartfelt laughter after my children were grown and we all went out together than ever before in my life."

Walter writes: "Is it a compliment or the reverse to be asked to take the chaperon in to dinner?" Answer: "The honor is (sometimes) great, but the pleasure small."

"What about fresh-water bathing for my boy who is six years of age?" a mother wants to know. Answers the JOURNAL baby-care expert: "On very warm days it will not harm the boy to go in once, but twice is too much."

Asks Patty: "If a girl meets a man very often on her way to work, is there any harm in showing that she recognizes him?" Answer: "Decidedly! The girl who works is exposed to enough daily dangers without inviting familiarities."

Our town is a flowerpot. Once Helen Gould Shepard planted the first window boxes on Fifth Avenue. Today Mary Lasker and Salute to Seasons make Manhattan a bower of blossoms. And near our Workshop, pedestrians buzz like bees around the Outdoor Cleanliness Association's flower sale. There the JOURNAL's Richard Pratt met Mrs. Charles Gristede, who told him: "The city gives us an awning. Stores give carts. The mayor's for us—his wife opens our show. We net $500 to fight air pollution. Do you know dry cleaning has quadrupled; carbon monoxide threatens trees? Buy a flower for a better city?" He bought an armful.

WERNER WOLFF

Fabrics, fashion editor and fair director Lamb.

June Forecast: The British Trade Fair this month will be a smasher. Our food taster Louella Shouer has been sampling pheasants, cheeses, custards; our fashion editor Wilhela Cushman sniffing meadowy Scotch tweeds. Executive editor Mary Bass, viewing a brilliant cargo of goods, turned to a British Empire representative with an idea: "I wonder if you've thought of borrowing our slogan for the commonwealth? It's Never Underestimate the Power of a Woman!" He'll let us know.

Fragrant Fifth Avenue: Sherry-Netherland clock.

ABBOT MILLS

Women buy 60 per cent of men's ties, so Bill McCleery asked president Peter F. Lynch of Sulka how men buy the other 40 per cent. "Winston Churchill," said he, "is a polka-dot man. Harry Truman and the Duke of Windsor both designed their evening ties. Women balk at price—men don't. Henry Ford splurged $10 once and asked us never to tell Mrs. Ford—she'd object."

Sunday breakfast is really hard to get in New York, if you're an early bird. Our Neal Stuart, in from a New Mexico assignment and off to New Hampshire by train, found that at 7 A.M. all food bars were shuttered. Hungry Neal "had oval spots in front of my eyes" when she arrived at the interviewee's door, and her first words were: "I'm from the JOURNAL. Please—do you have two eggs?"

When the Arthur Murrays (page 70) came to one of our parties, talk turned to a onetime Gould editorial comparing dancing to marriage. "A woman," wrote Mrs. Gould, "must submit to a man's guidance . . . but she must stand on her own feet." Said Mr. Gould: "The man chooses the pattern but he is controlled by the demands of the music." The Spaniards say, "The dances I have danced no one can take from me."

Cynthia Wheatland learns in a hurry from expert Murray.

Carole O'Brien, who answers diet mail, recently attended a lunch talk on "obesity." The menu: sauced meat, buttered peas, potato, ice cream with fudge sauce, and chocolate cookies. "We left," she reports, "several pounds heavier but knowing that overweight is a definite threat to our health."

Sitting alone,
she had to decide which way it was to be for her and Peregrine:
the shallows of cocktail parties and divorce, or the depths of a happy marriage.

Agatha

THE Journal PRESENTS FOR THE FIRST TIME IN ANY MAGAZINE

T. A. Down

"Look," I said in the darkness after half an hour of silence, "do you want a divorce?"

"No," came the answer. From across the room. From the other bed. "It would kill my mother to have a divorce in the family."

That was the night I got out of bed and went to the kitchen and started scrubbing the floor. You can't cry in the same room with somebody and not have him know it, and Peregrine never could bear tears. We're still married, with three children instead of one. And even though I've scrubbed the floor more midnights than I care to count, I've been happy, and so has Peregrine.

Mostly I don't think about that horrible summer or the two or three other later bits of miserableness. I've been much too busy. But every time Agatha turns up I remember, all right. Even though it wasn't Agatha that first time. I think it was . . . well, somebody else.

Anyhow, last week we got an invitation in the mail. "Cocktails," it said. "Six-thirty to eight." An address in Georgetown, down on North Place, and Agatha's name. Agatha's name of twenty years back. Agatha Aldrich. Back in about 1942 it was Mrs. Richard Addington. That was when we first knew her, when everybody in the world almost was going through Washington all the time, and people were sleeping on the thick carpet behind the sofa in the brand-new Statler, and nobody could find a room anywhere, and there were all those jokes about pushing people into the Potomac so you could rent their apartments.

Agatha was a young thing and a bride and bright and oh, so misunderstood. She was always asking people in for drinks in the little Georgetown house she'd managed to get somehow and making them understand about her being misunderstood. She had some sort of secret job—everybody did but me. I just worked for a plain

By DORIS HUME

Across the awesome summit of the great Toltec Pyramid of the Sun the morning breeze moved, cool and thin. Voices of tourists less intrepid than Paige MacRae could be heard far below, lamenting unresponsive muscles as they inched up the endless steps. To the southwest was Mexico City with its bright modern overlay, but the haze of distance wrapped it in invisibility as if it had never been. Time seemed, as Paige stood there, to check its forward thrust; she caught the feeling of backward flow, of return to another day, another century.

Here was the very spot on which the great altar had been based, where, spread-eagled in sacrifice, the victim had seen the knife-edged stone raised high, to catch the light as it plunged downward to his heart. So acute was Paige's sensing that a prickle swept across her skin. Alone against the sky she stood, bareheaded; red-gold hair giving back glints. A slimly built girl of twenty-three, her fine carriage made her seem taller than she was.

The gray eyes were widely set, dark-lashed, under brows that had no need of penciling. She had a round firm chin, a generous mouth, and a throat line cleanly modeled because of the proudly lifted head.

"You feel it too! So few are capable of it. So few."

A man's voice so close made her turn in surprise toward the speaker. "You startled me," she said, but she smiled with the camaraderie of tourists; in a strange land he who speaks one's language is a friend. "I didn't see anyone here."

She was aware that he was studying her from behind the glasses. "You must trust me." He smiled. "You must believe that I know what is best for all of us."

"I came up from the other side," the man said. He came closer and the movement was balanced, easy. He had a narrow face, pale brows above a high-bridged nose, fair hair that lay sleek, its blondness blending into silver at the temples. A deep tan intensified the color of his blue eyes. He was, Paige decided, in his early forties. A very striking man—and somehow vaguely familiar.

He said, "I've been watching you. I come here CONTINUED ON PAGE 121

See YOU in THE papers

when one is a glamorous movie star and the other is his wife.

By EDWARD KAYLIN

Joe Blaine, boy accountant, and Betty—the most beautiful girl in the world, who, for some reason beyond his ken, had consented to join him in holy matrimony—had discovered Monte Madden. Six months ago, when Joe was home with the virus, he'd happened to tune to "Homebody"—one of those programs that examine the contents of women's handbags—and there was Monte doing a guest shot. Joe spotted him immediately as the funniest thing since bubble gum and when he called Betty—Betty didn't watch daytime television; it made her feel guilty—Monte convulsed her too. Then, three months later—bang!—Monte Madden was hotter than a two-dollar pistol and every Monday through Friday night, at 11:30 Eastern Time, a great clicking could be heard in the land as millions of viewers switched away from late movies and onto the Monte Madden Show. Betty and Joe, of course, were among his most devoted fans.

It was on a Tuesday, a perfectly ordinary Tuesday, that the main event came off. A few warm-up remarks addressed to the studio audience, a topical joke, a brief announcement for Prince, the new shorter cigarette, a piano solo by the leader of the band, a rapid-fire exchange with the announcer, and Monte introduced his first guest, Julie Thomas, the skyrocketing young Hollywood star whose great performance in The Sure Thing was packing them in at the Radio City Music Hall.

Monte was given to flowery introductions, but this time he outdid himself. Julie, he announced, was the most exciting person he'd ever met. "You know," he said, "the thing that gets me is how you can be so fiery and at the same time so sensible and relaxed. You are relaxed, dear, aren't you?" He paused. "Even if there are thirty million people out there watching you?" Julie Thomas assured him that she was relaxed.

He turned back to the audience. "It's absolutely amazing how completely calm she is. Nothing flusters her. And she's so outspoken. I was talking to her backstage. Whatever she feels like saying, she says. You know," he continued, "I admire that." Then, addressing himself to the girl, "I admire you." Julie Thomas made ineffectual motions with her hands as though burrowing out from under the laurels being heaped on her, but Monte went on. "Tell me," he said, with his familiar quizzical smile, "were you always so willing to speak up?"

The girl really was terribly pretty—piquant little face, dancing dark eyes, generous mouth, wind-swept Italian-boy haircut and a suggestion of curves she hadn't even used yet. She wasn't beautiful like Betty, of course, Joe thought. Betty was a blonde with high cheekbones, bright blue eyes, creamy complexion. Yet he had to admit, in all fairness, there was much to be said for Julie Thomas.

Her voice was good too—soft and sultry. "I don't think I was ever afraid of people, if that's what you mean," she was saying. "But I don't come out with everything that's on my mind, either. No," she went on thoughtfully, "you have to compromise or become a hermit. Why, if I said everything I thought, even right now, we'd be cut off the air and CONTINUED ON PAGE 110

"Of course," Joe said. But he had a vaguely troubling thought that he really ought to be getting home to his wife.

Princess Margaret's Husband

KEYSTONE PRESS

Margaret loves Tony for what he is—she could easily have found a more obviously "suitable" mate long ago—but he will have to change greatly in his new way of life.

THE KIND OF MAN HE REALLY IS

By LAURA RILEY

When Britain's Queen Mother Elizabeth announced that her daughter, Margaret, was going to marry Antony Armstrong-Jones, the royal establishment quickly lowered its velvet curtain between him and the outside world. Old friends who had sat on the floor of his Greenwich-Village-type apartment in London eating garlic bread and drinking Spanish wine were persuaded to silence. Former female companions were "unavailable." Business associates "could not confirm or deny" even the simplest detail.

The predictable happened. In the absence of fact, speculation flourished, and Antony became an enigma by default. He was described as "tense with a hair-trigger temper"—and as "easygoing and friendly." He was called a dilettante playing at photography, and praised as a "devoted, sincere artist." He was "intelligent" but "not terribly intellectual," "gallant" and "arrogant" at once.

What is he like, really?

Why did Princess Margaret marry him?

What kind of husband will he be for the girl whose lively, unconventional behavior and attitude have made her the most admired, criticized and widely discussed royal princess since King George IV's Caroline was censured by Parliament "for the levity of her manners"?

One thing certainly: he will be different from most royal husbands, and different from the way he himself has been in the past.

Margaret and Antony—or Tony, as he almost invariably is called after a few minutes' acquaintance—are much alike—but not entirely. They have important differences, not all of them simply reflections of the difference between royalty and commoner. And their very alikenesses are not those which necessarily make for harmony.

If he is moody—she can be equally so, a propensity that started with inherent willfulness and was heightened by the traditional privilege granted royal whim.

If Tony needs attention and admiration—he has married a young woman who needs them as much as anyone in the world. The basic conditions of her life and training made this almost inevitable, and several deeply trying experiences have nurtured this inner demand.

On the other hand, both like entertainment—to be entertained and to entertain others. Both like night life and conversation of a witty, rapid-fire, somewhat gossipy nature, about popular music, the current theater, and what's new around town generally. Both like off-beat acquaintances, and sometimes themselves strive to startle.

Both have been overshadowed by close relatives—and have reacted against it: Margaret by her sister, Elizabeth, the queen; Tony by an overwhelmingly vital father who went from an eminently successful student life at Cambridge to become one of England's outstanding attorneys. And both have had previous romantic interests.

But, again: Margaret enjoys elaborate evenings in formal dress—elegantly careful hair-dos, soft, expensive furs, glittering diamonds in quantity. She is a Child's world

The Wonderful World of Little Children

Where every fine day the sun comes up with a good-morning smile that is personally meant and warmly returned.
Where soap and water are hotly prized, not for cleanliness but for bubbles.
Where the commonest blade of grass may become some boy's whistle.
Where riding a merry-go-round is the perfect form of travel.
There, anybody knows that the harder a child tries to be good,
The brighter the birthday candles will shine in his eyes.
Never were rivers and fields so fresh,
Days so daisied,
Nights so star-splashed,
Or heroes so much like
Home-town folks
As they are for little children.
O World, that should be fairer for their sake—
You are!
Never without them were ordinary women like you and me
So blindly, stubbornly,
Trustfully, whole-sweetheartedly,
Clung to and adored
For all those lovely rockaby qualities we wish we really had.
("Oh, mummy, I'm going to love you all my life.
Because I like you so much, that's why.")

THE WONDERFUL WORLD OF LITTLE CHILDREN—as described in the writings of Dr. Benjamin Spock. What is the world of a small child? We look in a child's face and know that his must be a world of awe and wonder, of continents and hemispheres waiting to be discovered and explored. But what is this world like, how do its tiny inhabitants think and feel? We ourselves once journeyed through it, but it has grown misty in our minds, we no longer remember. Dr. Benjamin Spock is loved by millions of mothers because he knows, as does no one else, the heart of a child. Here we present a small child's world, as seen through the eyes of our own Dr. Spock.

EXCERPTS FROM WRITINGS OF DR. BENJAMIN SPOCK WHICH HAVE APPEARED IN LADIES' HOME JOURNAL AND IN "BABY AND CHILD CARE" BY PERMISSION OF THE COPYRIGHT OWNERS.

"We must remember that each child as he develops is retracing the whole history of mankind, physically and spiritually, step by step. Human beings are born sociable. In civilizations that are simpler than ours, children and grownups, too, go to sleep curled up together. It's not surprising that a child, particularly an only one, feels a little lonesome going to sleep in a room by himself. If he can breathe life into a stuffed doll or animal, so much the better.

"There must be very little time sense in the child's world. A frightening separation for a day probably seems like eternity. Tomorrow or a week from now means almost nothing. A child doesn't even know whether it's morning or afternoon until he's four or five years old.

"Young children are always in the dark in the sense that their inexperience, ignorance, lack of a sharp sense of what is real leave them at the mercy of their immediate feelings."

DORIS PINNEY

How does his world appear to the child himself?

What are they like—the young dwellers in this world?

"Two- and three- and four-year-olds are curious, sensitive, imaginative. They feel strongly their dependence on their parents and are easily threatened by any danger of separation from them.

"The more significant emotional developments take place below the surface, in the unconscious levels of the child's mind. That's one reason why we, as grownups, don't recall such feelings and events from our own pasts. One of the principal reasons that young children worry about their parents' anger (and their own) is that their own anger is more violently, more barbarically felt than is the adult's. The young child senses that when he is angry at a parent, he wants, momentarily, to do away with him or her. But realizing that he is utterly dependent on the parent—and loves him too—he is filled with anxiety and guilt. He has no confidence yet in his ability to control his anger.

"Young children often interpret an illness or an operation as punishment for having done something bad or for having had antagonistic thoughts toward another. A child feels as guilty about a mean thought as about an act. He assumes that in a magic way his thought can do real harm."

HARRIET ARNOLD

What does the small child believe?

"Young children believe what they want to believe. They are quite capable of believing two contradictory theories at the same time (as in the case of the stork theory and the seed theory in regard to the origin of babies). When they are hearing a story being read, they eagerly swallow it whole, and yet, in another compartment of their minds, they realize, at least dimly, that it's only a tale. They love to pretend that they are some person or some animal, and play the part without self-consciousness. When a little boy sees a man driving a bus, he forgets about the man and immediately imagines how it would feel to drive it himself.

"A young child believes that a bad wish is almost as harmful as a bad act; that his parents know all his thoughts; and that if he has angry feelings toward someone, the latter automatically has the same feeling toward him."

CARROLL SEGHERS II

"Children always sense what their parents' feelings are. A little boy realizes that his father is disappointed when he is timid or clumsy, irritated when he is rude, disobedient or destructive, no matter how hard the father is trying to conceal these negative attitudes. Small children prefer—most of the time—to be helped to conform. They aren't comfortable with parents who disapprove but who are trying to suppress disapproval. They immediately detect parents' off moods. They are more apt to be bothered by a strained silence that lasts all day than by a hot argument that's over in a few minutes.

"All children are uneasy about their own lawless impulses (the rude child is always an anxious, unhappy child) and it comforts them when they know they have parents who will help them keep these under control. The fact that the air is cleared after a moment of firmness or disapproval or anger is a relief."

How does he view his parents?

How his parents serve as his models

"By the age of three a boy is beginning to realize more clearly that he is a boy and will grow up to be a man like his father. This gives him a special admiration for his father and for other men and boys. He watches them carefully and works hard to be as much like them as he can, in appearance and behavior and interests. In his play he concentrates on propelling toy trucks, trains and planes, pretending his tricycle is a car, being a policeman or fireman, making deliveries, building houses and bridges. He copies his father's remarks in his father's tone of voice. He takes on his father's attitude toward other males and toward women. He is preparing himself to play a man's part in the world, spiritually, occupationally, socially, by means of his love for and admiration of his father and other men.

"The girl at this age realizes that it is her destiny to be a woman, and this makes it particularly exciting and challenging for her to try to be like her mother and other women. She turns with more concentration to housework and baby care if these are her mother's occupations. In caring for her dolls, she takes on the very same attitude and tone of voice her mother uses toward children. She absorbs her mother's point of view toward men and boys."

CARROLL SEGHERS II

He must feel that he is loved

"But the most essential requirement is that a child shall feel he belongs to his parents (or parent substitutes) and is loved by them. Being loved by parents or parent substitutes means more than being protected, provided for and kissed. Good parents, in addition, will care how the child behaves and require that he be considerate of them and the rest of society. But all the teaching of parents and others is relatively useless unless he first gets the feeling of being cherished, and develops, in response, a deep attachment to and a desire to please those who are so important to him."

Can a small child be taught to love in return?

SUZANNE SZASZ

"The evidence is strong that a baby is born full of the inclination to love. At about one month, when he can't use his arms and legs in any way, can't even turn his head from side to side, he smiles when his mother brings her face near his and murmurs to him. By three months he is so brimming with warmth that he'll grin and squirm delightedly at a greeting from any old kind of person, including his doctor.

"At three and four and five years, children from reasonably happy families are almost as outgoing and affectionate as three-month-olds. They love children and adults who give them half a chance. More important still is their intense imitativeness of anyone they admire. They strive mightily to acquire the same table manners, tone of voice, vocabulary, hobbies as their parents and other grownups of whom they're fond. Even more fundamentally, each one is forming attitudes that will, to some extent, persist for the rest of his life. The mixture of tenderness and rivalry that he will feel for those of opposite sex, the proportions of enjoyment and anxiousness he will feel about those of his own sex, his basic feelings about himself and what he is in the world for, are mainly based on the parents' example. In such respects, these are the most formative years of all."

HAROLD FOWLER

THE WONDERFUL WORLD OF LITTLE CHILDREN

A "children's corner" in the living room, fitted up with special toys and treasures, bridges the child's world and that of the adults from whom he has so much to learn. Outdoors and in their playrooms, the children may romp and use their own playthings as they like. In the family living room, they learn respect for other people's possessions, and to show courtesy and consideration to their parents and adult guests.

Journal interior-decoration editor Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland has used the lower shelves of the floor-to-ceiling bookcases for a charming display of decorative animals, a flower painting, antique toys, art books. An old doll's trunk contains still more "special" toys and books. The children can play with these toys and animals, or look at the pictures in the handsome books, as long as they handle them carefully. Father and mother are at hand, to answer questions and to give the necessary guidance. When parents want to talk with adult guests, the children can play quiet games at their own little table. The children's corner makes them feel they are always welcome in the family circle—so long as they behave.

"In such respects, these are the most formative years of all . . ."

"Good parents will require that their children be considerate of them and the rest of society. A child learns a little about what is expected of him in his second year, a little more in the third, a lot between three and six. Firm guidance that springs from devotion is not only good for children; they love it.

"Boys and girls need chances to be around their father, to be enjoyed by him and if possible to do things with him. Better to play for fifteen minutes enjoyably and then say, 'Now I'm going to read my paper,' than to spend all day at the zoo crossly.

"Two-year-olds, three-year-olds and four-year-olds have an intense intellectual curiosity about the meaning of everything they run up against, from where the rain comes from to why birds eat worms. We can be on the lookout for direct questions, for veiled questions and for unspoken questions." —Dr. Spock.

THE WONDERFUL WORLD OF LITTLE CHILDREN

HAROLD TOWLER

"Children usually love simple toys best and play with them longer. This isn't because children are simple—it's because they have so much imagination. Your child loves to have you play with him if you are willing to play at his level. Let him show you how. Help him if he asks for it." —Dr. Spock.

Cynthia Wheatland has designed, for a small girl and a small boy, playrooms which double as bedrooms, and can grow up with the child. In the girl's room, shelves, magazine rack (ideal for outsize picture books) and sliding-door unit are attached by brackets to metal wall strips. The bookcase has a built-in doll's house, which can be removed when the little girl tires of it. (Furnishings are from the dime store.) Doors can be shut when it's "a perfect mess." The small easy chair for mother is covered with a timeless blue-and-white check.

Reverse the bedspread and you have a scrumptious shade of washable velveteen. Put up two curtain rods; hang up, with brass clips, easy-care sheets that match the shades—washable ones, the ball-fringe edging just glued on; tie the sheets back with pretty ribbons and you have a room for a young lady. If you move the shelf unit up the wall, a roomy dresser will fit underneath.

THE WONDERFUL WORLD OF LITTLE CHILDREN

"When we see children building with blocks, pretending to be airplanes, learning to skip rope, we are apt to think that these are just amusements. Yet the baby passing a rattle from one hand to the other or learning to crawl downstairs, the small boy pushing a block along a track pretending it's a train, are training themselves for useful work later just as much as the high-school student studying geometry. The child is striving every hour to more difficult achievements and to do what other kids and grownups do."

—Dr. Spock.

The boy's room will need little changing to suit his growing needs. Remove the doors from the cupboard between the windows, take out the lower shelves and you will have a desk for a school boy, with good light and a bulletin board. That does it!

The fitted mattress covers are of a bright striped denim at 79 cents a yard. The secondhand chest cost $10, was painted bright red, has real marine cleats for pulls, since small boys love boats. The nautical idea is carried out further by rope tiebacks for curtains, rope drawer pulls, canvas chairs. The floor is painted with blue deck paint, patterned with a sponge dipped in white paint.

THE WONDERFUL WORLD OF LITTLE CHILDREN

"How happily a person gets along as an adult in his job, in his family and social life depends a great deal on how he got along with other children when he was young. The important thing is to have him like people.

"At three and four and five children make friends quickly. It is necessary, however, to teach a child just how to be polite and considerate. Young children have to be gently reminded that they themselves are part of a social situation. If it's done in a friendly spirit, they are proud to learn.

"We have been going through a half century in which the trend has been progressively to throw off stiff forms and rely on the good intentions underneath. My own hunch is that after having pushed casualness as far as we can we are due for a reaction—as happens regularly in human affairs—and that good manners will come to be almost universally admired and taught again."

— Dr. Spock.

LEOMBRUNO-I

Good manners are acquired naturally and easily in parties marked by fun and friendliness. The nautical theme of the birthday party pattern editor Nora O'Leary has planned is yours for the making. The centerpiece is a hatbox covered with blue denim, with a red-and-white ball-fringe trim. A painted white stick makes the mast; it is strung with cotton cord. The banners can be made of paper or fabric. The tablecloth is blue denim, edged with four-inch white trim. The French sailor berets for the girls are made by gathering a thirteen-inch circle of fabric and adding "Friendly feelings come first, good manners then come naturally..."

blue grosgrain and a red pompon. Seven-by-nine-inch bags, again of blue denim, are furnished for "take home" goodies and prizes.

The boys' gob hats, the plastic boats which serve as candy dishes and the other "take home" gifts (in the gaily wrapped packages) are all from the dime store.

The menu JOURNAL food editor Louella Shouer has planned—sliced chicken, potato chips, sandwiches, milk, ice cream and birthday cake—is made up of foods almost all small children like, and that are easy for them to manage.

THE WONDERFUL WORLD OF LITTLE CHILDREN

Little children, so clear-eyed and unswerving in their view of life, live close to the heart of all ceremony. Even the smallest wedding guest thrills to the ageless poetry of the bridal procession. The veiled bride on her father's arm, "given away" to be received into a larger world; the ring, the kiss, the holy promises—so that is how a home begins!

Our small hero and heroine, beautifully and immaculately clad, are ready for any great family festival—a marriage, a christening, even an aged relative's unbelievable golden-wedding celebration.

Are innocence and beauty born?"

Paris-pink taffeta for formal occasions, around the world, any time of year.

Like so many of today's busy young marrieds, Barbara Eisenhower, wife of Maj. John Eisenhower, son of the President, divides her life between bread and butter and "swish." One moment she is shopping at the supermarket in Gettysburg, an hour later driving to Washington for an official luncheon; one day she is a nurse's aide at the local hospital, that night she may be in a ball gown at an embassy.

Tall, hazel-eyed and with fabulous energy, Mrs. Eisenhower has no "as usual" routines about clothes. She likes casuals, wears a sweater and skirt, slacks or shorts at home, prefers a suit for travel. She loves all colors, has a collection of simple clothes, "backbone of a wardrobe." Each season, she adds according to her needs.

HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!

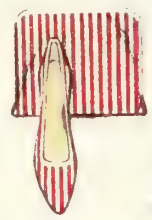
Carefree Vacation

Mollie Farnham believes vacations should be without fashion cares at all. Her former spring and summer purchases (navy polka-dot dress, bright blue jersey coat) she wears for going and coming, and for bad-weather protection. For resort wear, Mollie adds clothes and accessories for fun that are practical and pretty—ones which will pack easily. By BET HART

For more casual wear, the skirt is perfect with other shirts and sweaters already in her wardrobe. Here Mollie wears her mauve plaid blouse from last month. Her new denim play shoes are pretty with this and other costumes too.



For evening, Mollie takes along her white separates bought in April. She alternates tops for different nights with her bright pink cotton blouse she made.

For early-morning or casual wear all through the day, Mollie has her bright blue cotton slacks she made last month. This time she wears them with a favorite white blouse bought long ago.

Mollie wears her first vacation investment: a navy skirt and white jacket with matching trim. Light, bright and gay, it's practical as well because fabric is a cotton knit. Skirt, $5.95; jacket, $5.95.

To brighten past purchases, make new ones prettier than ever, Mollie adds gay accessories: red-and-white-striped waterproof slippers—the price, $3.95, includes their own terry-lined traveling case; a huge striped silk scarf, $1.98; a glamorous pin, $3.95; and a pair of blue denim playshoes, $5.95.

Mollie loves to swim and likes a good suit and a classic one that will last this season and on to the next. She chooses this bathing suit in white ribbed cotton. It has a short overskirt, a wide red print belt to make a tiny waistline even smaller. $12.95.

BATHING SUIT BY JOHN WEITZ

The two partners to a marriage must agree on their destination, which is, of course, a successful marriage and a home favorable for the rearing of their children. If each makes decisions by asking, "Will this promote the success of our marriage?" they can differ widely in other ways. But if each makes decisions merely on the basis of self-assertion, on the basis of "Whatever I do is right and I'll always entitled to have my own way," the matrimonial ship will soon be wrecked. Four hundred thousand marriages are wrecked each year in the United States. Most people naturally want their marriages to succeed. Many of them need some help in learning how to succeed. . . . The counselor in this case was Mrs. Edna K. Upton. PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., President, The American Institute of Family Relations.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

SHE: "Away back in our courtship days, I realized my husband put his mother and his whole family ahead of me. I loved him—and I hoped he would change."

HE: "Ivy thinks I'm a mamma's boy. It isn't true. I enjoy my mother's company more than I enjoy hers, but so would any other man in similar circumstances."

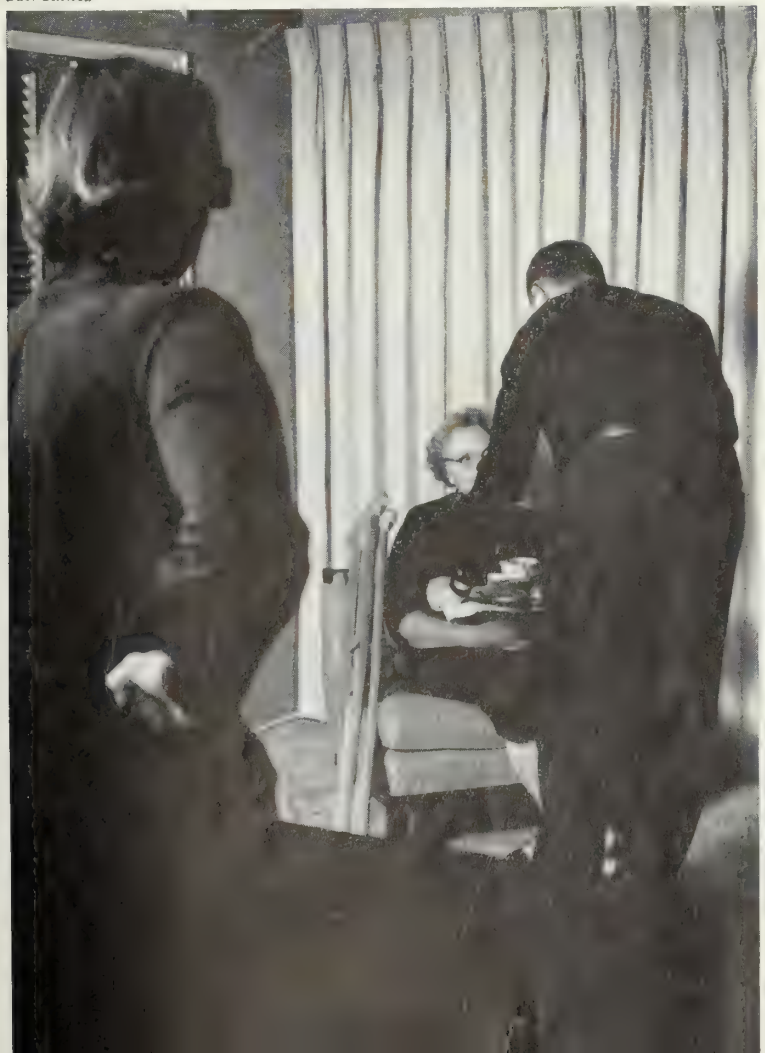
Ivy tells her side: "I once thought I could cope with my mother-in-law," said thirty-four-year-old Ivy, whose crisp, incisive voice suggested she could cope with anybody. But her clenched hands were trembling. "It seems I was too optimistic. After fourteen years of marriage and three children, I'm on the verge of divorce. Tod's mother is responsible.

"Away back in our courtship days, I realized my husband put his mother and his whole family ahead of me. I loved him—basically I still love Tod—and I hoped he would change. His devotion to his mother has increased through the years, as she's grown older, more vocal about her ailments, more slavishly dependent on him and his brothers.

"I'm no crybaby. Perhaps I could come to terms with Tod's constant neglect except for one thing. He clearly shows that his own little daughters—Cathy is eight, the twins are five—are as unimportant to him as I am. His indifference to our children tears me to pieces.



"We bought our present home two years ago shortly after the death of Tod's father. I chose the house because it was forty miles away from my mother-in-law, who shares an apartment with her bachelor son. Once Tod was pried loose from their vicinity, I supposed he would begin to pay a little notice to our daughters and me. I was mistaken.

"The moment Tod arrives home in the evening he flips on the TV and collapses on the sofa. He doesn't kiss me, he doesn't say hello to the girls. If they are anywhere in sight, he orders them to keep quiet. The other night I asked him to discipline Cathy, who had sassed me during the afternoon. He refused to co-operate with me, although when he personally is annoyed he is much too strict. He jumped on the twins about their table manners until I now serve him dinner separately at the TV set. I like to cook, but all he wants is the dreary meat-and-potatoes fare his mother dished out in his boyhood. His glowing recollections of her cottage-fried potatoes and pan-fried steak have practically destroyed my pleasure in cooking.

"He wastes no praise on our children. Last month I repeated to him a compliment from Cathy's teacher, and he just grunted.

When is Casual Too Casual?

In April the JOURNAL published a letter from a reader who told of visiting Washington, D. C., and being shocked by the hideous, unkempt appearance of the tourists.

Most nightmarish among the sights she saw: A woman weighing at least 250 pounds wearing a halter top and blue jeans rolled up to her bare knees. At least a dozen women over the age of 50, all barelegged and featuring varicose veins, wearing abbreviated shorts or sun suits. Teenage boys slouched in rumpled, flashy sport shirts opened to their navels.

How widespread is such casual disregard of personal appearance—such lack of sensitivity toward other people's sense of decency? The pictures on these pages, snapped on locations from coast to coast, speak for themselves. Hair combing in restaurants, dirty feet on public display, hair up on rollers in office-building elevators, slacks and shorts worn in museums are all candidly recorded.

In Anywhere, U.S.A., a clean, attractive, appropriate appearance is easily possible, no matter what your budget. Surely all of us can do ourselves the simple justice of looking right and, in turn, add appeal to the American scene at every level.

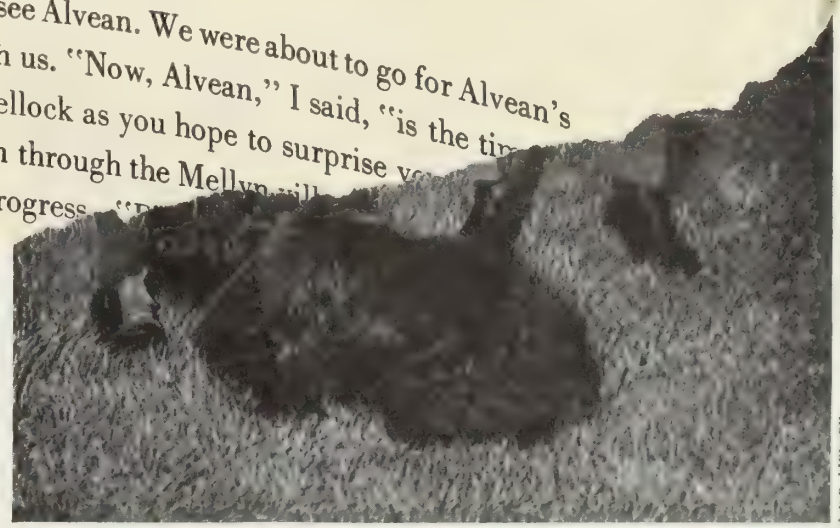
SYNOPSIS OF PARTS I AND II • I, Martha Leigh, a young impoverished gentlewoman, was governess to Alvean TreMellyn, eight. Aware that her father, Connan, a handsome, wealthy widower, was coldly indifferent to her, I secretly entered Alvean in the gymkhana which he judged. I prayed she might win his approval by riding well. Alvean's mother, Alice, and her lover, Geoffrey Nansellock, I was told, had been killed while eloping. Nansellock's brother and sister, Peter and Celestine, remained Connan's close friends.



When the mourning period for Alice ended, Connan gave a lavish ball. With Gilley, odd little granddaughter of Mrs. Polgrey, the housekeeper, Alvean and I, enthralled, watched through a concealed peep in the solarium wall as Connan danced with beautiful, young Lady Treslyn. Gossip said they would marry when her old, sick husband died. Yet, later, Connan kissed me—a thrilling, stolen kiss which disturbed me. He apologized and, to my joy, asked me not to leave, as I planned.

Oh, I could not have left! Not while the bewildering mystery of Alice haunted and held me. Why—if she eloped—the emphatic notes in her diary about a party that very same evening? Why—if she was dead—did I feel her presence? And, more frightening, hear her anguished plea, "You must not go . . . help me!"

Bed warmers for the king and queen—in June? Why ever did Roosevelt want to see his opponent, Willkie? Was the family really for a fourth term? Another bottle of Scotch for Churchill? While the Roosevelts were in the White House, the place was abuzz with historic meetings. Also some of the best stories ever told about historic people.

But the King and Queen of England stayed at the White House until their departure for New York and Hyde Park with the President and Mrs. Roosevelt. The king was a retiring, frail-looking man. The queen, with her pleasant expression, was a mild-mannered-appearing person. They were people that you liked, without affectation, and you admired their royal dignity.

President Roosevelt was very much interested in this visit and took over planning the menu for the state dinner. I mean he actually went over the menu. In all the twelve years of his Administration I dare say this was the only dinner that CONTINUED ON PAGE 84

"Mme. Chiang had great charm. Your opinion of the great lady, however, depends on what status of life you might happen to belong to. Her bed had to be stripped and the silk sheets replaced with fresh ones each time she got up—even if she went to bed for only ten or fifteen minutes four and five times a day."

Churchill refused to stay at the White House when Mme. Chiang arrived. "I know I couldn't stand that woman," he told Mrs. Roosevelt, "and I might not be able to hold my tongue." He often wore his air-raid suit around the house, models it here for Harry Hopkins' daughter, Diana, and the Roosevelt pet, Fala.

The Hoovers had six-course formal dinners every night. Mrs. Roosevelt's simpler meals brought on complaints that White House food was terrible.

Do you remember that about a month ago I got sick of chicken because I got it (between lunch and dinner) at least six times a week? The chicken situation has definitely improved, but "they" have substituted sweetbreads, and for the past month I have been getting sweetbreads about six times a week.

I am getting to the point where my stomach positively rebels and this does not help my relations with foreign powers. I bit two of them today.

Kitchen IN STEP WITH The Arthur Murrays

The Murrays wanted a big kitchen in their weekend home. And big it is with "his" and "hers" cooking corners. A brick barbecue grill for Arthur (he's the meat chef). Across the kitchen, gleaming counter space—and two ovens—for Kathryn (cakes, cookies and pies—the better to please five hungry grandchildren). These two dance as a team, but cook more efficiently if each sticks to his own specialties.

WESLEY BALZ

For an open look, Arthur designed recessed wall cabinets with continuous glass shelves just as wide as dinner plates. Tile floor, lacquered wood cabinets, plastic wall covering all match. For efficiency: sliding glass doors, a second sink, outlets aplenty.

Beyond the teak table (for breakfast, lunch and "when-grandchildren-come" dinner) is Kathryn's corner. It is well equipped from freezer-refrigerator around stainless-steel counters to gas range where Kathryn can—and does—cook on all six burners.

The Arthur Murrays' weekend world lies an hour northeast of New York where carpeted lawns run down to the shore and Long Island Sound salts the air. On a ridge of land above the rugged coast line stands their new home, as carefully planned by the Murrays as any of their dance routines. Built of washed brick, the house is long and low, and floor-to-ceiling windows that span its sea side look out upon the Sound.

Arthur and Kathryn wanted a house for fun, for friends, for family. Arthur, who studied architecture in his predancing days, designed a house in step with modern living; Kathryn brought to its contemporary décor her own rhythm and gaiety.

The pride of their new home—and the Murrays' joy—is a light, bright kitchen planned by Arthur and Kathryn for Arthur and Kathryn. They both love to cook. Theirs is a cheerful kitchen, predominantly warm beige because the color is restful, neutral, and Kathryn's Highly paid nurses must stand in for parents in most movie-star homes.

Should Movie Stars Be Parents?

By Joe Hyams

I recently asked a number of Hollywood psychiatrists why so many children of the stars go wrong. The answers I received were very similar. One of those who put it most clearly was Dr. Marcel Frym, a criminologist-analyst (president of the American Society of Criminology) on the staff of the Hacker Psychiatric Clinic of Beverly Hills:

"I believe these troubled children are trying to get back at their parents. This is the only way they know to get even for hurts inflicted at home. It may sound sadistic, but it's the common motive. These children are in trouble because their parents have failed them."

Then Dr. Frym, who has been treating Hollywood children for fifteen years, told me a story: "Last month a world-famous star came to see me. With tears in his eyes he asked me to help his son.

"I made appointments to see the boy. The boy failed to show up. Finally his father bribed him to come. He arrived drunk. For an hour he spouted obscenities. He came a second time, drunk again. This time he told me that his mission was to let the world know what a bastard his father really was—this father whom the world thought such a fine man. The boy has never come back here since."

Perhaps this story should not be too surprising. I suggested last month in this magazine that stars make poor marriage partners. A small handful of them are chronic punks and hoydens when off-screen. Yet even the hardest-working, most dignified names in the business—Joan Crawford (four marriages), Clark Gable (five marriages)—also have a record of discontent in their private lives.

Yet they marry. Then they have children. Can they do any better as parents than as marriage partners?

I believe the odds are overwhelmingly against it. I believe that most stars are basically unhappy people, and it follows that their children will be or are unhappy. How could it be otherwise? Sometimes I feel sorry for many of Hollywood's great and their restless search for security. But not too sorry; it's hard to make a tragic figure of someone grossing more than a million dollars a year. But for some of their children, "tragic" is the only word.

Lana Turner's daughter, Cheryl, was only fourteen when she killed her mother's lover with a butcher knife. Her life has evidently not straightened out since; a recent court order placed her in a correctional school for girls. Barbara Burns, daughter of the late comedian, Bob Burns, has spent time in jail for the possession of narcotics. Cathy Crosby, daughter of the Bob Crosbys, left home at seventeen, then had a nervous breakdown.

Bing Crosby's four talented sons are currently making a public spectacle of themselves with their ambitions to enter show business. The spectacle includes public drunkenness and sullen intrafamily quarrels which hit the front pages. None of the boys finished college. All four have married show girls. Two have been disciplined by judges for drunken driving. One has had a paternity suit filed against him.

The delinquencies of Edward G. Robinson, Jr., are notorious: open warfare with his parents, a brief marriage (the bride was visibly pregnant), theft, alcoholism. He has reported that he first got drunk at the age of seven.

Unhappy parents are raising unhappy children the world over. What goes wrong that is special to Hollywood? I would suggest, first, that the opportunities there for plain old-fashioned parental neglect are vastly greater than they are for most of us. Movie-star parents have compelling distractions of their own and plenty of money to arrange for hired hands to raise the children. Nurses and governesses—not always the best, though well paid—for the early years are the rule. Thus the children become disturbed when they are still quite small, and by the time their parents are ready to notice them are often fairly unpleasant characters. It is embarrassing, not to say irritating, for a great and beautiful star to have a five-year-old child who won't take his thumb out of his mouth, or screams before guests. Of course the star would prefer to love her child. Stars, like everyone else, are all in favor of parenthood. But the child is regrettably unlovable. As conditions deteriorate, the hurt star thinks he or she has only one recourse: more hired hands—boarding schools, psychiatrists—to solve the problem.

Here is a story told me by the director of one of Hollywood's best-known private schools. The school had decided it would have to expel the son of a prominent star. Before doing so, the director wanted to call the parents and explain.

The boy's mother was out of town, so he tried to get the boy's father. For five days he left urgent telephone messages—at the father's studio, dressing room, home, with his secretary and his business manager. On the sixth day the star finally called back. He listened briefly as the director began an account of the son's misbehavior, before bursting in belligerently, "Why are you bothering me! I pay good money for your school to solve this kind of problem!"

The director was so appalled that he changed his mind and decided to keep the boy in order to work with him. Sending him home seemed like throwing the boy to the wolves.

There are variations on this routine, of course. Families differ. Lana Turner, for example, is a warmhearted woman. Those who know her agree that she is a fond, impulsive mother. Cheryl is a sweet girl, not an unlovable Hollywood brat. But the fact remained that Cheryl lived much of the time with her grandmother. She ran away from a convent school. Her CONTINUED ON PAGE 152

Marriage Magic

And so they were married and lived happily ever after.

Would a child's fairy tale be a fairy tale if it didn't end that way? And being myself a partner in just such a real-life dream, I can't recommend it too highly. But as your old married friend (seven years this fall) I've got to warn you, though love is wonderful, "ever after" is a lo-o-ong time. To believe in this kind of magic is to walk into disappointment and heartbreak.

Here's a typical letter that came in—the kind that really sends your Mailbag Philosopher into a tailspin. An engaged miss named Wendy writes: "We're young, my family says. Well, what's better than being young and in love with a whole life together ahead of us? Mom and dad keep asking what Rod and I expect to make of our life together. We really haven't thought about it much. If we're truly in love, that'll work itself out. The important thing is to get off on the right foot, and I do know exactly the kind of wedding I want."

Wendy's wedding plans call for the whole treatment: a June bride married in a garden, in bridal white, with veil and orange blossoms, accompanied by bridesmaids, ushers, a best man. There are to be a three-story cake, a cloudburst of rice, a glorious honeymoon, and on their return her groom will carry her over the threshold. Then, because they're in love and have got off to a good start with a proper wedding, Wendy expects the "happily ever after" to work itself out. Does that sound logical to you?

Did you ever wonder where some of our bridal customs come from? I did. And for Wendy's information, as well as yours and mine, I looked into it.

Demons and Omens

Let's start with that engagement ring every girl hopes to wear. Why a diamond instead of a ruby or a nice inexpensive rhinestone? Because the diamond, as late as the Middle Ages, was supposed to get its sparkle from the "fires of love," to be good magic against the evil eye, and a symbol of permanence since it never wears out. The wedding ring itself represented the circle, symbol of eternity. And why are both worn on the third finger of the left hand? Because in ancient times the heart, which they'd discovered to be on the left side of the body, was regarded as the center of emotions, and the Egyptians thought that a special vein ran directly from the heart to that third finger. Later a Roman scholar wrote that the wedding ring must always be worn there to keep love from escaping from the heart.

Egyptians thought a special

The idea "happy the bride the sun shines on" stems from the belief that the sun's light will bring many children. In England until the middle of the sixteenth century they followed the custom of the Far East and most marriages took place outside, usually at the door of the church. Certainly a bride exposed to the elements would be far happier on a sunshiny day than in a shower.

The bride's wedding veil is Bridal white signifies purity, while ushers and bridesmaids appear to be our legacy from an old Roman law that required ten witnesses at a wedding (legally sensible, I guess). But the real purpose was to deceive any evil spirits by dressing the bridesmaids like the bride, and the groomsmen like her intended. This way, should a jealous demon envy the happiness awaiting the marrying pair and wish to make trouble, he couldn't single out the woosome twosome.

Romans broke bits of cake over

Today the best man serves the useful function of holding onto the ring for the shaky groom, but in an older day when the groom often had to capture his bride by force he required a very good friend, and certainly the best man he could find, to fight off her relatives while he vanished with his lady. The honeymoon came into popularity at this time because it was really necessary for the couple to dash away from her friends and relatives and for the groom to keep her hidden until her family gave up the search or acquiesced to the marriage. The actual term honeymoon came from a custom that decreed that one month after the wedding, while the moon was going through its phases, the newly married couple drank mead, a wine made from honey.

According to the sages of the ages, the Orientals thought the orange tree had much good magic. It is evergreen, and Meats succulent and subtly seasoned, delicate crisp-tender vegetables, sauces tantalizingly sweet-sour are among the mysteries of Chinese cooking. But a greater mystery, still, is the economy and ease with which these elegant dishes can be served. To ancient Chinese philosophers, in fact, we owe thanks for much of today's common-sense cooking:

"Do not plan a conglomeration of expensive, out-of-the-way dishes just to give your guests something to talk about . . . for that is to eat with the ears and not with the mouth."

"Do not cover the table with innumerable dishes and an indefinite variety of courses . . . for this is to eat with the eyes and not with the mouth."

strawberry festival

The evening of the strawberry supper at Appleyard Center (to help pay for the new church organ) was blue and gold, scented with syringa and clover. Redstarts flashed into and out of the maple trees shading the lawn and the broad side of the church, with its buffet table laden with delicious food. The soft light from a gay string of paper lanterns flickered over a succulent pink barbecue-baked ham and a creamy, coral shrimp-and-coleslaw aspic.

"I'll carry out the succotash," said Mrs. Appleyard, rosy-cheeked, in a blue checked apron. "And look what we have for dessert." She proudly surveyed her masterpiece, a towering sculptured pinkness of strawberry whipped-cream mold, waiting in the refrigerator next to Patience Barlow's strawberry-cream cake.

As people finished their supper, they went into the church and sat in the square pews listening to some of the old hymns the organist was playing. Voices began to join in:

"Drop thy sweet dews of quietness Till all our strivings cease. . . ."

It had been a perfect evening with a perfect ending.

Baked Boned Ham With Barbecue Sauce

1 boned whole ham—"fully cooked" or "ready to eat"
¼ cup whole cloves
1 cup drained pineapple titbits
6–7 maraschino cherries, cut in half

Sauce
½ cup soy sauce
½ cup vinegar
½ cup pineapple juice
½ cup honey
½ cup chili sauce
½ teaspoon dry mustard
½ teaspoon onion salt
Pinch cayenne

Combine sauce ingredients and simmer 15 minutes. Score ham and stud with cloves. Place on rack in shallow baking pan. Pour sauce over ham. Bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for 1½ to 1¾ hours for a 10–12-pound ham, or 2 hours for a 12–14-pound ham. Baste every 20 minutes. Remove from oven 20 minutes before end of cooking time. Baste and decorate with pineapple and cherries. Complete baking. If using a meat thermometer, it should register 130° F. (internal temperature at end of heating period). A 10-pound boned ham yields 25–30 servings.

Gingham Muffins

2 cups flour
1 tablespoon baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon sugar
1¼ cups chopped pitted dates
1 egg, well beaten
1 cup milk
¼ cup melted butter

Sift flour, baking powder and salt together twice. Add sugar and dates. Toss to distribute dates evenly. Mix egg, milk and butter. Make a "well" in dry ingredients and pour in the egg mixture. Stir lightly just to combine ingredients; there will still be lumps. Fill greased muffin pans ¾ full. Bake in a very hot oven, 425° F., for 20 to 25 minutes. Serve warm. Or cool on a wire cake rack. Wrap airtight in foil. Reheat, loosely wrapped in foil, in a slow oven, 300° F., for 20 minutes. Makes 12 muffins.

Strawberry-Cream Cake

Cake
2¼ cups flour
1 tablespoon baking powder
⅓ teaspoon salt
½ cup butter
1⅓ cups sugar
1 teaspoon vanilla
1 cup milk
4 egg whites

Strawberry Cream
1½ cups sugar
3 pints strawberries, washed, hulled and halved
3 cups milk
4½ tablespoons cornstarch
3 cups confectioners' sugar
1½ cups heavy cream

Cake: Sift the flour, baking powder and salt together twice. Cream butter and sugar until light and fluffy. Add vanilla. Add alternately dry ingredients and milk, a little at a time, beating well after each addition. Beat egg whites until stiff but not dry. Fold into cake batter. Divide between two well greased and floured 9″x5″x2¾″ loaf pans. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 35 to 40 minutes. Turn out onto wire cake racks. Cover with a clean cloth. Serve warm, sliced, with strawberry cream. 20 servings.

Strawberry Cream: Mix sugar and strawberries. Let stand at room temperature for 2 hours, stirring occasionally. Heat 2½ cups milk in a saucepan. Mix cornstarch to a smooth paste with remaining milk. Add to hot milk. Cook and stir until smooth and thickened. Cool and chill. Beat until smooth. Add confectioners' sugar, a little at a time, beating after each addition. Drain syrup from strawberries and add to cornstarch mixture. Mix well. Fold in strawberries. Whip cream until thick and shiny. Fold into strawberry mixture. Chill. Makes about 10 cups.

Shrimp-and-Coleslaw Aspic

3 envelopes unflavored gelatin
3 cups water
2¼ cups mayonnaise
9 tablespoons lemon juice
3 tablespoons grated onion
9 drops liquid pepper seasoning
3¾ teaspoons salt
2¼ cups finely chopped cabbage
2¼ cups finely grated scraped carrot
4 cups cooked, shelled and deveined shrimp

Heat gelatin and 1 cup water until gelatin dissolves. Add remaining water, the mayonnaise, lemon juice, grated onion, liquid pepper seasoning and salt. Mix well. Cool. Add the cabbage, carrot and 3 cups shrimp. Chill until thick. Mix well. Spoon into a 9-cup mold or divide between two smaller ones. Chill until firm. Unmold and decorate with chicory, escarole and the remaining shrimp. Makes 12 servings.

Spaghetti Loaf

2½ cups light cream
½ cup plus 2 tablespoons butter
2½ cups dry white bread crumbs
⅔ teaspoon thyme
1 tablespoon salt
1¼ cups grated Cheddar cheese
⅓ cup minced onion
5 tablespoons finely chopped green pepper
2½ pimientos, slivered
2½ tablespoons finely chopped parsley
7 eggs, well beaten
1¼ cups cooked spaghetti

Heat cream and butter until butter melts. Pour over bread crumbs mixed with thyme and salt. Let stand 10 minutes. Add remaining ingredients in order listed. Mix well. Pour into a well-buttered 9″x5″x2¾″ loaf pan. Place in a baking pan half full of water. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1½ hours or until a silver knife comes out clean from the center of the mixture. Remove and cool for 2 to 3 minutes. Turn out and serve with cheese-and-mushroom sauce. Makes 12 servings.

Cheese-and-Mushroom Sauce

1 onion, peeled and finely chopped
3 tablespoons butter
2 pounds button-size mushrooms, wiped clean
2 tablespoons flour
1 cup light cream
1½ cups grated Cheddar cheese
½ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper

Sauté onion in butter until transparent; do not brown. Add whole mushrooms. Cover and simmer until just tender. Blend in flour and add cream to make a sauce. Add cheese, salt and pepper. Cook and stir until cheese melts. Makes about 5 cups sauce.

Strawberry-Macaroon Whipped-Cream Mold

2 quarts strawberries, washed and hulled
1½ cups sugar
1½ cups crumbled macaroons
2 cups heavy cream
1½ pounds cream cheese
¼ cup milk
2 tablespoons grated orange rind
½ cup orange juice
3 envelopes unflavored gelatin
½ cup water

Cut 1 quart strawberries in half and mix with the sugar. Let stand 2 hours at room temperature, stirring occasionally. Soak macaroons in cream until soft. Allow cream cheese to soften at room temperature. Add milk and beat until smooth. Add orange rind and juice. Heat gelatin and water until gelatin dissolves. Drain berries. Add the syrup to the gelatin and beat into the cream-cheese mixture. Fold in strawberries. Whip cream-macaroon mixture until thick and shiny. Fold into strawberry mixture. Pour into a 10-cup mold. Chill until firm. Unmold and serve surrounded with the remaining strawberries. Makes 12 servings.

FIX-AHEAD CASSEROLES

Make 'em first thing in the morning – or even the night before! Make 'em the easy way with Campbell's Soups! There's your perfect sauce (or gravy) – cooked and seasoned with special care to put exciting new flavor in your casseroles! Before dinner, just pop your casserole in the oven – and relax till it's time to serve that golden, bubbling, Campbell-delicious casserole!

SAVORY CHICKEN CASSEROLE. In skillet, brown 2-lb. cut-up frying chicken in 2 tbsp. shortening; place chicken in 2-qt. casserole. Pour off drippings from skillet and blend into skillet 1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup, ½ soup can milk, ¼ tsp. each poultry seasoning and salt, dash pepper. Add 4 carrots (cut in quarters), 6 small onions, 1 pkg. frozen lima beans. Cover; cook 20 min.; stir. Pour over chicken; cover; refrigerate immediately. Remove 1 hr. 15 min. before serving. Bake, covered, at 375°F. for 1 hr.; uncover; bake 15 min., or until chicken is tender. 4 generous servings.*

TOP-O-STOVE CASSEROLE STEW

Roll 1 lb. beef cubes in 2 tbsp. flour, ½ tsp. salt, dash pepper. Brown in 2 tbsp. shortening. Stir in 1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup, 1 cup water, 1 minced garlic clove. Cover; cook slowly 1 hr. Add 6 carrots (cut in 2-in. pieces), 8 small white onions. Cover; cook 1 hr. Refrigerate immediately. Remove 30 min. before serving. Add 1 pkg. (10 oz.) frozen peas; cover; cook 30 min. If desired, uncover during last 10 min. to thicken.*

TUNA MACARONI CASSEROLE

In buttered 1½-qt. casserole, blend 1 can Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup, ½ cup milk, 7-oz. can tuna (drained, flaked), ¼ cup finely minced onion, ½ cup shredded Cheddar cheese, 2 cups cooked macaroni. Sprinkle top with ½ cup additional cheese. Cover; refrigerate immediately. Remove 30 min. before serving. Top with 2 tbsp. buttered bread crumbs; bake at 400°F. about 30 min. till bubbling. 4 servings.*

FRANK 'N POTATO CASSEROLE

To prepare sauce, combine 1 can Campbell's Cream of Celery Soup, ¾ cup milk, ¼ cup finely chopped onion, 2 to 3 tsp. prepared mustard. In buttered 1½-qt. casserole, arrange alternate layers of 4 cups diced cooked potatoes, sauce, and ½ lb. frankfurters (slit lengthwise). Cover; refrigerate immediately. Remove 45 min. before serving. Bake, covered, at 400°F. for 30 min.; uncover and bake 15 min. 4 servings.*

*Each dish may be completely prepared at one time. Reduce total baking time (cooking time for stew) 10 or 15 min.

Good things begin to happen when you cook with Campbell's Soups

Traffic signs you don't see

...but should always remember

The "traffic signs" shown here, though fictitious, are as important to your safety as the familiar ones posted along our streets and highways. Let's consider these "signs" and how they could help you avoid accidents.

Drive extra cautiously when you're upset. When you're worried or upset you may not give the alert attention to driving that today's highway conditions require. This is the cause of many accidents. Emotional stability is as important as any single factor in maintaining traffic safety.

Be sure your eyes are all right. Have your eyes examined regularly. If you notice changes between examinations, see your doctor for another eye test. To reduce eye strain, wear properly fitted sunglasses, but take them off after dark.

Never drive after drinking. No driver can take much alcohol without becoming a potential menace to himself and to others. Always remember that alcohol and gasoline are a dangerous combination!

Stop when you feel tired. Driver fatigue plays a part in many accidents, especially those that occur at night. With increasing fatigue, driver efficiency falls, until finally, nodding at the wheel results. Accidents that occur when the driver is dozing are generally very serious ones.

Don't drive after taking certain medicines. Sedatives may dull your reflexes; tranquilizers can cloud your judgment. Ask your doctor about the side effects of drugs, including antihistamines and cold tablets.

On long drives, take turns at the wheel. Share the driving with others—or stop now and then for a rest or refreshment. Prolonged driving—and its attendant eye, muscular and nervous strain—can impair your efficiency without your being aware of it. It's wise for drivers to rest every two hours on long trips.

Drive only when you're physically and mentally fit, and keep both hands on the wheel—for your own safety and that of your fellow motorists.

PRINCESS MARGARET'S HUSBAND

perfectly comfortable surrounded by pomp and ceremony, has been used to this way of life from birth. Tony Armstrong-Jones has never known it.

Indeed, at twenty-nine, he had until four months ago acquired those extra degrees of informality, odd mealtimes, haphazard sleeping hours, and freedom from normal conventions regarded as the privileges of the artistic set of London's elegant Bohemia of which he was a full-fledged member. His homes were in a cheap, dark and rather chilly basement in Chelsea, some small rooms overlooking the dockside of the River Thames at Rotherhithe and then in Pimlico, a faded neighborhood near Buckingham Palace, all of which might be likened to the cheapest apartments in the medium-priced districts of Greenwich Village.

He had no servants and few personal home comforts. When he entertained he either cooked the meals himself, got his daily cleaning woman to help out, borrowed help from the neighbors, or collected snacks and liquor from the nearby "local," as the British affectionately call their nearest tavern.

His last home, above his studio in Pimlico, was small and attractive, contrived largely by his flair for the unusual together with his ability to make an expensive-looking something out of a cheap and unpromising nothing. The spiral staircase of wood and brass leading from his apartment to the downstairs studio he built himself. Walls, woodwork and doors were papered and painted by him.

"Tony has wonderful ideas on decoration," said Mrs. Anna Garnett, mother of one of Tony's closest friends, Andy Garnett. "Bright colors, goldfish bowls in the walls—anything. Princess Margaret's home and his will be the chicquest in London."

Mrs. Ethel Wright, seventy-two, Tony's charlady, gave a more laconic opinion: "Princess Margaret may have to change her ways," she said, "but she isn't the only one. She will have to persuade Mr. Armstrong-Jones to be tidier. Maybe he was busy, but he used to let the place get into an awful mess."

Tony in many if not most respects would be better qualified as a husband for a commoner than for a princess—which is probably what he would have wound up as if a princess hadn't proposed (although he proposed back).

Of this young man whose background and inclinations are in most ways quite nonroyal, several personal glimpses are revealing.

He is extremely sensitive—though almost never referring to it—about a leg weakness left over from an attack of polio he suffered as a boy. He has a barely noticeable limp and the leg is a trifle thinner than the other. Because of it he rarely wears shorts or bathing trunks, and seldom dances—one of Margaret's chief loves is dancing. It is the reason he did not have military service. As a result of it, also, he did not equal his father's athletic career when he was at Cambridge University, although he took pictures of athletic events for the Cambridge newspaper, the Varsity. (The paper did not like his pictures well enough to keep him on the staff, but sportingly headlined news of his engagement in a local-boy-makes-good spirit, PRINCESS TO MARRY MAN WE FIRED.)

He is acutely sensitive to the reactions of those he is with and sympathetic to the feelings of those who matter to him personally.

The queen mother, attending a movie première not long before announcement of his engagement to Margaret, extended her hand graciously to a tall, imposingly dignified gentleman standing near the entrance to the theater. She had never seen him before, but she is accustomed to being greeted at theater entrances by some rather dignified gentleman—usually the theater manager—who then personally shows her to her place. The gentleman in this instance was not the theater manager, but he grasped her assumption, and with the help of quick cues from theater assistants ushered the queen mother to her seat. Tony did not want to tell the queen mother the man's identity for fear of embarrassing her—but Margaret did. It was Tony's father.

Tony's perceptiveness to the possibility of discomfiture in others is perhaps a result of his own sensitivity: he himself is embarrassed when revealed as not knowing something that everyone else knows. In his first public appearance with Margaret as husband-and-wife-to-be, at a ballet telling the story of a girl who prefers a poor boy to a rich man, his hands, kept clasped behind him in an effective poise-inducing mannerism copied from Philip, were clenched so tightly the knuckles showed white. When the time came to leave the royal box Tony moved aside to let the ladies of the party proceed first. They smilingly motioned him to his proper place—preceding them. But it was a moment of confusion.

He has shown he can be less sensitive on familiar ground or when his work is involved. Once while photographing one of the society matrons who, along with actresses and theatrical subjects, have formed a large part of his clientele, he informed another woman present at the sitting that he "no longer required" her help. She was a close friend of the woman being photographed; her suggestions had been friendly and not dictatorial, if persistent. His dismissal was conclusive. "Your suggestions are not needed here," he said. Yet the woman he had come to photograph thought him "a darling boy. He understood me. I mean he understood me, what I am like inside."

Most women he has photographed feel the same way about him, and have felt it immediately on meeting him. On a trip to the United States two years ago to photograph backgrounds for the play Rashomon, he photographed Mrs. Henry Fonda.

"You sense instantly that he is interested in you and likes you," she said. "He is terribly alive and always restless and moving around, like a fox—or a hummingbird. Very imaginative, though he can be a little corny when he is directed to make conventional poses. He was told to photograph me in a big gauzy dress and he took it with me lying on the floor and the skirts all around me. I didn't like it too much. But when he is following his own inspiration it is very good. He wanted to photograph me against the New York slums, and he did and they were beautiful, wonderfully expressive pictures. He wanted to photograph me in my kitchen. He will work, work, work to capture the feeling of realism he senses in a subject."

He photographed the "best-dressed" Mrs. William Paley leaning and looking out the window of her suite in New York City's St. Regis Hotel while he himself hung precariously out over an adjoining balcony to capture just the right angle of light.

He once developed a picture twenty-seven times under varying conditions of wash to get a particular "white on white" effect he wanted, to show sunlight filtering through a tree onto a city pavement.

WORLD MENTAL HEALTH YEAR

January, 1960—August, 1961

How can positive mental health be promoted? Can we prevent mental illness? What can we do to reduce human suffering and material loss by better care and treatment for those who are ill? The answers to these questions are being sought in a world-wide program of research and fact finding sponsored by the World Federation for Mental Health. If you wish to give your financial support to this important effort, address the U. S. office of the World Federation for Mental Health, 162 East 78th Street, New York 21, N.Y.

CONSTIPATION Make You Weak?

No need to let constipation "get you down." To get the kind of relief that doesn't cause weakness, be sure to get Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets. Doesn't cause cramps. Contains ingredients that act to soften waste, stimulate intestines without causing upsetting digestive distress.

In clinical study Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets rated 71% better, on the average, than other laxatives tested. These included candy and chewing gum laxatives, so-called "liver" pills, a well-known bulk laxative, milk of magnesia and ordinary mineral oil.

So why look further? Get relief without distressing weakness. Ask for Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets today!

What other people say about Tony can be illuminating. "I have known Tony all my life," said Lady Lewisham, one of Britain's best known and prettiest peeresses. "He was a terribly handsome little boy. I remember once I was at René the hairdresser's and Tony was taking advertising pictures. He caught me under the hair dryer. My hair was wet and in curlers. He said, 'Let me take a picture of you like that. It won't appear anywhere.' He'd practically taken it already by then. The next thing I knew it was in a national newspaper. My husband was horrified, but Tony talked me out of being angry. He said, 'It was good. It was real. I honestly didn't think you'd mind.' Tony isn't a society type. He doesn't like coming-out balls and things like that."

"He's splendid with children," said a friend, Mrs. Anthony Kinsman. "He has fantastic energy and at the same time tremendous patience. Once my four-year-old daughter Amanda was asked to join seven other little girls and eight boys to do bridesmaid and pageboy pictures for Tony. Well, Tony took them all off into the country and he was a marvel. Keeping sixteen children under control would shatter my nerves utterly. But not Tony's. In no time at all he had the children in their little costumes playing in trees and doing the most unlikely things. My little girl has been terribly fond of him ever since. He would make the most wonderful father."

(Tony once said he got along well with Prince Charles because "I always talk to him like an adult.")

As the future brother-in-law of Her Majesty Elizabeth II, he had been "invited" to live in Buckingham Palace until his marriage, thus protecting him and the royal family from the scrutiny, speculation and unending questions which would have hounded him every moment. To offer hospitality to the young man who was her sister's future husband presented no problem to Elizabeth. Her palace occupies 45 acres of land, woods, a lake and gardens in the center of London, has 602 rooms and a permanent staff of 260 footmen, maids, charwomen, kitchen workers and maintenance men to look after them.

But going to stay at the palace presented innumerable problems to Tony Armstrong-Jones, first of all in pure geography. Every member of the household (officials who serve the queen and Prince Philip), every gentleman, porter, page and ladies' maid knew the palace and its procedures better than he did.

When he arrived last February, as a future member of the royal family, he was told to use the "royals'" private entrance, screened from public view by the front façade of the palace. He had been given an identity card, a code telephone number. His name, description, picture and index number and type of his automobile had been circulated to palace security officials. But it was not possible to issue his picture to all 260 members of the palace staff.

Mr. Armstrong-Jones must have been glad that on the announcement of his engagement he was the most photographed photographer in the land. It was a help toward recognition when he lost his way in the palace, thus minimizing the embarrassment of being politely stopped and asked his reason, as a stranger, for wandering in the wrong direction down one of the many corridors. Since the late Queen Mary once got lost in Buckingham Palace when she decided to explore a little-used staircase, Mr. Armstrong-Jones had a formidable amount of map reading to do.

He was given private apartments on the third floor with windows overlooking the side garden of the palace, flanked by the busy moving traffic on Constitution Hill. He was fortunate in being housed in that part of the palace where the central heating extends to provide hot running water. There are still many rooms in the 240-year-old building which cannot be serviced by central heating and to which the hot water must be brought by maids or valets in big copper cans each morning.

Margaret loves Tony for what he is—she could easily have found a more obviously "suitable" mate long ago—but he will have to change greatly.

He already has changed. He lives more by the clock, along more conventional lines. He has given up his tight-fitting "drainpipe" pants which he had in materials ranging from beige gabardine to blue jean; high boots, flashy scarves. loud shirts and socks and "braces" (suspenders). Before he knew Margaret he almost never wore a dinner jacket. He will now wear Savile Row suits for ordinary everyday wear. and tail coat and white tie when required, riding breeches and possibly even kilts should the occasion make them appropriate.

He has always preferred an utterly informal do-what-the-spirit-moves-you sort of life. Although he made a comfortable living from his photography in recent years, he continued to live the free-and-easy life he adopted in the early days when he was earning little. It gave him a world in which he could exist without restraint, in which nothing was expected of him that he was not willing and able to give.

This does not mean that Margaret's style of entertaining and life is completely unknown to him either by birth or by experience. His parents are well-to-do and prominent. He is even said to have a remote connection with Welsh and British royalty—genealogists have figured out that Tony is the great-grandson of English King Edward I; and is, as well, Margaret's twelfth cousin twice removed, their first common ancestor being Collwyn ap (meaning son of) Tangno, a Welsh chieftain who existed 1000 years ago. And there are several titles scattered among his family members.

His mother is the Countess of Rosse. His father, from whom she was divorced shortly after Tony's birth, is Ronald Owen Lloyd Armstrong-Jones, who inherited a small fortune—in the hundreds of thousands of dollars—from his father, Sir Robert, who added the Armstrong to the family name in 1913. His full sister is the Viscountess de Vesci, and he has two half brothers by the Earl of Rosse—Lord Oxmanton, twenty-three, and the Honorable Desmont Parsons, twenty-two. He also has a new thirty-one-year-old stepmother, pretty, blond Jenifer Unite Armstrong-Jones, former British Overseas Airways hostess and daughter of a fruit-and-vegetable merchant, who was on her honeymoon with his father in Bermuda when the official news of Tony's engagement to Margaret broke.

The Countess of Rosse, who was the society beauty Anne Messel, is an elegant hostess, in Ireland, Yorkshire and Eaton Terrace. With her husband and her artist brother, Oliver Messel, she is devoted to nineteenth-century art and architecture.

It was his mother's gift of a camera when he was convalescing from polio that started his interest in photography. It was her interest in architecture that led him to study that subject at Cambridge.

The architecture didn't take, but the camera did.

Tony was educated at Sandroyd School, then at Eton, where he was stricken with polio. After he recovered he entered Jesus College at Cambridge, where his record was considerably less than impressive. After two years as a rather bored architectural student he was "sent down"—expelled—for the "usual high jinks," failure to attend classes regularly, staying out late beer-drinking.

Tony has seldom referred lightheartedly to this episode in his life.

After that he got a job in 1951 with Baron, who was a court photographer and personal friend of Prince Philip from wartime days. Several months afterward he opened his own studio. He got few commissions at first. The turning point came in 1956, when he wrote the Duke of Kent asking for a sitting. The duke liked his pictures and the results were so pleasing that Tony took the duke's twenty-first-birthday portrait. After that jobs came fairly rapidly. He compiled a book of photographs of London, collaborated with Sacheverell Sitwell on another book, on Malta. He did the first photographic scenery for a stage revue in Britain—Keep Your Hair On, produced by John Cranko, which failed despite critical approval. He was so busy he sometimes went back to his studio to work most of the night.

Two years ago he met Princess Margaret. He almost met her two years before.

One rainy afternoon in March, Margaret was sitting in the back of a London theater watching rehearsals for a new revue. She laughed at some of the effects—she had not laughed a great deal lately following her announcement six months before that "I have decided not to marry Group Captain Peter Townsend." The revue's managers had engaged Tony to take publicity photographs. He walked in the stage door. "Princess Margaret's out there," a stage attendant told him. Tony thought a minute. "Oh, well—the pictures can wait a day. I'll make myself scarce," and he left.

The honor of making possible their first exchange of words is claimed by the Earl of Leicester, at the wedding of his daughter to a friend of Margaret's, Colin Tennant, at Holkham Hall, near Sandringham. Margaret was in the wedding party and Tony took the pictures. The Earl of Leicester is certain they spoke, something like this: Tony said, "Would you mind just standing over there, please? Thank you." Margaret replied, "Here?"

Officially they met when Margaret attended a small private party given by her lady in waiting, Lady Elizabeth Cavendish, about two years ago. Lady Elizabeth asked Tony to come and take some pictures, and she introduced them. It was a polite meeting, but little more.

Not long afterward Margaret attended a ball with "old faithful" Billy Wallace—a nickname he earned by being the only one of Margaret's suitors who remained single over the years. They were with a group of friends. Tony spoke with a girl he knew at Margaret's table. Later on there was a Paul Jones, in which the dancers whirled about in large circles around the floor, and in a pause in the music Margaret stopped near Tony. They spoke briefly and later she signified her wish that he join her party.

They did not dance, or even speak further, until several weeks later at a debutantes' ball given by the other of Margaret's ladies in waiting, Iris Peake. Margaret again indicated her wish that he join her group. This time she indicated her desire to dance with him—in her customary way, by nodding her head in a definite, clearly identifiable mannerism (no one ever asks her for a dance first). They danced for a short time—Tony does not dance well and does not like to, although he enjoys dance music. But they talked. It is one of Margaret's great attributes that she can ask men about their work—men ranging in interests from Bertrand Russell to comedian Danny Kaye to renowned archaeologist Sir Mortimer Wheeler—just one leading question, and then gaze at them with shining blue eyes, needing to say little else besides "Oh, really?" and they will feel after an hour that they have been with a person who is not only lovely but gifted, who can discuss their subjects on equal terms with them.

She asked Tony about his work. He told her excitedly about the special photographic scenery he was doing for the next John Cranko show, Keep Your Hair On. She told him, "One night I shall buy every seat."

She didn't, because she was away when the show opened, and it closed after fourteen performances. But she continued to see him.

Once, when she was making up a theater party (she always made up a party of four to six, at least, in an effort to forestall the ever-upcropping rumors of romance) "old faithful" Billy Wallace was ill, and she invited Tony in his place.

She asked him sometimes to join her small informal cocktail and supper parties in her Clarence House sitting room. But she did not need to extend invitations in order to see him without attracting notice even among members of her own family, because by then he was accepted as a court photographer. Court photographers have a special status—they may often come and go as they like in the royal palace. Once Philip, an avid amateur photographer—as are most of the members of the royal family—took up Tony's invitation to visit his studio and inspect his equipment. Margaret visited him there, too, though not often.

But they also met at private parties in Mayfair and Belgravia. Margaret and Tony were weekend guests at the home of Jeremy Fry, thirty-five-year-old chocolate heir, several times last fall. They were Elizabeth's guests at Balmoral for two weeks last September. Still, not even the royal family knew. And Margaret didn't want them to. Tony was in a unique position to excite no suspicion: partly because he could always be assumed to be around in a picture-taking capacity; partly because he personally was such a contrast to the type of man whose public appearance with Margaret might cause marriage talk.

Tony was acceptable socially—but only barely. He was acceptable as the son of prominent, respectable parents. He was nice-enough looking, though not handsome in the classic sense. He is five feet five inches tall—tall enough to look over the top of Princess Margaret's most bouffant hairdo, but dwarfed by many of her friends such as Princess Alexandra, five feet nine in her nylon stockings. He has bright blue eyes, even features, a longish face, distinguished mainly by a quick flashing smile that comes often, showing white, even teeth.

But he was "different." His clothes were different; his manners were different. He does not give the impression that he was obviously "to the manner born"—even though he was.

And, finally, his whole life was "different" and everyone knew it. He gave wildly imaginative and informal costume parties. He once threw a friend into a fountain. He seemed to enjoy shocking people.

His girl friends were unconventional too. He has always known girls who were from established families—notably Henrietta Tiarks, daughter of millionaire banker Henry Tiarks, and one of England's most publicized post-debutantes. But there were also Edwina Carroll, a beautiful Anglo-Burmese actress, and Jackie Chan, striking half-Chinese actress-dancer who went into hiding when the engagement was announced. Tony had known Jackie for three years. She was his favorite photographic model—he took many pictures of her—and they kissed at the airport when Tony returned from the United States last year. They went on a holiday to Switzerland. Margaret knew about Jackie. Friends teased him about her in Margaret's presence—Tony, they said, had booked the entire front row at a pantomime in which Jackie played the lead. (Jackie Chan later won the role of Gwenny Lee, the Japanese "yum-yum girl" who never gets her man, in the film version of The World of Suzie Wong.)

As a result, when Tony and Margaret were seen together—even riding in his car together—there were no rumors of romance.

They had long conferences together and even the queen did not question that they concerned—largely, at least—photography.

Tony took the breath-takingly lovely upward-looking photograph that Margaret chose for her official twenty-ninth-birthday portrait. He also took some that were not so highly regarded by the British public, such as the one that shows her between two merry-go-round horses—much too undignified and untraditional a way for royalty to pose, many thought.

Once the family knew, they tried to persuade Margaret to wait. It would be more seemly, they argued, to make the announcement when the family was not in personal mourning for the deaths of two loved relatives—the Countess Mountbatten and the Marquis of Carisbrooke—and when it would not draw attention away from a royal welcome for Elizabeth's baby, the new young prince.

But Margaret wouldn't wait. She had listened before, and waited, and held family conferences and fought delaying actions over more pressing matters than these. She had waited until she was almost thirty years old, and that was as long as a girl ought to wait.

"They" proposed in January. Margaret proposed in much the same way she has always proposed that a young man ask her to dance, in a figurative sense. They discussed marriage; then she "nodded"—her meaning clear: she wanted to marry Tony and no one else.

Between the day Margaret told her family she would wait no longer to tell the world, and the time of the official announcement, Philip nearly let the "best-kept royal secret" out of the bag.

"It has been a tremendous month," he told painter Norman Hepple while sitting for his portrait in Buckingham Palace, just twenty-four hours before the announcement, "with the baby, two funerals and my sister-in-law getting engaged."

Hepple is a man who keeps his mind on his work. "I was so busy painting," he said, "I really didn't take in what he said about a sister-in-law."

Some people criticized the timing of the announcement. To these the family could only answer: "Margaret wanted it that way." Mostly public reaction, after astonishment, was delight that Margaret would not be a spinster, as had been feared increasingly with every birthday. (One newspaper waggishly suggested that "an American song writer" compose a piece for the royal couple—taking into consideration Tony's photographic background—and call it "Someday My Prints Will Come.")

Both of their lives will change—Margaret's, too, although Tony will inevitably make the greater adjustment.

Margaret will drop out of the limelight considerably—not performing so many public duties, mixing far more with the "arty" set she adores. This will be a mixed blessing. Actually she has always loved being a princess—but not as fully as is usually said. She enjoys living a gay, interesting life and doing it observably as a princess; but she has never enjoyed public duties, and has performed them mostly out of a sense of obligation to her family and training.

Tony gave up his professional photography before his marriage, and with it his erratic studio life. But he will certainly try to make Margaret's life the kind of life he likes, within the limits of what can be done in their rarefied set. He has never been an intimate of the "court set," nor enjoyed more than a little of the "garden-party/grand-ball routine."

Already Margaret seems more relaxed, especially when Tony is around. When photographers were taking their picture together at Windsor Great Lodge, Tony disappeared. It had been a long session. Margaret looked around, puzzled. Then she spotted him behind a tree. "There you are, Tiresome, I see you," she called teasingly and ran after him and they played hide-and-seek, giggling like children.

As a member of the family Tony now calls her Margaret (even her closest friends outside the family call her "ma'am" and "your Royal Highness"), but he also has affectionate names for her, "Pet" and "Sweetness."

He has already learned and does without conscious effort things that were a source of confusion to him five months ago—like walking four paces behind Margaret when they enter an auditorium or theater, and not picking up the check in a night club. (It will be mailed to them later.)

He is different from Philip, despite the comparisons drawn—that both liked casual clothing and a gay life before marriage. A significant difference often pointed out is that "Philip was a prince of Greece!" For him to slip into the royal niche was simplicity itself compared with the transition facing Tony should he choose to take a full public role.

It can come; but it will come gradually if at all.

Meanwhile, they will have an active life. Money will be no problem—Margaret's government income rose from $16,800 a year to $42,000 when she was married. She also has a private fortune, some of which she inherited from both her father and her grandmother, Queen Mary; and valuable jewelry.

They will travel abroad. They will exchange house visits with the queen mother and occasionally with Elizabeth and Philip. They will attend the theater, the ballet, concerts. Their social life will be sprightlier than that of any of the rest of the royal family.

Both will have to change small personal habits as well as important ones. Both have strong wills and hot tempers, but Tony is more subtle. Margaret simply puts her royal foot down in the royal manner when she wants something. Tony coaxes, reasons, if necessary goes by an indirect path to get what he wants.

Margaret is deeply religious. Tony, though a member of the established Church of England, has been a perfunctory and even dilatory churchgoer.

Both are impatient and find it difficult to focus their complete attention long on a subject or an individual they find dull. Both are intensely interested in doing and seeing everything possible.

Tony said in one of his books, "It's no good saying 'hold it' to a moment of real life. Like trying to hold a breath, you find you've lost it."

Margaret said once, "I cannot imagine anything more wonderful than to be who I am."

Already she has changed in a way that was apparent even before her engagement and could have given away her secret to a close observer.

She has always varied a great deal in her appearance on various occasions. She could be startlingly lovely when she took the pains to be perfectly made up, her hair consummately coifed, gowned in elaborately worked jewel-encrusted satins, an ermine stole flung over her shoulders with a carelessly soignée air managed by no other member of the royal family. At other times, in the Scottish highlands, wearing tweeds and little make-up, with her hair combed back in an indefinite style, she could appear quite plain.

"Lately she looks beautiful all the time," said a woman friend. "And," she added, "she looks like the cat that swallowed the cream."

People have said one reason she was attracted to Tony was a resemblance to her late father. She was devoted to her father and felt a deep sense of loss at his death. But there is not really too much similarity between the two men, beyond, physically, blue eyes and fair hair and a tendency to stammer slightly when tense and excited; and otherwise, an inclination to indulge Margaret. Her father let Margaret have her own way most of the time, excusing his helplessness before her with "She could charm the pearl out of an oyster." He never "told her off" the way Philip is not afraid to do, and has on several occasions.

Tony has a tendency to fuss over her, and indulge her too. But a man who loves a woman has a tendency to do this. It is a characteristic widely observed and, fortunately, not fatal.

But Tony, though soft-spoken, is not the basically gentle man that Margaret's father was. He has never compromised to live on another's terms. It is likely both will have to compromise now.

It is even more likely—in fact, a certainty—that the future for the Armstrong-Jones will not be humdrum. When you start off with a marriage license engrossed on vellum it's hard to achieve an ordinary way of living.

To learn how Princess Margaret kept her secret, turn to page 92.

THE LOLLIES

By ELIZABETH HENLEY

Summer's a blue tin music box
That the same old tune goes through:
A penny, a penny, a penny—
The children have nothing to do!

Amber, emerald, ruby, sweet
Barley sugars to last all day,
Everlasting the afternoon—
The children have nothing to play!

If only today be spent, my dears,
We shall spend more and many.
And mine's so thin I can see the moon—
A penny, a penny, a penny.

compared in dignity and quality with the White House dinners of the Hoover Administration.

The President wanted terrapin à la Maryland for the first course, but we did not have any terrapin dishes. When the President heard this he asked about it and I took the opportunity to tell him of the inadequate equipment of the kitchen for entertaining the rulers of the world with the dignity becoming to the wealthiest country in the world. The gold flatware lacked soupspoons, fish forks and knives. We had to use salad forks for dessert forks, and this meant washing the forks and spoons between courses before we could serve the fish or the dessert.

He said, "How horrible. But you know, if we were to ask for all those things you say we need, the politicians would make headlines out of the gold tableware being bought for the White House."

I said I realized this, but the newspapers had been sort of belittling our furnishings in comparison with the British embassy and the elegance and royal traditions of our visitors.

The President smiled and said, "I know how you feel, but at least I am sure we can arrange to get the terrapin dishes."

The dinner was a success. Besides an elegant course of terrapin I was, for once, able to buy enough Belgian hothouse grapes not only to decorate the table but also to make a service of fruit bowls to pass as a fruit course. I don't remember any other time since the Hoover Administration when this had happened or ever did happen again. We had been taking Tokay grapes and wiring them together to form clusters to decorate the tall fruit dishes on the table.

At the center of the horseshoe table there was usually one high-backed chair on each side for the President and First Lady, but the ruler of a country rates a high-backed chair. So there were two chairs with high backs on each side of the table that night. The President and the queen sat on one side and the king and First Lady on the other side.

On this occasion we changed the form of service. The President and king were served at the same time, and likewise the First Lady and queen were served at the same time. The dinner began at eight o'clock with the aides in their colorful uniforms, ladies in beautiful gowns especially bought for the occasion, and with royalty present everything seemed just a little bit more exciting.

The queen had a pillow she used in the car seat, and shortly after she was seated she requested this pillow. I think it prevented her from sitting too low in the car or at the table. So the President asked me to have her pillow brought. I sent one of the men to her maid for it, and as the Queen of England lifted herself I gently slipped the pillow on the chair.

We had a schedule to keep. My orders were to have the dining room cleared by ten o'clock, for 300 more guests were coming for the musicale after the dinner. When the President tapped his goblet of heavy cut glass that rang like a beautiful bell the table hushed to quietness. Then the President offered a toast to their Majesties, the king and queen, and to the people of England.

In response the king stood and offered a toast to the President and First Lady and to the people of the United States. If there had been complete quietness when the President offered his toast, it was even more noticeable when the king spoke. The king had had the affliction of stammering and I never felt so deeply moved in my life as, standing behind the President's chair, I watched this man of royal birth uttering his words with deliberation and dignity. His face showed a determined effort as he paused after each word, but without any hesitation or stammering.

I had an even greater admiration for the king, for to face an audience with this impediment of speech must have required great courage, will power and long hours of training. Perhaps it was my imagination, but the guests all appeared too alert in listening for the impediment of speech—or else I was judging others by myself.

After the toasts Mrs. Roosevelt and the queen led the ladies to the Green Parlor for coffee, and the President and the king led the gentlemen for coffee and liqueurs. For the concert we had Kate Smith, Lawrence Tibbett and Marian Anderson. Needless to say, the concert was a success and the artists were presented to the king and queen. After the musicale we served champagne punch to more than 300 guests.

At 1 A.M., before closing shop, I went over my instructions for the next morning's breakfasts. I had these instructions:

"Her Majesty, the queen—8:00 A.M. a small tray of tea; 9:00 A.M. tray of tea and fresh fruit, nothing else; 10:00 A.M., have a small decanter of sherry in Their Majesties' sitting room. Also be prepared with a tray of tea in case Their Majesties ask for it."

This message was from the lady in waiting. There were no orders for the king's breakfast. One thing was certain: breakfast was to be a little vague. But, including the lady in waiting, His Majesty's aide and royal servants, we served tea, more tea and still nothing but tea for breakfast, which was a novelty for us.

We had luncheon for the royal party and the presidential family, and a tea in the south grounds that afternoon so that some of the Cabinet members and heads of Government departments could be presented to Their Majesties. Each department head was seated with the royal party for a short time, when the king would ask questions about the working of their departments—especially the WPA and Social Security, for they were new adventures in government. On the third evening the king and queen departed for New York and from there to Hyde Park.

It was indeed an honor and a pleasure to have had this opportunity to play my small part in this important event. The king and queen were two grand people, but their royal servants could have stayed in England. They required more service than the king and queen, the lady in waiting or His Majesty's aides. The royal maid to the queen had two assistants, and she was a real browbeater. She would storm at the girls and they darted around like scared rabbits. In short, that royal maid to a royal lady was an overbearing snob. She criticized about everything we did with a sharp tongue. She was our guest and we no doubt would not ever see her again, but once was enough.

The Hitler shadow was looming over Europe. Little did I realize that within a few months this royal couple, their nation and all Europe would be in a death struggle to survive. By September Hitler struck Poland and England declared war on Germany.

Shortly after Dunkirk Ambassador Kennedy returned for a conference with the President, and after the conference Harry Hopkins asked, "How did you make out with Kennedy?"

The President replied, "Oh, I can handle Joe, but you know it is a shame that a man as smart as Kennedy is so blinded by his Irish hatred of England that he thinks England will be finished within the next two months. And he would not mind a bit. I did leave him with this thought: that when the liberties of forty million people on the British Isles are threatened, we are more than interested."

The President's name was offered at the Democratic National Convention for the third term and he was drafted over Garner and Farley. Mr. Willkie captured the Republican top spot and the race was on.

The President seemed to be very much impressed by Mr. Willkie, and after the election invited him to an off-the-record dinner in the Oval Room on the second floor. The President had been tipped off that Willkie was very fond of terrapin, and as we had no terrapin we rushed off to Harvey's, one of Washington's then finest eating places which catered to the diplomats with rare dishes. Mr. Willkie entered by the back door and went up the elevator to the second floor, where Mr. Hopkins ushered him in to the President.

Cocktails mixed by the President were served and just the three gentlemen had dinner. Mr. Hopkins began the conversation by saying, "I wanted you and the President to get together, for I think you are as important as the President in your approach to the new ideology of government which, as you know, isn't the Old Guard Republican viewpoint. As you know, also, the President doesn't have the viewpoint of the conservative Democrats."

These remarks brought from Mr. Willkie a sudden explosive, "Oh! I'll be damned!" He pushed his chair back from the table and said, "What do you guys have up your sleeves? Let's lay the cards on the table."

I heard no more of this conversation, for it was necessary for me to leave the room. I certainly would have liked to hear more, for this man from Indiana seemed to be very explosive. Mr. Willkie was never mentioned again after this conference in my presence, nor did I ever know the full reason for his off-the-record dinner appointment.

We were serving a luncheon party for Mrs. Roosevelt and the President was having lunch in the study on the second floor on Sunday, December 7, 1941, when the news really started things buzzing around the old house. The President called in the Cabinet and leaders of Congress. The Japanese envoy was called in and I understood from the usher, Mr. Claunch, that the President read the blast act to Mr. Saburo Kurusu, the envoy from Japan.

The President remained in the study. I heard him remark as further details continued to come in about the destruction of the fleet, "My God! How did it happen? I will go down in disgrace."

When I left the White House for home near one o'clock the next morning people were crowding the street in Lafayette Square, watching the White House. I do not know what they expected to see at that hour of the morning. The next day the President went before Congress stating that a state of war existed with the imperial government of Japan.

If I had thought the days of the early New Deal were busy, from then on I really had something to learn. For instance, on December 22 I thought that my daily detail was completed at 6 P.M. and was preparing to leave for home when my phone rang. I was told that an important guest was expected at about 7 P.M. The number in his party would be anywhere from 25 to 40 people, and the name of the guest was off the record.

Well, when the guest arrived one look told us that he was the Prime Minister of England, Winston Churchill.

This man Churchill was a dynamic personality. You felt it when he stepped into the room. His stature was typical of John Bull himself, with a jovial, ironic wit, a gruff, outspoken personality that could wax warm at times, yet you knew that underneath it was cold, factual and determined. His entourage occupied the entire east wing of the White House.

His was a healthy appetite. On his breakfast tray I was instructed to have something hot, something cold, two kinds of fresh fruit, a tumbler of orange juice and a pot of frightfully weak tea. For "something hot" he had eggs, bacon or ham, and toast. For "something cold" he had two kinds of cold meats with English mustard and two kinds of fruit plus a tumbler of sherry. This was breakfast. At lunch he had Scotch and soda. For dinner always champagne, and after dinner, brandy. Then during the evening more Scotch and soda.

The Prime Minister would wear an air-raid suit around the house, attending most of the morning conferences in this outfit. He would have conferences with his staff in which Lord Mountbatten was an important figure and the President would have conferences with his staff, including Admiral Leahy, Admiral King and General Marshall. Later the two combined staffs would go into conference together which could last and last.

During this stay many people who knew that the Prime Minister was a house guest were disappointed, on being invited to the White House, not to meet the President and the Prime Minister. Except for official occasions, they did not eat in the dining room. By dining together with a few of their advisers much time was saved. Mr. Churchill was to be with us for quite a few days.

At one time during this visit he left and went to the British embassy to avoid meeting Mme. Chiang Kai-shek. I heard Mrs. Roosevelt in the West Hall telling him that she wished he would stay. Mr. Churchill replied, "No. Thank you very much, but I know I couldn't stand that woman and I might not be able to hold my temper, or rather my tongue."

The next time he left us was when Mr. Crim, the head usher, called me and said, "The President wants you to get a crew together for a secret mission, destination unknown." The crew had to be selected at once. Each person was to leave his job and go home and stay there until a Secret Service man would come for him. The men were to pack for a stay of ten or fifteen days. When the Secret Service man arrived he would tell them what to do. No further information could be given.

Mr. Crim said, "The person to be cared for is a very important man and the President would appreciate it very much if you went in charge of the detail yourself." Of course the President had but to order, but men of great quality have a way of giving you the feeling that you are aiding them and that you are needed.

This was on Saturday, January 3, 1942, at 2 P.M. I selected my crew, called them together and gave them the instructions just as I had received them. I was asked, "What can we tell our families?"

I said, "There isn't anything you can tell them except that you are going on a mission for the President. Where, when and for how long, you do not know. But, by all means, remain at home." Those who needed tools I told to get their tools, to answer no questions and get out of the house as quietly as possible without attracting attention.

I called in my first assistant, Charles Fickling, and told him I would be gone for a few days and to take over. Then I went home and waited.

EXTRA! EXTRA!

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

What prop more gladdens the hostess than
That aid to the party, the Extra Man?
And pampered and petted, he'll be invited
Wherever the festive candles are lighted.
And opposite to this priceless pearl
Is placed that burden, the Extra Girl:
"Do go and be nice to her, Bill"—or "Syd."
For the Extra Girl is the loose-ends kid.

So no one is more sincerely elated
To see this problem successfully mated
Than is the hostess, whose spirits rally
With one less Extra Girl on her tally.
Though often her pleasure is blunted when,
In checking her list of Extra Men.
She realizes the blessing has cost her
One Bill or Syd from her scanty roster.

Sunday, January 4, at about 2 P.M. a Secret Service man whom I had never seen before rang my doorbell and presented his I.D. card. I grabbed my bag and said good-by to my wife and daughter. Then we went to the Washington Union Station, where we entered by the official driveway.

The Secret Service instructed my crew to wait in the concourse and took me into the stationmaster's office. In a small room off this office he gave me my instructions and the tickets. He told me to read the instructions and then destroy them.

After reading the instructions I went back to the crew and took them aboard a train. I was the only one in the party who knew our destination, but I was not to tell the others until we arrived there. My instructions were to get off the train near Fort Lauderdale, Florida. The conductor would let me know when we arrived there, which would be about noon on Monday. There we were to be met by another Secret Service man. The rest of our trip would be made by car.

We reached the place near Fort Lauderdale at 12:25. The man who met us was not a Secret Service man, but identified himself as the caretaker of a home owned by Mrs. Campbell, a relative of Mr. Stettinius, of the State Department. Her house was at Pompano on the sea and he said we were going there. His name was Edwin Lewis.

He was anxious to know whom we were going to take care of. Since Mr. Stettinius had made the arrangements, he was sure it would be the President. I told him I did not know, and at this he smiled. But I truly did not know.

However, I was guessing and when we arrived at Pompano the Secret Service detail told me to be prepared for about 15 or 20 people. Well, my job was cut out for me, for it was nearly 2 P.M. The plane was due to arrive with the important guest at 7 and dinner was scheduled for 8.

Mr. Crim, the head usher, had said that the Secret Service would arrange credit and that the house was completely ready to occupy. But the Secret Service had not been so instructed. With the help of the caretaker, I made a quick check of linens, china and supplies and sleeping quarters. Lo and behold, we even had to set up beds, and I had to drive fifteen miles for provisions with no credit credentials. Someone had failed somewhere along the detail.

I did not know just what to do, for I had only $100 of my own to buy whisky, brandy, champagne and food for from 15 to 20 people. The Secret Service man in charge told me he had no way to get to the stores because all the cars and trucks were needed to meet the plane. He said perhaps the caretaker could help me out. Mr. Lewis said he would take me in his car to the markets and stores. I showed him my White House I.D. card and asked if he would take me to Mrs. Campbell's tradesmen and vouch for me in securing provisions. He did, and we had no trouble. In fact, the tradespeople were most cordial. In many cases they invited me behind their counters to select whatever I wanted.

When the guests arrived I was not in the least surprised to find that it was Mr. Churchill and his party. Besides the Secret Service detail, this included the Scotland Yard chief and his detail, the Prime Minister's naval aide, his secretary, his physician, his valet and other staff members.

Well, I had everything for the dinner except the champagne, for which I made my apologies to the Prime Minister. This little town did not supply champagne for their trade and by the time it had arrived from Miami it was too late for dinner. The day ended at 2 A.M. when we had bedded the Prime Minister.

Next morning I was in the pantry when I heard a voice roar, "I say—where is everybody?"

I answered as I entered the dining room off the pantry, "Good morning, Mr. Prime Minister."

There he stood in his bare feet, looking like a pudgy, mischievous boy with a smile. He said, "Good morning. I say, can you expedite my man, Saunders, for me? And have the morning papers arrived?"

He was very complimentary about the dinner we had served the night before. I had had a standing roast of beef with Yorkshire pudding and horse-radish sauce, and of course at any meal—even breakfast—you always serve English mustard to the Prime Minister. He mentioned only the roast beef and Yorkshire pudding, saying it helped him to forget the fact that there was no champagne—which to my mind was a reminder to be sure and have champagne for dinner. I assured him there would be champagne that night.

Before we finished our little talk Saunders, the valet, came rushing in. The Prime Minister turned and roared at him, "So you have found your way!"

Saunders was a very nervous little man and he rushed off in a twitter, saying, "Sir, I will have your bath ready in a jiffy." After his bath the Prime Minister would have a tumbler of sherry. Then he was ready for his hearty breakfast.

Shortly after his tray had been returned, my bell rang and the indicator registered the Prime Minister's quarters. I entered the sitting room where he was sitting at the desk. I said, "Did you ring for me, sir?"

He grunted and said, "Yes. I am sure you are aware that I do not like whistling or talking outside my quarters. May I depend on you to take care of this detail?"

I replied, "By all means, Mr. Prime Minister."

Medina, the chef, was great for whistling. He enjoyed whistling Schubert's Serenade, and sometimes he would keep it going for most of the day. In the White House the kitchen was so far from everything that he was never heard except by the crew. Here it was different, so I told Medina, "No more whistling."

But every so often Medina would forget. Most of the times I would stop him. However, one of these times I forgot and, behold, my bell rang. I knew what was up when I saw the indicator. It pointed to the Prime Minister's quarters. Medina was in the midst of his whistling rendition of Schubert's Serenade. On the way to answer the bell I stopped by the kitchen and halted Medina.

Mr. Churchill was in the library reading as I entered. I said, "Yes, Mr. Prime Minister."

For a second or two he looked at me with that Churchill scowl. Maybe he thought this would unnerve me, but when you have faced men with six- and eight-ounce gloves and you knew their only thought was to beat your brains out for a few dollars and their reputations were such that you knew they were quite capable of doing it, no mental lashing could unnerve you. [Editors' Note: As a young man in Indiana, Alonzo Fields was an amateur boxer. He says now he "did not go far."]

Then he said, "How many stone do you weigh and how tall are you?"

I replied, "Sir, I am not too familiar with the English system of weight. I weigh two hundred and fifty pounds and I am six feet three and a half inches tall."

He replied, "Well, that is good. Don't you think you are big enough to stop that whistling?"

I said, "Oh, yes," in a voice of deep humility. "Mr. Prime Minister, the whistling shall be stopped."

That ended the whistling, but when the Secret Service were changing their posts of duty they would very often exchange a few words of conversation. Then you would hear the British Lion roar, "Stop that talking!"

There was a constant tour of couriers and often they would be invited for meals. The President and the Prime Minister had code names. A call over the phone would be "Mr. Worthington is calling Mr. Effingham." I was never too sure who was who, for I failed to note which in my diary.

The Prime Minister was one who was always late to bed, yet he wasn't a late riser. However, he usually took a nap in the afternoon before dinner. It was a pleasure to plan for the comfort of this great man because, like all great men so taken up with the problems of their countries and the world, he showed appreciation for the efforts of those paid to plan the things that were comforting to him.

The Prime Minister was in Florida incognito, so the daily routine was that after dinner he would retire to the library with Mr. Martin, his secretary; Commander Brown, the naval aide; and Sir Charles Wilson, his physician. There they would discuss the problems of the world and as he pranced up and down across the floor, creating phrases, he sometimes would stop and say, "Now there, let's say that again. Yes, put that down. We can use that sometime, I am sure. Yes, I like that," and he would repeat the phrase. I am sure many of the phrases that always gave a Churchill speech a punch line were created in this manner.

During these sessions Scotch would evaporate. I recall one such night when I thought we had the Prime Minister well fortified for the nightly session and was near retiring when I was summoned to the library. As I entered, I suppose my face must have reflected my astonishment to see the empty bottles, for the Prime Minister said, "Yes, my man, I need a little more to drink. You see, I have a war to fight and I need fortitude for the battle. And there is one more favor I hope you will do for me."

"Yes, sir," I answered.

"Well," he said, "I hope you will come to my defense if someday someone should claim that I am a teetotaler."

I smiled and said, "Mr. Prime Minister, have no fear, sir. You can depend on me to defend you against such a claim."

He chuckled and said, "That will be all. Good night."

Mrs. Campbell's cottage was about 100 fee from the beach, so one fine morning th Prime Minister went for a swim. The beac had usually been cleared. The nearest hous was at least three or four blocks away an when the P.M. went in, the Secret Servic could not find anyone within a mile of th beach. However, when he had finished hi swim there was discovered a woman with a dog strolling on the beach nearby and she sor of loitered around.

As the P.M. was incognito, the Secret Serv ice dared not in any way attract attention t him, so he had to stay in the water, for he wa without bathing trunks. We all had a few chuckles concerning his predicament and o course the P.M. never dared to swim in th raw again.

The afternoon of the day before we left Harry Hopkins called from Washington an told the Prime Minister not to let me forget t have stone crabs for him before we left. Ston crabs are a delicacy in Florida, and the Pres ident and Mr. Hopkins were very fond o them.

So at dinner that night we had stone crab for an entree. The Prime Minister said he en joyed them, but he was anxious to know i there was going to be any soup. He said fo an Englishman, soup is always a must if yo want to please him.

Mr. Churchill had invited the Prime Minis ter of Australia to board the train at Jackson ville, Florida, and to dine with him in hi stateroom. The dining-car waiters brough the food to me in a room next to the state room, since the P.M. was still traveling incog nito and not even the train crew knew who wa in the private car. The entire train crew wer curious about their special passenger. One o the vice presidents of the railroad made th trip and kept the conductor and other train crew members from interfering with th Secret Service detail and our party. The dining car waiters thought we were all FBI men. Th dining car was kept open for our party afte the car had been closed to the travelers. We all ate in the dining car except the Prime Min ister. All his meals were served in his state room.

The Prime Minister left the train just befor we entered the tunnel to cross from Virgini into the District of Columbia. We continue into the capital, where a detail of Secret Serv ice met us. Not until then did our familie know where we had been. We returned, as w had left, without any warning.

The end of the Florida trip certainly did no mean that Mr. Churchill's visit was over. H remained with us for nearly a month and half—from December, 1941, until nearl February, 1942. He returned again, and o September 8, 1943, when Italy surrendered h was with us. The President had a privat luncheon to celebrate the surrender. Th guests were Mr. Churchill; Mr. Stimson, th Secretary of War; Mr. Martin, secretary to th Prime Minister; Commander Thompson; Mr Bernard Baruch, and Colonel Llewellyn.

The party had a ring of joy, but there wa also a ring of soberness, for the P.M. re marked, "We are rid of the jackal. Now w can give our full attention to the Hun withou this jackal snapping at our heels."

We were getting well acquainted with th Prime Minister of England and he always le something to talk about each time he cam and went. The last time I had the honor t prepare for his comfort and entertainment wa after the war when he visited this country i 1952 and President Truman gave a luncheo on January 5. The guest list included Mr Franks, the British ambassador; Anthon Eden, Lord Ismay, Vice President Barkley Secretary Acheson, Secretary Snyder, Sec retary Lovett, Gen. Omar Bradley, Admira Leahy and several others.

Mrs. Truman was away at the time, so th menus were sent to the President. Whereupo I received this note from President Truman "Fields: I made some checks on thes menus. I believe that filet mignon would b the best meat course. The Prime Minister i fond of champagne. My salad preference is o No. 1 although No. 3 is excellent. Dessert o

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

One reason it is all but impossible to sympathize adequately with another's physical pain is that, according to the psychologists, pain is the only human experience which, the second it ends, leaves no memory.

The way to be happy with a husband is to have a poor memory; with a wife, a good one.

An old colored man declined to earn any "whether" money. Asked what he meant, he said, "When I works exter, that's 'whether' money because my wife and I fuss whether she's goin' spend it or whether I is."

Teenager, asked about his evening's activities: "The movie we saw wasn't there."

When new mothers leave a local hospital, they are wished "Many Happy Returns."

Small boy: "I don't see how God gets the matches down to us."

Mother: "What do you mean?"

Boy: "Well, I heard you tell Aunt Helen that matches are made in heaven."

When her daughter discarded a treasured potato peeler in the trash, my neighbor wanted to search the community dump for it. I know how she felt. I once had a measuring cup, used since my first days in the kitchen. It was split open at the top and I had to measure half a cup, then half again. But I much preferred it that way, and something wonderful went out of cooking when my family replaced it with a new one.

No. 1 is best and purely U.S.A., as is the filet. You look all three menus over and we will talk about it. HST."

So from the three menus we decided on oyster soup, celery hearts, assorted olives, filet mignon smothered with mushrooms, watermelon pickles, asparagus au hollandaise, grilled tomatoes, hard rolls, hearts-of-lettuce salad and Roquefort dressing, strawberry shortcake.

The Prime Minister was in rare form and on this occasion the habit of drinking was mentioned. He remarked that when he first went to India the drinking water was unfit for human consumption and the only drink fit for humans was whisky. For that reason he took up the habit of drinking and he just hadn't been able to drop it.

This brought quite a chuckle from the other guests. You would have to see the gestures of the P.M. and hear the inflections of his voice to be able to appreciate his remarks. Without a doubt, Sir Winston Churchill was one of the most impressive, dramatic and dynamic men it has been my pleasure to serve among all the leaders of this era.

Sandwiched in between Sir Winston's visits we had Mme. Chiang Kai-shek. She was and is a most charming lady to those who did not serve her. She is a proud and vain lady, especially about her ancestral line, and her table conversations were mostly about this ancestral line.

Of course I must say she had encouragement from the Roosevelts, for the President enjoyed talking about his ancestors too. But somehow the Roosevelts did not wear it on their sleeves.

Mme. Chiang was a very light eater—usually very weak China tea, soups and stewed fruits. A difficult person, extremely nervous and irritable with servants; but to many of the servants she made up for her demands, as she was a liberal tipper. Her bed had to be changed from top to bottom each time she got up. Even if she went to bed for only ten or fifteen minutes four and five times a day, each time the bed had to be stripped and the silk sheets replaced with fresh ones.

She had as her bodyguard a Mr. Kung, her nephew, and as her traveling companion a niece, Miss Kung. Miss Kung was not too pleased with the quarters assigned her at the White House. I understand that she expressed her objections to the State Department and after one or two nights she was provided with a suite at the Mayflower Hotel.

Mme. Chiang, without a doubt, had great charm and a striking personality and when she spoke before the joint Houses of Congress, I heard many of the gentlemen express praise for her ability and charm. She departed from her last visit at the White House May 5, 1943. I repeat that Mme. Chiang was a lady with very impressive charm and ability to sway people. Your opinion of the Great Lady of China, however, depends on what status of life you might happen to belong to.

On May 29, 1942, I was summoned again to prepare for an off-the-record guest of importance. As with most of the unannounced guests, he would arrive late in the day in time for dinner. The party staying at the White House would be small. The dinner also would be small, in the private dining room and very informal. So I pondered as I prepared my details just whom to expect.

The guests were rushed in through the south grounds and upstairs to their quarters. I did not see them upon their arrival, but shortly afterward I was summoned to the Rose Room. My assignment chart registered a "Mr. Brown" in that room.

My knock at the door was answered by a small, thin man who opened the door. He spoke excellent English, with an accent that I thought was Swedish. As I glanced over his head into the room I saw near the fireplace a man whom I readily recognized as Mr. Molotov of Russia.

The gentleman at the door was Mr. Molotov's secretary. He asked me to bring Mr. Molotov's valet to him. My chart showed that "Mr. Brown's" valet had the Yellow Room, so I proceeded to the Yellow Room and knocked on the door.

For some time there was no answer. I added a little weight to my knocking and shortly the door opened. For a second I was speechless, for standing before me was a nude woman with a bath towel wrapped—of all places—around her head. She could not speak English and the only words I could say in Russian were "Good morning," but I doubt very much that I could have thought of even those words just then.

I had nothing to say, but she said "Ya."

I said, "Mr. Molotov wants his valet," and she repeated "Ya."

I repeated, "Mr. Molotov wants his valet." Again she said "Ya" and pushed back into the room, leaving the door open. I turned my back and stepped away from the door and shortly she had a robe on, still with the towel around her head, and I led her to Mr. Molotov's room. I would like to think that I acted just as nonchalant as she did, for she certainly was not at all disturbed as she kept saying "Ya" while I tried to tell her my mission.

Mr. Molotov, with his round, chubby face, his stubby mustache and his eyes behind glasses, had an owlish, wise look, especially during conversations when he was listening. At other times his eyes would dart around with the glint of a fox waiting to spring on hi prey. It was this that often gave me the ide that perhaps he understood English.

Dinner in the small dining room was serve to the President, Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Molotov his secretary, and Charles Bohlen, from th State Department, who acted as the inter preter for the President. Mr. Molotov's sec retary did most of the talking in English an in Russian, and Mr. Bohlen kept the Presiden informed of what was going on. Mr. Molotov' rebuttals were just a little too fast for me and with the maneuvers of his eyes while a presi dential statement was being made, he seeme to be smiling to himself as if he knew what h was going to say before the translations wer even started. The President found it necessar to take his time in digesting the full content of Mr. Molotov's statements during thes translations.

Dinner was a simple affair of shrimp cock tails, clear soup, roast saddle of lamb wit mint sauce, hearts of lettuce with Russia dressing, and apple pie with sharp cheese.

Mr. Molotov made no particular request about food or drinks while he stayed with us He remained only a few days and then move across the street to Blair House for three o four more. He used to walk, unaccompanied up and down Pennsylvania Avenue and bough peanuts from Nick, the popcorn man, whos stand was a familiar sight to sight-seers an White House occupants for years.

After he returned to Russia his visit wa announced to the American public. The ma from Russia who many at the time though might be Stalin's successor seemed to me t be more mystic than impressive. The myst has no appeal for me. I rather distrust myst tendencies.

President Beneš of Czechoslovakia arrive on May 13, 1943, for a dinner party and con ferences and was a White House guest in ad dition to Mr. Churchill, who had arrived tw days before. President Beneš was a very quie little man and a pleasant personality. He gav the impression of a school professor who wa not quite rough enough for the task befor him.

I have chosen a few highlights from th many foreign personalities entertained at th White House during these years. By this tim these affairs had become so frequent that the were more or less daily routine. I should lik to list others whose visits I cannot mentio specifically: King of Greece, King of Yugo slavia, King of Iraq; Duke and Duchess o Windsor; Queen Wilhelmina of the Nethe lands; Queen Juliana and Prince Bernhard o the Netherlands; Duchess of Luxembour and consort; Crown Princess and Prince Ola of Norway; General de Gaulle and Genera Pétain of France; General Smuts of Sout Africa; Duke of Kent; Pandit Nehru of India Ramsay MacDonald; Ernest Bevin; Clemen Attlee; Anthony Eden and Lord Mountbatte

The rigors of the war in late 1943 were be ginning to tell on President Roosevelt. Th anxieties, long and late hours of conferenc on war policies, internal policies and politic were taking their toll. He no longer woul stand in a receiving line. He remained seate and received guests in a chair to conserve h strength.

The President always saw his secretarie while he was abed in his room, and usuall went to the office around 11 A.M. My brothe George and Arthur Prettyman divided th valet duties around the clock. This was not be cause of the President's health, but, sinc McDuffie had transferred to the Treasury De partment, two men were required to do h duties. McDuffie had had only one day off week and that usually started about 2 P.M When he was off Gus Generich, a former Ne York State policeman, would take over h duties. Gus Generich was the President's pe sonal bodyguard on the Secret Service detai

Here I must tell you something about th White House back-door politics. The hous hold servants were constantly in a dithe about the long hours they had to put in an no one would dare to say too much about i When the Hoovers were in the White House was a short day for the dining-room and kitche help if they were through after twelve hour but you did get one day off a week. The maid housemen and doormen had much better hours. Despite the pride that existed in those days of a butler feeling his class was above a houseman, most of the men on the butlers' staff—except the head and second man—always welcomed the chance of being detailed to houseman duty because it meant you would get home earlier.

The tension in the dining room under the Hoovers was hard to get used to, I confess. But once you had passed the scrutiny of Mrs. Hoover, you had to be tops. The slightest error was an offense. I do not believe it really mattered too much to President Hoover, but this I will say: once you had served under Mrs. Hoover, you really knew the formalities of service.

During the Hoover Administration the sounding of three bells would send the help hurrying and scurrying for a hiding place. One of the ushers would rush down the stairs with a doorman who would get the elevator and lock it, waiting for the arrival of the President, and the usher would see that no one was in the corridor.

There was only one elevator then, and if anyone was on it other than the First Lady, you had best jump off as soon as possible. On the second floor, which is the living quarters, there was a closet with a sink near the stairway used by the housemen and maids for their cleaning equipment. If either the President or First Lady came out of their rooms into the corridor the maids, housemen and butlers would scamper to this closet. They would almost run one another down trying to be first in the closet and out of sight, for if you lingered and were seen you would be warned not to let this happen again.

No man is exempt from saying silly things; the mischief is to say them deliberately. MONTAIGNE

I am sure the President and Mrs. Hoover never requested such actions, but those in charge preferred to have things done this way. It was really funny to see the help packing into that closet. It was like a cat coming into a room and surprising the mice playing and they had only one hole to dart into for safety. In those days I, too, pushed my way in, and no question about its being full after I got in!

On the roof of the house was a sun parlor which was used as an office for Mrs. Hoover's secretaries, Mrs. Butler, Mrs. McMullin and Miss Hobby. The secretaries usually had luncheon served upstairs in this office at 12:45. The family had lunch at 1 P.M. The butlers' staff at that time consisted of six men—the first, second and third man and the rest of the crew who really did the work, as the song goes. We toted the trays, washed the dishes, cleaned the silver. We had no status except to do what we were told by the three men of rank. So a free elevator during mealtime meant a lot to the three of us, since we had to carry those trays from the kitchen to the top of the house.

But at 12:45 the elevator would be locked, waiting for the three bells that would signal the coming of the President. Sometimes the doorman might take a chance and run us up, but if he did and the warning bells were to ring, he would be in bad with the head usher, even if he got back before the President arrived.

The top-salaried servants were the valet, head cook and head butler. The rest of us received from $60 to $90 a month and, with the depression on, you were mighty thankful to have a job, for you well knew it could be worse. Much worse. If you were a butler or cook, you received three meals a day. Other servants, except those that lived in, had two meals a day.

Well, March 4, 1933, brought some changes for the help that were improvements and some that were worse. They no longer had to run and hide when they heard the President's three bells, and when they were working in the halls, if Mrs. Roosevelt or the President came out, they were told to keep on working. If you happened to be near an elevator with a tray and the President or Mrs. Roosevelt was going up, they would call for you to come and ride up with them.

Although the removal of this tension was a great relief and many of the rigid formalities were dispensed with, you had longer working hours and less time off. But the closeness of the family had a way of making you enjoy working hard, up to a certain point.

The first thing Mrs. Roosevelt said was that your day off would be after the serving of lunch once a week, with every other Sunday off after the Sunday midday meal. Vacations would consist of only two weeks

We soon found out that the day off after lunch meant you would hardly get out before 3:30 P.M., so your day was gone. On Sundays it was even later. James Mingo and James Reynolds, the two butlers the Roosevelts had brought to the White House, were very disappointed over the working conditions. James Reynolds said he did not think it would do much good to talk to Mrs. Roosevelt about the long hours and inadequate time off. He said this was her custom and she would be hard to convince otherwise. But Mingo started a campaign with Mrs. Dall, and after not too long a time we started getting our full day off again. Except me—I had to take whatever day there was when there might not be many activities scheduled, and such days were few and far between. Also. we finally got our full vacation time back.

The next feature which upset the help was the cutting of salaries. The President in his campaign had promised to cut the government cost 25 per cent. All salaries were reduced 25 per cent, so a check that had read $43.65 the first and fifteenth now read $32.54. The valet, head cook, housekeeper and head butler's salaries were cut at the base pay and then the 25 per cent cut. The valet's salary was cut from $150 a month to $75.

The old White House servants were alarmed at the lack of dignity of the valet who appeared in a white coat where all other valets had worn striped pants and short coat in the morning and in the afternoon striped pants and a cutaway coat. McDuffie wore a white coat and most any color pants and shirt and tie. The two butlers had never worn full-dress clothes.

Of course as chief butler I lowered the dignity of that position, for I did not take walks up Connecticut Avenue in the afternoon in a cutaway coat and striped pants. Also, I broke down the class in the ranks of butlers because we all pitched in and worked together. There was too much work for even the head man to stand around and pose.

In the mornings until after lunch the butlers wore tuxedos, stiff shirts and black ties. For afternoon tea and dinner they wore tails, stiff shirts and white ties both summer and winter. Again the backdoor politics changed this to soft shirts with tuxedos and in the summer a light worsted business suit with black tie and soft shirt.

This was much cooler and less expensive, for we had to pay for our laundry and in the Washington heat a stiff shirt and collar didn't last long. With the cuts in salary, we finally got it settled for the laundry to be paid for by the Government.

The Roosevelt grandchildren and nurses added many problems to the duties of serving meals on trays. Finally a kitchen was built on the third floor which also served as a diet kitchen for the President. When all the grandchildren were present, meals could be prepared there and served in the sun parlor or hall.

My wife, Edna, was hired by Mrs. Nesbitt to cook for the grandchildren. I protested, for, as I told her, my wife was not a cook. Nevertheless, she went to work and I must say she surprised me, for she certainly cooked much better for them than she had for me. My wife still tells me off about the time I told the people at the White House she couldn't cook. I am not sure whether she has forgiven me, but she certainly hasn't forgotten about it.

She happened to cook a few meals for the President when the grandchildren were there, so now I dare not go into the kitchen at home when a meal is being prepared.

It was during one of these occasions that she had an experience with little Buzzie Dall. He peeped into the kitchen and asked if he might ask her a question. She told him to come in. He climbed up on a kitchen stool, crossed his legs and looked at her for a second or two. Finally he said, "What I want to know is do little boys have to have two daddies?"

I have always admired my wife's ability and at the same time begrudged it because I have never been able to keep up with her retorts. But she said this was one time she had to think before talking. She answered him, "I should think a little boy would be very lucky to have two daddies loving him. Just think how wonderful it is to have one daddy loving you. Some little boys are not lucky enough to have even one daddy to love them."

By this time the other children were calling him to play and she was relieved that the conversation was over.

One of the dearest and just about the most lonesome child ever to live in the White House was Diana Hopkins before her father married again after the death of her mother. She was a well-behaved and very companionable child. Mrs. Roosevelt was busy and likewise Diana's father. The maids were kind to her, but they offered little understanding or companionship.

She went to a private school and the little Soong girl from the Chinese embassy seemed to be her closest companion. She would go to the Chinese embassy to dinner and the Soong child would come to the White House.

One day a butler, Bill Coates, said to me that Diana and the little girl friend wanted to learn to cook. I said, "When we are not busy they can come in and we will be glad to teach them to make cookies, biscuits and cakes."

Diana was so pleased that she wanted to fix her own lunches for school and we taught her how to set up a tray and a table. She wanted me to put her name on the butlers' weekly schedule, so I made out a schedule with detail for her. She took it seriously and was just as punctual as any member of the crew and she was so pleased with herself for being a part of the crew.

Despite all the problems of the war, a presidential election was looming. It was obvious to those near the President and in position to observe the steady decline in his appearance that the talk of a fourth term would arouse a question as to his ability to see it to the end. He would appear fresh and pink when he arrived at a dinner party, but by the end of dinner he would seem to sag. His face would turn pasty and blanched. Whereas two or three hours prior he had looked alert and peart, he appeared tired and exhausted.

At a luncheon of a few political leaders and members of the family including Mrs. Roosevelt (although the President was not present), the talk was of the need for him to run again. Mrs. Roosevelt made no comments, but Mr. James, who was home on furlough, was very much set against it. He said, "If father runs for a fourth term and is elected, it will be the means of killing him."

Well, the pros and cons kept this up until the spring of 1944, with the doctors declaring that the President was as good as ever. At that time it was conceded that no doubt the President had a job to finish and only he could see it through.

After the election and Christmas holidays, normal activities continued, but the President had fewer social obligations. To save him from physical wear, the inaugural ceremonies were held on the south portico of the White House. By now the inaugural parties gave me little excitement. However, when one was over and you were complimented it made you feel that you had accomplished something.

The inaugural climaxed three days of teas and dinners, with the house filled with guests. On January 23 we were having a Cabinet dinner, to be followed by Mrs. Roosevelt's double-header teas. Just around the corner would be the luncheon for the movie stars, the March of Dimes Ball and the President's birthday. So each day taxed our imagination

On March 17, 1945, the President and Mrs. Roosevelt celebrated their fortieth wedding nniversary. Princess Juliana of Holland was aying an informal visit to the Roosevelts. We ad the usual exchange of presents between Mrs. Roosevelt and the President. On March 3 the governor general of Canada, the Earl of Athlone, and Princess Alice arrived for a state ffair and there was the usual fanfare and inner.

There were rumors that the President had ad an attack at Hyde Park during his stay here during Holy Week. Easter was on April rst. The President returned to Washington fter Easter and remained two or three days, hen took off for Warm Springs, Georgia. I verheard John Mays, the doorman, saying to Admiral McIntire, "I know it is none of my usiness, sir, but the President looks very bad o me. Don't you think you should have gone ith him?"

The admiral said, "I don't think he will eed me. However, if it will make you feel any etter, I have assigned the Navy's top man to o with him. I am sure he will come back a ifferent man. Ten or twelve days at Warm prings will make him feel fit as a fiddle."

The twelfth of April started out like any ther day. Mrs. Roosevelt, Colonel and Mrs. oettiger and little Johnny Boettiger were the nly ones in the house. For once Mrs. Roosevelt had no important activities scheduled, and fter luncheon I took advantage of the situaon and went home, leaving word to call me I was needed.

ux and polish the floors. I turned on the dio while I was working. I really didn't reit when first the announcer said, "Our beved President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, ssed away at Warm Springs, Georgia, day."

I was stunned. I left my floors half finished, anged my clothes and was rushing out of e house when the phone rang. I said, Hello. . . . Yes, I heard and am on my way."

I took a cab, but the cab could not get any oser than Lafayette Park. Thousands of peoe were packed in the street on the park side ross from the White House. Police details re keeping the people on one side of the eet. I had to present my I.D. card to cross er to the house.

When I arrived the family was upstairs in e West Hall. I went up and offered my conlences and any services one might be able to nder. Though most of us in the house had own that perhaps this might happen, somew we found it difficult to accept.

This was Thursday afternoon, April 12. ce President Truman was sworn in as Presint of the United States. He called on Mrs. oosevelt after the swearing in, with Mrs. uman and Miss Margaret. I was in the West ll when they arrived.

One of the first things Mrs. Roosevelt said s, "We will be getting out as soon as ssible."

President Truman told her, "Now don't u give that a thought. Take your time and not hurry."

President Truman and his family moved m their apartment to Blair House and ormen and ushers were sent across to Blair ouse.

Preparations were made to receive the body President Roosevelt to lie in state in the st Room. The funeral train left for Hyde rk Saturday night. Aboard the train were sident Truman, Mrs. Truman, Miss Marret, members of the Cabinet, Supreme Court tices, political leaders, the press and radio ople and the Roosevelt family. The memrs of the household staff were Mrs. Nesbitt, the housekeeper; Arthur Prettyman, the valet; Alice Palmer, Mrs. Roosevelt's Hyde Park cook; John Boardley, chief messenger, and myself.

It was a cool, chilly April day at Hyde Park. I think most of us who were trembling and with voices quavering when we talked were hoping that our neighbor, standing next to us, would assume that the chill in the spring air was the reason for the tenseness and shivering. But he, too, appeared to be having the same trouble.

After the impressive, white-haired vicar had pronounced the benediction and taps had been sounded over the final resting place of the President you dared not even look at your neighbor or try to say a word. You merely took one last look and walked away with eyes straight ahead.

We left for Washington at noon and next day faced the work of taking inventory of the personal effects which the Roosevelt family had accumulated during twelve years in the White House. I had catalogued the personal silverware, pewter and china, so we did not have too much trouble in my department.

Mrs. Roosevelt was anxious to get away and she warmly thanked me for this effort. Within two weeks a farewell reception was held by Mrs. Roosevelt, the children and grandchildren to say good-by to the household and office help and police guard. This, too, left you emotionally limp, as each member of the family would take your hand and say, "Thank you for being so nice to us for all these years."

Once the family had departed, we had to put our attention to making the house ready for President Truman and his family. Again, after twelve years, we were faced with apprehension, wondering what to expect. Would we be able to please the Trumans, and what would they be like?

How Princess Margaret Kept Her Secret

There were so very few rendezvous where she and Tony could elude the headline writers.

By JAMES LEASOR

How was it possible for the most publicized princess of our time to conceal the exciting fact of her love?

The main reason why the princess and the photographer could keep their romance a secret so successfully was the seemingly complete unlikelihood that they could possibly be attracted to each other! Once, in May of last year, a reference to their being together in public did appear in a British newspaper. They were two in a party of six at West Side Story. The reporter wrote that he "hardly recognized" Tony Armstrong-Jones in a white tie and tails. His usual wear was loose black sweater, tight narrow trousers, suède boots. They saw the musical together, without any companions, on two subsequent occasions. These visits were not reported for the best of reasons—that no one knew about them. They arrived separately and only met in their seats, which had been booked in other names. During the intervals they remained seated, studying their programs.

Such a genuinely private visit to the theater was so unusual, so out of keeping, so unexpected that no one in the audience would imagine or expect that the girl who looked like Princess Margaret could actually be Princess Margaret.

When arrangements were being made for them to meet, Armstrong-Jones was never referred to by name lest suspicions should be aroused. He was known by the nickname Taj, from his initials, T.A.J., or even as "Taj Mahal."

Antony's studio at 20 Pimlico Road was under half a mile from Clarence House, Princess Margaret's home. He had fashioned his flat from an ironmonger's shop, wedged between a laundry and a store that sells dead men's clothes. Here he lived his lively and social bachelor life against a background of twentieth-century bizarre and eighteenth-century elegance. A tiny stuffed bird moved endlessly in its gilded cage to the music of "Sweet Violets." In the background was a parachutist's dusty bicycle.

Guests asked to dinner, more often than not, would be asked to help get the meal. Armstrong-Jones invited important guests to scratch their names on his bathroom mirror with a piece of diamond instead of writing in a visitor's book—but Margaret's name is not there. When Armstrong-Jones did the cooking he and she usually ate green or red peppers, stuffed with chopped meat and rice. When the princess cooked, she favored bacon, eggs, sausages and fried bread.

Who would credit that Princess Margaret would marry a man who regularly carried his own laundry to the local self-service launderette?

When Princess Margaret first decided to visit Antony Armstrong-Jones at his studio, her chauffeur drove her several times around the block before she was satisfied that the road was empty and she could alight without being seen.

RONALD WESTON

Tony and the princess often sat on these stools at the bar of the River Club, a mile from Tony's flat.

Once, on an impulse, the princess borrowed a scarf from one of her maids to wrap around her hair. This was elaborately unnecessary. Who of Queen Elizabeth's loyal subjects, walking along middle-class Pimlico Road, an area that even borders on the seedy, would expect to see her sister knocking at the gray-painted front door of a common photographer's studio?

Once, when the two young people were dining à deux at a small restaurant, a woman at a nearby table thought she recognized the princess. She approached for a closer look. Then apologized. She had nearsight, she said. "Forgive me," she explained. "For a moment I thought you were Princess Margaret. There is a striking resemblance."

"Thank you," smiled the princess graciously. "I am very flattered."

Gradually, as this astonishing love affair went on, the happy pair grew in confidence that it would not be discovered until they were ready for discovery. Gaily they dined together in one or two of the more dimly lighted restaurants in Soho, and at the River Club, a magnificent club on the edge of the Thames.

RONALD WESTON

A favorite table at the River Club. Waiters recognized Princess Margaret, but no word leaked to the newspapers.

In a pub called "The Orange" last year, Tony Armstrong-Jones, opening his wallet to pay for drinks, was seen to have a small photograph of the princess inside it. This caused some little surprise until it was pointed out that since he had taken the official photographs on her twenty-ninth birthday, it was surely reasonable for him to have a miniature one. His role of photographer was very helpful, too, in explaining away the increasingly frequent visits he paid to Clarence House, Royal Lodge, Windsor, Sandringham and Balmoral.

For what the lovers needed most of all was time to be alone together, to discuss their future.

The number of people who had any inkling of her feelings for Armstrong-Jones was very small, although now all manner of people claim that they knew months ago. They didn't.

The chief conspirators were her old friend and onetime escort, Billy Wallace, and his best friend —Jeremy Fry, who had gone to school at Gordonstoun with Prince Philip. Antony explained his predicament to Fry, who asked them both down for the weekend. Jeremy Fry and his wife Camilla, plus their young family, live in a lovely Georgian manor, Widcombe House, just outside Bath. Here Margaret and Tony decided to get married.

At nine o'clock in the morning of the day the news was finally announced, the telephone rang in Tony's studio. He took the call himself, and then turned to his staff, his face white and strained. "I'm engaged, chaps," he said suddenly.

"Congratulations," someone replied. "To whom?"

"Princess Margaret!"

John Timbers, his assistant, said afterward: "He poured us all a whisky, and dashed about the place terribly nervously. He flung clothes and some camera equipment into two suitcases, shoved them in the back of his car and was off."

Tony Armstrong-Jones drove west out to Windsor Castle, where he was when the news was made public.

So the strangest, most surprising, most unexpected and most secret royal romance of our times came to its happy ending.

"He did mention it."

"I expect he will sell some of the horses. I shall keep a couple, but there is no point in keeping an expensive stable with only myself at the house. He saw you on Jacinth and thinks you'd be a worthy mistress for her. That was why he wanted you to have her."

"I see."

"Miss Leigh, you would like to possess a horse like that?"

"Who wouldn't?"

"Suppose I asked Connan if it could be taken into his stables and kept there for you to ride. How would that be?"

I replied emphatically, "It is most kind of you, Miss Nansellock. But I do not wish any special favors here. Mr. TreMellyn has a full and adequate stable for the needs of us all. I should be very much against asking for special favors for myself."

"I see," she said, "that you are very determined and very proud." She leaned forward and touched my hand in a friendly manner. She understood how desperately I clung to my pride because it was my only possession.

I thought her kind and considerate, and I could understand why Alice had made a friend of her. One day, I thought, I'll tell her what I've discovered about Alice. But not yet. I was, as her brother had said, as spiky as a hedgehog. I did not think for a moment that I should be rebuffed by Celestine Nansellock but, just at this time, I was not going to run any risk.

Connan TreMellyn came back the day before the gymkhana. I was glad he had not returned before, because I was afraid that Alvean might betray her excitement.

I was entered for one of the early events in which points were scored particularly for jumping. It was what they called a mixed event, which meant that men and women competed together.

Tapperty, who knew I was going to enter, wouldn't hear of my riding Dion.

"Why, Miss," he said, "if you'd have took Jacinth when she was offered you, you would have got first prize. That mare be a winner and so would you be, Miss, on her back. Old Dion, he's a good old fellow, but he ain't no prize winner. How'd you say to taking Royal Rover?"

"What if Mr. TreMellyn objected?"

Tapperty winked. "Nay, he'd not object. He'll be riding out to the gymkhana on May Morning, so old Royal 'ull be free. I'll tell 'ee what—just suppose master was to say to me, 'Saddle up Royal Rover for me, Tapperty.' Right, then I'd saddle the Rover for him and it would be May Morning for you, Miss. Nothing 'ud please master more than for to see his horse win a prize."

I was anxious to show off before Connan TreMellyn and I agreed to Tapperty's suggestion. After all, I was teaching his daughter to ride and that meant that I could, with the approval of his head stableman, make my selection from the stables.

The night before the gymkhana I presented Alvean with the brooch. She was delighted.

"It's a whip!" she cried.

"It will pin your cravat," I said, "and I hope bring you luck."

"It will, Miss. I know it will."

"Well, don't rely on it too much. Remember luck comes only to those who deserve it." I quoted the beginning of an old rhyme which father used to say to us:

"Your head and your heart keep boldly up,
Your chin and your heels keep down."

I went on: "And when you take your jump, remember . . . go with Prince."

"I'll remember."

That night when I went in to say good night I sat on her bed and we talked about the gymkhana. I was a little anxious about her, because she was too excited, and I tried to calm her down. I told her she must go to sleep, for if she did not she would not be fresh for the morning.

"But how does one sleep, Miss," she asked, "when sleep won't come?"

I realized then the magnitude of what I had done. A few months before this girl had been afraid to mount a horse; now she was looking forward to competing at the gymkhana.

That was all well and good. I would have preferred her interest not to have been centered so wholeheartedly on her father. It was his approval which meant so much to her. She was not only eager; she was apprehensive, so desperately did she long for his admiration.

I went to my room and came back with a book of Mr. Longfellow's poems. I sat by her bed and began to read to her, for I knew of nothing so able to turn the mind to peace as his narrative poem Hiawatha.

I often quoted it when I was trying to sleep. The words flowed from my lips. I knew I was conjuring up visions for Alvean. She had forgotten the gymkhana—her fears and her hopes. She was with the little Hiawatha sitting at the feet of the good Nokomis and . . . she slept.

I woke to find the mist had penetrated my room. I got out of bed and went to the window. Little wisps of it encircled the palm trees and the feathery leaves of the evergreen pines were decorated with drops of moisture.

I hope the mist lifts before the afternoon, I said to myself. But all through the morning it persisted, and there were anxious looks and whispers throughout the house where everyone was thinking of the gymkhana. Most of the servants were going to the show. They always did, Kitty told me. Billy Trehay and some of the stableboys were entrants.

"It do put master in a good mood to see his horses win," said Kitty; "but they say he's always harder on his own than on others."

Good will is the mightiest practical force in the universe. DOLE

Immediately after luncheon Alvean and I set out. She was riding Black Prince and I was on Royal Rover. It was exhilarating to be on a good horse, and I felt as excited as Alvean. I fear I was just as eager to shine in the eyes of Connan TreMellyn as she was.

The gymkhana was being held in a big field close to the village church, and when we arrived the crowds were already gathering. Alvean and I parted company when I discovered that the event in which I was competing was one of the first.

The show was intended to start at two-fifteen, but there was the usual delay, and at twenty past we were still waiting to begin.

The mist had lifted slightly, but it was a leaden day. The sky was like a gray blanket and everything seemed to have accumulated a layer of moisture. The sea smell was strong, but the waves were silent and the cry of the gulls was more melancholy than ever.

Connan arrived with the other judges; there were three of them, all local worthies. Connan, I saw, had come on May Morning, as I expected.

The village band struck up a traditional air and everyone stood and sang. It was very impressive, I thought, to hear those words sung with such fervor:

And shall they scorn Tre Pol and Pen,
And shall Trelawny die?
Then twenty thousand Cornish men
Will know the reason why.

A proud song, I thought, for an insular people; and they stood at attention as they sang. I noticed little Gillyflower singing with the rest, and was surprised to see her. She was with Daisy and I hoped the girl would look after her.

She saw me and I waved to her, but she lowered her eyes at once, yet I could see that she was smiling and I was quite pleased.

A rider came close to me and a voice said, "Well, if it is not Miss Leigh herself!"

I turned and saw Peter Nansellock. He was mounted on Jacinth.

"Good afternoon," I said, and my eyes lingered on the perfections of Jacinth.

I was wearing a placard with a number on my back which had been put there by one of the organizers.

"Don't tell me," said Peter Nansellock, "that you and I are competitors in this first event."

"Are you in it, then?"

He turned, and I saw the placard on his back.

"I haven't a hope," I said.

"Against me?"

"Against Jacinth," I answered.

"You could have been riding her."

"You must have been mad to do what you did. You set the stables talking."

"Who cares for stableboys?"

"I do."

"Then you are not being your usual sensible self."

"A governess has to care for the opinions of all and sundry."

"You are not an ordinary governess."

"Do you know, Mr. Nansellock," I said lightly, "I believe all the governesses in your life were no ordinary governesses. If they had been, perhaps they would have had no place in your life."

I gave Royal Rover a gentle touch on the flank and he responded immediately.

I did not see Peter again until he was competing. He went before I did. I watched him ride round the field. He and Jacinth seemed like one animal. Like a centaur, I thought. Were they the creatures with the head and shoulders of a man and the body of a horse?

"Oh, perfect," I exclaimed aloud as I watched him take the jumps and canter gracefully round the field. And who couldn't, I said to myself maliciously, on a mare like that!

A round of applause followed him as he finished his turn.

Mine did not come until some time later.

I saw Connan TreMellyn in the judges' stand. And I whispered, "Royal Rover, help me. I want you to beat Jacinth. I want to win this prize. I want to show Connan TreMellyn that there is one thing I can do. Help me, Royal Rover!"

The sensitive ears seemed to prick up as Royal Rover moved daintily forward and I knew that he heard me, and would respond to the appeal in my voice.

"Come on, Rover," I whispered. "We can do it!"

And we went round as faultlessly, I hoped, as Jacinth had. I heard the applause burst out as I finished, and walked my horse away.

We waited until the rest of the competitors were finished and the results were called. I was glad that they were announced at the end of each event. The practice of announcing all winners at the end of the meeting I had always thought to be a sort of anticlimax.

"This one is a tie," Connan was saying. "Two competitors scored full marks. It's most unusual, but I am happy to say that the winners are a lady and a gentleman: Miss Martha Leigh on Royal Rover, and Mr. Peter Nansellock on Jacinth."

We trotted up to take our prizes.

Connan said, "The prize is a silver rose bowl. How can we split it? Obviously we cannot do that, so the lady gets the bowl."

"Of course," said Peter.

"But you get a silver spoon," Connan told him. "Consolation for having tied with a lady."

We accepted our prizes, and as Connan gave me mine he was smiling, very well pleased. "Good show, Miss Leigh. I did not know anyone could get so much out of Royal Rover."

I patted Royal Rover and said, more for his hearing than anyone else's, "I couldn't have had a better partner."

Then Peter and I trotted off—I with my rose bowl, he with his spoon.

Peter said, "If you had been on Jacinth you would have been the undisputed winner."

"I should still have had to compete against you on something else."

"Jacinth would win any race—just look at her. Never mind, you got the rose bowl."

"I shall always feel that it is not entirely mine."

"When you arrange your roses you will always think, 'Part of this belonged to that man . . . what was his name? He was always charming to me but I was a little acid with him. I'm sorry now.'"

"I rarely forget people's names, and I feel I have nothing to regret in my conduct toward you."

"There is a way out of this rose-bowl situation. Suppose we set up house together. It could have a place of honor there. 'Ours,' we could say, and both feel happy about it."

I was angry at this flippancy, and I said, "We should, I am sure, feel far from happy about everything else." And I rode away.

I wanted to be near the judges' stand when Alvean appeared. I wanted to watch Connan's face as his daughter performed. I wanted to be close when she took her prize—which I was sure she would.

The elementary jumping contest for eight-year-olds began and I was feverishly impatient as I watched those little girls and boys go through their performances. But there was no Alvean. The contest was over and the results announced.

I felt sick with disappointment. So she had panicked at the last moment. My work had been in vain. When the great moment came her fears had returned.

When the prizes were being given I went in search of Alvean, but I could not find her; and as the more advanced jumping contest for the eight-year-old group was about to begin, it occurred to me that she must have gone back to the house.

I wanted to get away, for now my own petty triumph meant nothing, and I wanted to find Alvean quickly, to comfort her if need be, and I felt sure she would need my comfort.

I rode back to Mount Mellyn, hung up my saddle and bridle, gave Royal Rover a quick rubdown and a drink, and left him munching an armful of hay in his stall while I went to the house.

The back door was unlatched and I went in. The house seemed very quiet. I went up to my room and called Alvean as I went.

There was no answer, so I hurried through the schoolroom to her room, which was deserted. Perhaps she had not come back to the house. I then remembered that I had not seen Prince in the stables.

I came back to my room and stood uncertainly at the window. I thought, I'll go back to the gymkhana. She's probably still there.

As I stood at the window I knew that someone was in Alice's apartments. I was not sure how I knew. It may only have been a shadow across the windowpane. But I was certain that someone was there.

I ran from my room, through the gallery to Alice's rooms. My riding boots must have made a clatter along the gallery. I threw open the door and shouted, "Who is here? Who is it?" No one was in the room, but I saw in that fleeting second the communicating door between the two rooms close.

I had a feeling that it might be Alvean who was there, and I was sure that Alvean needed me at this moment. I ran across the dressing room and opened the door of the bedroom. There was no one there. Then I ran to the other door and opened it. I was in another dressing room and the communicating door—similar to that in Alice's—was open. I went through and I knew that I was in Connan's bedroom, for I saw the cravat which he had been wearing that morning flung on the dressing table. I saw his dressing gown and slippers.

The sight of these made me blush and realize that I was trespassing in a part of the house where I had no right to be.

But someone other than Connan had been there before me. Who was it?

I went swiftly across the bedroom, opened the door and found myself in the gallery.

There was no sign of anyone there, so I went slowly back to my room.

Who had been in Alice's room? Who was it who haunted the place?

"Alice," I said aloud. "Is it you, Alice?"

Then I went down to the stables. I wanted to get back to the gymkhana and find Alvean.

I had saddled Royal Rover and was riding out of the stableyard when I saw Billy Trehay hurrying toward the house.

He said, "Oh, Miss, there's been an accident. A terrible accident. It's Miss Alvean. She took a toss in the jumping."

"But she wasn't in the jumping!" I cried.

"Yes, she were. In the eight-year-olds. Advanced class. It was the high jump. Prince stumbled and fell. They went rolling over and over ——"

For a moment I lost control of myself. I covered my face with my hands and cried out my protest.

"They were looking for you, Miss," he said.

"Where is she, then?"

"She were down there in the field. They'm afraid to move her. They wrapped her up and now they'm waiting for Dr. Pengelly to come. Her father's with her. He kept saying, 'Where's Miss Leigh?' And I saw you leave, so I came after you."

I turned and rode as fast as I dared down the hill into the village, and as I rode I prayed, and scolded: Oh, God, let her be all right. Oh, Alvean, you little fool! It would have been enough to take the simple jumps. You could have done the high jumps next year. Alvean, my poor, poor child! And then: It's his fault. It's all his fault. If he had been a human parent this wouldn't have happened!

And so I came to the field. I shall never forget what I saw there: Alvean lying unconscious on the grass, and the group round her. For a moment I was terrified that she had been killed.

Connan's face was stern. "Miss Leigh," he said, "I'm glad you've come. There's been an accident. Alvean ——"

I ignored him and knelt beside her. "Alvean—my dear," I murmured.

She opened her eyes then. She did not look like my arrogant little pupil. She was just a lost and bewildered child. But she smiled.

"Don't go away," she said.

"No, I'll stay here."

"You did go . . . before ——" she murmured, and I had to bend low to catch her words.

And then I knew. She was not speaking to Martha Leigh, the governess. She was speaking to Alice.

Dr. Pengelly had arrived and had diagnosed a broken tibia; but he could not say if further damage had been done. He set the fractured bone and drove Alvean back to Mount Mellyn in his carriage while Connan and I rode back together in silence.

Alvean was taken to her room and given a sedative by the doctor.

"Now," he said, "there is nothing we can do but wait. I'll come back in a few hours. It may be that the child is suffering acute shock. In the meantime, keep her warm and let her sleep. She should sleep for several hours, and at the end of that time we shall know how deeply she has suffered from this shock."

When the doctor had left Connan said to me, "Miss Leigh, I want to have a talk with you. Come to the punch room now, will you, please."

I followed him there and he went on: "There is nothing we can do but wait. We must try to be calm."

I realized that he could never have seen me agitated as I was now, and had probably considered me incapable of such deep feeling.

Impulsively I said, "I find it hard to be as calm about my charge as you are about your daughter, Mr. TreMellyn."

I was so frightened and worried that I wanted to blame someone for what had happened, so I blamed him.

"Whatever made the child attempt such a thing?" he demanded.

"You made her," I retorted. "You!"

"I! But I had no idea that she was so advanced in her riding."

I realized later that I was on the verge of hysteria. I believed that Alvean might have done herself some terrible injury and I felt almost certain that a child of her temperament would never want to ride again. I believed I had been wrong in my methods. I should not have tried to overcome her fear of horses; I had tried to win my way into her affections by showing her the way to win those of her father.

"No," I cried out, "of course you had no idea that she was so advanced. How could you when you have never shown the slightest interest in the child? She was breaking her heart through your neglect. It was for that reason that she attempted this thing of which she was not capable."

"My dear Miss Leigh," he murmured. "My dear Miss Leigh." He was looking at me in complete bewilderment.

I thought to myself, What do I care! I shall be dismissed, but in any case I have failed. I had hoped to do the impossible—to bring this man out of his own selfishness, to care a little for his lonely daughter. And what have I done—made a complete mess of it and perhaps maimed the child for life.

But I continued to blame him and I no longer cared what I said.

"When I came here," I went on, "it did not take me long to understand the state of affairs. That poor motherless child was starved —— Oh, I know she had her broth and her bread and butter at regular intervals. But there is another starvation besides that of the body. She was starved of the affection which she might expect from a parent and, as you see, she was ready to risk her life to win it."

"Miss Leigh, I beg of you, do be calm, do be reasonable. Are you telling me that Alvean did that ——"

But I would not let him speak. "She did that for you. She thought it would please you. She has been practicing for weeks."

"I see," he said. "Miss Leigh, I think you care very much for Alvean."

"She is a child," I said, "and it was my job to care for her. God knows there are few others to do it."

"I see," he answered, "that I have been behaving in a very reprehensible manner."

"How could you . . . if you had any feeling? Your own daughter! She lost her mother. Don't you see that because of that she needed special care?"

SHULTON

Then he said a surprising thing: "Miss Leigh, you came here to teach Alvean, but I think you have taught me a great deal too."

I looked at him in astonishment. And at that moment Celestine Nansellock came in.

She burst out, "What is this terrible thing I've heard?"

"There's been an accident, Celeste," said Connan. "Alvean was thrown."

"Oh—no!" Celestine uttered a piteous cry. "And what—and where——"

"She's in her room," Connan explained. "Pengelly's set the leg. Poor child. At the moment she is asleep. He's coming again in a few hours."

"But how badly——"

"He's not sure. But I've seen accidents like this before. I think she'll be all right."

I was not sure whether he meant that or whether he was trying to soothe Celestine, who was so upset. She was the only person, I believed, who really cared about Alvean.

"Poor Miss Leigh is very distressed," said Connan. "I think she fancies it is her fault. I do want to assure her that I don't think that."

My fault! But how could I be blamed for teaching the child to ride? And, having taught her, what harm was there in her entering for a competition? No it was his fault, I wanted to shout. She would have been content to do what she was capable of, but for him.

I said with defiance in my voice, "Alvean was so anxious to impress her father that she undertook more than she could do. I am sure that had she believed her father would be content to see her victorious in the elementary event she would not have attempted the advanced."

Celestine had sat down and covered her face with her hands.

"We can only wait and see," said Connan.

I rose and said, "There is no point in my remaining here. I will go to my room."

But Connan put out a hand and said almost authoritatively "No, stay here, Miss Leigh. Stay with us. You care for her deeply. I know."

I looked down at my riding habit—Alice's riding habit—and I said, "I think I should change."

It seemed that in that moment he looked at me in a new light—and perhaps so did Celestine. If they did not look at my face, I must have appeared to be remarkably like Alice.

I knew it was important that I change my clothes, for in my gray cotton dress I should be the governess once more, and that would help me to control my feelings.

Connan nodded. "But come back when you've changed, Miss Leigh. I want you to be here when the doctor returns."

So I went to my room and took off Alice's riding habit and put on my own gray cotton. I was right. The cotton did help to restore my equilibrium. I began to wonder, as I buttoned the bodice, what I had said, in my outburst, to Connan TreMellyn.

The mirror showed me a face that was ravaged by grief and anxiety, eyes which burned with anger and resentment, and a mouth that was tremulous with fear.

I sent for hot water. Daisy wanted to talk, but she saw that I was too upset to do so and she went quickly away.

I bathed my face, and when I had done so I went down to the punch room and rejoined Connan and Celestine to await the coming of Dr. Pengelly.

It seemed a long time before the doctor returned. Mrs. Polgrey made a pot of strong tea and Connan, Celestine and I sat together drinking it. I did not feel astonished then, but I did later, because the accident seemed to have made them both forget that I was merely the governess. But perhaps I mean it made Connan forget; Celestine had always treated me without that condescension which I thought I had discerned in others.

Connan seemed to have forgotten my outburst. I believed he was anxious that I should not blame myself in any way, and he knew that the reason I had turned on him so vehemently was that I wondered whether I had been at fault.

"She'll get over this," he said. "When I was little older than herself I had an accident which I'm sure was worse than this one. I got it in the collarbone and was unable to ride for weeks. I could scarcely wait to get back on a horse."

Celestine shivered. "I shall never have a moment's peace if she rides again after this."

"Oh, Celeste, you would wrap her in cotton wool. And then what would happen? She would go out and catch her death of cold. You must not coddle children too much. What does the expert have to say to that?"

He was looking at me anxiously. I knew he was trying to keep up our spirits. He knew how deeply Celestine and I felt about this, and he was trying to be kind.

I said, "I believe one shouldn't coddle. But if children are really set against something, I don't think they should be forced to do it."

"But she was not forced to ride."

"She did it most willingly," I answered. "But I cannot be sure whether she did it from a love of riding or from an intense desire to please you."

"Well," he said almost lightly, "is it not an excellent thing that a child should seek to please a parent?"

"But it should not be necessary to risk a life for the sake of a smile." My anger was rising again. Both Celestine and Connan were surprised by my remark, and I went on quickly, "For instance, Alvean's talents may lie in another direction. I think she has artistic ability. She has done some good drawings. Mr. TreMellyn, I have been going to ask you for some time whether you would consider letting her have drawing lessons."

There was a silence in the room and I wondered why they both looked so startled.

Connan said slowly, "But Miss Leigh, you are here to teach my daughter. Why should it be necessary to engage other teachers?"

"Because," I replied boldly, "I believe she has a special talent. I believe it would be an added interest in her life if she were to be given drawing lessons. These should be given by a specialist in the art. She is good enough for that. I'm merely a governess, Mr. TreMellyn. I am not an artist as well."

He said rather gruffly, "Well, we shall have to go into this at some time."

He changed the subject, and shortly afterward the doctor arrived.

I waited in the corridor while Connan and Celestine were with Alvean and the doctor. A hundred images of disaster crowded into my mind. I imagined that she died of her injuries. Then I thought of her, maimed for life, more difficult than she had been previously, a wretched and unhappy little girl; and myself devoting my life to her. It was a gloomy picture.

Celestine joined me. "This suspense is terrible," she said. "I wonder whether we ought to get another doctor. Dr. Pengelly is sixty. I am afraid ——"

"He seemed efficient," I said.

"I want the best for her. If anything happens ——"

She was biting her lips in her anguish, and I thought how strange it was that she, who always seemed so calm about everything else, should be so emotional over Alice and her daughter.

I wanted to put my arm about her and comfort her, but of course, remembering my position, I did no such thing.

Doctor Pengelly came out with Connan, and the doctor was smiling.

"Injuries," he said. "A fractured tibia. Beyond that there's very little wrong."

"Oh, thank God!" cried Celestine, and I echoed her words.

"A day or so and she'll be feeling better. It'll just be a matter of mending that fracture. Children's bones mend easily. There's nothing for you two ladies to worry about."

"Can we see her?" asked Celestine eagerly.

"Yes, of course. She's awake now and she asked for Miss Leigh. I'm going to give her another dose in half an hour and that will ensure a good night's sleep. You'll see a difference in her in the morning."

We went into the room. Alvean was lying on her back, looking very ill, poor child; but she gave us a wan smile. "Hello, Miss," she said. "Hello, Aunt Celestine."

Celestine knelt by the bed, took her hand and covered it with kisses. I stood on the other side of the bed and the child's eyes were on me.

"I didn't do it," she said.

"Well, it was a good try."

Connan was standing at the foot of the bed.

I went on: "Your father was proud of you."

"He'll think I was silly," she said.

"No, he doesn't," I cried vehemently.

Connan came round to the side of the bed and stood beside me.

"He's proud of you," I said. "He told me so. He said it didn't matter that you fell. He said all that matters was that you tried; and you'll do it next time."

"Did he? Did he?"

"Yes, he did," I cried. And there was an angry note in my voice because he still said nothing and the child was waiting for him to confirm my words.

Then he spoke. "You did splendidly, Alvean. I was proud of you."

A faint smile touched those pale lips. Then she murmured, "Miss . . . oh, Miss . . ." And then: "Don't go away, will you? Don't you go away."

I sank down on my knees. I took her hand and kissed it. The tears were on my cheeks. I cried, "I'll stay, Alvean. I'll stay with you always."

I looked up and saw Celestine watching me from the other side of the bed. I was aware of Connan, standing beside me. Then I amended those words, and the governess in me spoke. "I'll stay as long as I'm wanted," I said firmly.

Alvean was satisfied.

When she was sleeping we left her, and as I was about to go to my room Connan said, "Come into my library a moment with us, Miss Leigh. The doctor wants to discuss the case with you."

So I went into his library with him, Celestine and the doctor, and we talked of the nursing of Alvean.

Celestine said, "I shall come over every day. In fact I wonder, Connan, whether I won't come over and stay while she's ill. It might make things easier."

"You ladies must settle that," answered Doctor Pengelly. "Keep the child amused. We don't want her getting depressed while those bones are knitting together."

Learn as if you were to live forever, live as if you were to die tomorrow.

GANDHI

"We'll keep her amused," I said. "Any special diet, doctor?"

"For a day or so, light invalid foods. Steamed fish, milk puddings, custards and so on. After a few days anything she wants."

I was almost gay, and this swift reversal of feeling made me slightly lightheaded.

I listened to the doctor's instructions and Connan's assurance that there was no need for Celestine to stay at the house. He was sure Miss Leigh would manage and it would be wonderfully comforting for Miss Leigh to know that in any emergency she could ask for Celestine's help.

"Well, Connan," said Celestine, "perhaps it's as well. People talk. And if I stayed here —— Oh, people are so ridiculous. But they are always ready to gossip."

I saw the point. If Celestine lived at Mount Mellyn, people would begin to couple her name with Connan's; whereas the fact that I, an employee of the same age, lived in the house aroused no comment. I was not of the same social standing.

Connan laughed and said, "How did you come over, Celeste?"

"I rode over on Speller."

"Right. I'll ride back with you."

"Oh, thank you, Connan. But I can go alone if you'd rather ——"

"Nonsense! I'm coming." He turned to me. "As for you, Miss Leigh, you look exhausted. I advise you to go to bed and have a good night's sleep."

I was sure I could not rest, and my expression must have implied this, for the doctor said, "I'll give you a draught, Miss Leigh. Take it five minutes before retiring. I think I can promise you a good night's sleep."

"Thank you," I said appreciatively, for I suddenly realized how exhausted I was.

I went to my room, where I found a supper tray waiting. It contained a wing of cold chicken, appetizing enough on most occasions, but tonight I had no appetite. I toyed with it for a while and ate a few mouthfuls, but I was too upset to eat.

I thought it would be an excellent idea to take Doctor Pengelly's sleeping draught and retire for the night. I was about to do so when there was a knock on my door.

"Come in," I called, and Mrs. Polgrey came. She looked distraught. No wonder, I thought. Who in this household isn't?

"It's terrible," she began.

But I cut in quickly: "She'll be all right, Mrs. Polgrey. The doctor said so."

"Oh yes, I heard the news. It's Gilly, Miss. I'm worried about her."

"Gilly!"

"She didn't come back from the show, Miss. I haven't seen her since this afternoon."

"Oh, she's wandering about somewhere, I expect. I wonder if she saw ——"

"I can't understand it, Miss. I can't understand her being at the show. She'm afeared of going near the horses. You could have knocked me down with a feather when I heard she was there. And now . . . she's not come in."

"But she does wander off alone, doesn't she?"

"Yes, but she'll always be in for her tea. I don't know what can have become of her."

"Has the house been searched?"

"Yes, Miss. I've looked everywhere. Kitty and Daisy have helped me. So's Polgrey. The child's not in the house."

I said, "I'll come and help look for her."

So instead of going to bed I joined in the search for Gillyflower.

I was worried, because on this day of tragedy I was prepared for anything to happen. I visualized a thousand things. I thought Gilly might have wandered onto the beach and been caught by the tide, and I pictured her little body thrown up by the waves in Mellyn Cove as her mother's had been eight years ago. That was morbid. No, Gilly had gone wandering and had fallen asleep somewhere.

I nevertheless made my way to the woods, calling "Gilly! Gilly!" as I went; and the mist, which was rising again with the coming of evening, seemed to catch my voice and muffle it as though it were in cotton wool.

I searched those woods thoroughly because my intuition told me that she was there, and that she was not lost but hiding. I was right. I came across her lying in a clearing surrounded by small conifers.

"Gilly!" I called. "Gilly!" As soon as she heard my voice she sprang to her feet. She was poised to run, but she hesitated when I called to her, "Gilly, it's all right. I'm here all alone and I won't hurt you."

She looked like a wild fairy child, her extraordinary white hair hanging damply about her shoulders.

"Why, Gilly," I said, "you'll catch cold, lying on that damp grass. Why are you hiding, Gilly?"

Her big eyes watched my face, and I knew that it was fear of something which had driven her to this refuge. If only she would talk to me! I thought. If only she would explain.

"Gilly," I said, "we're friends. You know that. I'm your friend—as Madam was."

She nodded and the fear slipped from her face. I thought, She has seen me in Alice's riding clothes and in her confused little mind she has bracketed us together in some way.

I put my arm about her. Her dress was damp and I could see the mist on her pale brows and lashes.

"Why, Gilly, you are cold."

She allowed me to cuddle her. I said, "Come on, Gilly, we're going back. Your grandmamma is very anxious. She is wondering what has become of you."

She allowed me to lead her from the clearing, but I was aware of the reluctant drag of her feet.

I kept my arm firmly about her, and said, "You were at the horse show this afternoon."

She turned and buried her face against me, her little hands gripped the cloth of my dress. Then, in a flash of understanding, I began to see what had happened. This child, like Alvean, was terrified of horses. Of course she was. Had she not been almost trampled to death by one?

I believed that, as Alvean had been suffering from temporary shock, so was this child; but the shock which had come to her was of longer duration. She had never known anyone who had been able to help her fight the darkness which had descended upon her.

In that misty wood I felt like a woman who has a mission. I was not going to turn my face from a poor child who needed help. This afternoon she had seen Alvean beneath a horse's hoofs as she herself had been—after all, it had happened only four years ago.

At that moment I heard the sound of horse's hoofs in the wood, and I shouted, "Hello, I've found her."

"Hello! Coming, Miss Leigh." And I was exhilarated—almost unbearably so—because that was Connan's voice.

I guessed that he had returned from Mount Widden to discover that Gilly was lost, and that he had joined the search party. He came into sight and Gilly shrank closer to me, keeping her face hidden.

"She's here," I called. He came close to us and I went on: "She is exhausted, poor child. Take her up with you."

He leaned forward to take her, but she cried out, "No! No!"

He was astonished to hear her speak, but I was not.

I said, "Gilly, go up there with the master. I'll walk beside you and hold your hand."

She shook her head.

I went on: "Look! This is May Morning. She wants to carry you, because she knows you're tired."

Gilly's eyes turned to look at May Morning, and in the fear I saw there was the clue.

"Take her," I said to Connan, and he stooped and swung her up in his arms and set her in front of him.

She tried to fight, but I kept talking to her soothingly. "You're safe up there. And we'll get back more quickly. You'll find a nice bowl of bread and milk waiting for you, and then there'll be your warm cozy bed. I'll hold your hand all the time and walk beside you."

She no longer struggled, but kept her hand in mine.

And so ended that strange day, with myself and Connan bringing in the lost child.

When she was lifted from the horse and handed to her grandmother, Connan gave me a smile which I thought was infinitely charming. That was because it held none of the mockery which I had seen hitherto.

I went to my room, exultation wrapped about me as the mist wrapped itself about the house. It was tinged with melancholy, but the joy was so strong that the mingling of my feelings was difficult to understand.

I knew, of course, what had happened. Today had made it very clear. I had done a foolish thing—perhaps the most foolish thing I had ever done in my life. I had fallen in love for the first time, and with someone who was quite out of my world. I was in love with the master of Mount Mellyn, and I had an uneasy feeling that he might be aware of it.

The next few weeks were the happiest I had so far spent in Mount Mellyn. It soon became clear that Alvean had suffered no great harm. I was delighted to find that she had lost none of her keenness for riding and asked eager questions about Black Prince's slight injuries, taking it for granted that she would soon ride him again.

We resumed school after the first week; she was pleased to do so. I taught her to play chess, and she picked up the game with astonishing speed; and if I handicapped myself by playing without my queen she was even able to checkmate me.

But it was not only Alvean's progress which made me so happy. It was the fact that Connan was in the house, and would appear in Alvean's room with books and puzzles which he thought would be of interest to her.

In the first days I said to him, "There is one thing that pleases her more than all the presents you bring; that is your own company."

He answered, "What an odd child she must be to prefer me to a book or a game."

I smiled at him and he returned my smile; and again I was aware of that change in his expression.

Sometimes he would sit and watch our game of chess. Then he would range himself on Alvean's side against me. I would protest and demand that I be allowed to have my queen back.

Alvean would sit smiling, and he would say, 'Look, Alvean. We'll put our bishop there, and that'll make our dear Miss Leigh look to her defenses."

Alvean would giggle and throw me a triumphant glance, and I would be so happy to be with the two of them that I grew almost careless and nearly lost the game. But not quite. I never forgot that between Connan and me there was a certain battle in progress and I always wanted to prove my mettle.

He said one day, "When Alvean's movable we'll drive over to Fowey and have a picnic."

"Why go to Fowey," I asked, "when we have a perfect picnic beach here?"

"My dear Miss Leigh"—he had acquired a habit of calling me his dear Miss Leigh—"do you not know that other people's beaches are more exciting than one's own?"

"Oh yes, papa," cried Alvean. "Do let's have a picnic."

She was so eager to get well for the picnic that she ate all the food which was brought to her and talked of the expedition continually. Doctor Pengelly was delighted; so were we all.

I said to Connan one day, "But you are the real cure. You have made her so happy, because at last you let her see that you are aware of her existence."

Then he did a surprising thing. He took my hand and lightly kissed my cheek. It was very different from that kiss which he had given me in the night of the ball. This was swift, friendly, passionless yet affectionate.

"No," he said, "it is you who are the real cure, my dear Miss Leigh." I thought he was going to say something more. But he did not. Instead he left me abruptly.

I did not forget Gilly. I determined to fight for her as I had for Alvean, and I thought the best way of doing so was to speak to Connan about it. He was in that mood, I believed, to grant me what I asked.

I boldly went down to the punch room, when I knew he was there one morning, and asked if I might speak to him.

"But of course, Miss Leigh," he replied. "It is always a pleasure to speak with you."

I came straight to the point. "I want to do something for Gilly."

"Yes?"

"I do not believe she is half-witted. I think no one has made any attempt to help her. I have heard about her accident. Before that, I understand, she was quite a normal little girl. Don't you see that it might be possible to make her normal once again?"

I saw a return of that mockery to his eyes as he said lightly, "I believe that as with God, so with Miss Leigh, all things are possible."

I ignored the flippancy. "I am asking your permission to give her lessons."

"My dear Miss Leigh, does not the pupil you came here to teach take up all your time?"

"I have a little spare time, Mr. TreMellyn. Even governesses have that. I would be ready to teach Gilly in my own time—provided, of course, you do not expressly forbid it."

"If I forbade you I am sure you would find some way of doing it, so I think it would be simpler if I say, 'Go ahead. I wish you all success.'"

"Thank you," he said, and turned to go.

"Miss Leigh," he called, "let us go on that picnic soon. I could carry Alvean if necessary to and from the carriage."

"That would be excellent, Mr. TreMellyn. I'll tell her at once. I know it will delight her."

"And you, Miss Leigh, does it delight you?"

For a moment I thought he was coming toward me and I started back. I was afraid that he would place his hands on my shoulders and that at his touch I might betray myself.

I said coolly, "Anything which is going to be good for Alvean delights me, Mr. TreMellyn."

And I hurried back to Alvean to tell her the good news.

So the weeks passed—pleasurable, wonderful weeks which I sometimes felt could never be repeated.

I had taken Gilly to the schoolroom and I had even managed to teach her a few letters. She delighted in pictures and quickly became absorbed in them. I believed she enjoyed our lessons, for she would present herself at the schoolroom each day at the appointed time.

She had been heard to speak a few words now and then and I knew that the whole household was watching the experiment with interest.

When Alvean was well enough to take lessons in the schoolroom I should have to be prepared for opposition. Alvean's aversion to Gilly was apparent. I had brought the child into the sickroom on one occasion and Alvean had immediately become sulky. I thought, When she is quite well I shall have to reconcile her to Gilly. But that was one of the problems of the future.

There were plenty of visitors for Alvean. Celestine was there every day. She brought fruit and other presents. Peter came and she was always pleased to see him.

Once he said to her, "Do you not think I am a devoted uncle to call and see you so often, Alvean?"

She retorted, "Oh, but you don't come to see me only, Uncle Peter. You come mainly for Miss."

He replied in characteristic style: "I come to see you both. How fortunate I am to have two such charming ladies on whom to call."

Lady Treslyn called with expensive books and flowers, but Alvean received her sullenly and would scarcely speak to her.

"She is an invalid still, Lady Treslyn," I explained; and the smile which was flashed upon me almost took my breath away, so beautiful was it.

"Of course I understand," Lady Treslyn told me. "Poor child! Mr. TreMellyn tells me that she has been brave and you have been wonderful. I tell him how lucky he is to have found such a treasure. 'They are not easy to come by,' I said. I reminded him of how my last cook walked out in the middle of a dinner party. She was another such treasure."

I bowed my head and hated her—not because she had linked me in her mind with her cook, but because she was so beautiful, and I knew that rumors persisted about her and Connan and I feared that there was truth in them.

Connan seemed different when this woman was in the house. I felt that he scarcely saw me. I heard the sounds of their laughter and wondered sadly what they said to each other. I saw them in the gardens and told myself there was an unmistakable intimacy in the very way they walked together.

Then I realized what a fool I had been, for I had been harboring thoughts which I would not dare express, even to myself.

I dared not look into the future.

Celestine one day suggested that she should take Alvean over to Mount Widden for the day. "It would be a change," she said. "Connan, you shall come to dinner and you can bring her back afterward."

He agreed to do so. I was disappointed not to be included in the invitation, which showed what a false picture I had allowed myself to make of the situation during these incredible weeks. Imagine myself—the governess—invited to dine at Mount Widden!

I laughed at my own foolishness, but there was a note of bitterness and sadness. It was like waking up to a chilly morning after weeks of sunshine; it was like the first gathering of storm clouds in a summer sky.

Connan drove Alvean over in the carriage and I was left alone, for the first time since I arrived here without any duties.

I gave Gilly her lesson, but I did not believe in taxing the child too much, and when I had returned her to her grandmother I wondered what I was going to do.

Then an idea struck me. Why should I not go for a ride, a long ride? Perhaps on the moor.

I immediately remembered that day when Alvean and I had ridden to her Great-Aunt Clara. I began to feel rather excited. I thought, Great-Aunt Clara will want to hear how Alvean is getting on. In any case, she treated me with the utmost friendliness and made it clear that I should be welcome any time. Of course it would be different, calling without Alvean, but then I believed that she had been more interested to talk to me than to the child. So I made up my mind.

I went to Mrs. Polgrey and said, "Alvean will be away all day. I propose to take a holiday."

Mrs. Polgrey had become very fond of me since I had taken such an interest in Gilly. She really did love the child, I believed. It was merely because she had assumed that Gilly's strangeness had been the price which had to be paid for her parents' sins that she had accepted her as non compos mentis.

"And none deserves a holiday more, Miss," she said. "Where are you going?"

"I think I'll go on the moor. I'll take luncheon at an inn."

"Do you think you should, Miss, by yourself?"

I smiled. "I am very well able to take care of myself, Mrs. Polgrey."

"Well, there be bogs on the moor and mists and the little people, some say."

"Little people indeed!"

"Ah, don't 'ee laugh at 'em, Miss. They don't like people to laugh at 'em. There's some as say they've seen 'em. Little gnomelike men in sugar-loaf hats. If they don't like 'ee they'll lead 'ee astray with their fairy lanterns, and afore you knows where you be you'm in the middle of a bog that sucks 'ee down and won't let 'ee go however much you do struggle."

I gave a shiver. "I'll be careful, and I wouldn't dream of offending the little people. If I meet any I'll be very polite."

"You'm mocking, Miss, I do believe."

"I'll be all right, Mrs. Polgrey. Don't have any fears about me."

I went to the stables and asked Tapperty which horse I could have.

"There's May Morning, if you'd like her. She be free."

I told him I was going to the moor. "A good chance to see the country," I added.

"Trust you, Miss. Baint much you miss." And he laughed as though enjoying some private joke. "You be going with a companion, Miss?" he asked slyly.

I said that I was going alone, but I could see that he did not believe me.

I felt rather angry because I guessed that his thoughts were on Peter Nansellock. I believed that my name had been coupled with his since he had been so foolish as to send Jacinth over for me.

I wondered, too, if my growing friendship with Connan had been noted. I was horrified at the possibility. Oddly enough, I could bear to contemplate their sly remarks, which I was sure were exchanged out of my hearing, about Peter and me; it would be a different matter if they talked in that way of me and Connan.

How ridiculous! I told myself as I walked May Morning out of the stables and down to the village. There is nothing to talk about between you and Connan. . . . But there is, I answered myself; and I fell to thinking of those two occasions when he had kissed me.

I looked across the cove at Mount Widden. Wistfully, I hoped that I should meet Connan coming back. I didn't, of course. But I continued to hope until I had left the village behind and came to the first gray wall and boulders of the moor.

It was a sparkling December morning and there were great golden patches of gorse dotted over the moor.

I could smell the peaty soil. The wind, which had veered a little to the north, was fresh and exhilarating.

I wanted to gallop across the moor with that wind in my face. I gave way to my desire and, while I did so, imagined that Connan was riding beside me. In this moorland country it was possible to believe in fantastic dreams. As some told themselves that these tracts were inhabited by the little people, so I told myself that it was not impossible that Connan TreMellyn would fall in love with me.

At midday I arrived at The House on the Moor. It was very like that other occasion; the elderly housekeeper came out to welcome me and I was taken into Great-Aunt Clara's sitting room.

"Good day to you, Miss Leigh! And all alone today?"

So no one had told her of Alvean's accident. I was astonished. I should have thought Connan would have sent someone to explain, since the old lady was obviously interested in her grandniece. I told her about the accident and she looked very concerned. I hastily added that Alvean was getting on well and would soon be about again.

"But you must be in need of some refreshment, Miss Leigh," she said. "Let us have a glass of my elderberry wine; and will you stay to luncheon?"

I said it was most kind of her to invite me and I should be delighted to do so.

We sipped our elderberry wine, and once more I was conscious of that heady feeling

Another "make-ahead" one-dish dinner, savory with Hunt's Tomato Sauce–

Shepherd's Pie

Wouldn't you be proud to serve this Shepherd's Pie?

How rewarding it is to set a dish like this before your family — or your guests!

It's made of lamb* — that's why it's called Shepherd's Pie. And in this special Hunt recipe, the meat is meltingly tender. The vegetables are sweet and fresh-tasting — the airy ring of mashed potatoes turns it into a complete dinner.

But what really makes the dish is the sauce — the rich pan juices of the meat and vegetables blended with Hunt's Tomato Sauce.

Hunt's belongs here (and in all your other tomato dishes, too) because Hunt's is all tomato, through and through. No fillers or thickeners hide the flavor. It's carefully made for cooks who care — kettle-simmered to a rich, thick consistency, and seasoned just so.

Truly, Hunt's is tomato at its cookin' best!

2 lbs. lamb* stew meat, boned and cubed
2 tablesp. flour
1 teasp. salt
⅛ teasp. pepper
¼ teasp. chili powder (optional)
3 tablesp. pure vegetable oil, such as Wesson
2 8-oz. cans Hunt's Tomato Sauce
2 cups water
½ teasp. salt
1 bay leaf
4 carrots, quartered
8 small onions
½ lb. cut string beans
2 cups mashed potatoes, homemade or instant

You may substitute beef, if you like.*

Wipe meat with a damp cloth. Mix flour, 1 teasp. salt, pepper and chili powder, and roll meat in this mixture; brown in hot oil. Pour off excess oil. Mix Hunt's Tomato Sauce, water, ½ teasp. salt and bay leaf. Pour over meat and simmer, covered, for 1¼ hours. Add vegetables, and cook 30 minutes longer, or until vegetables are tender. Pour stew into 2-quart greased casserole. Spoon mashed potatoes around outside rim. Bake in moderate oven (375°F.) about 15 minutes. Makes 5 to 6 servings. If you make Shepherd's Pie a day ahead, add mashed potatoes before final heating. Follow with a light dessert, such as fruit.

which I had experienced after her dandelion wine on the previous occasion. Luncheon consisted of mutton with caper sauce exceedingly well cooked and served. Afterward we retired to the drawing room for what she called a little chat.

This was what I had been hoping for, and I was not to be disappointed.

"Tell me," she said, "how is dear little Alvean? Is she happier now?"

"Why . . . yes, I think she is much happier. In fact, I think she has been more so since her accident. Her father has been so attentive, and she is so fond of him."

"Ah," said Great-Aunt Clara, "her father." She looked at me, and her bright blue eyes showed excitement. I knew she was one of those women who cannot resist talking; and since she spent so much of her time with only her own household, the coming of a visitor was an irresistible temptation.

I was determined to make the temptation even more irresistible. I said tentatively, "There is not the usual relationship between them, I fancy."

There was a slight pause, and then she said quickly, "No. I suppose it is inevitable."

I did not speak. I waited, afraid that she might change her mind. She was hovering on the edge of confidences.

"I sometimes blame myself," she said, as though talking to herself. Indeed, her blue eyes looked beyond me as though she were looking back over the years and was quite unconscious of my presence. "The question is," she went on, "how much should one interfere in the lives of others?"

It was a question which had often interested me. I had certainly tried to interfere in the lives of the people I had met since I entered Mount Mellyn.

"Alice was with me after the engagement," she went on. "Everything could have changed then. But I persuaded her. You see, I thought he was the better man."

She was being a little incoherent, and I was afraid to ask her to elucidate lest I break the spell. She might remember that she was betraying confidences to a young woman who was more curious than she should be.

"I wonder what would have happened if she had acted differently then. Do you ever play that game with yourself, Miss Leigh? Do you ever say, now if at a certain point I—or someone else—had done such-and-such, the whole tenor of life for that person would have changed?"

"Yes," I said. "Everybody does. You think that things would have been different for your niece and for Alvean?"

"Oh, yes. For her—Alice—more than most. She had come to a turning point. A crossroads, one might say. Go this way and you have such-and-such a life. Go that way and everything will be quite different. It frightens me, because if she had turned to the right instead of the left—as it were—she might be here today. After all, if she had married Geoffrey there would not have been any need to run away with him, would there?"

"I see you were in her confidence."

"Indeed yes. I'm afraid I had quite a big part in shaping what happened. That's what alarms me. Did I do right?"

"I am sure you did what you thought was right, and that is all any of us can do. You loved your niece very much, did you not?"

"Very much. My children were boys, you see, and I'd always wanted a girl. Alice used to come and play with my family—three boys and no girl. I didn't live in this house then. We were in Penzance. Alice's parents had a big estate some few miles inland. That's her husband's now, of course. She had a good fortune to bring to a husband. In any case, they were set on the marriage with the TreMellyns."

"So that was arranged."

"Yes. Alice's father was dead, and her mother—she was my sister—had always been very fond of Connan TreMellyn; the elder, I mean. They wanted their children to marry. They were betrothed when Connan was twenty and Alice eighteen. The marriage was to take place a year later."

"So it was a marriage of convenience."

"How odd it is! Marriages of convenience often turn out to be marriages of inconvenience, do they not? They thought it would be a good idea if she came to stay with me. You see, I was within a few hours' riding distance from Mount Mellyn, and the young people could meet often like that—without her staying at the house."

"And I suppose Mr. TreMellyn rode over to see her often."

"Yes. But not as often as I should have expected. I began to suspect that they were not as well matched as their fortunes were."

"Tell me about Alice," I said earnestly. "What sort of girl was she?"

"How can I explain her to you? The word 'light' comes to my mind. She was lighthearted, light-minded. I do not mean she was light in her morals—which is a sense in which some people use the word. Although of course, after what happened —— But who shall judge? You see, he came over here to paint. He did some beautiful pictures of the moors."

"Who? Connan TreMellyn?"

"Oh, dear me, no! Geoffrey. Geoffrey Nansellock. He was an artist of some reputation. Did you not know that?"

"No," I said. "I know nothing of him except that he was killed with Alice last July twelvemonth."

"He came over here often while she was with me. In fact, he came more often than Connan did. I began to understand how matters stood. They would go off together and he'd have his painting things with him. She used to say she was going to watch him at work. She would be a painter herself, perhaps, one day. But of course it was not painting they did together."

If you want to be thought a liar, always tell the truth.

LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH

"They were . . . in love?" I asked.

"I was rather frightened when she told me. You see, there was going to be a child."

I caught my breath in surprise. Alvean, I thought. No wonder he could not bring himself to love her. No wonder my statement that she possessed artistic talent upset him and Celestine.

"She told me two weeks before the day fixed for her wedding. She said, 'What shall I do, Aunt Clara? Shall I marry Geoffrey?'

"I said, 'Does Geoffrey want to marry you, my dear?' And she answered, 'He would have to, would he not, if I told him.'

"I know now that she should have told him. It was only right that she should. But her marriage was already arranged. Alice was an heiress, and I wondered whether Geoffrey had hoped for this. You see, the Nansellocks had very little and Alice's fortune would have been a blessing to them. I wondered . . . as one does wonder. He had a certain reputation too. I did not think she would be happy with him."

There was silence, and I felt as though vital parts of a puzzle were being fitted together to give my picture meaning.

"I remember her . . . that day," the old lady continued. "It was in this very room. She talked to me about it—unburdening herself as I'm unburdening myself to you. It's been on my conscience for the last year—ever since she died. She said, 'What shall I do, Aunt Clara? Help me. Tell me what I should do.'

"And I said, 'There's only one thing you can do, my dear. That is go on with your marriage to Connan TreMellyn. You're betrothed to him. You must forget what happened with Geoffrey Nansellock.' And she said, 'Aunt Clara, how can I forget? There'll be a living reminder, won't there?' Then I did this terrible thing. I said, 'You must marry. Your child will be born prematurely.' Then she threw back her head and laughed and laughed. It was hysterical laughter. Poor Alice, she was near the breaking point."

Great-Aunt Clara sat back in her chair. She was a little frightened because she was wondering whether she had told me too much.

I said nothing. I was picturing it all: the wedding which would have been a ceremonial occasion; the death of Alice's mother almost immediately afterward; and Connan's father had died the following year. The marriage had been to please them and they had not lived long to enjoy it. And Alice was left with Connan—my Connan—and Alvean, the child of another man.

The situation was fraught with drama. And yet, I thought, what good can come of brooding on it? Alice is dead; Alvean and Connan are alive. If they were wise they would try to make happiness for each other in the future.

"Oh, my dear," sighed Great-Aunt Clara, "how I talk!" A little fear crept into her voice. "I have talked too much and you, Miss Leigh, have played no part in all this. I trust you will keep what I have said to yourself."

"You may trust me to do so," I assured her.

"I knew it. I would not have told you otherwise. But in any case, it is all so long ago. I think about it sometimes during the night. It might have been right for her to marry Geoffrey. Perhaps she thought so, and that was why she tried to run away with him. To think of them on that train! It seems like the judgment of God, doesn't it?"

"No," I said sharply. "There were many other people on that train who were killed. They weren't all on the point of leaving their husbands with other men."

"How right you are! I knew you had lots of common sense. And you don't think I did wrong?"

"You must not blame yourself," I said. "Whatever you did, you did because you thought it was best for her. And we, after all, make our own destinies. I am sure of that."

"You do comfort me, Miss Leigh. You will stay and have tea with me, won't you?"

"It is kind of you, but I think I should be back before dark."

"Oh, yes, you must be back before dark. Miss Leigh, when Alvean is well enough, you will bring her over to see me?"

"I promise I shall."

"And if you yourself feel like coming over before that ——"

"Depend upon it, I shall come. You have given me a very pleasant and interesting time."

The fear came back into her eyes. "You will remember it was in confidence?"

I reassured her. I knew that this charming old lady's greatest pleasure in life must have been sharing confidences, telling a little more than was discreet.

She came to the door to wave me on when I left. "It's been so pleasant," she reiterated. "And don't forget." She put her finger to her lips and her eyes sparkled.

I imitated the gesture and, waving, rode off.

I was very thoughtful on the way home. This day I had learned so much.

I was nearly at Mellyn village when the thought struck me that Gilly was Alvean's half sister. I felt a great desire to help them all out of this morass of tragedy into which Alice's indiscretion had plunged them.

I can do it, I told myself. I will do it.

Then I thought of Connan with Lady Treslyn, and was filled with disquiet. What absurd and impossible dreams I was indulging in. What chance had I—the governess—of showing Connan the way to happiness?

Christmas was rapidly approaching and it brought all that excitement which I remembered so well from the old days in my father's vicarage.

Kitty and Daisy were constantly whispering together. Mrs. Polgrey said they nearly drove her crazy and their work was more skimped than usual. She went about the house sighing "Nowadays ——" and shaking her head. But even she was excited.

I began to think about Christmas presents and made a little list. There must be something for Phillida and her family, and Aunt Adelaide, but I was mainly concerned with the people at Mount Mellyn. I had a little money to spend, as I had saved most of what I had earned since I had taken my post.

One day I went into Plymouth and did my shopping. I went on Royal Rover and left him at a well-known hostelry where he would be looked after until I was ready to return.

I bought books for Phillida and her family and had them sent direct to her. I bought a scarf for Aunt Adelaide and that was sent too. I spent a long time choosing what I would give the Mellyn household. Finally I decided on scarves for Kitty and Daisy, red and green which would suit them; and a blue one for Gilly to match her eyes. For Mrs. Polgrey I bought a bottle of whisky, which I was sure would delight her more than anything else, and for Alvean some handkerchiefs in many colors, with A embroidered on them.

I was pleased with my purchases. I was beginning to grow as excited about Christmas as Daisy and Kitty were.

The weather continued mild and on Christmas Eve I helped Mrs. Polgrey and the girls to decorate the great hall and some of the other rooms.

The men had been out the previous day and brought in ivy, holly, box and bay. I was shown how the pillars in the great hall were entwined with these leaves and Daisy and Kitty taught me to make Christmas bushes. I had never before heard of a Christmas bush. We took two wooden hoops—one inserted into the other—and this ball-like framework we decorated with evergreen leaves and furze; then we hung oranges and apples on it and I must say this made a pretty show. These we hung in some of the windows.

The biggest logs were carried in for the fireplaces, and the house was filled with laughter, while the servants' hall was decorated in exactly the same manner as the great hall.

"We do have our ball here while the family be having theirs," Daisy told me. And I wondered to which ball I should go. Perhaps to neither. A governess' position was somewhere in between, I supposed.

"My life!" cried Daisy. "I can scarcely wait for the day. Last Christmas was a quiet one—had to be on account of the house being in mourning. But we in the servants' hall managed pretty well. There was dash-an-darras and metheglin to drink, and Mrs. Polgrey's sloe gin had to be tasted to be believed. There was mutton and beef, I remember, and hog's

No jam tastes like the kind you make yourself!

Easy! Thrifty! No failures—and only one-minute boil with Certo or Sure-Jell!

Sure-Jell and Certo are brands of pectin . . . the fruit substance that causes jelling. The amount of pectin in fruits varies—so Sure-Jell or Certo takes the guesswork out of jam and jelly with package and bottle.

Recipe: Strawberrry Jam. Crush 2 quarts fully ripe berries. Mix 4½ cups prepared fruit in large saucepan with 1 box powdered Sure-Jell. (Or use liquid Certo—recipe on bottle.) Stir over high heat until mixture comes to boil.

Stir in 7 cups sugar at once. Bring to full rolling boil; then boil hard 1 minute, stirring constantly. This short boil time means less juice boils away. So you get up to 50% higher yield—and fresher flavor! So much better than jam you can buy!

Remove from heat; alternately stir and skim foam for 5 min. Ladle into 11 medium jars. Cover with paraffin. Sure-Jell and Certo are recommended by General Foods Kitchens.

pudding. No feast in these parts ain't complete without hog's pudding. You ask father!"

All through Christmas Eve the smell of baking filled the kitchen and its neighborhood. Tapperty, with Billy Trehay and some of the boys from the stables, came to the door just to smell it. Mrs. Tapperty was up at the house all day working in the kitchen. I scarcely recognized the usually calm and dignified Mrs. Polgrey. She was bustling about, her face flushed, stirring and talking ecstatically of pies which bore the odd names of squab and lammy, giblet, muggety and herby.

I was called in to help. "Do 'ee keep your eye on that saucepan, Miss, and should it come to the boil tell I quickly." Mrs. Polgrey's dialect became more and more broad as the excitement grew, and I could scarcely understand the language which was being bandied about in the kitchen.

I was smiling fatuously at a batch of pasties which had just come out of the oven, golden brown pastry with the smell of savory meats and onions, when Kitty came in shouting, "Ma'am, the curl singers be here."

"Well, bring 'em, bring 'em in, ye daftie," cried Mrs. Polgrey, forgetting dignity in the excitement and wiping her hand across her sweating brow. "What be 'ee waiting for? Don't 'ee know, me dear, that it be bad luck to keep curl singers waiting?"

I followed her into the hall where a company of village youths and girls had gathered. They were already singing when we arrived, and I understood that the curl singers were what were known in other parts of the country as carol singers.

They rendered "The Seven Joys of Mary," "The Holly and the Ivy," "The Twelve Days of Christmas" and "The First Noel." We all joined in.

Then the leader of the group began to sing:

"Come let me taste your Christmas beer
That is so very strong,
And I do wish that Christmastime,
With all its mirth and song,
Was twenty times as long."

Then Mrs. Polgrey signed to Daisy and Kitty, who were already on their way to bring refreshment to the party after this gentle reminder.

Metheglin was served to the singers with blackberry and elderberry wine, and into their hands were thrust great pasties, some containing meat, some fish. The satisfaction was evident.

When they had finished eating and drinking, bowl—which was tied with red ribbons and decorated with furze—was handed to Mrs. Polgrey, who very majestically placed some coins into it.

When they had gone Daisy said, "Well, now that lot have come agooding, what's to be next?"

She delighted in my ignorance, of course, when I had to ask what agooding meant.

"My dear life, you don't know all, Miss, do 'ee now. To go agooding means to go collecting for Christmas wine or a Christmas cake. What else?"

I realized I had a great deal to learn about the habits of the Cornish, but I did feel I was enjoying their way of celebrating Christmas.

"Oh, Miss, I forgot to tell 'ee," cried Daisy. "There be a parcel in your room. I took it up just afore them come agooding, and forgot to tell 'ee till now." She was surprised because I lingered. "A parcel, Miss! Don't 'ee want to see what it is?"

I realized that I had been in a dream. I felt that I wanted to stay here forever, and learn all the customs of this part of the world. I wanted to make it my part of the world.

I shook myself out of that dream. What you really want, I told myself, is some fairy-tale ending to your story. You want to be the mistress of Mount Mellyn. Why not admit it?

I went up to my room, and there I found Phillida's parcel. I took out a shawl of black silk on which was embroidered a pattern in green and amber. There was also an amber comb of the Spanish type. I stuck the comb in my hair and wrapped the shawl about me. I was startled by my reflection. I looked exotic, more like a Spanish dancer than an English governess.

There was something else in the parcel. I undid it quickly and saw that it was a dress—one of Phillida's which I had greatly admired. It was of green silk, the same shade as the shawl. A letter fell out:

Dear Marty: How is the governessing? Your last letter sounded as though you found it intriguing. I believe your Alvean is a little horror. Spoilt child, I'll swear. Are they treating you well? It sounded as if that side of it was not too bad.

The shawl and comb are my Christmas gift. I hope you like them because I spent a lot of time choosing.

I am wondering whether you'll be sitting down to dine with the family this Christmas or presiding in the servants' hall. I'm sure it will be the former. They couldn't help but ask you.

I shall want to hear all about the Christmas festivities. And, dear sister, when you're the fourteenth at the dinner table don't freeze likely suitors with a look or give them one of your clever retorts. Be a nice, gentle girl.

Happy Christmas, dear Marty, and do write soon. The children and William send their love. Mine to you also. PHILLIDA.

I felt rather emotional. Dear Phillida, her shawl and comb were beautiful, even if a little incongruous for someone in my humble position. And it was good of her to send the dress.

I was startled by a sudden cry. I spun round and saw Alvean at the door.

"Miss!" she cried. "So it's you!"

"Of course. Who did you think it was?"

"I've never seen you look like that, Miss. You look . . . pretty."

"Thank you, Alvean."

She was a little shaken. I knew who she had thought it was standing in my room. I was the same height as Alice, and if I were less slender that would not be obvious with the silk shawl round me.

Christmas Day was a day to remember all my life. I awoke to the sounds of excitement. The servants were laughing and talking below my window. I opened my eyes and thought: Christmas Day. And then: My first Christmas at Mount Mellyn.

I was out of bed when my hot water was brought up. Daisy scarcely stopped a moment, she was so full of excitement. "I be late, Miss, but there be so much to do. You'd better hurry or you'll not see the wassail. They'll be coming early. They know the family 'ull be off to church, so they mustn't be late."

IN THE JULY JOURNAL

There was no time to ask questions, so I ashed and dressed and took out my parcels. Alvean's had been put by her bed the previous ight.

I went to the window. The air was balmy nd I drew deep breaths and listened to the entle rhythm of the waves. They said nothing is morning; they merely swished contentedly. his was Christmas morning when for a day ll troubles, all differences might be shelved.

Alvean came to my room, carrying her embroidered handkerchiefs rather shyly. She aid, "Thank you, Miss. A happy Christmas!"

I put my arms about her and kissed her, and though she seemed a little embarrassed by is demonstration, she returned my kiss.

She had brought a brooch so like the silver hip I had given her that I thought for a moent that she was returning my gift.

"I got it from Mr. Pastern," she said. "I anted one as near mine as possible, but not o near, so that we shouldn't get them mixed p. Yours has a little engraving on the handle. ow we'll each have one when we go ridg."

I was delighted. She had not ridden since her ccident, and she could not have shown me ore clearly that she was ready to start again.

I said, "You could not have given me anying I should have liked better, Alvean."

She was very pleased, although she murured in an offhand way, "I'm glad you like Miss." Then she left me abruptly.

This, I told myself, is going to be a wonderful ay. It's Christmas.

My presents proved to be a great success. rs. Polgrey's eyes glistened at the sight of e whisky. As for Gilly, she was delighted ith her scarf. I suppose the poor child had ver had anything so pretty before. She kept roking it and staring at it in wonder. Daisy d Kitty were pleased with their scarves, too, d I felt I had been clever in my choice.

The wassail singers arrived and I heard their ices at the door of the great hall:

"The master and mistress our wassail begin
Pray open your door and let us come in
With our wassail, wassail, wassail.
And joy come to our jolly wassail."

They came into the hall and they, also, carried a bowl into which coins were dropped. All the servants crowded in, and as Connan entered the singing grew louder and the verse was repeated.

"The master and the mistress ——"

I thought, Two years ago, Alice would have stood there with him. Does he remember? He showed no sign. He sang with them and ordered that the stirrup cup, the dash-an-darras, be brought out with the saffron cake and pasties and gingerbread which had been made for the occasion.

He moved nearer to me. "Well, Miss Leigh," he said, "what do you think of a Cornish Christmas?"

"Very interesting."

"You haven't seen half yet."

"I should hope not. The day has scarcely begun."

"You should rest this afternoon."

"But why?"

"For the feasting this evening. Of course you will join us. Where else would you spend your Christmas Day? With the Polgreys? With the Tappertys?"

"I did not know. I wondered whether I was expected to hover between the great hall and the servants' hall."

"Oh, come, this is Christmas. Do not wonder whether you should be welcome or not—just come. By the way, I have not wished you a merry Christmas yet. I have something here—a little gift. A token of my gratitude, if you like. You have been so good to Alvean since her accident."

"But I have only done my duty as a governess."

"And that is something you would always do. I know it. Well, let's say this is merely to wish you a merry Christmas."

He had pressed a small object into my hand, and I was so overcome with pleasure that I felt it must show in my eyes and betray my feelings.

"You are very good to me," I said. "I had not thought ——"

He smiled and moved away to the singers. I had noticed Tapperty's eyes on us. I wondered whether he had seen the gift handed to me.

I wanted to be alone. The small case he had pressed into my hand was demanding to be opened. I slipped out of the hall and ran up to my room.

It was a small blue plush case, the sort which usually contained jewelry. I opened it. Inside, on oyster-colored satin, lay a brooch. It was in the form of a horseshoe, and it was studded with what could only be diamonds.

I stared at it in dismay. I could not accept such a valuable object. I must return it, of course.

I held it to the light and saw the flash of red and green in the stones. If it had been some small token I should have been so happy. I wanted to throw myself on my bed and weep.

I could hear Alvean calling, "Miss, it's time for church. Come on, Miss. The carriage is waiting to take us to church."

I hastily put the brooch into its box and put on my cape and bonnet as Alvean came into the room.

I saw him after church. He was going across to the stables and I called after him.

He hesitated, looked over his shoulder and smiled.

"Mr. TreMellyn, it is very kind of you," I said as I ran up to him, "but this gift is far too valuable for me to accept."

He put his head on one side and regarded me in the old mocking manner. "My dear Miss Leigh," he said lightly, "I am a very ignorant man, I fear. I have no notion how valuable a gift must be before it is acceptable."

I flushed hotly and stammered, "This is a very valuable ornament."

"I thought it so suitable. A horseshoe means luck, you know. And you have a way with horses, have you not?"

"I—I have no occasion to wear such a valuable piece of jewelry."

"I thought you might wear it to the ball tonight."

For a moment I had a picture of myself dancing with him. I should be wearing Phillida's green silk dress, which would compare favorably with those of his guests because Phillida had a way with clothes. I would wear my shawl, and my diamond brooch would be proudly flaunted on the green silk, because I treasured it so much, and I treasured it because he had given it to me.

"I feel I have no right."

"Oh," he murmured, "I begin to understand. You feel that I give the brooch in the same spirit as Mr. Nansellock offered Jacinth."

"So-o," I stammered, "you knew of that?"

"Oh, I know most things that go on here, Miss Leigh. You returned the horse. Very proper and what I would expect of you. Now the brooch is given in a different spirit. You have been good to Alvean, not only as a governess but as a woman. Do you know what I mean? There is more to the care of a child than arithmetic and grammar. You gave her that extra. The brooch belonged to Alvean's mother. It is a gift of appreciation from us both. Does that make it all right?"

I was silent for a few moments. Then I said, "Yes . . . that is different, of course. I accept the brooch. Thank you very much, Mr. TreMellyn."

He smiled at me—a smile I did not fully understand, because it seemed to hold many meanings. I was afraid to try to understand.

"Thank you," I murmured again and hurried back to the house.

I went to my room and took out the brooch. I pinned it on my dress, and immediately my lavender cotton took on a new look.

I would wear the diamonds tonight. I would go in Phillida's dress and my comb and shawl, and on my breast I would wear Alice's diamonds.

So on this strange Christmas Day I had a gift from Alice.

CHOICE CHINESE RECIPES

Though Americans have learned from the Chinese, the latter have also learned, from settling here, of efficient methods, new vegetables and meats. Today by teaming their age-old recipes with our myriad foods and modern equipment, the Chinese have created a new cuisine: Chinese-American cooking.

Beef, for example, a meat rarely used in the East because the cow was a revered beast of burden, assumes new elegance prepared in the Oriental manner. In Steak Kow, fork-tender sirloin is excitingly teamed with crunchy water chestnuts, celery cabbage and Chinese mushrooms. Another Anglicized contribution: fried chicken cooked à la Cantonese, a mellow blend of chicken, Chinese mushrooms and celery cabbage made aromatic of ginger root. And when given a sweet-tart treatment, even an old American favorite like pork chops wins new accolade. For a main dish that doubles nicely as an hors d'oeuvre, butterfly shrimp coupled with ham.

It's easy to integrate Chinese food into an American meal—as a matter of fact, we do it at home quite often. If you decide to make the Chinese dish the meat dish, you have only to prepare a salad and rice. For a savory potato substitute: pork-fried rice. There is no secret formula for serving a Chinese-American meal. Let your family be your guide—simply mix and match the cuisines for their enjoyment.

Here we offer you six recipes to try—all in the best Chinese-American tradition to be prepared with ease, served in elegance and eaten with acclaim.

Steak Kow

¼ cup Chinese mushrooms
4½ teaspoons salad oil
1½ teaspoons salt
1 pound sirloin steak, cut ½″ thick
2 cups sliced celery cabbage
⅓ cup sliced water chestnuts
⅓ cup sliced bamboo shoots
½ cup water
½ cup frozen peas
1 tablespoon oyster sauce or clam juice
¼ teaspoon monosodium glutamate
Dash pepper
1 teaspoon cornstarch mixed with 2 tablespoons cold water

Soak mushrooms in cold water to cover for about ½ hour. Drain and slice. Rub skillet with 1½ teaspoons salad oil and ½ teaspoon salt. Heat very hot. Fry steak quickly—2 minutes on each side. Remove and cut into 1″ squares. Heat skillet again with 1 tablespoon oil and 1 teaspoon salt. Add celery cabbage, water chestnuts, bamboo shoots and mushrooms. Stir and fry for 2 minutes. Add water and frozen peas. Cover and cook for 2 minutes. Add steak. Cover and cook 1 minute more. Stir in oyster sauce or clam juice, monosodium glutamate, pepper and cornstarch-water mixture. Cook ½ minute. Serve at once. Makes 4 servings.

Butterfly Shrimp

24 large shrimp, cleaned and split halfway through lengthwise
½ pound ham
6 strips bacon
½ cup flour
2 eggs, beaten
5 teaspoons butter
2 large onions, peeled and thinly sliced
½ teaspoon salt
2 cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
1 cup water
¼ cup Worcestershire sauce
2 tablespoons sugar
1 teaspoon tomato sauce
4 teaspoons cornstarch mixed with ½ cup cold water

Flatten each shrimp and top with a thin slice of ham measuring about 2½″ x 1″. Cut each bacon strip into 4 pieces; dip in batter made by combining flour and eggs and place over ham and shrimp. Sauté in 1 tablespoon butter 3–4 minutes on each side. Remove from skillet and keep warm. In the same skillet sauté onions, 3–4 minutes, stirring constantly. Arrange onions in serving dish and cover with fried shrimp. Heat 2 teaspoons butter in a skillet, add salt, and brown garlic. Now add water, Worcestershire sauce, sugar and tomato sauce. Mix well and bring to a boil. Gradually stir in cornstarch-water paste, cook until thickened and pour over shrimp. Makes 4–6 servings.

Roast Pork Fried Rice

¼ teaspoon salt
1 egg
¼ cup diced leftover roast pork
¼ cup diced onion
¼ cup bean sprouts
3 cups cooled, cooked rice
1 teaspoon soy sauce
¼ teaspoon monosodium glutamate
Dash pepper

Grease a skillet well, add salt and heat until very hot. Now add egg and scramble. Mix in the pork, onion, bean sprouts and rice. Stir and fry for 2 to 3 minutes. Season with soy sauce, monosodium glutamate and pepper. Cook and stir 1 more minute. Makes 4 servings.

Pork With Mushrooms

¾ pound boneless pork
1 tablespoon cooking sherry
[illegible]
teaspoon monosodium glutamate

Partially freeze pork and cut against the grain into paper-thin slices. Heat a well-greased skillet until very hot. Stir and fry pork for 2 minutes and at the same time sprinkle cooking sherry over meat. Mix together soy sauce, salt, monosodium glutamate, sugar, water and pepper and add along with the mushrooms. Bring to a boil. Now blend in cornstarch-water mixture and stir over low heat for 1 minute. Make[illegible]

Pork Chops à la Lee

1½ tablespoons salad oil
1½ teaspoons salt
4 pork chops, cut 1″ thick
1 tomato, peeled and diced
1 heart of celery, sliced
¼ cup sliced onion
1 cup sliced lettuce
½ cup water
¼ cup catchup
2 tablespoons Worcestershire sauce
2 teaspoons sugar
¼ teaspoon monosodium glutamate
Dash pepper
2 teaspoons cornstarch mixed with 3 tablespoons cold water

Heat ½ tablespoon salad oil and ½ teaspoon salt in a heavy skillet. Sauté pork chops 30–40 minutes or until done; remove, bone and cut into ½″ squares. Add 1 tablespoon oil and 1 teaspoon salt to the skillet and sauté tomato, heart of celery, onion and lettuce for 1 minute, stirring constantly. Add ½ cup water, cover and cook 1 minute. Stir in meat and cook 1 more minute, covered. Now stir in catchup, Worcestershire sauce, sugar, monosodium glutamate, pepper and cornstarch-water paste. Cook, stirring, ½ minute longer. Makes 4 servings.

Fried Chicken Cantonese

½ cup Chinese mushrooms
1 broiling chicken, split
2 tablespoons soy sauce
¼ cup cooking sherry
Cooking oil or fat
2 tablespoons butter
½ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon ginger or 8 thin slices ginger root
4 water chestnuts, sliced thin
½ cup bamboo shoots, cut into 1″ squares (or ½ cup drained, canned bamboo shoots)
1 cup celery cabbage cut diagonally into ½″ pieces
1 cup plus 6 tablespoons water
2 teaspoons cornstarch
1 teaspoon sugar
1 teaspoon monosodium glutamate
⅛ teaspoon pepper

Soak mushrooms in cold water for ½ hour. Drain and slice into ⅛″ strips. Rub chicken with soy sauce and sherry. Let stand 10 minutes. Fry chicken in ½″ fat 5 minutes on each side or until done. Cool and remove bones. Cut meat into bite-sized pieces. Heat butter in a skillet until bubbly. Add salt, ginger, water chestnuts, bamboo shoots, celery cabbage and mushrooms. Stir and cook for ½ minute. Now add 1 cup water, cover and cook 3 minutes. Mix together cornstarch, sugar, monosodium glutamate, pepper and 6 tablespoons cold water. Add to vegetable mixture, cook and stir for 1 minute. Place chicken in a serving dish and top with vegetables. Makes 4 servings.

you'd never invite me back." She smiled and the world smiled with her.

After a brief pause for a commercial for Cuffo ("Go everywhere. Do everything. On the cuff. We bill you just once a month."), they resumed, going into some of the semi-inside show-business talk for which the program was famous, and giving Monte the chance personally to guarantee that The Sure Thing was the greatest thing that had happened to Hollywood since The Birth of a Nation.

That out of the way, "Tell me, Julie," Monte said, "how did you become an actress in the first place? Were you like the rest of us? I mean, did you always want to get into show business?"

Julie Thomas' merry eyes twinkled, her lips curved into the suggestion of a smile, and good feeling sped across the air waves as the nation poised itself for her answer.

"Well, no. I wouldn't say that." The smile grew wider as she hesitated momentarily, thinking back. "You see, when I was getting out of high school, everybody was saying what college they were going to, or secretarial school, or to look for a job or something. And this wildly handsome boy said he was going to the School of Dramatic Art. And my mother didn't know what to do with me anyhow, so I persuaded her that I should be an actress and she sent me there." She broke into rippling laughter and everyone laughed along with her. She looked as cute as a kitten. You could tell why audiences loved her.

When the laughter quieted down, Monte commented on the strange things that set the pattern for one's life, and then barreled ahead with the next question. "What about the boy? Was he just a passing fancy or did something come of this?"

Julie was still laughing. "That's the best part," she told him. "He never even showed up at the school. He's probably a doctor or a lawyer or something with a wife and seven thousand kids."

"I know that girl from somewhere," Joe said.

"From the movies," Betty answered.

And then Monte and his guest were shaking hands and Monte was saying, "Julie, it was wonderful having you here, and I hope you'll come back soon and see us again. Will you?"

"I'd love to," Julie said. "I've really enjoyed it." There was wild applause as she started to move off stage and the camera closed in on Monte. Suddenly, with the unpredictability that was so great a part of his charm, he asked another question.

"By the way, did you ever see him again?"

The camera cut back to Julie just as she was about to step into the wings.

"Hey," Joe said, "that girl's got quite a figure!"

"Oh, I don't know," Betty said.

Julie was again facing the audience, a puzzled expression on her face. "What 'him'?" she asked.

"You know. The wildly handsome boy who lured you to the dramatic school."

"Oh, him! No, I never did see him again. I think about him every once in a while though. Joe Blaine! He was beautiful!" And then, with a sudden inspiration she waved directly at the camera and said, "Hiya, Joe. Keep in touch!"

As the camera again switched from Julie to Monte Madden, poised for his next commercial, there was a final explosion of laughter across the country. All across the country, that is, except in the Blaine house, where, for the first time, the Monte Madden Show had been abruptly cut off the air. After just one look at the dawning recognition in her husband's eyes, Betty had gone right over and flicked the switch.

Joe didn't even notice. "Did you hear that?" he yelled. "That must be that kid Julia Tommaso. I thought she looked familiar. How do you like that! A real movie star!"

He was already burrowing in the bookcase for his high-school yearbook when the phone rang. Betty took her eyes off the beast to whom she was bound in wedlock and picked up the receiver. It was Frank Curtis. "Hey," Frank said, "you watching the Madden show?"

"No," Betty said, speaking the literal truth. "Why? Are you making a survey?"

"This'll kill you." Frank laughed. "You know that Julie Thomas? The one in The Sure Thing?" He didn't wait for a reply. "Well, she was on the show and she said the reason why she became an actress was on account of a guy named Joe Blaine. And she told him to keep in touch. You would have gotten a charge out of it. I wonder if the real Joe Blaine was watching."

"What do you mean 'the real Joe Blaine'?"

"You know. The one she was really talking about."

Horrified, Betty heard herself saying, "Oh, the one she was talking about was watching all right. He's sitting here looking at his high-school graduation book right this minute. Refreshing his recollection."

"No kidding! Let me talk to him."

"Frank wants to talk to you," Betty said.

Joe came to the phone with the open book in his hand. "Hello."

"Hello, lover boy," Frank said. "You certainly must have had it in the old days."

"Oh, knock it off, Frank," Joe said. "I hardly knew her. I didn't even recognize her."

"Sure," Frank said. "Sure you didn't. You tell that to Betty, old buddy. Maybe she'll go for it. Boy, oh boy! See you, lover," and he hung up.

Joe turned back to his book. "What a nut!" He laughed. "He's calling me 'lover boy.'"

The phone rang again. "You take it, will you, dear?" Joe said. "I want to find this picture."

Grim-faced, Betty picked up the receiver. It was Bill Gordon. Joe signaled that he didn't want to come to the phone. When Bill hung up, there was Sue McCall, and then Joyce Perone, and then Pete Peters, and then Betty took the receiver off the hook and left it off.

If Joe had had more experience, he probably would have sailed a better course. But he'd been married less than a year and was not yet fully familiar with storm warnings. In fact, the muddleheaded nincompoop was so crazy about Betty, it had never even crossed his mind that anyone else could possibly doubt his feelings. Least of all Betty.

So instead of saying the Tommaso girl might be good-looking and a great actress but she certainly didn't have much sex appeal, or—even better—giving Betty some tangible evidence of her own insuperable desirability, the dumb bunny hurried to show her Julie's picture and to remark that, even then, you could see she'd be something special. "She used to wear tight sweaters," he remarked, pouring oil on the flames.

"That was no Mother Hubbard she had on tonight," Betty said casually, stretching her own memorable contours. Testing. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten. Just testing. She might as well have been in the room by herself. Nothing happened.

Shrugging her shoulders, she took the book Joe held out to her and studied the likeness of the extremely attractive youngster who had become Julie Thomas. "She doesn't look like much there," she commented. It was a second warning. Joe missed that one too.

"How can you say that?" he wanted to know. "Why, she's a doll. And look what they elected her! 'Most Boysterous.' B-o-y-sterous. I think that's kind of funny."

"A scream," Betty said. "I see where she was a cheerleader too. That fits in."

"It does, doesn't it!" agreed the master strategist.

About half an hour later, having nostalgically made his way clear through the book, he realized that Betty had gone to bed without kissing him good night. But by the time he got upstairs she seemed to be fast asleep, so he didn't disturb her.

When he awoke the next morning, she was still asleep. So again he didn't bother her. This lack of bothering her bothered her very much indeed. In fact, all the time he was dressing, a seemingly closed eye was rigorously inspecting him for evidence of a disposition to trifle with connubial affections. However, he knew nothing of all this and proceeded to the office in blissful ignorance of the emotional hurricane beginning to swirl about him.

There was a small amount of kidding at the office and a couple of the girls wanted to know if he were the "real" Joe Blaine. It went off very well, though, because Joe said, "Sure, sure," and of course no one believed him.

After lunch, though, things changed. Frank Curtis called. He'd just seen the afternoon papers. In an interview that morning, Julie Thomas had said she'd love to meet Joe Blaine again. So her studio had undertaken to find him for her. They were offering a thousand dollars for information leading to etc., etc. That's why Frank wanted to be doubly sure that Joe was really the Joe Blaine. Because, as Joe's buddy, Frank didn't want the whole thousand, but he sure could use like a third of it. What do you say, Joe?

Joe thought about it. Frank certainly had a point. Someone was going to collect that money—so why not Joe Blaine? And Frank did deserve something for telling him about it. Besides which, it would look better if the information came from Frank. Of course there was the fact that he'd hardly known Julia Tommaso at school. But so what? She said she knew him. And it would be a kick to meet a movie star. Something to talk about. And he and Betty could certainly use a little extra cash if they were ever going to get that new car.

"O.K., Frank," he said. "I'm the guy. You call them. One third for you, two thirds for me."

"Right away," Frank said. "See you in the papers."

Fifteen minutes later, Joe's phone rang again. The voice at the other end was hep, high-powered and high-priced. "Joe Blaine?"

"Yes."

"Formerly of Philadelphia?"

"Yes. Who is this?"

"Hank Ellis. Eastern Director of Press Information for Palmetto Films. A fellow named Frank Curtis says you're an old high-school friend of Julie Thomas. Is that right?"

"I guess so," Joe said. "I went to school with her."

"Do you remember her nickname?"

Joe thought. "Yeh," he said after a while. "They used to call her 'Bouncy.' Probably because she was a cheerleader."

"Probably," Hank Ellis agreed. "Well, anyhow, Bouncy'd like to see you. Could you come to her hotel?"

"Well, sure. I think so. I'd like to see her too."

"At the Brinsley? Around four?"

"Not four," Joe said. "I've got a job."

"Right. I forgot. How about six?"

"Fine," Joe said, "six."

Then he hung up and dialed Betty to tell her about the money and that he was going over to see Julie Thomas at the Brinsley at six and it might be a while before he broke away, so Betty shouldn't wait for him. He noticed an unusual quiet at the other end.

"You there, honey?" he asked.

"I'm here," she said.

"That's nice," Joe said. "What have you been doing all day?"

"Oh, not much. I cleaned the house and did some shopping and answered a lot of funny phone calls from people we know. And then I had lunch and then I had some sewing to do. And then I had to take the car in to have it fixed, and then there were some more calls. Nothing very glamorous."

"What's the matter?" Joe asked. "You sore about something?"

"Certainly not. What would I have to be sore about?"

"You really sure everything's O.K., honey?"

"Fine," she said.

"O.K., then," Joe said, and hung up.

When he called from the Brinsley lobby at six, the soft, husky voice of Miss Thomas herself told him to come right up. And she seemed genuinely pleased to see him. She looked great. She was going to be sensational in color.

As soon as he was settled in a chair, Joe put it right to her. "Julie," he said, "what's this stuff about the dramatic school and all? You didn't have any crush on me. You made that whole thing up, didn't you?"

She had the grace to blush. "That's right, Joe. I hardly knew you. But when Monte caught me by surprise and I reached out for a name, I came up with yours. That's all there was to it." She smiled apologetically.

"That's all right," Joe said. "It's just that I'd hate to think I missed out on something." He paused. "This is all strictly publicity, huh?"

"I'm afraid so," Julie said. "But how about taking me to dinner?"

"Fine," Joe said. "A pleasure." So they went to the hotel restaurant and people stared at them.

The conversation came easy. Julie told him how, after she'd popped off on the program the previous evening, the publicity department had decided to milk it. They figured they could probably rack up a few stories on the movie page, maybe even a couple of lines on the front page, and a good play in the gossip columns. Possibly some pictures. Would Joe mind posing for a few pictures with her? No, he didn't think so. And he told her about his deal with Frank Curtis. She said the publicity department was probably good for five hundred more if he'd play along another day or two. Joe said he'd be delighted.

Then, business out of the way, they just chatted. Neither of them was in contact with any of their former classmates and they quickly agreed that even in their school days they'd moved in completely different circles. So Joe told Julie about Betty and the job and the house. And she told him about Hollywood and Sam Claiborne, the Western hero on television to whom she was secretly engaged. The last part was confidential. It hadn't even got into the columns yet.

Toward the end of dinner there was a call for Julie and they brought the telephone to the table. It was Hank Ellis. Could he send a photographer over for a couple of pictures? With three drinks under his belt and a star of screen and television quite cozy next to him, who could refuse? Not Joe. "Of course," he said. "Tell him to come ahead." He had a vaguely troubling thought that he really ought to be getting home to Betty. But it was only vague.

The photographer was there in practically no time. You might even, if you'd stopped to think about it, have wondered if possibly he hadn't been quite close by all the time.

The pictures taken, Julie signed the dinner check and Joe convoyed her back to her suite. Then, after mutual exchanges of it-had-been-great and Joe's agreement to come again if the studio wanted him, Joe headed for home.

Betty was sitting in a chair with a good view of the door as he walked in. The television set was tuned to a show high on the list of her current hates. Obviously she wasn't paying attention. "Have a good time?" she wanted to know.

"Uh-huh. We had dinner at her hotel. Very fancy." He came over to kiss his wife, but she moved her face so that he caught her forehead instead of her lips.

"There was a call for you about ten minutes ago. They want you to see her again tomorrow night. Dinner and a night club. They'll check with you at the office in the morning."

"Fine," Joe said. "Money, money, money! What's new with you?"

"Oh, the usual thing. I woke up at noon and had room service send up some pheasant in aspic. Then I did the matinee, took my singing lesson, and went to dinner with Frank Sinatra at a little French place in the sixties. He's just in town for a couple of days, you know. He wanted to go on to a party at some countess' house, but I didn't feel like it. So I came home and worked on my memoirs instead."

"What are you so sore about, honey?" Joe asked, in all innocence. "You jealous or something?" It wasn't possible, but it was the only thing he could think of.

Betty gave him a withering look. "I'm going to bed," she said. "I guess you'll be seeing your old flame again tomorrow night?"

"I guess so," Joe said. "Boy! That publicity's a funny business. And, incidentally, she's not my old flame. She's just a real nice girl."

"Sure she is," Betty said and started out of the room.

"Hey," Joe yelled, "don't I get a good-night kiss?"

She came back and pecked at his cheek, then, before he could grab hold of her, was on her way again.

And that's when it came to him. "You are jealous," he said. He was more pleased than annoyed.

"Who? Me?" Betty said. "Because my husband's running around with his old high-school sweetheart and she just happens to be a big-shot actress? Don't be ridiculous. Why should I be jealous? I think it's wonderful. I love it."

"Oh, for heaven's sake, Betty," Joe said. "I'm not 'running around' with anyone. It's just a way to pick up a little extra money. What's so terrible about it? She happened to pull my name out of a hat last night. I told you we didn't have anything to do with each other in school."

"Better late than never," said Betty, completing her withdrawal.

Joe was so upset he didn't even stay up to watch Monte. But by the time he got undressed, bathed and to bed, the little woman was once again asleep and the subject was closed.

Joe had a very bad night. When he went out the next morning, he left a note for Betty: "Darling, please call me as soon as you can. I love you. Joe."

The note might have worked if it hadn't been for the morning papers. The pictures had come out rather well. He and Julie looked very friendly indeed. The captions were good too. "Julie Finds High School Beau" . . . "Reunited High School Sweethearts" . . . "Julie and Joe an Item?"

There wasn't any call from Betty, so at about 10:30 he called her. He was already pretty frazzled. Fellow employees whom he hadn't seen for months kept dropping in on him, the telephone operator was busy screening his calls, and the receptionist was having trouble keeping the reporters at bay. An awful lot of people wanted word from Joe himself on whether there really was anything cooking. Julie had said they were just old, old friends, but the press learned long ago that when show-business people say they're just old, old friends it can mean anything.

Joe could tell immediately that Betty'd seen the papers. "Why, hello there!" she said. "Are Julie and Joe really an item? Our friends are anxious to know, and I'd like to help them if I can. Care to make a statement?" She paused. Then, getting no answer, "Or are you calling about something else? Some new publicity gimmick, maybe? Going out of town for a few days? Atlantic City, perhaps? Or one of those places in the Catskills? Or was there something you wanted me to tell the reporters? They're out on the porch. Or maybe they'll just go away and question the neighbors."

Joe was stunned. He'd known, of course, that Betty had her war paint on. But not that she'd been honing her scalping knife too. "Look, honey," he heard himself saying weakly, "stop getting excited. There's nothing to it. Just tell the reporters to go away. Honest, honey. It's nothing."

"But you are going to see her tonight?"

"Yes," he said defensively. "Yes, I am. For five hundred dollars, why shouldn't I?" And then he returned to how unimportant it was and how Betty was getting steamed up over nothing and how he loved her. And he went on rhetorically to inquire whether, when Julie Thomas stepped out of the picture—today or tomorrow—it would be better or worse to have a little extra money. For his part, he stated, he thought it would be better.

Betty listened to her husband's outpouring until it was absolutely clear that he wasn't going to cancel his plans. Then she said "Good-by" and hung up. After which, just to put the frosting on the cake, there was a call from Julie herself.

She'd seen the papers. She hoped it wasn't too embarrassing for him or his wife. The studio wanted him to take her to dinner and dancing tonight—and they would pay him five hundred dollars—and she'd love to see him again—but if he wanted to forget it, she'd straighten it out with the publicity department. Should she?

Joe thanked her and said not to bother. Everything was fine. When did she want him to pick her up? At eight? Good. He'd be there.

When Joe walked into the suite that night, Hank Ellis was there. He had a drink with them—about his third, Joe guessed (actually it was his eighth)—and talked about Julie's commitments. A television guest shot the next morning. A ribbon cutting at a new supermarket in the afternoon. And then to Washington for some personal appearances. At the mention of Washington, he looked at Joe and smiled. "You'll probably be just as pleased," he said. "All this must have put you on quite a spot at home."

Joe agreed that it probably would have if Betty weren't so understanding. Hank Ellis said no woman was that understanding. He'd been married a long time and one thing he knew was that when jealousy reared its head, women reacted like ten-year-old children. They turned primitive. Julie said not at all. "Primitive, shmimitive," was the way she put it. Women, she said, could be just as clear-minded as men and where no offense is intended they take none. She was sure Joe's wife was that kind of woman. Then she went off to the bedroom to dress, and Hank, his drink finished, gave Joe six hundred dollars—the extra hundred was for the evening's expenses—and with a firm pat on the shoulder and an admonition to take it easy, headed for the door.

When Julie reappeared, she looked sensational. There's something special about women whose job it is to look beautiful. And Julie was wearing her work clothes. Several times Joe felt it necessary to repeat to himself the cabalistic lines "Mirror, mirror on the wall. Betty is the best of all."

They were greeted at Le Rond Point with a special flourish. The dinner was superb. There were lots of stoppers-by, all apparently on the best of terms with Julie and delighted to meet Joe. Some of them even tried to discuss his "plans," but Julie kept the talk carefully casual and gave him little warning nudges every time there was a leading question. They danced a couple of sets and he spent most of the rest of the time being smilingly silent and alternating his thoughts between what an interesting evening he was having and what it was going to be like when he finally got home to Betty.

After dinner they went to The Marrakech to dance. Here the table hoppers and gossip columnists were a little thicker, and the photographers were out in force. But Julie handled them all with the skill of much practice and infinite understanding. She was a model of coolness and urbanity.

That is, she was a model of coolness and urbanity until the very tall young man with the black string tie came in. Joe recognized him immediately. Sam Claiborne, Julie's confidential fiancé—big as a house, tough as the U. S. Cavalry and as edgy as one of those Texas-to-Kansas cattle herds he was always involved with.

The maître d' seated him at a table about fifteen feet away. A number of the patrons recognized him and some of them wandered over to shake his hand. But he didn't invite anyone to join him, and, indeed, was barely polite to them. He seemed to be concentrating on (1) working his way through as many martinis as possible, and (2) keeping an unwavering stare on his intended and the so-and-so who was trying to break up his not-even-completed-yet happy home.

Julie's suavity began spiraling swiftly downward the moment Claiborne appeared. The bubbles went right out of her conversation. Visitors to the table now were not inclined to linger. She was no longer interested in dancing. All she wanted, really, was to become completely inconspicuous. In the circumstances, it took some doing.

And it certainly didn't work with Claiborne. Because after about twenty minutes, he carefully stood up and embarked on the long and perilous journey to their table. Julie said, "If he sits down, just be pleasant. Whatever you do, don't get into a fight with him."

"O.K.," Joe said with deep sincerity. He had no more intention of fighting Sam Claiborne than of tangling with a rogue elephant.

"I can handle him if he gets difficult," Julie said. "Just let me take care of it."

By this time, Claiborne had negotiated the distance to their table, where, after Julie had reluctantly introduced him, he pulled up a chair and settled himself firmly as a member of their party.

On the very next drink, he went over the top. Motioning them conspiratorially toward him, he whispered to Julie, "What's the big idea saying this is a publicity trip?" Then without waiting for an answer, he turned to face Joe. "And what's your big idea fooling around with my fiancée?"

> To live in a great idea means to treat the impossible as though it were possible. It is just the same with a strong character; and when an idea and a character meet, things arise which fill the world with wonder for thousands of years. GOETHE

He took another quick swallow from his deep-dish olive pie and paused courteously for an answer. Getting no immediate reply, he held up an admonishing finger and spoke again. "I don't believe you caught my question," he said, trying to recall it. Finally it came to him. "What's the big idea?" he repeated.

"You see, Sam ——" Julie began, but Sam was again addressing himself to Joe.

"You want me to pop you one?" he inquired, as he gently lowered his head onto the table.

"What do we do, Julie?" Joe whispered. "Should I hold him here while you leave? You want to go out together? Take him with us? What do you think?

"Ho, ho, ho," said Claiborne, lifting his head briefly. "'Go out together,' he says. "You just try going out together." He carefully returned to the tabletop.

"Joe," Julie said, "if you really want to know what I think, I think you should just slip away. That would be the easiest. And call me tomorrow."

"Yes, Joe," Sam Claiborne breathed, "just slip away."

"I don't like it," Joe said. "It looks like he's making me run."

"No it doesn't," Julie said. "Nobody knows anything's going on here. You'll just be doing me a favor."

Reluctantly, Joe stood up.

"And you'll be doing yourself a favor," Claiborne murmured.

Joe started to sit down, but Julie motioned violently and said, "Please, Joe, don't make trouble."

So he straightened up again, then slowly and deliberately walked out. As he passed the maître d', he peeled off a hundred-dollar bill. "For Miss Thomas and her friend," he said.

The doorman asked if he wanted a cab and he was just about to agree when he noticed an old and familiar-looking car parked down the street. It stood out like overalls at the Bachelors' Cotillion. His own car—with his own wife at the wheel. He walked over to her.

"You spying on me?" he asked.

"Certainly," Betty said. "Who has a better right?" Then, "Are you going back in?"

"I was planning to go home, if that's all right with you."

Her eyes were as big as cupcakes. "But you left Julie Thomas inside. Does that mean it's all over?"

"Like I've been trying to tell you," Joe said, "it never started. There's nothing to be over."

"Oh! Honey!" She reached through the car window and threw her arms around his neck. "That's wonderful."

"It sure is," Joe said, bending to kiss her.

At which point a hand spun him around and a familiar voice said, "What kind of a guy are you anyway? First you steal my girl. Then you make her mad at me. And then, when I come looking for you, you're already tangled up with another one." He peered into the car at Betty. "And a good one." Sam Claiborne managed to bow and sway at the same time. Then, "Excuse me," he said, and launched a boulder-sized fist at Joe's chin. Joe ducked just in time. Instinctively, his left smashed into Claiborne's middle and his right clipped the big man on the side of the head. Claiborne went down like a bucket in a well. Joe felt as shaky as the legendary saloon brawler who accidentally knocked out John L. Sullivan.

After that, of course, all was confusion. Betty was out of the car and trying to push Joe into it. The night people poured out on the pavement. The cliff dwellers above the clubs threw their windows wide. Flash photographers materialized from every bistro on the block. Julie was down on the sidewalk cradling Claiborne's head in her arms. And there was a policeman.

Claiborne opened his eyes briefly, looked up at Julie, then moved his gaze to Joe. "Man!" he said. "You don't hit like any accountant I ever knew."

"Come on, now," the cop said, "move along, everybody. Break it up." The people began going away. "Any charges?" he said.

"No charges," said Julie and Betty together.

"Betty," Joe said, "this is Julie Thomas. Julie, this is my wife."

Sam Claiborne opened his eyes again. "Proud to know you, ma'am," he said.

"Oh, stop that," Julie snapped "You're in New York now."

Sam winked and once more closed up shop.

The two girls smiled warily at each other. "Your husband and I went to high school together," Julie said.

"I know," Betty said. "And I wanted to tell you how much I've enjoyed your performance" . . . the hesitation before she added "on the screen," was barely perceptible.

"Thank you," Julie said a bit doubtfully.

Claiborne was back with them again. He tilted his head up at Betty. "I wish I'd known you in school," he said.

"No, you don't," Julie snapped. "Anyhow, she's married."

"So?"

"So you shouldn't mess around with married people," she said. "Right?" She turned to Betty and Joe for confirmation.

"Right!" they said in unison.

"O.K.," Claiborne agreed. With that, Joe helped Claiborne to his feet and got him and Julie installed in a cab which departed amid mutual declarations of esteem and affection. Then Betty and Joe got into their car and drove home.

As they entered the house, he looked at his watch. Twelve-fifteen. "Want to watch Monte for a while?" he asked.

"I don't think so," she said. "Let's just go on upstairs."

On the first landing, he stole a glance at her. "You know," he said, "we'll probably get quite a going over in the papers tomorrow."

"I know," she said. "Did I look all right?"

"Great," he said. "Just great."

She reached over and took his arm and put it around her waist. "That's nice," she said.

And they went on up to bed. END

old news magazine. I worked just as hard, and just as long, and on something that was just as important, but it hadn't the glamour of Top Secret.

Lieut. Dick Addington was a flier, and maybe he was gay, too, on the side. I just don't know. He was somewhere else. Anyhow, they were divorced, and Agatha was Mrs. Aldrich Addington. But that didn't last long. Almost immediately she married Jeff Harper, an older engineer who understood her—for a while at least. After her second divorce I don't know what she called herself. Mrs. Aldrich Harper, maybe, or maybe Mrs. Aldrich Addington Harper. Maybe she didn't bother to have any plate made, since it was for so short a time. Probably she just called people up and said, "Hi, sweety, it's me, Agatha. Can't you and that nice"—pause—"husband of yours come for drinks on Thursday? Sixish?" All in that throaty voice of hers.

After she was Mrs. Aldrich Addington Harper or whatever, she married an Englishman, a painter. Working on battle paintings or something. I don't remember what his name was; and what's more, I wager even Agatha has to get out her five-year diaries to keep her husbands straight. After that she married a lemon rancher. From California or Arizona or somewhere. She persuaded him to spend a few months back in good old Georgetown, and I met him then. He was always cheerful and friendly and eager to explain about citriculture. But he either didn't understand Agatha, or understood her too well—and she was off to Mexico for another divorce. Then after a few months she was off to Majorca as Mrs. Novelist. It wouldn't do to bring his name in, poor guy. She left him, and he left Majorca. And here she was turning up again, at what must have been her tenth or fifteenth Georgetown address, with just plain Agatha Aldrich on her cards. No Miss, no Mrs., no nothing.

I'll tell you what it is about Agatha. She got that old nursery game all mixed up. You know, the one that starts "Rich man, poor man, beggar man, thief," and goes all the way down to "chief." You're supposed to tell off the buttons on your coat one by one, and then you get to the last button you know what kind of man you're supposed to marry. Agatha thought you were supposed to marry them all, and in only sixteen or seventeen years she's managed five out of eight! Not exactly the right categories, but you could switch them around and make a stab at proving your point. The painter, for instance, was a beggar man, all right, and the engineer was rich.

There's only one good thing about that string of names, and I'll tell you what it is. One name she's never had on the cards in her third case is Mrs. Peregrine Harcourt. That's what my cards say, and will till the day I die.

Well, when I opened that invitation I said "spit" and "damn" and "party-party" and went straight to the telephone and made an appointment to get my hair done. Without even looking at my checkbook. That's one thing I learned from that horrible summer. Money spent on me is as important as money spent on dentists or tuitions or trash cans or even Peregrine. I didn't mean to group him with the trash cans, you understand; it just came out that way. I love that man madly. Fortunately or unfortunately.

But let me tell you about that summer. We'd been married just before Pearl Harbor, and come to Washington, and worked desperately hard and long, and been divinely happy, even if Peregrine didn't remember it that way years later. I know. I have the letters he wrote me when I had to go away on editorial trips, and he had to dash off to one Army Air Force base or another. He was a happy man. And then Victoria was born and Peregrine went off to war, after several final good-bys and last-minute changes in orders. Remember those days? You said good-by to people, and went home and cried and prayed and then they turned up again the next day, or the next week. Not having been shipped out at all.

One of those last good-bys I said on a May morning at the bus stop at the foot of our street. With tiny Victoria in my arms. And then I thought about it, and thought the port of embarkation might be New York, and that Peregrine might get another leave there. So I closed up that apartment somehow, and got myself and Victoria to the station, along with our folding crib and the playpen, and the suitcases and the typewriter and the sewing machine and the file case and the big bag of diapers and things. And the only space in the whole train was in the bar car, so there Victoria and I sat all the way to New York, with nice old gentlemen being terribly kind. But how they evaporated in Penn Station! Not a porter, not a conductor, not anybody. Just me and Victoria on that long, long platform. And our stuff. Mountains of it. So finally after trains had gone by to the left and to the right and made the whole place tremble, I put up the crib, which had little wheels on it, and put all the stuff in it, and Victoria on top of the stuff, and pushed it along to the foot of the long stairs leading up into the station. And there I stood, shouting "Help! Help! Help!" up those stairs until somebody finally came and helped us get to a taxi. We got up to Peregrine's family's house—through a brownout—and there was Peregrine, trying to get me on the telephone in Washington. I saw his face that night when he saw Victoria and me. I know he was a happily married man.

We had that last night together—at least until three o'clock in the morning or so, when Peregrine had to start back to that nameless secret port of embarkation. Of course the matches in his pocket had "Fort Hamilton" printed on them, but that was the way it was those days.

And that was that, for three and a half years. I don't suppose people who live through wars can ever tell other people what it's like. Peregrine has told me about London with the V-1's and the V-2's, but I can't imagine it. He's told me about other things, too, but it isn't real to me. So when I try to tell how it was not to see Peregrine for three and a half years it probably won't mean much either. But you young readers, next time you think you hate your husbands and never want to see them again, just think. Just imagine going a whole week, seven whole days and nights, without laying eye on him. Then imagine going another week, and another week, until a month has gone by, and your birthday, and the baby's birthday, and his birthday, and Thanksgiving, and Christmas, and New Year's Eve, and Easter—and all that all over again, until three of everything have gone by. And four of some.

Letters. Proper letters, and little V-mail things, that were photographed down. Times when no letters came through for weeks. Times when batches of letters came through at once. Times when your family hid the morning papers from you because the news was bad. Very bad. And there was lots of bad news. Years of it, from everywhere. Millions of women lay awake all night, trying not to argue with God. You tried to see the face of your man in the darkness—and it got so you couldn't remember what he looked like.

Peace finally came, but not everybody came home right away. Peregrine didn't come until the winter of 1946–47. And it was hard to pick up. Too much had happened. Or at least too much had happened to Peregrine, and too little had happened to me. Nothing but time and hard routine work and desperate longing and anxiety. I'd given up the Washington apartment and divided my time between our families, because I didn't want Victoria growing up with only me to love. But being a mother and a daughter at the same time when your husband is away at war is not a constructive experience. Ask any of your friends who are a bit over forty and have a child of about seventeen. Most of them will be able to tell you how it was. Except that nobody can tell you if you don't know.

After Peregrine came back we had life on the G.I. Bill. And that was hard going too. No money. Just plain no money. No money for a movie, even if you'd had money for a sitter. I'd been lucky enough to find an apartment near Columbia, but it was expensive. The last week of almost every month Victoria and I had to go home to my family where meals were free. And Peregrine was pushing himself desperately, studying and teaching and doing odd bits of work here and there around town.

Once in a while there would be a party. The trouble was that these were given by our friends who were older: the captains and colonels Peregrine had served with and under. They all had decorated wives and decorated apartments that took up whole floors. They thought Peregrine was wonderful and so did I, but their esteem didn't particularly extend to me. My clothes were old and wrong, and my life had nothing in common with theirs. Except Peregrine.

My days went to housekeeping and Victoria; and whenever Victoria was asleep or otherwise engaged—which wasn't often—I typed masters' essays. Night after night I typed. And I didn't know how. I'd had a typewriter ever since college, and typed my own things, but always looking at the keys. Those poor students! They all got their degrees, but the first half dozen or so of the dissertations looked a bit odd. Because nobody had ever told me you were supposed to put two spaces after a period. You couldn't erase a single letter, and you had to fit everything inside, but only just inside, a red rule that went all around the page. You had to figure out the footnote copy, and know how much space to allow for it at the bottom of the page. Some of those pages I tried ten and twelve times before I got them right. But the money helped us eat. And I picked up some odd learning.

The next year somebody offered Peregrine an extra job, teaching part time at Yale. He'd go up to the 125th Street station every Thursday morning at the crack of dawn, and come home sometime on Saturday. We couldn't afford long-distance telephoning, but sometimes something would come up and I would have to reach Peregrine while he was in New Haven. And twice he wasn't where he was supposed to be staying. I asked him about it the first time, but his answer was so evasive, and so miserable-making to both of us, that I have never mentioned the second time to this day. It's only having that blasted Agatha back in town that makes me remember it now.

Then came the awful summer. We rented the apartment for what seemed like a lot of money, to five bachelors on the G.I. Bill. Peregrine had himself a research job that meant spending the summer in England. Our families said, "Dear, dear, isn't it a pity you can't go, too, Sarah," but neither of them had any money either. One of the grandparents was recuperating from a stroke and in the other family a great-grandparent was dying. An active five-year-old isn't welcome when you have to keep a house quiet. So Peregrine found us a tiny cottage up near Pawling. It belonged to a friend of his, Howard Hamilton, and it was supposed to be for a sort of tenant farmer. We got it for practically no rent, partly out of friendship but mostly because it was in really terrible shape after the long war years.

So there we were, Victoria and I, out in the middle of nowhere. The house was dingy and dirty. Nothing a coat of paint wouldn't have made into something quaint and charming—but I couldn't afford to buy even a quart of paint. And the power was always going off during thunderstorms so that my memories of the summer are all mixed up with the smell of kerosene. Me lighting the lamp while I cheerfully said "RumboBumboBumbo," and Victoria chortling and saying "RumboBumboBumbo" too. And the thunder and lightning swerving around that little valley and making the old elms along the road sway in the weird light.

And every week a letter from Peregrine. Every week. A one-page note saying something like: "Dear Sarah, This is to let you know that things go well here. Dinner with Tom and Marian last week and they asked about you and Victoria. Love to Victoria. Peregrine."

Letters like that from my beloved husband, who even during the most frantic days of the war had always got something off, day in, day out, even when he knew no mail would go out for days—if ever. If ever. Wonderful letters they had been. Some long, some short. I still have every one. One said only, "Sarah, Sarah, Sarah, I keep seeing your face. P." And that was all. But that was connection-making. That warmed me all over. It made me see Peregrine's face. The letters that came that awful summer were letters you'd write out of duty to someone you disliked. It began to dawn on me.

But I kept writing. I'd sit out under the gnarled apple tree and watch Victoria feed our farm animals. We had six pullets. At least I think that's what you call them. Chickens that had been born that spring. "Darling," I'd write. "I wish you could see Victoria now. She's throwing grain to the chickens, and talking to them, and they're talking to her. She keeps saying, 'No, chickens, go back. Go back, chickens. You mustn't get so near my feet. Because I haven't any shoes on. Not any shoes at all.'" And then I'd put in something about our families, if I had any news, and something about the weather, and any other event if there had been such a thing. Like the time the horse came strolling down the road and into our little lane, and ate all the pansies.

Four times a week, or maybe even five, I'd get off little letters like that, a page or two or three. Maybe I should have been more honest, and written something like, "Darling, what's the matter? I can't bear things the way they are. I can't bear life without you. Not ever any more. Those more than three years wore out my endurance. Even if the job does make money, give it up and come home. Because I love you." But Peregrine isn't one for that kind of talk. And really, why should he come home just because I loved him? He might reasonably change his plans because he loved me, but not just because I loved him.

I was in such despair that I couldn't initiate any action. My idea was to act as though everything was all right, and hope and pray that it would be. September would come, and with it Peregrine, and maybe everything would be all right.

BUNS AND GARDENIAS

By CARL SANDBURG

On Avenue A or B I read a sign:
Manhattan Ashcan Manufacturing Company—
In one of the suburbs I passed another, whizzing past I got it on the fly:
Sensitive Research Instrument Corporation—

And I knew I had a vested interest in each.
I am an ashcan. I am a sensitive instrument.
(If this bothers you for a moment please immerse your excellent head elsewhere and leave me in my own tub of follies.)
I am an ashcan. I am a sensitive instrument.

Often and often hot buns on a plate are better than fresh gardenias in a bowl.
In case of doubt take the hot buns and afterward look long at the flowers.

You too may be an ashcan,
you too a sensitive instrument.
Maybe you see yourself here five sacraments of dust.
Maybe moonwhite and pale gold you see yourself here.

Mostly Victoria and I didn't see anybody at all. Except the milkman every other day, and the mailman who came to the letter box out on the road. Twice a week Mary Hamilton took me into Brewster or Pawling for shopping, and two or three times that summer she and Howard asked me over for Sunday supper. They were friends of Peregrine's, the comfortable and decorated kind. Terribly nice and all that, but not what I needed. And their parties weren't what I needed, either, although that wasn't their fault. I'd put on my prewar pink linen, and stick a Silver Moon rose from the old stone-wall clump into my sash. And Mrs. Miller, the sitter, would pick up Victoria and me, drop me off at the Hamiltons' and then take Victoria back home to bed. She was a good soul—used to say she was the only sitter taxi in the county.

At the Hamiltons' I'd hold my head high and try to take a proper interest in what Paris was doing to hemlines. My hair would be all wrong, and my rose would wilt instantly. The talk would be about little theater and plays of the winter and "21" and the trouble of keeping good help in the country and how long it took to get a new car from what dealer.

Agatha turned up at one of those parties. She and the painter. They were on a sort of wedding cruise to the United States. They'd been visiting all sorts of people everywhere for a whole year, it seemed, and had seen Peregrine only a fortnight before, just as they left England.

"Didn't he write about it? Robby and Jill had us all down in Wiltshire for a long weekend. Everybody brought food along. And Jerry brought a lot of liquor from Berlin, don't ask me how, Scotch without the purchase tax, stuff like that. Peregrine must have written about it. Because it was the most wonderful weekend. Absolutely mad. Everybody there. Wasn't everybody there, sweety?"

"Absolutely. Everybody. Mad. You know Peregrine too?"

So I looked the painter in the eye, and I said, yes, I knew Peregrine too. I said I'd known him for years. Absolutely. Was even, as a matter of fact, married to him.

And the painter said, "Agatha sweet, did you know Peregrine was married? This pink girl's his wife."

And Agatha said, "Isn't he delectable? Always amusing." And then to him she said, "Peregrine and Sarah were married way back before the war. One of those things, you know. Hardly seen each other since, but they are still married. Even a baby to prove it, haven't you, Sarah?"

It was along about then that I started walking home. By myself. All two miles of it. Darkness was coming on and there were noises in the hedgerows and noises in the trees. I thought of telephoning Peregrine in London, and saying:

"Hello, this is Sarah. Sarah Harcourt."

"What's the matter? What are you calling up for?" That's what Peregrine would say.

Then I'd say, "Who are Robby and Jill? And Jerry?"

And he'd say, "Who?"

And I'd repeat, very clearly, "Robby. And Jill. And Jerry."

And Peregrine would say, "Is that what you called up about? Is that all you wanted? Good heavens, Sarah, have you lost your mind? We'd better hang up now. This is expensive."

And I'd say, "Not until you tell me about Robby. And Jill. And Jerry. And Wiltshire. And everybody."

But Peregrine would have hung up by then.

And besides, I'd never call. Partly because I didn't really care about all those people. I only cared about Peregrine. What I really wanted was to call him up across the ocean and say:

"Thinking about anybody?"

And hear him say, "Am I not!"

And I'd say, "Who, for instance?"

And Peregrine would answer, "The most beautiful girl in the world."

Except, of course, that he wouldn't. Not now. Or at least if he did, it wouldn't be Sarah Harcourt he had in mind. Walking down that rutted road in my old white spectators, I knew I wouldn't dare start the old routine. The noises in the hedgerows and the trees got worse, and they all made a sort of crying sound. And I realized that I was making as much noise as that wandering wind.

When I got home I was still crying, and Mrs. Miller put her arm around me and said, "Poor dear, missing your husband. Want me to stay the night? Miller won't mind."

But I said no, I'd be all right. So she got into her little old car and turned around by the barn and went off down the lane and down the road, the little red taillight looking like hope itself going farther and farther and farther away from me.

I suppose if I'd waited at the party and gone on to another party somewhere with one of the extra men at the Hamiltons', things might have been very different all the rest of my life. Because even one kind word that night would have made me glance away from Peregrine, if you see what I mean. Six or seven kind words might even have made me glance away from Victoria for an hour or so. I don't know. But it was the way it had been during the war. And I've always been glad I stumbled home that night along the darkening road, crying out my heart with only the elms and the hedgerows to hear, and only Mrs. Miller to comfort me. Instead of resting my weary head on a shoulder in a convertible.

My birthday came that next week, as it happened. Victoria and I decided to cook hamburgers outdoors to celebrate. We had cooked hamburgers outdoors almost every day that it hadn't rained. We had done it to celebrate the first zinnia, the big red tomato, letters from daddy, Victoria's learning to tie bows, Victoria's learning to whistle, the end of a rain—almost anything made a celebration that summer.

Just as we were getting the fire ready in the little stone firebox, in drove Howard Hamilton. Victoria ran to meet him and he handed her an enormous florists' box. "Give this to mother. It's Happy Birthday from daddy."

House and terrace blend into one living space.

BIG-LITTLE HOUSE

BY JOHN BRENNEMAN
ARCHITECTURAL EDITOR

Seldom have we seen a small house combine so much finesse and so many interesting features. This house contains just 1160 square feet plus its balcony study, but its clean lines, glassed-in gables and open balcony make it seem much bigger.

The plan has perfect circulation, spacious rooms, an efficient kitchen and a lovely entry hall, somewhat rare in a house of this size.

The terrace in back is sheltered from the street and close to the kitchen and living area.

A balcony study over the kitchen, entry and bedrooms takes advantage of attic space to make a big activity area and provide the guest room every house needs. Glassed-in gables provide generous light for this upstairs room.

This house is ideal for a small family, a retired couple, or anyone who wants big comfort with very little work. The balcony study runs the length of the room over the fireplace.

Balcony shown here is airy, private. Note the easy-to-care-for finishes.

Dotted line shows edge of balcony. High ceiling gives living/dining room a feeling of real luxury.

"Mummy, look what Mr. Hamilton has. From daddy. For you. Across the ocean. Let me open it. Do let me open it."

So Victoria sat in the grass by the lane, with the hollyhocks around her, and untied the lavish satin ribbon. And there were inside twelve of the longest-stemmed red roses I had ever seen.

"From Peregrine?" I said. "You must have made it up yourself, Howard, just out of kindness for the ladies in your lane. You're wonderful. And we both thank you, don't we, Victoria?"

Solarcaine is greaseless—white. Comes in a plastic "applicator" bottle. Flows on without rubbing—

New "wonder drug" medication stops torture of sunburn... instantly!

From Florida comes news of a remarkable new medication for sunburn, kitchen burns, all kinds of skin irritations. A lotion, it relieves the pain of sunburn as no mere medicated "face cream" can do.

Called Solarcaine, it contains "wonder drug" anesthetics that actually block pain ... "short-circuit" the pain impulses in nerves. And its refrigerants bring instant soothing and cooling.

Thus Solarcaine stops sunburn torture ... instantly! Promotes fast, clean healing, too, as its antiseptic ingredients penetrate beneath skin's surface.

At the same time it acts to "moisturize" parched tissues, soften the skin and make it feel better!

Grand for itching, too and for the pain of detergent hand burns. Use Solarcaine for all "skin pain," summer and winter.

Read What Users Say ...

"I first purchased Solarcaine on Treasure Island, off St. Petersburg, Fla. It's wonderful for sunburn. I like it for 'detergent hands,' too."
Mrs. James R. Miller, Kettering, Ohio

"I've found Solarcaine marvelously effective for sunburn, burns and many other minor skin irritations. Not enough people know about it!"
Beverlee Timsak, New York City

"I discovered Solarcaine while vacationing in Florida. It is absolutely the best medication for sunburn I've ever discovered—nothing gives me such wonderful relief."
Mrs. Paul Todd, Oklahoma City, Okla.

SOLARCAINE

"May I go fix them, mummy? In the big green vase? Please, mummy?"

And I kissed my bright-haired darling and sent her into the house with the box, longer than she was, carried carefully across her chest.

"Look, the box is so big I have to turn! Mr. Hamilton, the flowers are bigger than the house!"

We all three laughed, and Victoria disappeared. Then Howard said, "But it wasn't my idea, Sarah. Really not. Peregrine's idea."

"Can't believe it," I said. Peregrine had laughed at me more than once for my aversion to red roses, and to flowers with frightfully long stems. Red roses turn bloated and purple, like untidy old women with too much make-up. And as for stems, why in the world do people want ostentatiously long stems except for altar decorations or funerals or hotel lobbies? I want flowers on my dinner table, and flowers where we eat breakfast, and flowers on the little stand between the beds. Nowhere do I want pomposity. But of course I didn't go into that with Howard Hamilton.

"Really," said Howard. "Why should you think Peregrine wouldn't remember your birthday? He's the kind of guy that never forgets anything. See? Here's the note he sent, with the rent."

Howard held out the note. It had a bit about the rent, and then a couple of newsy paragraphs about people I had never heard of but that presumably were wartime friends of Howard's and Peregrine's. Then at the end it said, "The fifteenth is Sarah's birthday. If you're going out that weekend, how about taking her some flowers for me? That place on the corner of Madison Avenue, the one nearest your office, knows me and they'll put them on my account. But I can't see their delivery stretching out to Bullet Tree Lane somehow. No card. Unnecessary on these occasions."

"So you did the choosing!" My heart rose like a bird, despite the oddity of Peregrine's having an account at an unknown florist's.

"Man there knows Peregrine too well for that. Said Mr. Harcourt always got long-stemmed red roses. Said Mr. Harcourt came in almost every week, never got anything but long-stemmed red roses. That's how I knew."

Just like that.

I suppose I said thank you to Howard—he and I were friends in a calm, uncomprehending sort of way. He thought I was a nice little girl, I suppose, and I thought he was a nice little man. He did his duty by his friends—and their wives—and without Mary and Howard we never could have got through the summer at all, Victoria and I.

Anyhow, Howard went on home. I admired the roses Victoria had put in the big green metal vase that came with the cottage, and we put them on the hearth, which was really the only place you could put them in that house. And then Victoria and I cooked our hamburgers, and the smoke got in my eyes so badly that Victoria had to run and get a handkerchief and soak it in cold water and wash my face. Even I saw the comedy of having my face washed by my little braided daughter—and as for Victoria, she had the giggles about it for most of the rest of the day. "Daddy will be so surprised. Put it in a letter, mummy, right away. Tell daddy that Victoria had to wash mummy's face. Only say Sarah's face, because you aren't daddy's mummy. You're my mummy. And I had to wash your face when the smoke got in your eyes."

When I went into my room I found that Victoria had picked the longest white hollyhock and put it in a milk bottle beside my bed. Around the neck of the bottle she had tied the satin ribbon from the florist's box with one of her floppiest bowknots. She jumped up and down with excitement about her birthday present to me, and I thought the ungainly stalk was the most beautiful thing I had seen that day.

The memory of that day, my thirtieth birthday, still brings tears to my eyes. I wonder how many women really want to be thirty again. I certainly don't.

September came, and Peregrine with it. He wrote about the ship and said not to bother to come down to meet it. But I did, of course. His family were back in town, and I took Victoria there and promised to bring Peregrine back for lunch.

It was all very gay down at the pier, with everybody meeting everybody and brilliant sun on the ship and deep shadow inside the pier. When Peregrine swung toward the barrier after going through customs I saw his eyes searching—and saw his brilliant smile of recognition. And my heart turned cold, because that smile, that achingly familiar smile, wasn't for me. It was for someone behind me, behind my left shoulder. Before I could react Peregrine saw me, and came to me, and dropped his bags, and folded me into his shoulder, and held me there. He was always a man for quick action in a crisis. He held me with my face pressed against the rough tweed of his jacket for what seemed an eternity. I couldn't move to see who was behind me. I couldn't even look up. I had to stand there, locked in my husband's arms, knowing his quirking eyebrows and his rueful smile were signaling that dammit, this was unexpected, but nothing he could do about it, and why don't you go home and I'll get in touch with you as soon as I can get away, or something like that.

It was awful. It was really awful.

The taxi ride uptown was awful too. "You shouldn't have bothered to come to meet me, you know," Peregrine told me. "Where is Victoria? And how is the apartment? Tenants wreck it?"

So we weren't to talk about anything important. All right, I thought, all right. A taxi is hardly the place for a scene, anyway.

On the way up and across town we went by Howard's office, and there on the corner was the flower shop. Charge account indeed. "They know me there." When the only flowers Peregrine ever brought me came from the little open stands in the subways. Funeral flowers, we always called them. I don't know whether they really had been used before, but they certainly didn't last long after you got them home. I'd loved them so, those little blooms in tight bunches. And I knew Peregrine wasn't one for taking flowers to his mother. When appropriate moments came along I was delegated to choose plants. But Mr. Harcourt always got roses, red roses, with long stems.

Even though the ride was fairly smooth I was churned up by the time it ended! At the family's apartment everyone said how well Peregrine looked, which was true. And they said how much good it had done him to get away for a bit. And eventually lunch was over and Peregrine and Victoria and I and all Peregrine's stuff were in another cab, and then we were back in our own apartment. After a whirlwind tour of the place with Victoria as eager guide, Peregrine picked up his briefcase and said:

"Look. I've got to turn in some reports and see some people. I'll be back, but probably not until quite late. Better not wait supper. Goodby again."

"You can't go now. You have to see Freddy and Billy. Billy has a brand-new tricycle. A big one, big enough for you to ride. It really goes. Billy got it for his birthday."

"Tomorrow, poppet, tomorrow." And Peregrine and his briefcase were gone.

That was home-coming day. Victoria had her quiet time, and then we went across Riverside Drive to the park. I said yes, it was wonderful when all the other mothers said isn't it wonderful to have Peregrine back? And I said yes, he had enjoyed it. And yes, he looked fine, just fine. And Victoria dashed by going north, and dashed by going south, and wheeled and careened and played in the sand pile. And we went home.

I ate poached egg and applesauce with her, and then we each ate a piece of apple pie. Not that Victoria was supposed to eat pie. You know how it is with your first child. But we'd made that pie together, Victoria and I, at breakfast time, for daddy, and I'd promised Victoria that she could have some too. So Victoria and I solemnly ate pie, leaving a big piece, three quarters of the pie, for daddy. Then we had Victoria's bath, and Victoria's story. And Victoria went to bed. We asked God to guide and guard our loved ones, and to give strength to those who needed it all the world round. And Victoria went to sleep.

I went around the apartment and straightened up. I emptied ash trays, and polished the brass ones. I fluffed up the little pillows that made the old sofa more comfortable, and straightened the folds of the curtains. The curtains in the front, in the sitting room, were a light-colored cloth that hid what was going on inside at night but let a warm and welcoming light go out. I wanted Peregrine's apartment to look welcoming to him that night, whenever he came. I wanted it to look like home.

Then I went out to the kitchen and made icebox-cooky dough. Funny thing to do at a time like that, I suppose, and funny thing to remember ten years later. But I'd been making icebox-cooky dough the first time I ever saw Peregrine, and so somehow in moments of stress about Peregrine I find myself kneading dough.

Still no Peregrine.

I tried to read, and I tried to write letters and that didn't work. So I got out the step stool and did the upper shelves in the kitchen, the ones I hadn't got to since Victoria and I came home. But our law-student tenants hadn't used any cornstarch or baking powder. They apparently hadn't even opened the door of the upper cupboard, so there wasn't much to do up there.

So I decided to go on to bed. I had just got into the tub when the telephone rang. You know the awful process you go through when the telephone rings and you're in the tub. This time there was no question in my mind. It might be Peregrine. He'd have had to look up his own number, though, or ask information, because the telephone had finally been put in while Victoria and I were in the country. But it might be Peregrine. So I grabbed a towel, and whipped it around me and dashed down the hall leaving wet feet on the carpet as I went. Very out of breath, I said, "Hello."

". . . happy birthday, dear Ethel, happy birthday to me!"

And the voice at the other end said, "Darling, I can't stand it, I can't stand it, I can't live without you."

I was so taken aback I couldn't say anything.

And the voice said, "Hilda. Say something. Say something, darling."

So I pulled myself together and said, "I'm sorry, you must have the wrong number."

All the way back to the tub I could hardly see. And when I got back into the water the wall inside me burst and I cried and sobbed and keened and howled and grieved and felt so sorry for myself that I could hardly bear it. All over town people were calling each other up and saying darling, I can't live without you, and I didn't even know where Peregrine was. At least I hoped I didn't. Here I was offering love and devotion and passion to somebody who didn't give a damn. Here I was struggling to keep a household going on ten dollars a week and nobody loved me. Here I was, the May Queen of 1939, danced off my feet at all the house parties I ever went to, crying in the bathtub. Here I was, the girl the office wanted back, sacrificially doing my bit by my child and my husband, and not even being thanked for it. No appreciation. No adulation. No nothing. Here I was —— Well, about then the bath water was getting awfully cold, and so was I. Part of me kept imagining Peregrine in that other woman's apartment, probably a big swishy one with a wall of glass looking out at the East River, and probably the lady in question had all kinds of glamour, and hands that weren't all beat up from a summer of housekeeping on Bullet Tree Lane. She probably even had a respectable negligee. Or did I mean respectable?

Part of me kept seeing that scene, and part of me kept seeing myself, my wasting years, my futility. And the bath water got colder and colder. So I finally got into my nightgown, my best nightgown, and put stuff on my face so that it looked more cheerful, and put on my old blue flannel bathrobe, and went back to the sitting room to think. To use my brain on the whole mess.

It was a tough hour. I suppose it comes to all women—and to all men too: the moment when you must stop and consciously evaluate and decide.

As I saw it, I faced two roads that September night. I could go to bed and sleep or not sleep as the case might be, and pack up the next morning as soon as Peregrine had left for wherever he was going. He was sure to be going somewhere. I could go home with Victoria, to my family, and see what happened. Leave the action up to Peregrine. He probably wouldn't take any action. I would get my old job back, find a place in town to stay through the week, and go out to Victoria for weekends. Then when I had the job situation well established and enough money saved up I would get a proper apartment in town, and a proper nursemaid, and put Victoria in school and start making myself another life. Alimony I would never take. I had heard Peregrine on the subject too often. I didn't agree with him that all women who took alimony were leeches, but still I wasn't going to live on his money nor have Victoria live on his money. He could put some money into an education fund every month, and he could start building up capital for Victoria so that when she married she wouldn't be absolutely dependent on her husband for every cent even if she did choose to stay home and take care of her own children. What a difference five dollars a month would have made to me in those last years. What a difference five dollars a month would mean to most women. Five dollars of your own, to get your hair done with, or to put toward a decent pair of shoes that really fit, or to buy pretty cloth for bedroom curtains. Things like that.

Or, instead of running out, I could fight. I could make that man talk, which is a thing he doesn't do easily, not about things that matter. I could bring the whole mess out into the light. I could refuse to let things go by default. I could employ wiles and deceits to make time for another chance. Just what I meant by wiles and deceits I must confess I still don't know, but that was the way my mind was working.

Another chance. Would another chance make any difference?

That was where the longest thinking came in. Our first years had been good ones, hectic because of the wartime pitch of our living, and clouded because of the disastrous things that were happening in the world. But they had been good years. For both of us. That I knew as surely as I knew my own name. And Victoria. Victoria was a darling. She was both of us, and both of us loved her.

That long war separation had been a bad thing for our marriage. And the strain and poverty of the last two years had been made mean, somehow, instead of fun, because of the people we saw socially. If all the wives had been struggling to remake their old clothes, if the parties had been beer and hot dogs and baked beans —— But no.

These things would be changing now. Because Peregrine was through with the course work at Columbia. He had done brilliantly, and the research of the summer was leading into a proper job in Washington with a real salary. So that if we could hang together a few more months there would be a move to a new place, new but familiar to our youth. And more money. Not an enormous amount, but enough so that Victoria and Peregrine and I wouldn't all three dine on half a pound of hamburger.

More importantly, Peregrine would have one job instead of three or four in different places. He would still be working on the dissertation, but he wouldn't be scurrying about to pick up twenty-five dollars or fifty dollars. And if we were both better fed and less anxious, things might work better.

My Name

Or was I being cowardly? Was I unwilling to face the fact that Peregrine didn't love me any more?

I kept forcing my mind to add and subtract, to weigh Victoria's happiness one way and the other. I thought of the divorcees I knew, and the pattern of their lives. I thought of being an unwanted wife. And the barren pride I might feel if I were strong, and got out. But which was the course of strength?

Along about midnight I went to bed. But not to sleep. I had decided to bring the thing out into the open, and to fight. Decorously, but fiercely.

Peregrine finally came back. He didn't say a word, just got ready for bed, and went to bed. And still nobody said anything. Cars went by in the street, and there was the constant rumbly noise of New York, the pulsing of the city and its arteries. Even so, I could hear Peregrine breathe over in his bed. He could probably hear me breathe, too, over in my corner.

I don't know how long that silence lasted. I couldn't stand it any longer.

"Look," I said. "Do you want a divorce?"

And I still really thought, of course, that he'd say, "Good heavens! No! What would ever make you think that! Not live with you and Victoria? What would I ever do without you?" But he didn't. Not like that.

"No," came the answer. "No, I don't. I've thought about it, goodness knows, but it would kill my mother to have a divorce in the family."

I was shocked. I was really mad. "What about Victoria?"

"It's my mother I'm thinking about. I owe her some consideration, after all. Father too. I've been thinking about it all summer."

"Not about Victoria? Your own sweet child? Or even me?"

"You've both been so far away for so long. Our getting married was a horrible mistake, but by the time I realized it the invitations were out."

"And—and you hated to mess everything up?"

"Yes."

"Why didn't you ever say so? Why, we were married for two whole years before Victoria was born."

We talked about it a bit longer, and then I asked if there was another woman. Strange phrase that. Another woman. But everybody knows what it means, I guess, so let's leave it. And Peregrine said:

"Don't make me be a cad, and name names."

That I thought was the end. Go out and desert your wife and daughter. That's all right. Go philandering around in the costly part of town, and that's all right. But name a name? "Don't make me be a cad." It hit me in that queer part of the throat that mostly isn't there but suddenly swells up when something really awful happens.

I got up out of bed without another word and went into the kitchen and turned on the light and started scrubbing the floor.

First, of course, I had to go through being sorry for myself all over again. What had I done to deserve all this?

But, said the still small voice of reason, what did you ever do in the first place to deserve a good guy like Peregrine? He's a very good guy, even if he's being a heel right now.

Good guy, huh, the other part of me would snarl. Good guy indeed. But nobody could say he was a cad. Never a cad.

There's been a war. Everybody's all mixed up. You should have kept your job and worked all through the war, and saved money.

And left Victoria to hired help and ailing grandparents? The kind of help you could get during the war?

Well, there's a lot of therapy in getting down on your knees and scrubbing the floor. Especially a kitchen floor in New York City where the filthy, greasy, grainy soot comes filtering in day and night. Maybe it's the water and the sloshing. Maybe it's the immediacy of the problem. Maybe it's the on-your-knees part. Because suddenly God and I were working on the whole thing together.

I found I was loving Peregrine more than I ever had, and differently. Poor darling, trying to find a solution, and not knowing how any more than I did. So wise about so many things, but as lost about all this as I was, even more lost because he had that so-and-so around his neck.

And then it came to me, the wonderful thing. He hadn't said, "Yes. I do want a divorce. I am so wonderfully, so completely, so passionately, so honestly in love with someone else that this is an impossible situation."

That he hadn't said. He had trumped up for himself a miserable lame excuse, an absolutely infuriating heartbreaker of an excuse, but the truth showed through. He didn't want to marry the other woman. That phrase again. Even if he didn't want us around particularly at the moment, he certainly didn't want to make his extracurricular affair permanent.

I felt better. Not a lot better, but better. We still had time.

Time! Time for scars to heal, yes, but time for new ones to be made. Time for pricks and bludgeonings, and lots of floor scrubbing. The next weeks weren't easy. What Peregrine did for an equivalent of floor scrubbing I don't know. Probably walked the city. He couldn't have afforded to do much else with all the time he was out of the apartment.

Because I went out the next morning and spent. Spent money. Money I didn't have. I went out first thing and bought a little black suit. A spectacularly simple little black suit. And a gray dress that had a matching velveteen jacket. And a scrap of a black hat. And a pair of proper shoes. And every time I signed a charge slip I made myself remember the florist on Madison Avenue. Peregrine could write her poetry, I decided, but not spend money on flowers. Not at least while his wife looked and felt like a Thing, instead of like the Remarkable Woman she was.

That was one of my conclusions that black night, you see. When Peregrine first met me I was, to be sure, making cookies. I was also, more importantly, a Remarkable Girl. I had a job lots of people wanted. A job that paid real money and sent me all over the United States to see important people. I had a secretary of my own. I dictated the things I wrote. I was the sort of girl young men invited to dinner and the theater at least a fortnight ahead. I was, as assorted young men had pointed out fairly regularly, the Prettiest Girl at the Party. I had the right garment in hand for any occasion. Not necessarily a terribly expensive one, but the right one. And I had the assurance that went with all that. That was the kind of girl Peregrine had married. A girl who was doing a worth-while job in a worth-while way, and knew it.

Then in one great swoop Peregrine had gone off to war, I had given up job and home, taken on baby, and returned to being myself a Child in the Home. I had given up the initiative for my life. Trying so hard to keep peace among two sets of grandparents, I had put my disposition in neutral, and stopped going forward into life. Three years is a long time. Long enough to come to feel like a nonentity.

So that autumn I slowly took on the initiative. Not for Peregrine's life: his life is his own. But for my life. That first morning I bought the new suit and the new dress, and the hat and the shoes. And that afternoon I spent all the money I had with me to get my hair properly done for the first time in years. I had had to ask Peregrine to stay with Victoria—a thing I had never done before—but I knew that if he had any pressing commitments he could take the darling across town to his mother.

Later that week I took Victoria out to my family, and went to Washington to house-hunt. And I found us a wonderful house in Georgetown. Decrepit, but wonderful. With a wandering overgrown garden, and a fireplace in every room. Nobody wanted the house because it was in such bad repair, but I knew it was right for us. For more than a hundred years it had sheltered love and grief, joy and sorrow. I was convinced that its dignity would give us dignity, and that its perfect proportions would help us find proportion. It may sound odd, but I was sure that in restoring that house together we would restore ourselves.

And that is the way it was. We moved before Thanksgiving. Peregrine had already started the new job, and Victoria started school right after the holiday. I worked on the house all day every day, scraping away the neglect of years. Evenings, many evenings, Peregrine worked too, and we wore ourselves out working together. And day after day the rift was slighter.

I spent money on myself. Not enormous quantities of it, but enough so that I felt like the wife of an important man. Because that's what Peregrine is. An important man. Important to me. Important to Victoria. Important to his community.

And Christopher was born. And Richard.

Somewhere along the way, if this were a proper story, there would come a great scene of reconciliation. There would be a great laying out of confessions, a formal forgiveness, a rebirth all of a sudden of everything wonderful. But the whole point of this is that there never has been such a thing. Just as the rift grew imperceptibly, so has the rift closed imperceptibly.

What turning point there was for me came when I scrubbed the floor that long-ago night. What turning point there was for Peregrine I have no way of knowing. But somehow we both came to realize that love is based on understanding, not on being understood. There have been moments of ecstasy since—and moments of frustration. But there has been an undercurrent of swelling happiness.

The other woman that summer—well, I knew who she was then, really, and I certainly know now who she was, and the world being as small as it is, I've spent a few evenings in the same room with her. Dinner parties and things like that. She and one of her husbands ever came to dinner at our house one night. No that it was my idea, and not that I enjoyed it.

And Agatha? Dear misunderstood Agatha! How does she come into it?

I don't really know. But now and then across the last ten years there have been some strange interludes for Peregrine. Minor, and not frequent, but enough to set me scrubbing the floor and thinking again, searching for the weak elements in our matrimonial structure. And Agatha's been floating around during most of those times, back in the general Boston-New York-Philadelphia-Baltimore-Washington circuit.

Last week we went to Agatha's party. We got to the charming little house in Georgetown. Every single house in Georgetown is charming now, of course, most of them just a little too charming. We liked it better the way it used to be, but the clocks won't turn back.

One of Agatha's children answered the door.

I said, "Hello. You don't know us. We're the Harcourts."

And the little boy said, "Hello." And then seeing my husband behind me, he said, "Hello Peregrine!"

And Peregrine said, "Hello, Mark!"

Then the dog, a black poodle, came bounding up, and Peregrine said, "Well, Shadow how is the world for you today?"

So there I was again. But where? I hadn't seen Agatha for years, but Peregrine knew and was known by her boy and her dog.

Mark took our things off up the narrow staircase and we went on into the sitting room. There was Agatha, just the same. No, not just the same. Hair a slightly different color, face less inflated somehow. Voice a little hoarser, gestures a little more extravagant, eyes a little more misunderstood. Scattered about the room were people more or less like herself—a little brighter than life, a little bigger than life, a little smaller than life. People somehow porcelainized. Like characters moving about in a drawing-room comedy, not like men and women.

We stayed an hour or so and then Mark found our things for us. As we went down the steps—one immaculately squared-off Chinese holly to the left, one immaculately squared-off Chinese holly to the right, and two old-fashioned gas street lights set into the brick sidewalk to remind the passer-by that this is part of Old Georgetown—as we came down the steps Peregrine suddenly laughed. "What a collection of lost souls! For heaven's sake let's go home."

So that's the way it is. END

DARK PURPOSE

whenever I can, and sometimes I hate the stupid impassive faces of tourists: complaining of the climb, fussing with light meters and lens openings. Here the past is like a great ever-blowing wind and they never feel it. Is this your first trip to Mexico?"

She nodded. "I go home tomorrow."

"I see you are regretting that. But I am sure you will bring a most stimulating account to . . . your family. I think you have not just seen Mexico; you have felt her."

"I have no family, but I'll probably spill over to my defenseless patients."

"Patients? You mean you are a nurse?"

"That's right. St. Anthony's in San Francisco." She looked off into the distance. "And you've no idea how remote it seems at this moment." Her gaze came back to his. "You live in Mexico?"

"Not in the city—but I live here."

"I'd never be able to say it calmly like that." Paige's eyes twinkled.

"How would you say it?"

"With Roman candles going off inside me, I guess."

"Promise me you will never lose what you have," he said almost gently, "that wonderful radiant appreciation. It is a rare thing."

"You are very kind." She glanced at her watch, a trifle disconcerted by the unswerving blue gaze. "I must go, if I am to be in time for the reception at the American Embassy this afternoon."

"Reception? But, of course. It is July Fourth. I am glad you reminded me."

"You are an American?" she ventured.

"My parents were living in Europe when I was born ——"

Before he could say more, two middle-aged ladies came rising into view, to collapse breathless and laughing on the top step. "Enid," said the older, "do your looking! I swear I'll never make this climb again. I ——" She stopped short, staring, then said incredulously, "Why, Mr. Steiger! Of all people!"

Paige's companion turned at once, smiling in recognition. "Well—good morning, Mrs. Abbott." He went over to extend a hand and help her to her feet. "I salute your endeavor."

Mrs. Abbott indicated her companion. "My cousin, Mrs. Rhodes." Then, with conscious importance, "Enid, Egon Steiger."

And then Paige realized why he had seemed familiar—though the small photographic reproduction on the back of the book jacket had been a pale copy of the actual man. She turned to go, pleasantly excited. Egon Steiger! Though he was comparatively a newcomer, with only two mystery novels to his credit, those books had been spectacularly successful.

Paige had not thought he would notice her departure, but before she had taken the first step down he was beside her. "Look, you may feel dizzy going down; the steps are much steeper than they appear to be. You must let me come with you."

Paige said quickly, "Thank you, but I'll have no trouble. Heights don't bother me at all." She looked down and nodded. "Anyway, here comes my guide."

Egon Steiger held out his hand and took her own. He did not shake it, but held it gravely. "Then," he said, "que le vaya bien. May all go well with you."

The gardens of the American Embassy were thronged with people. Paige was disappointed. It was warm and close, and she realized she should have followed her first inclination and stayed away. Joining those who were leaving, she would not quite admit to herself that she had hoped to see Egon Steiger again.

The suddenness of what happened took her completely by surprise. Someone collided with her, then seemed to melt into the crowd. Paige realized, with dismay, that the flat silk handbag she had been holding under her right arm was gone. I must not panic, she told herself, when she remembered that her vital papers had been in the bag.

She started nervously when a hand touched her arm. She swung to face Egon Steiger, and at sight of someone familiar, such relief swept over her that tears stung her lids.

He said, "Hello! I looked for you in there, but no needle was ever more elusive. And then, from the steps, I caught a glimpse of your hair and ——" He stopped suddenly. "Is anything wrong?"

She said through lips she tried to hold steady, "I . . . my purse has just been snatched."

He looked around sharply. "Here? Now?"

"Just a moment ago. Someone bumped me, and then ——"

He said angrily, "Pickpockets and purse snatchers have a heyday at something like this." He made an uneasy exploratory motion toward his own hip pocket, then relaxed.

Ahead of them the Hotel Geneve showed its familiar yellow façade. "Let me take you in here for coffee—or whatever you'd like," he said.

When the steaming cups were set before them she managed a smile. "You don't know how glad I am that you came along," she said.

"Perhaps you had better tell me just what you have lost."

"My tourist card, my health certificate, proof of citizenship ——"

"Money?"

"Twenty-three dollars. I've some money in my room—enough to settle the hotel bill." She made an embarrassed gesture. "You—you can't imagine how stupid I feel."

"It can happen to any of us." He smiled. "Do you realize I do not know your name?"

"Oh, I'm sorry; I didn't think. I'm Paige MacRae."

"Paige. That's a pretty name, and unusual. But right for you, I think. May I use it?"

"Why, yes—if you wish. It's not . . . quite as if you were a stranger."

He smiled warmly. "Thank you for saying that. Though I am sure Mrs. Abbott will vouch for me."

She finished her coffee. "I don't want to hurry you," she said, "but shouldn't I do something right away?" When he did not at once answer, her face grew troubled. "What is it?"

"Now," he said, "you must not let what I am going to say upset you. Mexico is as she is. But the authorities take a very dim view of the loss of a tourist card. The 'loss' has proved lucrative when the card was sold to someone anxious to cross the border; someone whose description fitted the owner of the card. As a friend, Paige, I would advise you against hastily reporting your loss."

"But what, then?"

"Those of us who live here know there are ways and means, but they involve reaching just the right people. Tell me," he said kindly, "would it make you unhappy to spend some extra time in Mexico?" At her level gaze he added, "I meant work." He made a sibilant sound to call the hovering waiter. "Bring me the English-language newspaper," he instructed.

In a moment it was placed before him. He folded it and pushed it toward Paige, his finger indicating a place. She read:

Capable registered nurse to care for young invalid. Near Cuernavaca. Call Room 608, Del Prado Hotel.

She looked up, not yet understanding. "You mean you know of someone who needs ——"

Now Possible to Shrink and Heal Hemorrhoids Without Surgery

Only Preparation H Contains New Healing Substance That Can Shrink Hemorrhoids Without Surgery And At Same Time Relieve Itching and Pain.

A world-famous research institute has discovered a new substance which now makes it possible to shrink and heal hemorrhoids without surgery. It stops itching and relieves pain in minutes, then speeds up healing of the sore, injured tissues all while actual reduction (shrinking) takes place.

Tests conducted under doctors' observations proved this so. And most amazing of all, this very striking improvement was maintained over a period of many months.

In fact, results were so thorough, sufferers were able to make such statements as "Piles have ceased to be a problem." Among these sufferers were a very wide variety of hemorrhoid conditions, some of 10 to 20 years' standing.

All this was accomplished without the use of narcotics, astringents or anesthetics of any kind. The secret is the remarkable new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) which quickly helps heal injured cells and stimulates regrowth of healthy tissue again. It is offered in ointment or suppository form called Preparation H®.

In addition to actually shrinking hemorrhoids, Preparation H lubricates and makes elimination less painful. It helps prevent infection which is a principal cause of hemorrhoids. Just ask for Preparation H Ointment or Preparation H Suppositories (easier to use away from home). Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Any drug counter.

Now! Scotkins in Color!

Give a party look to every meal with new pastel-pretty Scotkins! Pick a shade to match your table settings... or mix two or three colors for a fresh effect. Only Scotkins® give you such linen-soft colors with linen-like strength.

Just one sees you through the juiciest hamburger, the sizziest steak. Look for new colored Scotkins in luncheon size. Traditional white, too, in luncheon and dinner sizes. You'll find them all in the brand-new Scotkins boxes.

"I am the someone. I put this in the paper two days ago; it is my reason for being in the city."

She did not dare admit the excitement that went through her, but said gravely, "Maybe you'd better tell me more about it."

"It will take time to get a replacement of your papers," he replied. "You would be doing me a real service by coming down to Loma de Sombra until matters are straightened out. I will be glad to duplicate your salary at St. Anthony's."

"I—I hardly know what to say."

He smiled. "Let me tell you about us—my daughter Cora and myself. So we may know what is best to do. No es verdad?" Noting the momentary clouding of her face he asked, "Do you not know Spanish?"

She shook her head. "No; I'm sorry. If the language is a necessary qualification ——"

He shook his head. "The only qualification, Paige, is the willingness to attempt getting along with a difficult person. I need someone who can win my daughter's confidence."

"If you think I could be of help with her —— I honestly love children."

For an instant his gaze grew shadowed, unreadable. Then he said in a too-even voice, "My daughter is not a child. At least—in years and body she is not a child. She is twenty-three years old."

"Oh, I didn't understand."

"Will it make a difference?"

"Why, no. I don't know why I thought you were speaking of a child. I guess it didn't occur to me you'd have a daughter of that age."

He smiled at her confusion. Cora was, he told Paige, his only child, born at the cost of her mother's life. The skiing accident that crippled her at seventeen was, in a terrible way, his fault, since he had challenged her to try the dangerous slope. Since then all that could be done had been done, in both America and Europe—without result. Three years ago he had brought Cora to Mexico. The final verdict of the doctors had changed her. She withdrew more and more into some private world of her own where none could reach her.

"You mean," Paige probed gently, "that her mind is becoming unstable?"

His eyes thanked her. "It is better to say it, face it, isn't it? Yes—that is what I mean." His hands described a helpless gesture. "My servants do their best, but they are unequal to the task, because they are not trained for it. They have no understanding of a sickness of the mind. Even Gregoria ——"

"Gregoria?"

"She has been with us almost since our coming to Mexico. She is devoted to Cora. But it is not a task for an untrained person." He sighed. "Yet Gregoria is going to be fiercely jealous of your coming." He looked at Paige for a long moment. "Is it too difficult a challenge I am offering you?"

"I wouldn't be a nurse, Mr. Steiger, if I were afraid of a challenge."

They faced each other across the small table. "You'll come, then?"

"Yes, I'll come." And with the words all the pattern of her life as she had known it up until now was shattered.

Egon Steiger's own small single-motored cabin plane waited for them at the Mexico City airport the following forenoon. A feeling of unreality clung to Paige as the plane took off. At this very hour she would have been returning to San Francisco; instead, she was flying to an unfamiliar destination with a man she had not known until yesterday.

Egon Steiger interrupted her thoughts. "There is one small matter," he said. "About uniforms. I don't know how you will feel about this, but I think Cora might accept you more readily if you did not wear one."

She looked at him, questioning in her eyes.

"If—just at first—it could appear that you were to be a companion to Cora—someone of her own age . . . there would be a difference in the basis of your relationship."

"But would it be an honest basis?"

"I don't know why not, Paige. Though Cora is confined to a wheel chair, she is not a bedridden patient. And then, too, she is used to Gregoria for her bath, her dressing ——"

Paige said a little stiffly, "I'm afraid you haven't made my duties very clear."

"I have angered you," he said quickly. "I didn't mean to, believe me. He paused as if finding what he had to say difficult. "Cora has shut me away from her. I think in her brooding she has come to blame me for all that has happened. God knows I blame myself, but that makes nothing easier. I thought perhaps a stranger—someone who has no connection with the past—could get closer to her."

Paige felt pity, yet a kind of embarrassment, too, that she had forced him to this painful explanation. She said impulsively, "If it will make things simpler, make Cora accept me more easily, then certainly the uniform won't matter."

She heard the lift in his voice. "Then you would be willing to try this my way?" Egon asked.

"You mean say nothing about the fact that I am a nurse? If you wish it that way."

"Thank you," he said. "They are inadequate words, but thank you." His smile seemed to have a special warmth. And then he turned his head and pointed. "But look! There is Loma de Sombra—Shadow Ridge."

Below, Paige saw red tile roofs, oblongs of green lawn, the bright blue of a pool with a flanking cabana. On her left was the low dark pine-choked ridge casting the deep shadow that gave the place its name.

The plane came in on a long fluttering glide, effortlessly overtook a station wagon scurrying toward the landing strip. Egon Steiger cut the switch, opened the cabin door and jumped out, then turned to give a helping hand to Paige.

They were in the station wagon, driven by a heavy-set Mexican with a pock-marked face, and heading back toward the house, when suddenly Steiger leaned forward to stare from the window; then he spoke sharply to the driver in Spanish, pointing Paige saw a dog racing across the far end of the landing strip, a magnificent Doberman pinscher, his unusual size evident even at this distance. There was no mistaking that Egon was angry, but when he turned to Paige his voice was again normal. "I'm sorry this had to happen, but I had left express orders that the Doberman was not to be let run in my absence."

Before he could say more or Paige could reply, they rounded a curve and before them were green lawns and flower beds, and the big house clinging to its terraced slopes; a house of softly faded pink stucco, roofed with tiles.

The car stopped before iron-grilled gates. In the open doorway appeared two people: a small-statured Mexican in starched white jacket; and a dark, arrogant-looking woman of perhaps thirty, dressed in a voluminous blue skirt and a white peasant blouse.

As Paige and Egon Steiger came up the three shallow steps to the entrance the man and the woman bowed stiffly.

Steiger indicated the two. "This is Luis, my butler, Miss MacRae. He speaks English. And this is Gregoria Montejo, who has much of the care of my daughter."

Paige smiled, but the woman's face showed no response. She and Luis bowed again.

Accompanied by Steiger, Paige passed through the doorway and the entrance hall into the main sala. Beyond it she glimpsed a wide, partially roofed terrace.

"The maids do not speak English," Egon Steiger said, "so Gregoria will show you to your room. Luis will see to your bags."

The room to which Paige was taken was on the same level as the sala. It had its own entrance off a gallery that ran the full length of the wing. A very large room, its focal point was an immense carved bed covered with a spread of faded apricot brocade.

Gregoria said from the doorway, "If there is anything that you wish ——"

"Nothing, thank you, Gregoria," Paige said, and smiled into the unresponsive face.

Paige was fascinated by the great room in which she found herself. A door led into a dressing room lined with commodious wardrobes. From the dressing room another door opened into a bathroom. Still another door centered one wall of the bathroom. Paige turned the handle and the door moved silently on well-oiled hinges. Then she stopped short, aware that she was looking into another bedroom and that it was occupied.

At the far end of the room stood a wheel chair, so turned that Paige had only a rear view of the head and shoulders of the occupant. She closed the door quickly. It was something of a shock to have come so suddenly upon Cora Steiger.

An hour later Paige had finished unpacking. It was time for comida, the main meal of the day in Mexico. She felt an upsurge of excitement. She would meet Cora Steiger. If only I can gain her confidence, Paige thought.

Leaving her room, she followed the open gallery toward the wide curving stairs leading to the upper terrace. She had put on a plain sheath of apple-green linen, a gold choker and bracelet. She thought, as she climbed the stairs, she had never felt less like a nurse.

The dining room opened off the terrace of the upper level. Distantly the snow-frosted peaks of the two volcanoes, "Ixty" and "Popo," shouldered into the blue. Paige stood, breath-held, to observe the scene. She did not at first see the man who was standing at the terrace railing. As he turned, an involuntary "Oh!" of surprise escaped her. She found herself facing a stranger: a wide-shouldered but thin young man with an angular, flat-planed American face below a sandy crew cut. She saw a straight, taut mouth, dark brows above hazel eyes, a long thin scar from temple to jaw.

He regarded her with a level, unfriendly stare. "I am Miles Hilliard, Mr. Steiger's secretary"—his mouth gave a humorless twist—"on all the occasions when I am sober enough to be of value to him."

She stared back at him. "I am Paige MacRae." She almost added that she was to be Cora Steiger's companion; then recalled Steiger's warning, and said nothing.

"A visitor," Miles Hilliard remarked. It was not a question. He appraised her unabashed and she had a bewildering impression of dislike.

Egon Steiger appeared and greeted Paige with a warm smile. "I had planned to be here when you came up, but"—the smile faded—"I was with Cora. I wanted to prepare her somewhat for your meeting."

Gregoria came toward them, pushing the rubber-tired chair in which Paige had seen Cora seated. She now had a chance to see the girl full-face and her unconscious reaction was of pity. Cora Steiger was pale and appallingly thin. Once she might have had beauty, but all the youthful bloom had been burned away by pain and the torment of lost hope. But it was the sharp suspicion of her look that Paige was now aware of, the way her glance darted, under partially lowered lids, from one person to the other. As the brief, sliding gaze rested upon Paige she wished suddenly for the uncompromising honesty of a crisp white uniform and a well-starched cap.

Egon bent down to Cora and took an unresponsive hand. He said very gently, "Cora, my dear, this is Paige MacRae. I have asked her to visit with us for a while; I thought some company might be enjoyable to you."

Paige spoke quietly. "I have been looking forward to meeting you, Cora." She was unprepared for the sudden full look she got from Cora: brief, but penetrating; unmistakably hostile.

"Well," Egon Steiger said in a resonant steadying voice, "let us go in and eat."

It was a strange meal. Steiger made all the gestures of a charming host—a lonely figure at the head of the dark massive table. On one side was Paige, on the other the silent girl and the half-sober secretary. Over everything hung stillness. A little maid came and went, shadow-quiet.

"How very still it is here," Paige remarked.

"Still?" Steiger smiled. "I see you are not used to country living. Not yet, that is."

An odd look on Cora's face checked Paige's reply. Luis was pouring wine in Steiger's glass, and Paige, following Cora's gaze, saw below his sleeve a crude bandage around his wrist through which blood had seeped. As if aware of the exposure, Luis moved the bottle with a haste that spilled a drop upon the cloth. Steiger had apparently not seen.

Black coffee followed the dessert and they rose from the table. "Rest well, my dear," Egon said to Cora as Gregoria began to wheel her away. The girl did not answer.

Egon turned to Paige and she felt he must be forcing his smile. "I expect you'll welcome a siesta after the trip down. I am called away for an hour. If there is anything you need, do not hesitate to ask for it. As the Mexicans phrase it: 'My house, which is your house.'" Still smiling, he turned.

"How charming!" Miles Hilliard remarked as he came up beside Paige. He stood looking in the direction in which Steiger had disappeared. "Such delivery!" His hazel eyes mocked. "Proof of the inestimable value of repetition!"

"Meaning what?" Paige asked.

"Well, naturally," he said, "since I do not own a house I have little occasion to practice such a pretty phrase." He snorted. Then as she stared at him, he turned, saying, "A pleasant siesta, Miss Paige MacRae . . . visitor."

He walked away, leaving her wordless and indignant.

NEXT MONTH

"I have never been unfaithful to you; but I no longer feel any loyalty to you, and I do not think you would be hurt—except for your vanity. Any infidelity I may commit will be because I have found a woman I admire and respect and love, as well as want; and who accepts me for what I am."

Neal Buckley paused to read over the long letter he had just written to his wife, Janice. It was a bill of indictment, a summation of the things she had done over fifteen years to destroy all the joy and delight of their marriage. Perhaps it was cowardly to write instead of telling her in person. But this way Janice would have to hear him out. He felt tense and driven. Would he have the nerve to send it?

He sealed the letter and dropped it into the slot.

YOU KNOW HOW WOMEN ARE

By CATHARINE BARRETT

Complete novelette, condensed in the JULY JOURNAL

In her room, Paige put on a cool robe and lay on the great bed, but relaxation eluded her. A half hour went by; the clock ticked, a fly buzzed sporadically.

Impatiently Paige got up, flung open the draperies at one window and looked across a stretch of lawn to the swimming pool sparkling in the sun. Instantly she knew what she wanted: a swim. Quickly she found and put on her swim suit, let herself out of her room quietly and started toward the pool. At the sensuous delight of the grass beneath her bare feet she began to run exuberantly.

The distance was greater than it looked, the pool larger than she had imagined. Glossy-leaved banana plants along one side partially concealed the building she had noticed from the air, evidently a dressing cabana.

As she ran she saw at the far side of the sweeping lawn a dog, the same great Doberman she had seen on her arrival. A small-town girl with a love of dogs, Paige watched his approach, saw with pleasure the upfling of head that told her she had been seen. She leaned forward, clapping her hands to hasten him. "Come on, boy! Come on!"

She did not see the cabana door open, becoming aware of Miles Hilliard's presence and his hand upon her at the same instant. She spun around and glimpsed his grim set face. Without ceremony he lifted her in his arms and made a staggering run for the open door. Inside, he kicked it shut and put her down. She jerked free, momentarily speechless with indignation. Outside the door she heard the snuffling breath of the dog.

Uncomfortably aware of her attire, Paige was hotly angry because she knew Miles must have been watching her there by the pool. She could still hear the dog outside; there was assurance in its nearness. She had her hand on the latch when Miles moved more quickly than she would have thought possible to intercept her. "Don't open the door." His hand came down hard over hers. "The dog ——"

She did not retreat. "You will open this door."

He shook his head. "He is taught to run silently—to kill the same way."

"Kill!" The word was shocked from Paige. "You're drunk!" she said.

"No," he said, "practically sober. Shocked sober. You must listen to me."

"I am going out that door. If you're afraid of a dog, Mr. Hilliard, I am not."

"The dog knows me. You are a stranger."

"Open the door."

"Look, I will telephone to the house ——"

"Do that," she said.

She watched him go to a small wall telephone. Her sweeping glance took in the desk and typewriter, books, papers; a couch, a heavy chair. She opened the door.

He slammed up the phone and reached her at the same instant. "You little fool!"

She wrenched through the opening. The dog was gone. There was scorn in the look she gave Miles Hilliard.

He said, "Don't ever come out here alone again, do you understand?"

She slapped him hard. She saw the finger marks stand out across the scar, then redden. He did not move. He said in an odd tone, "It's been a long time since anyone has taken me seriously enough to do that."

She turned, head high, cheeks hot. She refused to hurry as she went back across the lawn, wanting almost desperately to run. She knew that he stood in the doorway and watched her all the way.

Back in her room, after all the confusing happenings, she had not expected to go to sleep, but she did. She awakened to the sound of sluicing rain and far-off thunder.

There was a soft knock at the door and when Paige opened it she discovered Luis. "Señorita, por favor, the cena will be at nine. The supper," he amended.

"Thank you, Luis."

He bowed. She saw that he held his right hand a little behind him, and remembered what she had seen at the table. She said, "Luis, you have hurt your wrist I noticed."

"It is nothing," he said uneasily

"Let me look at it, Luis I know about such things. Come in."

Unwillingly he pushed up his sleeve and Paige unwound the clumsy bandage to disclose a jagged wound. She said uneasily, "Don't you think Mr. Steiger might want you to see a doctor, Luis?"

He drew back sharply. "Señorita, he must not know. Please, he must not know!"

What has Luis done? she thought. A fight, perhaps; a slash with a knife? No, the edges were uneven.

She brought her first-aid kit and cleaned the wound gently. Eyes on her work, she asked, "What was it, Luis, an . . . argument?"

When he did not answer she looked up. His forehead glistened with sweat. He nodded quickly. "Sí, an argument."

She bandaged the wound expertly, using the small tube of ointment the kit contained.

"Mil gracias, señorita," Luis said. "Con permiso ——" He all but ran out the door.

Funny little man, she thought.

Paige had put on a white piqué dress for the evening meal, a jade rebozo. Filigreed circles of gold hung at her ears.

On the terrace, Egon Steiger rose from a chair to greet her, and as he did the dog that had been crouching at his feet rose, too, and stood utterly still except for the dark glittering eyes. Miles Hilliard lounged at his former place by the railing. He nodded without speaking.

Egon Steiger said, "Good evening, Paige," and as if at some unseen signal the dog sank to its haunches, but it did not take its gaze from her. Steiger smiled. "This," he said, "is Vengador, most loyal of friends." He spoke in Spanish and the dog rose and came over to Paige to sniff the back of the hand she extended, then returned to his place.

"He is . . . gentle?" Paige asked. "I see he wears no collar."

Egon Steiger smiled, and dropped a hand to fondle the close-cropped ears. "Between 'Gador and me there is no need of a collar. Between 'Gador and anyone else it would be quite useless."

"He is gorgeous. I am happy to make his acquaintance," she said sweetly, meaning that Miles Hilliard should hear.

A moment later he turned with a brief "Excuse me, please," and disappeared down the stairs.

Luis came then to announce the meal.

"Cora is not joining us?" Paige asked.

Steiger shook his head. "She insists on supper in her room."

"Mr. Steiger," Paige said, when they were seated at the table, "tomorrow I must make an attempt to see more of your daughter. I'm afraid I don't know exactly where Gregoria's duties end and mine begin."

He smiled. "That fine conscientiousness of yours is troubling you again. I introduced you as a guest, remember?"

"Yes, but ——"

"It's important. Perhaps you have noticed that your bathroom opens into Cora's room."

"Yes."

"A door, left ajar without seeming intention, is an invitation to outreaching on the part of another. If Cora knew you were a nurse she would pull back deeper into her shell. And she needs so desperately someone who is her contemporary, someone in whom she may come to confide."

"I shall certainly do my best," Paige replied.

"You must be patient—with both of us," he said later, as she rose to leave him.

She answered only "Good night," but she knew his gaze followed her until she disappeared down the staircase. She went into her room, closed and bolted the door.

By the time she was ready for bed the rain had stopped. She lay quietly in the darkness, thinking of Egon Steiger, lonely, gallant; of the pitiable girl Cora, the unsocial Miles Hilliard, the strange little Luis . . . even the dog, the darkly beautiful dog that was Egon Steiger's shadow.

She slept. Once, as in a dream, she heard footsteps pacing, back and forth, back and forth, back ——

At the end of a week Paige felt, unhappily, that she was no more acceptable to Cora Steiger than at the beginning of her stay. To all overtures the girl was unresponsive. Paige wheeled her down by the pool, sought pleasant places on the terraces, offered to read to her.

"Here, I'll get that, Cora," Paige said that afternoon, seeing the girl straining silently to reach a book that had slid from her lap to the floor.

"Leave it there," Cora said now shortly.

Paige picked up the book and handed it to her. Cora's fingers curled around it, her gaze flat, hard. "Why don't you go back where you came from? You think I don't know why you're here? You are here to spy on me."

"Spy on you?"

Cora's grip tightened on the book. "You think you've fooled me? Everything you do gives you away. When I saw Luis' bandaged wrist I knew. Better than most I should know a nurse when I see one. Lie about it if you want to; it won't matter."

Paige felt betraying color whip into her face. She could not now evade if she hoped to take even one step toward gaining Cora's confidence.

"I don't intend to lie about it."

"Then why no uniform? Why pretend ——"

"Cora, your father was thinking only of you when he asked me to come. He thought you had seen so much of uniforms ——"

"So that's what he said!" For a long intense moment the girl studied Paige's face. Then she pushed back into her chair, her eyes cold. "I don't want you here, do you understand? I do—not—want—you—here."

"Cora ——" Paige began gently.

Sudden fury twisted Cora's face to ugliness. With all her strength she hurled the book at Paige. "There!" she panted. "Now will you get out? Will you go? Now! Now!"

Without replying, Paige turned and left. Back in her own room she pondered uneasily what she should do. She wished she could talk to Steiger, but he had gone immediately after comida to the building on the ridge, which he called the casita—the little house. Nothing was permitted to disturb him when he was writing.

As the week had passed it seemed to Paige that he had grown more tense. If he were disappointed in the slowness of her progress with Cora, what she had to tell him now would not help.

She had inquired two days before as to the possibility of recovering her lost papers, but he had shaken his head. "One drops a word here, a word there, and then one waits." Then he had smiled. "Now, promise me you will not concern yourself."

The remainder of the day stretched interminably ahead. And then she thought, Why not go into Cuernavaca? And felt an instant lifting of her spirits. It could not be more than thirty minutes' drive. There could scarcely be another day when she was less wanted here.

It was with relief that she heard footsteps and saw Miles coming across the terrace. He paused at sight of her, quick appraisal in his look. "Is anything the matter?"

Did her feelings show so plainly to everyone? She said, "Why, no, nothing at all. I wonder if you'd have someone drive me into Cuernavaca?"

"Cuernavaca?" He said it as if she had mentioned the next province. He hesitated for a long moment, then he said stiffly, "I'm sorry, the servants take orders only from Mr. Steiger."

"But I can't disturb him; he's working. I just want you to tell whoever drives to take me into Cuernavaca."

"I could not order the car for you. I'm sorry."

Anger and frustration welled up in her. "I don't believe you!"

His face whitened with anger. "If you'll excuse me, please." He went past her and into the house.

Resourcefulness came to her aid. The switchboard girl at the Hotel Marik in Cuernavaca must speak English. She would call there and ask them to send out a taxi.

An old-fashioned telephone stood in a niche in the sala. Paige lifted the receiver and heard only an odd humming sound. "Hello!" she said with impatience. Distantly a voice was murmuring and she said at once, "Hotel Marik, por favor. Hotel Marik."

"Is there something, señorita?"

She turned to see Gregoria. Paige said as crisply as she could, "I am trying to reach the Hotel Marik. Will you get if for me?"

"Of course, señorita." Gregoria took the receiver and began to jiggle the hook, seemingly without result. "It seems not to function, señorita."

"Keep trying, please."

COUNTRY WAYS

By JANE MERCHANT

"Here we turn the children out
To daisies every summer"—
Grandma's glad to talk about
Our ways to any comer.

"Sturdy, trusty, full of zest
And lovely altogether,
Daisies make the merry best
Of any soil and weather.

"All that any country needs
Is what the country raises
Where the daisies grow like weeds
And children grow like daisies."

"Yes, señorita." Gregoria made elaborate effort. Again she turned. "It seems to be—how do you say?—impassive."

Paige knew now only a stubbon refusal to be defeated. She took back the receiver.

Then she saw Gregoria's gaze go past her and even before Egon Steiger spoke she knew he was there. "My dear, something is wrong; I can see it in your face. Why did you not have someone come for me?"

With an effort she kept her voice steady. "I understood you were never to be disturbed during working hours. I—I was just trying to get a taxi to take me into Cuernavaca for an hour or two. Cora is resting ——" There was something disconcerting in the way his blue eyes watched her as she talked.

He said, "I have been thoughtless. Of course you need some relaxation. But—about the telephone. You see, with servants, one must be careful, keep constantly in touch. So—all calls go through the casita when I am up there. Of course when I heard your voice, I came down at once."

No wonder Gregoria had been slyly amused, Paige thought indignantly.

Egon smiled warmly. "Come," he said.

"Where?"

"I am taking you into Cuernavaca. You must let me make up for my thoughtlessness."

"But your work?"

"You will be giving me pleasure."

In the driveway a small foreign sports car waited. Egon helped Paige, then swung in beside her. As they started up the driveway she heard the muffled howl of a dog. Vengador had been left behind.

At a pleasantly secluded table in Cuernavaca Paige smiled at Egon Steiger over a tall, moisture-beaded glass.

He said quietly, "It is not happy news that you have for me."

"You know?"

"Tell me," he said gently. He leaned forward and she could sense his waiting.

She said at last, "It's just that . . . well, maybe Cora would be more responsive to someone else." That's not what I intended to say to him at all! she thought.

She saw his mouth tighten a little as if in pain. "Paige"—his eyes had never seemed so strangely blue—"remember, I warned you of her sometimes violent reaction to the mental anguish that she feels."

"But Cora dislikes me."

"No, my dear. In her bitterness she strikes out at whoever is nearest." His eyes were shadowed. "She turns on me, too, Paige."

"On you!"

"On all of us. But I've learned to know it for what it is." His eyes searched hers. "I do not want you to tell me that you will not stay. We need you at Loma de Sombra. Paige, please stay."

The blue gaze seemed to burn into hers. She looked down, uncertain. "Please," he said again. She looked up and nodded.

Miles Hilliard barged into the cabana and slammed the door, his feelings in angry turmoil. What sort of fool was he to concern himself with any of the women who came to this place? He knew them all. He ought to, after nearly three years of living at Loma de Sombra.

They had two things in common: beauty and charm They wanted what they saw; they were willing to barter what they had. Some remained longer than others, but none ever overstayed her welcome by an hour. Egon watched their little posings and posturings, the deep looks, the soft smiles; then, with scorn, shooed them unceremoniously away.

HEAP BIG TOTEM BURGERS
(new outdoor treat!)

Especially when you grill these heap good hamburgers, don't forget the wonderful difference Ac'cent makes! It emphasizes all their natural "good lean beef" flavor—makes 'em so moist they almost spurt good beef juices! What Ac'cent does for Totem Burgers, it does for charcoal-broiled steaks and chicken, too. Be sure to use enough to taste the exciting flavor improvement. Start with the amount we recommend. Unlike other seasonings, you can't use too much Ac'cent!

TOTEM BURGERS

1 pound ground beef
1 teaspoon Ac'cent
¾ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
4 hamburger buns
4 slices (4 oz.) process American Cheese
Butter
Lettuce
4 slices tomato
4 slices onion
Pickle relish
4 stuffed olives

Break up meat with fork in mixing bowl. Sprinkle Ac'cent, salt and pepper over entire surface of meat. Toss gently. Shape into 4 patties. Panbroil, broil or grill to desired doneness. Just before hamburgers are done, top with cheese. Butter hamburger bun and cover with lettuce. Top with hamburger patty, tomato and onion. Spread with relish; top with olive. Cover with remaining half bun. Repeat. For best results line your grill with Reynolds Wrap—for better heat and cleanliness. YIELD: 4 servings.

For weeks there would be no one. Then one morning Steiger's plane would take off for Mexico City. A house guest always companioned his return. And who this time? Miles had thought with bitterness, a week before, at the sound of the returning plane. He was totally unprepared for Paige MacRae.

Miles remembered in uncomfortable detail his first meeting with Paige. The night before Egon's unheralded return he had slept badly. He had taken three very stiff drinks before coming up to the dining room, which brought him to a point of contempt for everything, including himself. This slender sunny-haired girl had given him a level look and rewarded his rudeness with the curtness it deserved. And something about the high-headed way she stood reminded him of Margot. He hated her for it. How dared any woman coming to this place remind him of Margot?

He told himself just what this Paige MacRae must be and why she had come to Shadow Ridge. But all during that first meal he watched her. She was not like any of the others; there were no posturings. She spoke to Egon with a quiet assurance, a dignity that was again an unbearable reminder of Margot.

He fought against the girl's domination of his thoughts in the days that followed. But he could not be free of her. The more Miles became aware of Paige, the more he sensed the difference between her and the others who had come as Egon Steiger's guests. She devoted a great deal of time to Cora. And Egon, who had always displayed fierce intensity toward his feminine visitors, followed by indifference as they began to weary him, treated Paige as Miles had not seen him treat any other woman.

Miles had been honestly startled at Paige's expression when she had met him on the terrace that afternoon. She looked angry, hurt. Something had happened. What lay behind this sudden decision to leave the house without telling Egon? He looked at her standing there and, with no inward blaze of conviction but rather like the quiet turning of a page to find written a simple truth, he knew that she was not like the others; that her purpose in coming here was as honest as her eyes. He felt as if suddenly pushed off balance. The abrupt way he had taken leave of her was really flight.

Miles had seen Steiger enter the house, had seen the expression on the man's face, the momentarily unguarded eagerness, the animal excitement. As if he were licking his chops, Miles thought angrily. He heard Egon's voice as he spoke to the girl, gentle, kindly. He could picture Paige looking into Egon's again-masked face and, in her own honesty, believing it also honest. He watched Egon and Paige leave for town in the small foreign car. The dog was not with them, which meant that Egon was not planning a speedy return.

Back in the cabana, Miles tried unsuccessfully to work. He found himself endlessly turning to the clock, until daylight was gone and darkness settled. When Luis brought his supper Miles asked, "The señor has not yet returned?"

"No one has returned, Señor Hilliard." A pause. "There comes, I think, a storm. If the rain is heavy soon the road will be, perhaps, not passable until tomorrow. Except, of course, Señor Hilliard, in the jeep."

"It rained this morning; it is not likely to rain tonight," Miles said shortly.

Luis answered, "Sí, señor," and went out.

But after a bite or two Miles pushed the food aside, hearing the witch dance of the first drops across the banana leaves, and within minutes the lashing downpour.

Egon's plans would have been simple. Some shopping, laughter over the trinket he would buy Paige, too small a thing to refuse; pleasant conversation over cocktails. And then, of course, back to Loma de Sombra. Egon Steiger was too experienced to overplay his hand.

But one thing tormented Miles: the thought of the dirt road leading across lonely countryside to Shadow Ridge. There were spots that became little better than morasses during heavy rain. A low car once bogged was helpless—as Egon Steiger knew very well.

At nine-thirty Miles tried to reach Cuernavaca, but found the phone useless. By ten he could stand the suspense no longer. The thought of the girl in a stalled car with Egon Steiger was unendurable. He ran through the rain to the gallery.

"Get the jeep," he told Luis. "Bring it to the door. I have reason to believe the señor's car is stuck in the mud."

"Yes," Luis said softly, "it could be so."

"Good!" Miles said, and meshed his gears. Its four-wheel drive and all Miles' skill were needed to keep the jeep on the slippery road, and as kilometer after kilometer went by and he saw nothing he began to feel he had been hasty and overzealous. Miles cursed the trip for a fool's errand. Then he saw the stranded sports car off the road, so turned that he might have passed it. He slid to a stop. As he yanked open the door of the stalled car a light came on, catching the faces of both passengers in the sudden illumination. Miles saw the fury in Egon Steiger's face, the relief in the girl's. Then Steiger's expression changed.

"Well—Hilliard!" His voice was warm, grateful—and a betraying note too high. "I had not hoped for such a response to my mental SOS."

Paige had not spoken, but she was staring now at Miles. His gaze clung to hers and he could not look away. Then something in her eyes answered his and he knew that she was glad he was there.

Slowly Paige undressed for bed. She thought as she brushed her hair, Here I am back at Loma de Sombra. The heavy door leading from the bathroom into Cora's room was a reminder of tomorrow. Paige stood staring at it, her nurse's training urging her to see that all was well with her patient before she herself went to sleep. The noise of the rain would cover the opening of the door; the dim light on the bedside table would show her if the girl slept.

She opened the door. The small lamp was not burning, but the light from the bathroom made a path across the rug. Paige stared at an empty bed. In the doorway of her dressing room stood Cora Steiger, gaze fixed on Paige in an expression of complete shock. She took an uncertain step forward, then swayed and would have fallen had not Paige caught her. She half dragged, half carried her to the bed.

Cora sank back among the pillows and stared at her, wordless. Paige sat down on the bed and took the girl's cold hands in hers.

Cora said then in a low hoarse voice, "You will tell him! You will tell him!"

Paige said gently, "Cora, try to trust me."

Cora's voice shook. "How can I trust anyone? Anyone?" She wrenched her hands away. "It's no use now; you'll tell him."

Paige asked in honest bewilderment, "But why not tell him what would make him so happy—that you can walk?"

Cora drew back into the pillows, her whole body rigid. Her eyes seemed even in the dim light to burn into Paige's. "If you tell him, there is no more chance for me."

"But he is your father, Cora."

The girl's eyes made a quick circuit of the room, then they met Paige's with dark intensity. Her voice was low, yet harsh. "He is my . . . husband."

Paige repeated the words incredulously: "Your husband!"

Before she could say more there was a sound, so slight she was not sure she had heard anything. But Cora stiffened, warning in her eyes. "Run!" she gasped. "Run!"

Paige fled to the bathroom, clicking off the light. There in the darkness she waited, breathless, the door not quite closed. A hinge rasped faintly. The light went on in Cora's room. She heard Cora speak. "What do you want? You wakened me."

"Did I, my dear? I'm sorry. I thought, somehow, you would not be asleep." It was Egon Steiger who had entered the room.

"I was asleep," Cora said sulkily.

"Were you, Cora? There is no sleepiness in your voice." A pause. "You weren't really asleep, were you?"

"Awake, asleep, what difference?"

The voice spoke gently. "Poor child. It is so hard for you to know which is truth and which is fantasy; which are the things you know—and which are the things you dream."

Cora's voice was low, intense. "You've come to start on that again. You think, don't you, that if you tell me often enough I'll believe it—as you make everyone else believe it."

"Cora, if I must confide certain things to others, it is only to protect you."

"So you've told her—the girl."

His voice was kindly. "You must know I had only your interest at heart in bringing Miss MacRae here. I must know that you are competently cared for, so I will tell you now that she is a registered nurse. You must know it is not easy to persuade someone like her to come to this lonely place. I must insist that you do nothing in future to jeopardize her remaining."

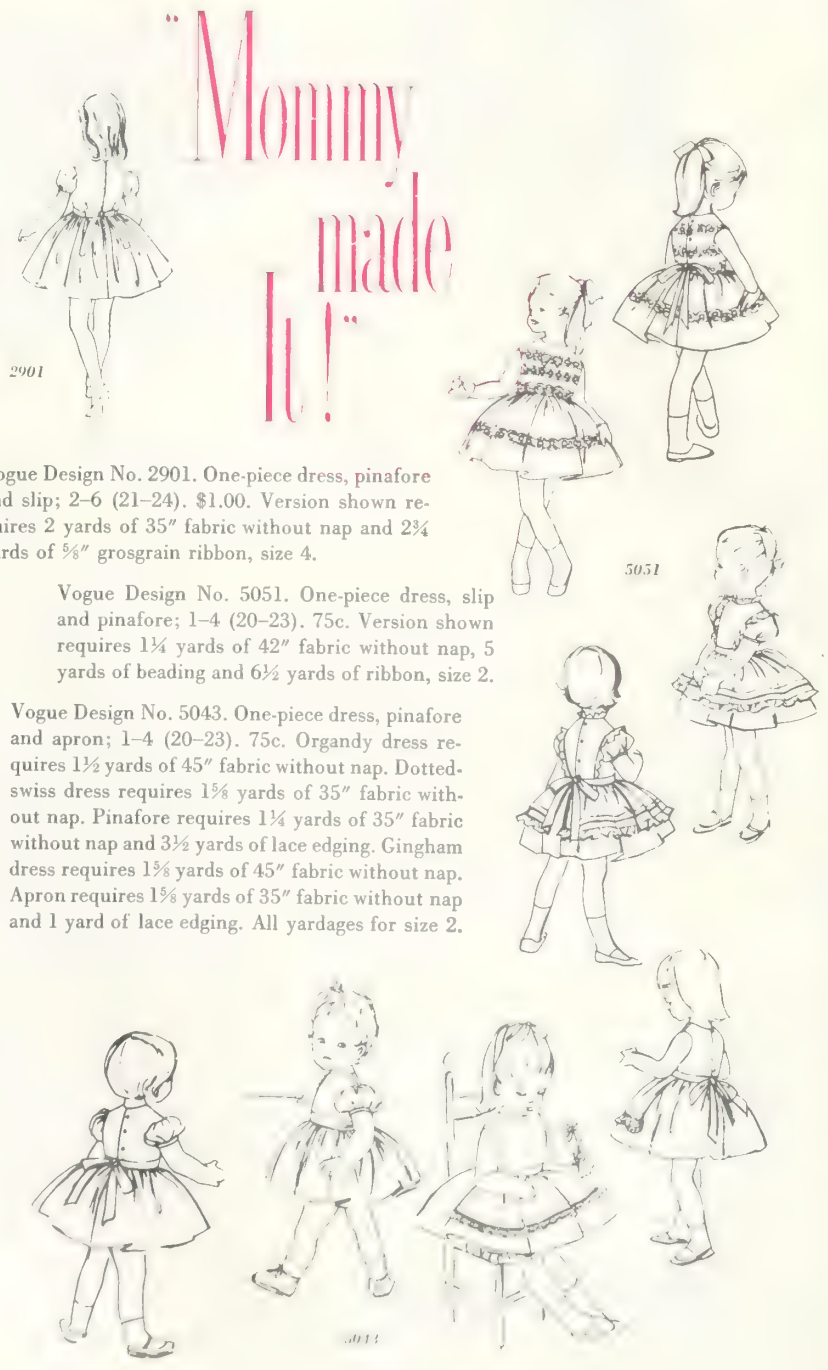
"So it is like that?" Cora said.

He said, "For me there is peace of mind in knowing she is here. You are not strong ——"

Suddenly Cora laughed, a wild laugh that roughened Paige's skin. "And I must be kept strong, mustn't I? It would be dreadful for you if I died, wouldn't it? What would you do then?"

"My poor, poor girl ——"

"Oh, stop it! Stop it!" It was the same sort of fury Paige had witnessed earlier, directed toward herself. "Get out! Get out, do you hear? I do not listen to you."



"Well—good night, then, Cora. I hope in the morning you will feel better."

The girl made no reply and presently Paige heard the click of the light switch and the closing of the door. She had been on the point of believing Cora's incredible statement. But now she remembered what Egon had told her of Cora's hallucinations. It was going to be hard to meet Cora tomorrow. She went to the outer door to assure herself it was bolted. And then she heard steps which came closer, paused. She knew—without knowing how she knew—that Egon Steiger stood outside. Slowly, silently the door handle turned and there was pressure against the bolt. And then she heard his voice: "Paige . . . Paige." A voice too low to cause awakening, yet one to be heard if awake. "Paige?" The handle moved again and the bolt strained in its socket. "Paige?" She stood there, pressed against the door. Her lips opened to answer because there was such demand in the voice, such force to compel. She wanted to say, "Yes, what is it?" She pressed the back of her hand to her mouth.

Then she heard the steps going away, whispering into silence. A moment later there was the sound of a car as it began the climb to the casita on the ridge.

Paige opened her eyes to morning sunlight. The air smelled rain-washed, fresh. She sat up, feeling the upsurge of new energy. How silly she had been! She felt only pity this morning for Cora. As for Egon Steiger, the troubled father, Paige wished now she had opened the door and come out on the gallery to talk with him. How simple it might have made everything.

As she came lightly up the stairs to the terrace, drops of water on the bougainvillaea caught the sun and turned to crystal. Miles stood in his usual place, staring off at the volcanoes. She could not forget the look on his face when he opened the door of the stranded car. That look had been for her alone.

"Good morning, Miles," she said.

He turned, and she saw he had been drinking. He spoke thickly. "I—I didn't expect you to be up here this early."

She felt rebuffed, then indignant. She had not wanted to see him like this. She spoke shortly. "If I am intruding, I'll leave."

"No—no, I didn't mean that." He shook his head heavily. "I—I neeeded more time, that's all."

"More time? For what?"

"To say what I want to say."

"What do you mean?"

"When are you going? You ought to know it's not good sense, your staying here."

Shocked, she stared at him, and before the look in her gray eyes his gaze faltered. He ran his hand over his face and half shook his head as if to clear it. His voice was ragged. "I should apologize for my state—but it is my state of courage." Then for an instant his gaze burned into hers. "Get out of here. You hear me? Get out of here!"

She looked at him, beyond speech. He turned and with great care crossed the terrace and went down the stairs. Paige stared after him.

When Egon did not appear at the usual time she went, at Luis' suggestion, in to breakfast, and she was eating when he finally came in, flanked by Vengador, to join her. He was wearing dark glasses, though the morning was not more brilliantly sunny than usual. Seeing she had observed, he smiled. "You'll forgive my 'dark' outlook, I hope." He seated himself. "I worked most of the night, which means eyestrain, so I must depend on these."

Paige found it hard not to stare. There was something different about him. His mouth had a tautness she had not seen before. And she noticed that he was not really eating. The dog, head close to his knee, was getting most of the food. He said then, "Have you seen my daughter this morning?"

Paige shook her head. "I expect she is sleeping late."

Egon Steiger sighed. "Forgive my impatience, Paige. I'm anxious to know how things will go. Last night we got in so late I dared not disturb Cora."

Paige, taking a drink of coffee, was glad that the cup somewhat concealed her face. She swallowed, then put the cup down carefully, not looking at the man, fearing her eyes would betray her astonishment.

Paige spread a bite of toast before she asked her question. "Don't you think, perhaps, if I am going to make another attempt, it might work out better if Cora knows I am a nurse? If she realized that I got the job because I was trained for it ——" She was aware he was studying her from behind the glasses.

Abruptly he put his hand over hers. "You must trust me; you must believe that I know what is best for . . . all of us." His fingers tightened convulsively. "Paige—I ——"

The dog moved closer, growling possessively; and Paige pulled free. Egon struck the dog across the muzzle, a brutal backhanded blow. It withdrew a few feet and sank slowly to the floor.

Egon turned back to Paige. The pulse was beating in his temple. He said, "I am sorry. I regret to discipline Vengador in front of you, but with such an animal, control must be constant and obedience instant."

Paige wanted to get out of the room. She put down her napkin and rose. "You'll be seeing Cora before she comes outdoors?"

"Of course." She wanted to say, Take off the glasses so I can see you. He said slowly, "If there is anything you feel that I should know—anything at all—of course you will come to me."

She nodded, but did not answer. Relieved when he and the dog had gone, she went out on the terrace. But she could not shed her uneasiness. Did he know more than he seemed to know? Why had he pretended he had not seen Cora last night? Why had he said nothing about having stood outside her own door?

Over an hour passed before Gregoria appeared, wheeling Cora down by the pool. The girl was wearing a floppy-brimmed sun hat that hid her face.

When Gregoria had gone Cora spoke to Paige with quiet intensity. "Don't act different, but he's watching. I know; I can feel it."

Paige checked an involuntary impulse to glance around quickly. She realized, unhappily, that Cora's mind was following another labyrinth. She drew up a chair and sat down. "Are you quite comfortable?"

Cora did not answer; then after a moment she said, "Will you read to me?" She took a book from a pocket in her chair. The hat still hid her face. Paige opened the book, recognizing it as one she had read.

NOTATIONS

By ELIZABETH ALLEN

Gardening, I reached out for a weed,
But in my hand the green stalk
Stiffened, went tight with balk;
It was a long green insect, not a stem,
Smooth and cool, taut with phlegm,
Trying hard to look what it was not.

Swimming, I ran into a snake.
We both drew back and eyed
The other, and then passed aside
As people, meeting on a busy street,
Who, before they move on, must retreat.
There was a real politeness in his glide.

And we could preach a sermon,
write a poem,
Or sadly pull the belt in one more notch
In contemplation of our human botch;
Grieve for our elegance, which is defective;
Sigh for our color, which is not protective;
Or simply stand and watch

Birds praise the wind with flight,
Or see the salmon curving his hosannas,
Or smell the jasmine, opening at night.

She began to read; then, above her own low voice, she heard Cora's speaking quickly from under the concealing hatbrim. "Did you tell him? Don't stop reading or look up; just answer as if it's part of the story. Did you tell him what I told you?"

Startled, Paige still managed to keep her eyes on the print. "I did not tell anyone."

"That's the truth?" Cora's hands tightened on the chair arms.

"It's the truth, Cora. I have told no one."

Cora's voice trembled with intensity. "You must believe what I told you. I'm trusting you, Paige; there is nothing else I can do."

"I have said nothing," Paige repeated.

"Tell me," Cora said, "is he wearing dark glasses this morning?"

"Why, yes—but haven't you seen him? I thought he ——"

"I have not seen him since last night."

Paige kept on with the pretended reading, saying the words automatically.

Cora continued, "When he wants to be able to look at you, stare at you, and you cannot tell what he is thinking, then he wears dark glasses. He's different then; I'm afraid of him when he wears them."

"Cora, what would he be suspicious of?"

"Anyone. Everyone. Of me. He is always suspicious." Her voice faltered. "Oh, Paige, help me before it is too late. Nothing is as you think it is in this place. You don't know what he is capable of; you don't know."

It was sad, sitting here in the glorious sunlight by a shimmering blue pool, listening to Cora pouring out her suspicious fears. Paige ached to help the girl. She said, "Now, you mustn't worry about things."

"He has made you think about me as he wants you to think, hasn't he?" Cora asked bitterly. "You believe nothing; you don't even believe he is watching us."

Paige said in a calming tone, "Now if he were watching, where would he be? And why?"

"I don't know. Only I can feel it."

Paige sighed inwardly. Cora saw danger everywhere, dark intention in everyone. Paige knew, unhappily, she must tell Egon the truth about her, leave decision to him.

She put down the book, ashamed that Cora had persuaded her to be a party to this pretense. As she raised her head she saw movement at the far corner of the lawn. Into the sunlight a young rabbit hopped nervously. What happened was immediate. There was the split second when the rabbit's ears jerked upright and it leaped, but at the very apex of its leap Vengador was upon it. There was a choked-off squeal, and the furry body flew through the air to fall limp upon the grass.

The dog lunged toward it again, then stopped short. He swung his head, then, as if obedient to some signal, turned and disappeared into the shrubbery. Everything was as it had been except for the unmoving patch of fur.

"The milk for the señorita." Luis' voice behind Paige made her jump.

Cora took the glass and began to sip it while Luis waited. Paige's mind was darting at this fact, then that. The dog never left Steiger's side; therefore only one thing could account for its presence in the shrubbery: Egon was there. But why? It was ridiculous to think he would stand hidden spying on his daughter.

Something of her thought must have shown in her face, for all at once Cora put down the glass. She said, "Luis, take me in the house. I am tired." As Paige started to rise, she added coldly, "Don't bother. I don't need you." Luis wheeled the chair away.

Paige sat there, determined to be sensible, waiting for Egon Steiger to come and explain why he was in the vicinity. In a moment he appeared, walking toward her. He smiled gravely. "I am sorry about what just happened." She stared at him without answering. His hand dropped to the neck of the great dog. "I did not see the rabbit in time to check him," he said. "Why did Cora go in?"

"Well, she was upset—about the rabbit." Uneasily she fumbled with the book still lying in her lap.

Egon reached over and took it from her. He riffled the pages. "You were reading to Cora?"

She nodded, then put the question she had to ask. "Did Cora say anything to you this morning when you talked with her? I mean about . . . yesterday."

"She mentioned our having talked?"

She shook her head. "But at breakfast you said you were going to ——"

"Of course. No, she did not mention yesterday. Do you feel, Paige, that she still remembers it?"

Paige sought for the right words. "She didn't mention it, only asked me to read to her."

He concerned himself with the book. "What sort of a story is this?"

Paige made herself smile. "Well, we haven't got far as yet, of course. It starts with a girl, Diana Wynn, faced with the problem of remaking her life after the death of her lover. She meets Tom Cawley—an older man. I—I don't suppose it is any great book, but if Cora is interested I'll be happy to read it to her."

She sensed his relaxing. "I continue to be deeply grateful that you are here," he told her. "You know that, don't you, Paige? How strange a thing is fate. You lose a purse—and I gain —— But I dare not yet put that into words." His voice was tender.

"Please ——" She got to her feet.

He rose also. "I did not mean to distress you." He held out his hand. "Coming in?"

"I—I think I'll stay a while longer in the sun."

He left, smiling, taking the book with him as if he had forgotten to put it down.

Paige returned to her room. The connecting door was closed. She tried to open it and found it locked. She rapped firmly, but there was no answer. Somehow she did not believe this was Cora's doing. Purpose in the very lift of her head, Paige left her room and went into the library, through which she could reach the small rear terrace outside Cora's room.

She did not expect to come face to face with Miles in the big book-lined room. The meeting was so sudden that neither had time to mask surprise. She saw he was now sober, though still pale.

He said, "Wait, please," and she paused. She knew he was finding it difficult to speak. He said, "I know there is no adequate apology I can make to you. Things just seemed to . . . start out all wrong between us."

What had happened had bothered him greatly; she could see that. She said, "Oh, Miles, let's just forget the whole thing. Please. I realize everything happened because you were drinking. I know what drinking can do; I'm a nurse and ——" She stopped short, biting her lip, wishing she could recall the words.

An odd light came into Miles' eyes. "Then you are a nurse! You came here as a nurse—not as a visitor."

"Mr. Steiger asked me not to mention it. He didn't want Cora to know. He hoped she'd accept me as a—a companion."

He asked as if puzzled, "But why would he think he could fool Cora?"

"She knows now. She saw the bandage I put on Luis' wrist. He had a bad cut ——"

"A dog bite. Luis tried to prevent the Doberman from getting loose the day you arrived."

She refused to look away. Finally she said, "I know now he is . . . dangerous. I didn't realize it." She meant it as apology.

Miles said quickly, "You couldn't have been expected to know."

And somehow, with the words out in the open, all the sting was gone from memory of the scene in the cabana. Paige made a little movement with her hands. "So—here I am: a nurse who isn't doing any nursing; a companion who isn't being companionable."

Miles looked puzzled. "How did you come to take the job? Out in this place. Or am I impertinent to ask?"

She hesitated. It would be such a relief to talk to someone. So she told him. The meeting with Egon, the purse snatching at the embassy reception, Egon's kindness in rescuing her and his eagerness to have her take the job as Cora's nurse.

When she finished, he looked at her earnestly. "Paige," he said, "find an excuse, any excuse, to leave this place. Don't ask me for reasons. Just go when you get the chance."

"But I've got to wait for a replacement on my papers."

"Report the loss to the embassy. The longer you delay, the more difficult it will be to explain why you waited."

"Miles, Mr. Steiger has gone to a lot of trouble for me; I know that. And I don't just run out on something. Cora is my problem. I ——"

If Vengador had not been panting a little Paige would not have been aware of Egon's approach.

"Were you needing me, Miles?" Egon said, and they both turned.

"I have these ready," Miles said, indicating some papers on the desk. "Whenever you want to go over them ——"

"I can now, as well as any time." He seemed to be looking at Miles, yet Paige had a strong feeling that he was watching her behind the dark glasses.

"I thought I'd find Cora out on the rear terrace," Paige said, and hoped her voice was very even. "I'll see if she wants anything."

He shook his head. "She is resting," he said. "I don't believe I'd disturb her."

She had a fleeting impression, not strong enough to be a conviction, that he did not intend she should see Cora just now.

What French's does to a hot dog...

...should happen in your frying pan!

Never—no never—have you tasted a recipe like this. Delicious . . . but as easy to fix as snapping your fingers.

The only musts are franks, pineapple, and the golden touch of French's Mustard!

You'll find French's golden touch makes this a brand new dish even though it's prepared with good old-fashioned hot dogs. That's because French's fairly sparkles with the goodness of not just one, but a combination of seven lively spices —selected from round the world, and blended to create a golden seasoning treat.

Use French's Mustard on sandwiches, cheese, hamburgers . . . in meat loaf, baked beans—whenever you want to add to food the excitement of seven lively spices . . . the rich flavor of French's golden touch! So good—it's America's favorite!

Hawaiian Franks

1 lb. franks
⅔ cup drained crushed pineapple
4 tbsp. French's Mustard
8 slices white bread
Butter

Mix drained pineapple and French's Mustard. Split franks in half, lengthwise, but not quite through. Heat in ungreased skillet, then remove and place diagonally across bread slices. Spoon pineapple-mustard mixture into frank slits. Wrap bread around each frank, overlapping corners. Secure with toothpicks. Melt small amount of butter in skillet (low heat). Brown wrapped franks, turning so bread is toasted on all sides. Add butter if needed. 4 servings.

7 lively spices in every jar
—that's the secret of French's Golden Touch!

She smiled. "Then I think I'll take a swim." She did not wait for a reply, but as she walked away she knew both men watched her.

When Paige reached the dining room for comida, Cora and Miles were already at the table. Egon came in, still wearing the dark glasses. "Well, we are quite a family group today." He made the conversation general at first, but then slowly, imperceptibly, he began to concentrate attention upon Cora. "I am so glad you are feeling better today, my dear." As she stared at him he smiled. "I noticed Paige was reading to you this morning. So intent over your book, you two." He broke a morsel of bolillo and gave it to the dog. "Tell me," he said. "What is it about, Cora?"

Paige felt her pulses jerk. Suddenly she knew her impression had been right; Egon had deliberately kept her from seeing Cora earlier. His question was not an idle one; there was purpose behind it. Paige was sure that Cora had heard nothing they had read that morning—the sketchy sentences only covering lapses in their strange conversation. Cora put down her fork and stared toward the dark glasses, her voice indifferent. "It's not much of a book."

"We did not get very far," Paige said, but Egon went on as if she had not spoken.

"What is it about, Cora?"

She can say she doesn't remember, Paige thought quickly.

"It's about a girl," Cora said. She stopped. Paige saw that Miles had become aware of something, for his gaze met her own in questioning. Cora picked up her fork as if she would say no more.

"You must have remembered some of it," Steiger said gently. His hand, caressing the neck of the dog, paused in its movement.

"I don't see what difference it makes."

"I was just hoping you would reassure me by . . . remembering," Egon said very evenly.

Cora made an exasperated gesture. "It's about a girl—Diana Wynn—who is moping around because her boy friend has been killed. There is this man, Tom. Much too old for her, if she's foolish enough to fall in love with him." She did not shift her gaze. "I don't think you'd care to read it."

He smiled broadly. "You've convinced me," he said. "It sounds very dull." At once there was a change in him, a lightening of his mood. He began to laugh and joke. Cora sank back into unresponsiveness, not even glancing at Paige

She did not appear the rest of the day, and that night the door was again locked between her room and Paige's.

Miles was on the terrace as usual at breakfast time. There was an almost blinding brilliance to the sunlight. He turned as Paige approached, his eyes sought hers quickly. His face had a new clearness and she knew he had not had a drink. She said, "Miles, there are a lot of things I don't understand here. I've got to talk to you."

"What kind of things?"

"That's just it; I'm not sure." She hesitated, then plunged. "Do you think Cora is out of her mind?"

He looked at her sharply. "A little odd, maybe, but that's a long way from —— Paige, what do you mean?"

"Miles, I've got to tell you. Cora told me that Egon Steiger is not her father. He ——"

"Not her father?" Miles said. "You mean she's adopted?"

"No ——" She stopped short as the look in Miles' eyes warned her that Egon was coming. She turned to greet him. He was not wearing the dark glasses and, perhaps by contrast, his eyes seemed pale as ice.

All during breakfast Paige knew that their unfinished conversation churned in Miles' mind. It took effort to respond to Egon's conversation. There had to be a way she could talk with Miles other than during these few moments before a meal.

As the meal ended and the three of them rose and went out on the terrace, Paige said, "I'll go and see if Cora is up."

Egon moved closer. "Not now. I must make amends for being so neglectful. You have seen very little of Loma de Sombra. I should like the pleasure of showing it to you." He turned to Luis without waiting for her answer. "Get the station wagon," he said.

There was no avoiding it. Within minutes the car was at the door. Vengador leaped at once into the rear seat, moving about excitedly. Paige was uncomfortably aware of him, but tried not to show it. There was eagerness in the way Egon put the car into motion.

Numerous little roads, some hardly more than trails, traversed the estate. Exhilarated by her presence and spurred on by her interest, Egon showed Paige everything: the landing field, the hangar, the cactus-fenced servants' quarters, the pens for the boxers that accompanied Ramón on his rounds at night. About the property ran a strong chain-link fence, too high for a dog to leap, with strands of heavy barbed wire on top.

Paige said, "This seems such a peaceful country. Is all this protection necessary?"

"Thievery," he said. "So, Julio sleeps in the hangar. And the top wire of the fence is charged. If it is cut, the broken circuit sets off an alarm."

"Which brings Ramón and the dogs," Paige said. "It's like living in medieval times."

He said gravely, "Some command, others obey."

"But obedience isn't to brute force any more. If your servants dislike it here ——"

"They can leave. Is that what you were going to say?"

"Well, it's true, isn't it?"

He smiled, an oddly complacent smile. "Not here," he said. "Wages don't enter into it at all. They give me absolute loyalty because of what I have done for them." He paused. "Take Luis. He murdered his wife in a rage because he believed she was unfaithful. He escaped. Now he's here. I stand between him and . . . retribution."

"But the law ——"

Egon spoke with proud sureness. "Here, I am the law."

"It is going to seem a little strange now, when I look at Luis—and the others."

He laughed. "Oh, not all have cause for the nightmares Luis has. Ramón helped himself to an employer's till; Julio injured a pedestrian in Monterrey. I give them what they cannot now find elsewhere: freedom."

Freedom? she thought. Freedom!

"But Gregoria . . . Miles ——" She had to ask.

"Miles —— Does it matter to you? Why should it matter?" Quick anger came into his voice. Then he checked himself and half shrugged. "Miles—I permit him to find the self he thinks he has lost. Not realizing that, he hasn't the wit to be grateful."

The car swung into the turn-off that led up to the casita on the ridge. They stopped in a small clearing and a moment later Paige entered the building with Egon Steiger.

She found herself in a large disorderly room fronted by ceiling-to-floor unbarred windows. There were a large littered desk, cabinets gray with dust, a leather chair, a wide blanket-covered couch. Books were everywhere, piled on the floor, spilling on the rugs. On the wall was the telephone, with the push buttons that controlled outgoing calls in its base.

The dog, suspicious of Paige's being in this place, moved about nervously, then sank down on the rug by the couch, eyes darkly watchful.

Paige looked around the room, trying not to show her surprise. There was in its disorder a feeling of confusion almost tangible. Over it hung an odor she could not classify.

"What a wonderful view," Paige said.

From the windows was an excellent panoramic view of the estate below. The landing strip, the hangar; the road leading to the house. Also the upper terrace was clearly visible, as were the lower end of the gallery and her own bedroom door. One side of the pool showed the cabana.

She saw, pretending not to notice, a binocular on the floor half under the chair. She stole a look at Egon Steiger. He moved and now the binocular no longer showed, though she had not seen him shove it with his foot.

He looked at Paige. "Could I have dreamed ten days ago that I would see you standing here? When I look at you ——"

Uncomfortable at the undercurrent in his voice, she turned from the window and in so doing knocked a book from the desk. She caught it as it fell. It was a badly worn volume written in German. She had forgotten most of the German she knew, but one word in the title she recognized: Poisons.

Egon took the book from her at once. "It looks very old," she said.

He nodded. "It is a résumé of strange legal cases through the last century." He smiled. "A writer of books like mine needs much odd information."

"Yes," she said, "of course." She was thinking, He lied again.

Tension was building in the room. She said at last, "Shouldn't we be getting back? Cora will be ——" But when she moved he barred the way and she looked up to meet the almost hypnotic ice-blue eyes.

He said, his voice very low, "We must not pretend, we two. You know I had to bring you here, to tell you what you must already know. I love you, Paige. I love you."

"Please—I ——"

But his hands seized her arms in a grip frighteningly strong. His gaze burned into hers. "I knew from the very first how it would be. You must have known it too."

For a dizzying second she hesitated and in that second he had drawn her close into his arms. She was pressed tightly against him, hardly able to breathe, and his mouth was hard and relentless upon her own. That odor she had noticed on entering the room was all about her, in his clothing, on his skin.

She cried out as she wrenched away and at the sound the dog sprang toward them, fangs bared, eyes green-black. Sheer fright drove Paige back into the man's arms in an effort to get away from Vengador.

Egon spoke a sharp explosive word and the dog retreated a step, fury-darkened eyes never leaving the girl. He sank to a half crouch.

"Get him away!" Paige cried, real fear in her voice. "Please—please get him away!"

Again Egon spoke and again Vengador retreated a scant step, growling deeply in his throat. Egon stood there, his arms around Paige, his voice suddenly gentle as he spoke, his lips against her hair. "Perhaps I should thank him. My darling—there, there . . . don't tremble so. I'm here; you're safe."

As she again pulled free, he led her to the big chair by the desk. "It's all right," he said, as kindly as if he reassured a child. "I have a place for Vengador outside; I'll put him there. It will take me but a moment or two," he said, and slipped out, followed by the dog.

Paige sat there, stunned, not only by the ruthlessness of his approach but by what she had come to know. Dark glasses to hide contracted pupils . . . and the odor. . . . "Not necessarily habit-forming of itself," her class notes had read. "But the path to incurable drug addiction." Marijuana.

Her thought was disrupted as the door, insecurely closed, was flung open by the wind. Air rushed into the room, scattering papers. Mechanically Paige caught at flying sheets as she ran to slam the door. Loose pages in a partially opened drawer had been sucked out; others hung over the edge. Paige yanked out the drawer to stuff them back. The glint of a peculiar yellow caught her eye. She never knew what made her reach in and draw it out. It was the International Health Certificate, known to every traveler. Beneath it, secured by an elastic band, was a small packet. It was several seconds before she realized that she held in her hand her own missing papers. Everything was there—even the money.

It was instinct that made her thrust the packet into her blouse and get back to the chair. Egon opened the door. Again the wind sent papers swirling, so no disorder seemed of her making.

Then the door was shut and the room was quiet again. Egon came over and stood looking down at her. Her face felt tight and cold as if the blood had drained from it. He was quite in control of himself now. He said, "I could not hold back longer what I felt." His voice deepened. "Paige, I must have your love."

Her heart was thrumming against the little packet, but she got up slowly and faced him.

"I am like any girl, Egon; I want love. But I do not want it forced upon me."

He drew back so suddenly, his mouth tightening, that she felt fear in the pit of her stomach. If she had chosen the wrong approach —— Then as suddenly he changed. "Forgive me," he said. His eyes moved over her. "How proud you are," he said. "I like your pride, Paige."

She stood, praying for the right words. "Egon—maybe I am a little afraid to love too quickly. Maybe I mistrust any emotion I feel . . . too soon."

"Then you do love me! You do."

"I must have time to know myself," she told him. "You would want me to be honest and tell you that."

His eyes seemed to burn over her. She was afraid to look directly into his face, so naked was desire, yet she forced herself to say, "You must give me time. There is Cora to think of, Egon; not just . . . ourselves." The thought was whirling through her mind that Egon Steiger was not free to take anyone as his wife. She knew that now.

"I know," he said. "Loving you gives me the courage to face what otherwise I could not face."

"What do you mean?"

"The truth. Cora does not improve, Paige; she only grows frailer all the time. You see it, don't you?" He took Paige's hands and his grip tightened. "You see how much I need you," he said thickly. "Paige—I ——"

At that moment the telephone rang, a long insistent br-r-r-r! It startled both of them, then he strode to the instrument. "What is it?" Paige heard an excited voice at the other end of the wire.

"All right, at once," Steiger said quickly and hung up the phone. He turned to Paige. "Cora has had an accident."

What I like about music are the pretty little ladies who listen to it.

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD

In seconds they were racing down the narrow road. Egon's mouth was taut, about him was the very emanation of excitement. As they reached the house, Paige heard the wild keening of a dog. She realized that for this moment Egon had forgotten even Vengador.

Cora lay on her bed, her upset wheel chair nearby. Luis and Gregoria were there. Paige went to Cora and felt her pulse.

"What caused this?" Egon demanded, not approaching the bed.

Paige stroked the girl's hand. "You're all right," she soothed, and just for an instant felt the pressure of the thin fingers.

Gregoria spoke nervously, pointing to the upset chair. "I heard the noise. I found the señorita so."

Cora opened her eyes. "I was trying to pick up my handkerchief," she said slowly. "Somehow the chair tipped. I'm not hurt."

"But I could not be sure, señorita," Gregoria said anxiously. "I could not know."

Miles appeared in the doorway, breathless. "What has happened? I heard the car—and now the dog ——" Again came the blood-chilling howl.

"Get up there and let him loose," Egon said sharply to Miles. "He's behind the casita."

Miles did not move. "I operate a typewriter better with ten fingers," he said calmly.

"Luis!" Egon turned toward the little man, who seemed to shrink inside his clothes.

"Señor"—soundlessly his mouth framed the plea—"por favor ——"

Cora pulled herself to a sitting position with Paige's help. "I'm all right. Paige can take me out on the terrace."

"Of course," Paige said agreeably, but Egon interrupted. "I'll go loose Vengador and be right back."

Miles' glance met Paige's. But he had no further reason for staying. He turned away.

"I will stay with Cora until you get back," Paige told Egon firmly, and there was nothing he could do but go. Paige wanted only a moment alone with Cora; time to say the one thing that could bring her comfort.

In a moment Cora said, "I'd like some tea, Gregoria, some hot tea."

Gregoria went from the room.

Cora said breathlessly, "I had to pretend to fall. She almost caught me walking."

"Cora," Paige said quickly, "listen. I believe you. I believe everything you have told me. Everything. I know now it's so."

For an instant Cora looked as if she might faint there among the pillows. Then she swallowed and tears flooded her eyes.

"I had to tell you," Paige said. "I'll try to talk to you later; not now." Cora stared at her, too shaken to answer. "And we can't seem to be on good terms—only reluctant ones. Remember that. Everything depends on it." She took the girl's hand and squeezed it hard. Then she heard the betraying sound of a spoon rattling in a saucer. She set her face. She said, clearly and coldly, "I only wanted to make you more comfortable, that's all. Certainly I have no wish to inflict myself on you."

"Then if I want you to do something for me, I'll ask you," Cora said, just as clearly.

Gregoria hurried in with the tray. "If you don't want me for anything ——" Paige began.

Cora stared at her. "Why should I?"

With an excellent imitation of injured dignity, Paige moved toward the door. As she reached it she turned and for an instant the girl's eyes met her own. There was a light in them she had never seen since coming to this house. She knew it was the light of an awakening hope.

Cora lay on the bed, her eyes closed, the half-empty teacup pushed aside. In her mind pulsed those hurried words of Paige's: "I believe everything you have told me."

Paige knows! She believes me! Cora thought. From the night Paige had discovered she could walk Cora had known despair, for she knew Paige had not believed her when she said Egon was her husband. And, not believing, she might betray her.

Cora feared Egon. She feared him as she feared no other living person, for she knew that when he moved in an aura of dark purpose, nothing could stand in his path. It was the more terrible because of the deceptive mask of gentleness he could wear so well.

It was that gentleness that had at first caught her interest. She had been a lonely girl. Motherless only child of a Texas rancher, she had been literally swept into wealth on the black crest of a gusher. When, at sixteen, she lost her father in a field accident, she was bereft. A bank became her guardian. She was sent to good schools, on expensive vacations, but she missed the roughly tender man who had reared her, missed belonging to someone.

She met Egon Steiger on the ski run at St. Moritz three days after her twenty-first birthday. She was flattered when he showed her attention. He seemed to have such understanding of her inner loneliness, something the younger men did not. He told her that he, too, was an orphan, told her how he needed her; it was that for which she hungered. She fell deeply in love.

Elopement with him—his laughing suggestion—was high adventure, because she did not have to elope. She was now of age; she needed to account to no one. But she loved the secrecy of it, his unwillingness to share a moment with an outside world. She proudly registered her new name with the bank in Texas and knew that she was truly happy for the first time since her father's death.

She was not sure when she first began uneasily to feel that he was not quite what he had seemed to be. Slowly came realization that what she had mattered more than what she was. Still, she had no inkling of his purpose until he brought up the matter of their wills, and that each must, of course, provide completely for the other. It was only then it occurred to her to tell him that her inheritance was provisional. The income of her trust was hers only during her lifetime. It had been her father's honest attempt to protect her from the Egons of the world. To her children at her death went the principal of that trust. If she died childless, everything went as an endowment to a university.

At first Egon did not believe her. Then he cursed as she had never heard cursing. She saw

WARNING: HELP PROTECT BABIES AND NEW MOTHERS AGAINST DREADED STAPH GERMS

BY GENE WILBURN, MEDICAL NEWS WRITER, HOUSTON CHRONICLE

A dreaded disease has become a medical scourge. In recent years, Staphylococcus aureus—or "yellow staph"—has run rampant.

Newborn babies, new mothers, older people and people recovering from surgery are particularly susceptible! 16 babies died from staph infections in a Houston hospital in less than three months. Staph has become so widespread that in Pennsylvania it is now a reportable disease, that must be made known to the state health authorities.

Ironically enough, staph has gained this new lease on life partially through medical progress itself. In recent years, sulfa drugs and antibiotics have worked miracles against most kinds of germs, but with staph, their too-liberal use has backfired. Staph has the greatest capacity of any known disease germ for developing resistant strains. Now, its actual biology has changed, and the germ has become a scourge!

While staph has become a formidable problem to hospitals, it can also be tracked into any home, the cleanest of homes, by anyone, sick or well. You don't have to have a skin lesion to pick up staph in the home. A crawling infant, a barefoot bather, may be a ready victim.

This dangerous enemy can be picked up not only by contact with a patient or carrier, but also by contact with contaminated surfaces—for example, bathroom fixtures, bath tub, bowl, tiles, bath mat. In fact, the bathroom may be a critical area for the spread of infection from one person to the next. And clean personal habits are of vital preventive importance!

Unfortunately, too many homemakers have abandoned the tried-and-proven principle of regular disinfection in the home. Published laboratory reports show that neither suds nor pine oils have the power to kill staph—that so-called "sanitizers" are not true germicides—they may not kill all disease germs they touch.

Lysol Brand Disinfectant has been proved to be an efficient germicide, killing disease germs, including staph, on contact. In laboratory tests, its anti-germ action was found to last 7 full days. That's why Lysol is so important for weekly bathroom cleaning. A few drops in your cleaning solution will disinfect from one cleaning to the next as nothing else can!

Here are 3 basic steps for weekly bathroom cleaning: 1. Use Lysol in cleaning solution as directed. 2. Wipe floors, walls, bowls, fixtures with this solution. 3. When laundering bath mats and lid covers, soak in Lysol solution before adding detergent. Note: If anyone in your family has a boil (a direct source of staph contamination), disinfect bathtub, basin, bowl, seat with Lysol after every use. Now in pine scent as well as regular, a bottle costs as little as 29¢.

"IT POURS LIKE A PITCHER"

Egon stood clearly revealed. With what consummate cruelty on this sunny morning had he laid before this chair-bound girl his signed intent to commit murder.

Paige knew now that time was a frantic, precious thing.

The day passed, and with difficulty Miles curbed his impatience. He purposely delayed going upstairs until after nine and both Paige and Egon were at the table when he arrived. He felt at once some difference in Paige. Though poised, she was tense and her smile seemed forced

He rose from the table when it became evident that he could remain no longer without arousing suspicion in Egon. As he said good night and turned to go, he again caught Paige's glance and he knew he glimpsed fear.

Stealthily Miles crossed the lower terrace to the doorway of Paige's room. He turned the bronze handle of the door and swung it inward.

Waiting within the room, at last he heard Paige's heels clicking down the stairs and coming along the gallery. Vengador's nervous panting told Miles that Egon accompanied her. The handle turned and the door opened.

Paige said gravely, "Good night, Egon."

Miles detected the barely leashed excitement in the man's voice. "Each time it grows harder to let you go like this. Each night I ——"

Paige said, "I am very tired, Egon. So again—good night." She opened the door wider and came inside, closing it and carefully slipping the bolt; then stood, listening.

Outside the soft footsteps melted away. Very evenly Miles spoke from the shadows by the door. "I'm here. Don't be startled."

He heard her gasp, but she did not move.

"Put on the lamp as you usually do. Do nothing differently. Don't try to talk now."

She did as he had bidden and he knew she understood. Egon might come back.

Paige went into the dressing room and returned wearing pajamas and a housecoat. She had removed her make-up and her face had the clean sweetness of a child's. "I'm following routine," she whispered, and turned out the lamp. "Miles, was it safe to come?"

"I had to," he said. He took her hands. "You'd better tell me all you know. She is his wife?"

"Yes, but there's more than that. Oh, it's all so terrible, so merciless."

"Tell me."

She recounted in a low voice what Cora had told her, and how she had found her papers in the casita. "I knew then, Miles ——"

He interrupted. "But he doesn't know you've found them, Paige. Look, ask him to drive you in to Cuernavaca. Once there—well, he can't follow you into the ladies' room. Get to a telephone and call the American Embassy in the city ——" He stopped, sensing her unresponsiveness. "What is it? Is there something you haven't told me?"

She said slowly, "Miles, Cora is his wife. And he has decided to marry me."

"You don't mean he'd ——"

"Yes. Miles, he has learned to forge her signature so perfectly that it could have fooled even her. As long as that endorsement is on her checks, the money will keep coming. Now he can make that endorsement himself. Now she is in the way—because of me."

"He must be insane!"

"I think he is. Cora thinks so."

"You saw this signature?"

"I saw it." She told him about the book Egon had returned to Cora. "Miles, she knows what it means. If I get away and he becomes suspicious, no matter what happens later, it will be too late for Cora. He will never let her live to testify against him." Paige's voice shook. "We've got to get out of here together, the three of us."

"Yes, but how?"

"Have you a gun—anything?"

"Nothing. He has. Also, there is the dog."

"Miles, why are you here? What hold has

"You write his books. Why?"

"Who told you that? Not Steiger."

"Cora guessed it, and Egon was too angry to deny it. Miles, why do you stay here?"

He said, "At first it was a job, and I needed a job." He paused for a moment, then continued, "I never thought I'd want to tell this to anyone—but I think you've a right to know. My wife was killed, Paige, in a car accident that was all my fault. I couldn't forget it, so I tried to run away from it."

"Oh, Miles, I'm sorry. I didn't know."

"Steiger was fit to be tied the first time I rewrote some of his heavy lines," Miles went on. "And then, pretty soon, I was doing all of it. That first book sold well. No one was more surprised than I. And then the old urge came back; I had wanted to write for myself and had failed, before Margot died. Now I wanted to try again. When I first told him, he ordered me to get out. Then he changed—just as suddenly—and said he owed me something and was going to give me a chance to prove myself. Eight weeks as his guest. I hadn't expected kindness like that. I'll never know what impulse moved him."

TOADY

Europeans regarded the common toad with superstitious awe until the dawn of the scientific age. Shakespeare made several references to the common belief that the ugly amphibian was poisonous. Peasants wouldn't so much as touch one. Medieval traveling medicine men were not slow to take advantage of the situation. In order to demonstrate to a crowd the effectiveness of his wares, a quack would have his assistant swallow a toad (or pretend to do so). When the fellow began writhing in agony from the "poison," his master would "cure" him with a dose of his medicine. This device was so common that it became customary to speak of any meek assistant as a toad-eater. In time, the expression came to be used of persons willing to curry favor by doing unpleasant things. Shortened to toady, the term has survived the actual toad-eater by several centuries. WEBB B. GARRISON

"What happened?"

"Nothing. I got tied up in knots again. My head felt as if it were held in a vise. The harder I tried, the worse things got. I became sick from the strain." He paused. He tried to keep the disappointment out of his voice. "Well—I stayed on. I ghost-wrote the second book."

"But that is writing."

"It doesn't seem to matter when it isn't for myself. But that eight weeks on my own —— I suppose I kept remembering the other failures, and how I'd lost everything I valued."

"He said a strange thing about you: 'I permit him to find the self he thinks he has lost.'"

"None of it makes sense."

"I think it did to him. Maybe he couldn't bear to admit that there was one person here on whom he depended, one person about whom he did not know everything. . . . Miles! There is something I haven't told you; when I said that it reminded me of it. Cora can walk!"

"Walk!"

"Yes, walk. The night we came home in the rain I went into her room—and caught her. She's been walking in the night, trying to get strong enough to get away."

"No one knows?"

"No one but me. Miles, if you could get out of here ——"

"I won't leave you here. Not for an hour. It'll have to be the three of us. Look, how well can she walk?"

"Only slowly. Oh, Miles, she's been so alone, so despairing. And now —— She knows what he means to do. If she just—well, got weaker and weaker . . . who'd suspect anything? Miles, there is an old book in the casita, in German, about poisons."

"Poisons?" He said it again slowly, "Poisons! I hadn't thought of that." Then he hastened to reassure her. "We mustn't panic. Right now we must wait." He stood up. "I'd better go. In another few minutes Ramón will be coming this way. I want to be in the cabana."

Paige went with Miles to the door. He told her, "Bolt the door behind me. Don't open it to anyone."

"Be careful, Miles. Be very careful."

"Don't worry." He wanted to take her in his arms, comfort her, reassure her. More: love her. Instead he went out.

He kept close to the flank of the house until he reached the place where he must cross the lawn. Beyond was his door, and safety.

The voice spoke quietly. "Well . . . señor. Good evening." Ramón moved from the place where he had concealed himself.

Miles felt as if a tightening hand had squeezed the blood from his heart. Ramón had caught his master's secretary coming from the room of the señorita in whom that master had an undisguised interest. He was no fool. The information had great value.

Miles permitted himself the ghost of a smile. He shrugged. "Of all men in this place," he said in Spanish, "you will most surely understand. Am I not a man? Am I not aware of beauty when it is before me?"

"You put it well, señor; since I, too, am a man with eyes in his head."

"I prefer they be eyes that look east, not west," Miles said. "I have American dollars to back my preference."

"One hundred dollars?"

"It is more than I have." Miles saw the acquisitive glitter in Ramón's eyes; he bluffed. "Perhaps the señor will be interested in the price you put on your loyalty."

Ramón's face grew darkly ugly in the moonlight. Then harshly he said, "We do not talk more of the matter—now. Give me what you have."

"I'll get it," Miles said and walked past him into the cabana, got the money and came out.

Ramón's dirty fingers closed over the bills. "Gracias, señor," he said. The tone was an insult. Ramón moved on into the darkness.

It was several moments later that the full force of his mistake struck Miles. American money —— He had not purchased safety. Ramón, with those telltale American dollars in his possession, could ruin everything.

He stood looking in the direction Ramón had gone, calculating his chances. Double the sum in pesos—that might do it. But if it didn't, if he refused? Miles' mouth set in a grim line.

Paige listened at the door as Miles left. She felt inwardly excited. She had felt his impulse toward her, when he left, and would not have resisted had he taken her in his arms, yet she felt a deeper appreciation of him because he had not. Miles ——

She heard a voice and hurried to the window, tensing as two figures moved from the shadow of the banana plants by the cabana door into the moonlight.

Miles held out something which Ramón took. Paige stood clinging to the grille of the window. Miles had given Ramón money. Money for silence, because he had seen! But how could one buy silence from a thief like Ramón?

She did not know how long she had stood there when she heard the knock on the dressing-room door and Cora's voice calling her: "Paige ——" She ran to open it. "What is it? You should have been asleep hours ago."

"I was asleep. Then I had a dreadful dream. And now I can't stand to be alone in there."

Paige said quickly, "You mustn't be found in here!" As hurriedly as she dared she escorted Cora back, then sat down beside her.

Cora's eyes seemed clouded, far-looking. She said in an unhappy voice, "Paige . . . he came in here tonight. He said I wasn't eating enough, that I was getting thinner all the time. He had Gregoria bring me some milk." There was a pause. "You'll be angry with me ——"

"Of course I won't. What are you trying to tell me?"

"I accused him—about the book. I didn't mean to, but he stood there staring at me. I hate the way he stares."

"And then what?" Paige asked uneasily.

"He laughed at me. He told me I had written the name myself, that he had seen me do it." She started to sit up in bed.

"Cora," Paige said gently, "what's the matter with you tonight?"

Cora stared at her. "I felt so afraid, and my head aches so." She twisted uneasily. "It feels as if there's a tight band around it."

Patiently Paige soothed her. Cora closed her eyes. Her face looked pale and drawn in the lamplight. Paige watched for a little while longer, then went back to her own room. But not to rest; she was too worried. Yesterday there had been no doubt in Cora's mind. Why should she now be so confused?

Suddenly, from memory, came Miles' words as he described to Paige his barren attempt at writing: "My head felt as if it were held in a vise." So—he had given Miles a drug to dull and cripple that creative upsurge; then, later, let it have outlet in the refashioning of his own ideas. It was monstrous.

Now, Cora. The milk! Of course, the milk. Bringing nightmares, confusion. Was this the beginning of the plan Egon meant to execute?

In the morning, Miles was waiting on the terrace. "Hello," he said, but he did not smile and his face was dark and set.

She told him, low-voiced, "I talked with Cora last night. I found out something."

Egon walked toward them quickly, the dog trotting to keep up with him. Uneasily she saw that Egon was wearing the dark glasses. The drug again, Paige thought.

"What a beautiful morning," he said to Paige as they sat down to breakfast.

"Yes, it is," she said, putting down her spoon. "If ——"

The sound of running footsteps interrupted; Julio, in dirty white shirt, face sweat-streaked from his running, burst in. "Señor! . . . Señor!" No other words would come. He stood with heaving chest.

Slowly Egon rose to his feet. Julio made an ineffectual gesture with his battered straw hat. His voice was a hoarse whisper.

"What is it? What's happened?"

Julio crossed himself. "It is Ramón, señor. Out there. Ramón—he is dead!"

Paige sat stunned, but across the table Miles had risen to his feet, his napkin slowly crumpling in his hand. Egon broke the spell as he kicked back his heavy chair. "Come with me," he said to Miles, and Miles followed him without a glance toward Paige.

The possibility that crouched in Paige's mind was frightening. Had Miles . . . followed Ramón? Had he given him the money to dissuade him from exposing them, with no intention of letting him keep it as evidence?

Luis touched her arm gently, with respect. "Señorita, if you will drink the coffee. There is strength in its blackness."

"No, thank you, Luis. I . . . couldn't." She saw Luis' head turn and then Gregoria came through the doorway, walking slowly, as if she forced each step. "No!" she whispered. "No! It is not true that—that Ramón ——"

She read the answer in Paige's face. Again she whispered, "Not Ramón? No!" Then she screamed, "No! It is not so; it is not so! No—no!" She turned and ran from the room.

Paige looked at Luis. He said, "Ramón is a primo—a cousin. They come from the same village. Much they quarrel, but now —— Gregoria will know grief."

Paige found Cora already dressed and in her chair. "What's happening?" she asked uneasily. "Gregoria ran out of here —— Paige, what is it? You're so pale!"

Paige took Cora's hands. "Try not to get upset. Something has happened to Ramón."

"He's dead!"

Paige nodded. "Yes, he's dead."

Cora's hands tightened on Paige's. "Who?"

"Nobody knows," Paige said.

She wheeled Cora out by the swimming pool, then stared as if fascinated at the spot where she had witnessed last night's disturbing pantomime. The money . . . where was the money? If Egon should find it ——

Cora dozed in her chair. Her skin had a grayish tinge. Uneasily Paige waited and at last Egon and Miles came across the grass to where she sat. Miles, without a glance in Paige's direction, went on to the cabana. Egon drew up a chair and sat down.

She waited for him to speak, hating the dark glasses behind which he hid, exposing her to a scrutiny she could not parry. He looked at the drowsing Cora.

"How is she this morning?" Paige had never heard him use quite that tone.

"She seems very tired. I wonder why."

The dark glasses were turned toward Cora now. "My poor, poor girl," he said. "How frail she is. The doctor in Cuernavaca suggested extra milk before bedtime." The glasses turned. "You and Gregoria must see that she takes it, no matter how indifferent she is."

She nodded; she could not answer. At last she said, "The police will be coming?"

His head turned toward her. His voice was very quiet. "The police, Paige; why the police?"

It caught her completely off guard. "Why, I thought—I thought that Ramón ——"

The black lenses seemed fixed on her. Egon smiled. "My dearest, you have been upset! I am so sorry. But—when the time comes, a man goes; it is as simple as that."

"You mean a heart attack?"

He nodded. "He lay as he had fallen. His gun was not fired."

She felt her heart beating faster. If it were true, then the money would have been in Ramón's shirt when he died. Had Egon found it? She tried to sound professional. "Well, there'll be an autopsy, won't there?"

"Why hand poor Ramón's body over to the police? He lived in fear of them."

"But how can you hide something like that? There'll be a funeral."

"There will be. He will be buried here at Loma de Sombra, with nothing to mark the place. He loved it here. And he had forsaken religion, poor fellow; he wanted no priest."

Just then Paige saw Gregoria running across the grass. Egon moved forward a step to meet the woman, whose face was streaked with sweat and tears, her hair disheveled, her skirt torn and dirt-stained.

"No, no, no! Por Dios, no!" She flung herself upon Egon, emanating grief and horror. "You cannot let them do it," she cried in anguish. "You cannot! They are burying Ramón, my cousin; the son of my mother's dead sister. Burying him in the ground as if he were a dog. You must come and stop them. He cannot lie in unconsecrated ground."

Egon said sharply, "It is his wish. Do you understand that? His wish. We—we had spoken of it." As she stood momentarily shocked into silence he hurled his words at her. "Do you think a priest would hold his tongue? You would have the police here, would you? You'll live to regret it, if you disobey me. I ——" Suddenly aware of Paige's presence, he checked himself. "There are others to think of, others who depend on me to protect them. You'd destroy them for one to whom it no longer matters. Your cousin laughed at the church, called it a trap for fools. Do you think he changed?"

"He had no time. He fell so quickly there among the stones. There is that place on his poor head —— I beg of you ——" She flung herself down and would have clasped him around the knees.

Paige felt her heart side-slip at what Gregoria had unwittingly revealed. Ramón had died from a blow. And Egon was determined to hide the fact. Did that mean he himself had seen Ramón take that bribe, and killed him for his treachery?

The blood rushed darkly into Egon's face at Gregoria's words. "Get up!" It was a terrible tone of command.

As she stared up into his relentless face all the fury seemed to go out of her. She swayed to her feet, her mouth going slack.

Paige looked up to see Luis approaching. "Señor," he said quickly, "Julio and Martino ——" He gestured helplessly. "Gregoria swore there would be curse ——"

"I gave them their orders!"

"Martino is afraid, señor. He has hidden himself. Julio asks if the señor will come ——"

From his very stance Paige knew the anger Egon's dark glasses concealed.

"All right," he said abruptly. He turned and hurried toward the house.

Gregoria seemed unaware of Paige on one side, Luis on the other, as they half carried her to her room.

Outside on the gallery, Luis looked into Paige's troubled face and glanced around quickly before he spoke. "This is an evil place; you must not stay."

She stared at him, uncertain of what he might know.

"In all things you have been kind to me, señorita. I would repay a little. If you will, trust me. Tonight you must leave here."

"Tonight!"

He nodded. "Tonight the place will be unguarded. The dogs will not go with Julio. Fear grows in darkness. Tonight the señor will lock his door while he sleeps; for he, too, will be afraid."

Miles! she thought.

As if he read the name in her mind, Luis said, "The Señor Hilliard understands there must be haste." He looked toward the cabana. "Go to the señor now."

Paige's heart pounded as she ran across the lawn to the cabana. Miles opened the door. She saw the quick light come into his face. "Luis says he has talked to you."

He nodded. "That's right. He wants to help us," he told her. "He thinks we can get out of here tonight."

Still he had told her nothing—about the other. And she had to know. He saw the searching in her gaze. "What is it, Paige?"

"Miles"—she found it hard to phrase—"Miles, I saw what happened last night. I saw . . . Ramón. You gave him money?"

He looked down at her gravely. "Yes, I gave him money. I gave him all the American money I had. Then, after he was gone, I realized it was a crazy thing to have done, if he went to Steiger. I had to get it back."

"You went after him?"

He nodded. "I was going to offer him double the sum in pesos."

Her lips felt stiff. "And he . . . wouldn't?"

"I found him dead." Looking into her face, he stopped short. "Paige! You didn't think that I ——"

She felt tears of relief stinging her eyes. "Oh, Miles, I've been so afraid. If you had—it would have been because of me, and I ——"

She was in his arms and they were strong and comforting around her. They clung to each other wordlessly, knowing security in their closeness. He kissed her then, and she felt a heart-shaking upsurge of response. He held her as if he could not let her go.

They drew apart at last. She felt lightheaded with happiness and relief. Her gray eyes clung to his. "Oh, Miles, how could I have thought —— You got . . . the money from him?"

Just for an instant he hesitated. She put her fingers across his lips and shook her head. "Darling, you'll have to tell me all of it."

"I hoped I wouldn't have to." He reached into his pocket and drew out some folded bills. "Luis brought me these—just before daylight."

"Luis!" She gasped the name. "Oh, Miles, no! Not Luis?"

"He knew your danger—because he knows Steiger as few men can."

"I can't bear to think of it. Luis ——"

"He's your slave, Paige; he worships you. He watched last night; he saw what happened. To him it added up to one thing—danger for you. He followed Ramón ——"

With an effort she pulled herself together. "I don't want to think about it. Luis has suffered so much. Miles, can we go tonight?"

"I think it's our chance. Egon will sleep here in the house tonight. That means the station wagon will be parked in the driveway."

"But the sports car—and the jeep?"

"Luis will fix them so they won't start."

"Egon would kill him!"

"We're taking Luis with us, Paige. We owe him a chance. Once away from here, he'll find a place to hide."

"Oh, Miles, you make it seem almost simple. When will we go?"

"About three in the morning. I'll come to your room. We'll help Cora."

"Miles, I think Egon has already given Cora something. She was confused and depressed last night; and dull and sleepy this morning. I know Gregoria brought her milk at bedtime. She said her head felt . . . as if it was in a vise."

They stared at each other. "I know what you're thinking, Miles. It's the same way you felt. Remember?"

"I've been thinking about it ever since you mentioned that book on poisons." Suddenly his eyes blazed. "I ought to kill him for what he's done to me."

She put her hands on his arms. "No, Miles."

He held her close again. Then he released her. "Go back now," he told her gently. "I love you. Keep knowing it."

Several times during the day Paige went to knock softly on Gregoria's door, but there was no response and she went away again. But as the afternoon waned she grew concerned, tried the door, then slowly opened it. Gregoria was kneeling, her rosary in her hands, her lips moving silently.

Paige went to her. "Gregoria," she said gently, and was shocked by the despair and grief on the face that turned toward her. "Gregoria, if you went to the village priest ——"

The dull eyes lifted. "I have no money for Masses, señorita."

Inside Paige's bra were the bills she had recovered from Steiger: a ten, two fives, three ones. She took the money out. "Here. This is for you."

Gregoria's hand moved toward it, then drew back shaking. "I cannot take it, señorita."

Paige pressed the money into the unsteady hand. Gregoria stared at it, then slowly drew it toward her breast. "I will pray the Holy Mother to bless and protect you," she said in a low, intense voice.

It took Paige a moment or two to steady herself when she was once in her room after supper that evening. Soon, she thought. Only hours, now. Then we will be safely away.

Since Gregoria had not left her room, no one had brought Cora the milk that Egon was now insisting on, and Paige had a feeling that he would come himself. She went into the darkened bathroom to wait; soon the light in Cora's room came on and then Egon spoke. "I hoped you wouldn't be asleep yet, my dear. I have brought your milk."

THE TOWN RAIN

By MEMORY McGONIGAL

How does the soft fine town rain know
So much about my seasons?
On a sunny day I am to-and-fro,
On a sunny day I am friend-and-foe,
On a sunny day I can let love go
For a hundred good unreasons.

How can the town rain tell such things
As it falls from the sky above you?
When the fine rain falls I am
harp-with-strings,
When the fine rain falls, I am
vine-that-clings,
When the fine rain falls I am
bird-that-sings:
My love, my love, I love you!

"Thank you. Please put it there."

"You must drink it, you know."

"Oh, I will, but I like to sip it.

"Well, I'll come back later to be sure you didn't fall asleep without drinking it."

Looking from her own room a few moments later, Paige glimpsed him as he paced the terrace. She hurried back to Cora. The girl was sitting on the edge of the bed with the glass in her hand. The eyes of the two met.

"It's got something in it, hasn't it?"

Paige nodded. "I think so. Here, I'll take it away." She acted quickly, helped Cora back into bed and covered her. "When he comes back, act sleepy. I left just a little in the glass, as if you couldn't quite finish it."

Egon returned in a little while and left, carrying the empty glass. Then the light on the terrace was snapped out and the house seemed very still.

Paige waited another careful hour before she went again to Cora's room. She whispered, "Don't turn on the lamp." She took Cora's hands in hers. "Now I can tell you," she said. "We are leaving here—tonight."

She felt the spasmodic jerk of the hands she held, heard the indrawn breath. "Tonight!"

"Everything is arranged. Luis and Miles will be with us. Just two more hours ——"

Gregoria lay huddled beneath the blanket. For hours she had knelt in prayer for Ramón, until, chilled and aching, she had finally crept back to bed.

Beneath the pillow was the tangible proof of the Señorita MacRae's generosity. Gregoria's fingers tightened on the money. She knew the way to the village. Three kilometers it was—no more.

At last the great house settled into stillness. She got up, wrapped her head and shoulders in a dark rebozo, put her rosary in her skirt pocket. In her left hand she clutched the money. Very cautiously she opened the door and slipped out.

Vengador was uncomfortable. He disliked this massively furnished room and the closeness of the drawn draperies. In the casita the breeze was always cool. Restless, he trotted to the window and nosed aside the heavy drapery, sniffing deeply as he drew the night air into his lungs. Then his forward-pricked ears caught a new sound, the sound of footsteps, then the scrape of metal and the ghostly whispering of a hinge.

Vengador growled, a deeply menacing sound. The growl awakened Egon Steiger. "What is it?" At his voice the dog whirled from the window and rushed to the bed, quivering with his need to convey his warning.

Steiger shrugged into a robe, thrust his feet into slippers. From the table by the bed he took a heavy snub-nosed gun. Then he crossed to the door and opened it. At a low fierce word Vengador came to heel.

Gun in hand, the dog flanking him, he hurried outside. Reaching the gate, he saw it had been opened, readied for re-entry. In the damp earth a mark was discernible. He knelt and struck a match. The imprints were quite clear; those of a shoe. A woman's.

Steiger cursed, a short and ugly word, and, turning, ran to the station wagon. He jumped in, followed by the dog. The motor roared into life; the car gathered speed as it headed for the open gate.

The bedside-table clock said 2:58. Paige went to the door, opened it cautiously and listened. Loma de Sombra lay hushed and still.

A step outside, and Miles came, slipping in quickly, closing the door behind him.

His hands caught hers in a hard, reassuring grip. "It's exactly three," he told her. "Are you ready?"

"I'm taking only my papers."

"Good. Let's get Cora."

"I'm here," she said from the connecting doorway. "I'm ashamed I'm shaking so. I—I can't seem to help it."

"It's all right," Miles said gently. "I'll carry you. We're going around the far side of the house; no one will hear us. Luis is somewhere near the car." He took a step toward her.

He stopped short as the night's silence exploded in the violent roar of a motor and the sound of a car racing up the driveway.

"What is it?" Paige whispered.

They heard running steps and Luis burst into the room, panting. "I was waiting, señor, as agreed. Then suddenly he came out—with a gun—and went to the gate. He lit a match, held it low. Then he came running back to the car. The dog must have heard something——" Suddenly his mouth rounded. "Gregoria!"

The woman's room was empty. Paige stood aghast at what she had done. "I—I gave her what money I had. Money for Masses."

"The dog must have heard her." Miles said, "and roused Steiger. Luis—the other cars?" But looking into the little man's face, he knew.

"I wanted to make sure he could not follow," Luis said in a stricken voice.

"He may not find Gregoria," Paige said.

"He will find her" Luis said simply.

"Oh, Miles," Paige said, "if he finds that money he'll know —— And she'll tell him I gave it to her. Two fives, a ten, three ones . . . Miles!"—hope leaped in her voice. "If he found my papers still in the casita, he'd think Gregoria stole the money—no matter what she said. It would give us another chance."

"You're right," Miles said quickly. "Give me the papers; I'll take them back."

She shook her head. "I couldn't tell you where I found them. I'll recognize the drawer, but I can't tell you. I've got to do it, Miles."

"I won't let you go up there."

"There's no other way, don't you see?" She turned quickly toward the door.

Paige was three quarters of the way up the winding road that led to the casita. Her heart pounded, but she pushed on. Everything depended on Egon's finding the papers far back in that certain drawer.

At first she thought she heard only the roaring in her own ears. Then she knew. Beyond the gate a car was coming. Egon! He would stop at the house and Miles would come to question and delay him as they had planned. But the car did not stop; it passed the house and was coming toward the ridge.

There was no hope of outrunning it. She flung herself behind a thick shrub as the car rushed past.

Leaving the motor running as he braked to a stop, Egon rushed into the casita, snapping on a light. His jerk pulled the drawer from the desk, spilling its contents. He pawed through them. What he sought was missing.

He ran back to the car. Vengador had not followed him into the casita, but was nervously questing the air with his nose. He was reluctant to get into the seat, but Egon cursed him into obedience and, wheeling the car, went back the way he had come.

By the furious haste of the car's descent Miles knew that Paige had not reached the casita in time, but he was sure, also, that she had eluded Egon. There was no longer any safety in the big house.

Miles turned to see Cora standing in her doorway.

"He's coming!" she said weakly.

"Yes," Miles said. "I'll get you out of here."

He picked her up and hurried with her to the cabana. It had heavy inside shutters and a strong door. Egon might not search here. Finding no one in the house, he might go raging out along the road to Cuernavaca.

Miles put Cora down. "Lock the door behind me," he told her. "Open it only if you hear my voice or Paige's. I've got to get to Paige." He hurried out, then stopped and drew back behind the hedge. Egon was running down the gallery toward Paige's room.

He flung open the door to emptiness. Swiftly he went into Cora's room, tearing the covers from the bed, yanking open wardrobe doors.

He was already back on the terrace when he heard the car start. He rushed to the railing; the driver was too small to be anyone else but Luis. He fired three shots, but the car went on. He ran into the driveway and stood watching and listening. He heard the car turn into the casita road. He looked down at the quivering dog and remembered Vengador's actions minutes before on the ridge. So—they were there!

For a moment he stood very still. Then he laughed. He laid his hand on Vengador and crouched and pointed. "Go!" he said almost softly. "Go!" Then, as the dog sprang forward, he screamed, "Mata! Mata! Kill!"

The black dog was gone into the darkness. A wild cry burst from him as he ran, a hunting cry.

Frantically Paige tried to formulate some plan. She must get to Miles. As the car descended the hill she started down behind it; once at the bottom she could cut across through the little woods behind the pool ——

But her legs shook and she stumbled in the thick darkness, for the pines grew close. Then she heard the car again. Three shots rang out, but it kept coming. Only Egon had a gun. So it must be Miles coming for her.

A man's voice was shouting. She heard the words. Then she heard the dog. Turning back toward the casita, she began to run.

Vengador did not need a road. He diagonaled up Loma de Sombra, his savagery at last giving voice.

Luis heard and knew its meaning. The station wagon rocked and swayed. Then, ahead, the headlights caught Paige. Luis sounded the horn in quick staccato and applied the brakes. She was into the car before it fully stopped and they rushed on. She rolled up the window, but the tail gate was raised and it could be closed only from the outside.

Vengador was coming between the trees as they reached the small parking square. Luis almost dragged Paige from the car and into the casita, slamming the heavy door. They stared at each other, wordless. The dog's feet thudded against the wood as he hurled himself against it.

For a long moment it was still in the room, strangely still. Then one of the lower panes in the big window shattered, and Vengador was in the room. Confronting the two, he stopped short. Below the hill Egon Steiger was shouting. "Mata! Mata!" Slowly, gaze never leaving them, Vengador began to circle, great haunches gathered for his spring.

Paige heard the hissing intake of Luis' breath. Like a nightmare in slow motion was the step by backward step by which he forced her to the door, his body guarding hers.

"Go, señorita, go!" he whispered, never taking his eyes from the dog. One hand, backreaching, dragged open the door. She was out. It closed heavily. She stumbled toward the still-vibrating car. Behind her was a wild defiant cry; she never saw the terrible arc that brought man and dog together.

Coming around the corner of the house, Miles saw Egon firing after the car and knew that Luis must be driving. Sickly he realized the little man was betraying Paige's whereabouts. He saw the dog sent on command. Then Egon ran down the driveway, gun in hand, urging the animal on. Taking advantage of any cover, Miles followed him. Somehow he must reach him, get that gun. He could hear the car on the road; he could hear the dog. And he knew he stalked a madman.

Now the dog's wild cries ceased, as did the sound of the car. Egon stood still in the center of the road to listen. Foot by foot Miles drew closer—but not close enough; by many feet not close enough. Then clearly in the stillness came the sound of breaking glass. And Egon began to run again, screaming, "Mata!" . . . Paige. Miles felt sweat cold upon his face.

And then, again, the car. He could not know who drove it. But Egon stood, gun ready, as the headlights swung out of the casita road and turned toward the house. The car came on without lessening speed and at the last instant Egon jumped to safety. As it passed Miles, he saw Paige at the wheel. Egon turned and fired; the car lurched on a shattered tire and went off the driveway into the bushes.

"Paige! Paige!" Miles raced toward her as she climbed out. A shot winged past them as they ran for shelter.

"Cabana!" Miles said as they ran. The cabana door was not locked. Cora sat in the chair, staring at them with hopeless eyes.

Miles slammed in the bolt. One look at Paige and he drew her into his arms. "I tried to run him down," she sobbed. "I wanted to. Oh, Miles . . . Luis —— He was so afraid of Vengador." She buried her face against his shoulder. "He put me behind him; he forced me out the door. Miles, Miles—he never had a chance."

"I don't think he expected one, darling."

"What will we do now?"

"We'll think of something."

Cora said sadly, "But for me you two could nave got away. I know."

"We're going to get out of here," Paige said firmly. She added, to bolster her own courage, "There are three of us; he wouldn't dare ——" Only he would. Cora stared down at her hands.

And then they heard his voice, too quiet, too even. "So you are all here. What use in locking the door? I can wait. It's simple."

"Don't be a fool, Steiger," Miles said. "Get out while you have a chance. You're washed up, finished, through; you know it. And if Luis is dead—the charge is murder."

Egon laughed softly. "You don't fool me, Miles, while you sweat in there. There is only one door and I have a gun. It would be easy to make you come out; smoke is not pleasant for breathing." When no one answered he said, "I am sure you are thinking. Long thoughts, eh, Miles? And the others ——" He seemed to evade mention of those names.

"Say nothing," Miles whispered to Paige. "It will worry him. Because nothing has gone as he planned. He'll be thinking too."

But the waiting was dreadful, minute after long minute. Miles tried unsuccessfully to wrench a leg from the heavy chair, but its strong screws defied him. In that neat spare room was nothing for a weapon. Cautiously he opened one of the shutters and peered out. He closed it again. "He has the gun all right—and the dog is with him."

Paige did not answer. She knew that any faint hope she had had for Luis was gone.

Egon spoke now. "Hilliard, somehow you have guessed what is in my mind. Why should I stay here when I can always find a new world for myself?" The tone changed to one Paige knew well. "But you are coming with me, Paige. You know that." The voice grew softer. "In time you will forgive me that I brought you here in the only way I could. I meant you no harm—never any harm. But you must come with me; nothing can change that. Soon it will be light—and there is the plane."

Silently Paige and Miles looked at each other.

Egon spoke again, but the voice had hardened a little. "I have been very patient, Paige. But I cannot wait much longer."

"Miles," she said in a low voice, "if I should agree ——"

"No!"

"But if he could be off guard for just a moment. If he thought ——"

Miles went to the shutter again and looked out. "He is here at the point of the pool," he said as he turned back. "I've got to get him with a rush. In the water I'd have a chance—and an upper hand with the dog." Hearing her in-caught breath, he said, "Darling, don't you see? We can't wait until daylight, even if he will. There has to be the element of surprise. It's our only chance."

"Oh, no, Miles. No!"

"We can't wait, Paige. And I won't let you go."

They swung sharply at the sound of the door bolt. Cora stood there; they had not seen her get up from the chair. They could not see her face clearly, but there was purpose in the way she stood; she had risen above fear.

"Only I can surprise him," she said. "He does not know that I can walk. It's your chance, Miles." She opened the door and stepped out into the dimness.

Just beyond the hedge opening, by the pool, Egon waited. The dog, bruised from the battle in which he had not been victor without a price, rested on the grass. In the jacaranda tree a bird began to twitter softly.

"Egon!" Cora's voice, speaking so close, momentarily transfixed him. She came toward him slowly because she could walk no other way. Deadly pale in the indeterminate light, she might have been a ghost.

Involuntarily he took a backward step as she advanced. His eyes were fixed on her, unbelieving; he shook his head as if to clear his vision. The dog, recognizing her, did not move. Cora went steadily toward him.

Egon did not see Miles, screened by the banana plants, tensed for his rush. He only stared blankly at Cora—walking—and took another backward step—into emptiness.

As he fell, his twisting body struck the coping. The splash and his strangled cry brought the dog to its feet.

Cora gasped at the shock of it, and Miles rushed forward.

Ordinarily a fair swimmer, Egon was not swimming. He was making bumbling efforts to keep afloat. His face, an uncertain oval, went beneath the surface, then reappeared. He tried to cry out and choked as water filled his throat.

"He'll drown!" Paige cried as she ran to join Miles, and Miles started toward the pool. But Vengador drove him back. There was no voice to give him orders, but he had been taught to remain on guard while Egon swam; he had never been permitted in the water.

Again and again Miles tried to get close, yelling at the dog, ordering it back, unconscious humanity driving him to save a man who would have shown him no mercy. But head low, Vengador raced back and forth, barring the way.

They saw Egon make a terrible effort as if, recovering himself, he realized his peril. "Ven!" he cried weakly. "Ven." In Spanish it means "Come!" It was, too, the first syllable of that name in whose aptness he delighted: Vengador—Avenger.

And then there were only bubbles on the surface of the water. But Vengador still guarded. Though now he looked into the smooth-surfaced pool and seemed uncertain and confused.

Cora turned away and hid her face, and Paige put a steadying arm around her.

Then there came another sound, the brief wailing of a siren.

The young policeman who was driving the car came to a stop. "This is it," he said. "This is the home of the Señor Steiger."

His stout superior nodded. "Of course. Was it not I who recognized the description, even though the woman was so incoherent?"

"Should we go in this early?"

"The money in her hand—American money. And the name she spoke—Ramón. It must be he who beat her so badly. The señor will want to hear of this."

With importance the young man touched the siren and it wailed sharply. The older made a quick sign of annoyance. "Don't be a fool, Mario. No point in disturbing the señor—until we have enjoyed a good breakfast. Can you not see the gate is open? Then—drive in."

KITCHEN IN STEP WITH THE ARTHUR MURRAYS

Just off the kitchen is Kathryn's laundry, expertly organized to take care of linens. The washer-dryer is usually kept spinning—especially in summer, when swimmers need lots of towels.

favorite. To accent: a jewellike cluster of lights—blue, yellow and coral—that seem to float above the round teak dining table. In the center of the room a large domed skylight floods the kitchen with soft light—even on darkest days—and as evening approaches turns blue-mauve. "I saw these domes in industrial architecture," said Arthur, "and liked the effect."

Arthur grew up in a kitchen. "While my parents ran a bakery, I cooked for my brothers and sisters." Arthur still makes his own breakfast and often takes time to whip up soufflé pancakes. "It took me twenty-one days in Bermuda to perfect this recipe," he said. "What I wanted was something puffed and light—halfway between a pancake and an omelet."

"And these are," said Kathryn. "Try them with blueberries. Not in them; over them. Arthur never did like purple pancakes."

Characteristically Kathryn: a perfectly organized pantry. "I nailed up the board and put the hooks for hanging tools in myself," she said. The shelves on the other wall hold cans.

Arthur's Soufflé Pancakes

6 tablespoons buttermilk pancake mix
½ teaspoon salt
6 egg yolks, beaten until thick and lemon-colored
6 tablespoons commercial sour cream
6 egg whites, beaten until stiff but not dry

Place the dry pancake mix and salt into a mixing bowl; add beaten yolks and sour cream and mix just enough to blend. Now carefully fold in beaten whites. Drop from a tablespoon onto a lightly greased, hot griddle (a drop of water should sputter upon it). When bubbles begin to appear on the top of the pancake, turn and brown on the other side. Serve topped with butter, honey or maple syrup; or for a real change, heat two 10-ounce packages frozen unsweetened blueberries with 1½ cups sugar until sugar is dissolved. Serve as a sauce over the pancakes. Makes 6 servings.

Kathryn's cooking career began after several married years while she was living in Southern California. "I was inspired by those gorgeous fruits and vegetables. Also by Marlene Dietrich, who's a fabulous cook and lived in the next bungalow. For days I smelled the exotic things she was making and saw elegant pies cooling in her window. I decided then that if I couldn't be as glamorous, I would at least learn to cook."

Kathryn did, although she is the first to admit she's a weekend cook. "I love inviting a few couples in—particularly those with big appetites." At the Murrays', appetites are no problem—after several sets of tennis or a swim in the pool, most guests are hungry enough for seconds.

"When I first began to cook twenty-two years ago," said Kathryn, "I used to search cookbooks for something sophisticated enough to serve. Now I rely on recipes I've developed over the years, most of them easy to make. I don't keep records of who ate what, and when, because I'm never embarrassed to serve guests the same menu. I like to think my dishes are specialties of the house."

Among Kathryn's original recipes—copies of which she has mimeographed because so many guests ask for them—are a quick but cloud-light crab soufflé, strawberry pie whose cooky-dough crust all guests eat, and eggs baked in cream, "the results of an experiment one hungry Sunday morning and now a specialty at our house."

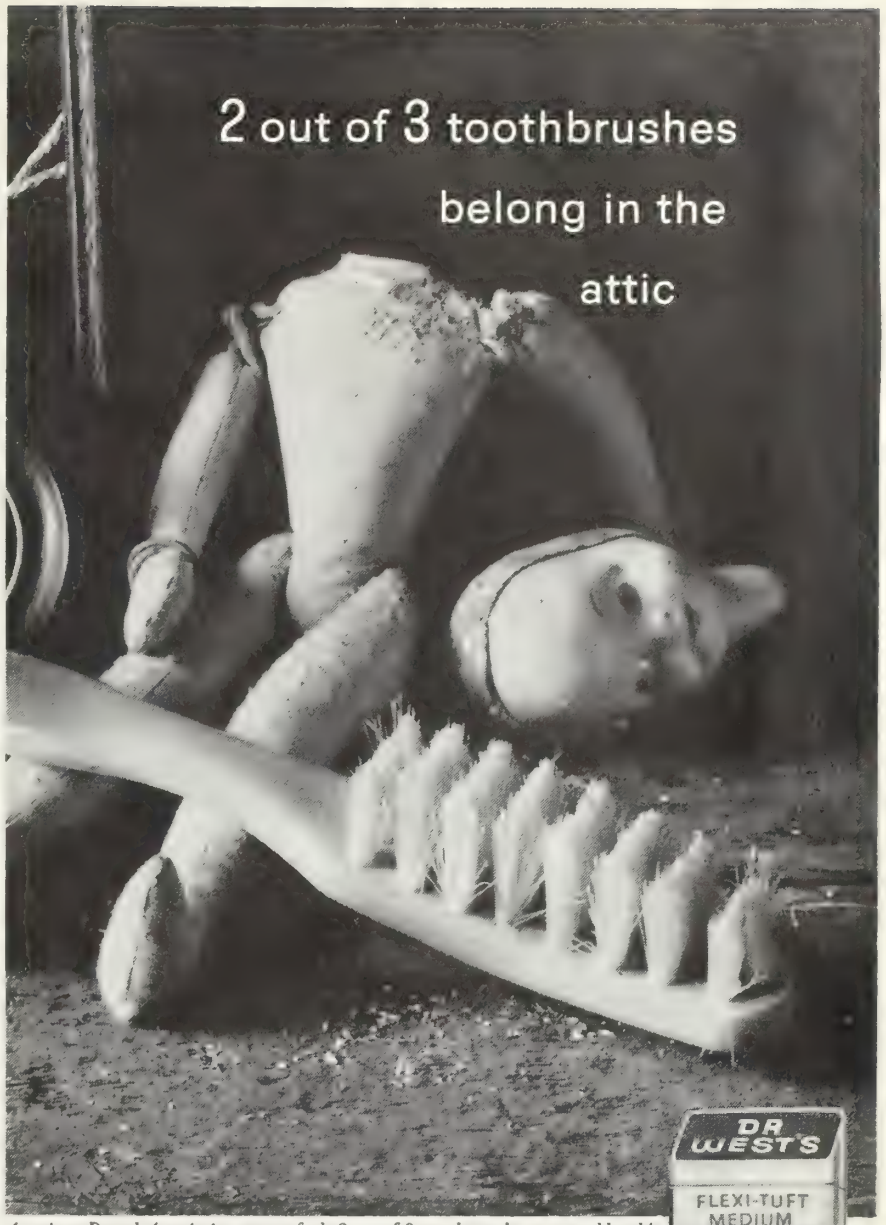
Eggs Baked in Cream

6 eggs
Butter
Salt and pepper
Powdered tarragon
Cinnamon
Heavy cream

Butter well six individual-size ramekins measuring 3½" in diameter and 1½" in depth. Break an egg into each; sprinkle with salt, pepper, tarragon and cinnamon—just a pinch of each will do. Now add enough heavy cream to each ramekin to just cover the egg (you'll need about 1½ cups in all). Place ramekins on a baking sheet and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 15 minutes—a little longer if you like harder eggs. Serve at once. Makes 6 servings.

Kathryn keeps her cooky jar full of crisp honey cookies for two grandsons next door. "I have to hide the jar if I want any cookies on hand, but those two—even when I rotate the hiding places—know just where to look."

Kathryn's Honey Cookies



½ cup butter
¼ cup sugar
¾ cup honey
1 egg beaten with ¼ teaspoon salt
Grated rind of 1 orange
1 teaspoon vanilla
1 cup chopped nuts
Sift together twice:
2 cups cake flour
1½ teaspoons baking powder
¼ teaspoon baking soda
4 teaspoons dry instant coffee

Cream butter and sugar well. Mix in the honey. Now add egg and blend. Mix in dry sifted ingredients quickly but thoroughly. Last, fold in orange rind, vanilla and nuts. Drop batter from half teaspoon onto greased and floured baking sheets, making sure not to place the cookies too close together—they spread. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 12–14 minutes or until cookies are golden brown. Cool on wire racks. Makes about 60 cookies.

Kathryn does most of the cooking in the kitchen by the shore. "Even for big dinners," said Arthur, "she does the important part; all the help does is pull something from the oven."

"Cooking to me isn't work," said Kathryn. "In a kitchen like this?"

And it's true, the Murrays do seem to waltz through their work. But then they planned a kitchen where they could. END

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

"The other husbands in our neighborhood catch up with family fun and family chores on weekends. On Saturday and Sunday, Tod rises at the crack of dawn and hustles off to play golf. The girls and I don't see him again until after dark. There was a community circus the second Saturday in October and I begged him to take us. He said he'd signed up for a tournament. I'm quite certain that the tournament, like all his other weekend golf games, wound up forty miles from us in my in-laws' apartment.

"In addition to the visits made behind my back, Tod telephones his mother every day. It's a toll call and I'm sure the monthly expense must be terrific. Tod does his telephoning at the laboratory where he is employed as a physicist; I learned about it by sheer accident. One morning his car wouldn't start and he had to wait for a mechanic. His mother, upset when she didn't hear from him on the dot of ten o'clock, telephoned the laboratory and then telephoned our home to find out what was wrong. I asked a few questions myself and she spilled the beans about the morning-phone-call ritual. Since Tod talks to his mother from the laboratory, not from his home, it seems pretty obvious he talks to her about his business activities. He brushes off any inquiry of mine about his work.

"Tod takes no pride in our home, which is as handsome as any in our block but is the poorest kept. I had to nag for months before he planted grass and shrubs. Now he is too darned lazy to mow the lawn or prune the shrubs unless I raise a rumpus.

"Our house needs paint both on the outside and the inside. Last month I pleaded with Tod to paint Cathy's bedroom, but he just shrugged. When I argued he finally got mad and sarcastically suggested that I hire a professional. I knew he wasn't serious. Both of us are too sensible to waste money paying sky-high wages. We do agree practically always on the way we spend and budget.

"I started to paint Cathy's bedroom myself. To my surprise, Tod suddenly took over and finished the job for me. Two evenings later I learned the answer to his unusual burst of energy when he walked into the house with his mother and her luggage. I'd had no announcement whatever of a possible visit. At first I was dumfounded. Then I understood. Recently my mother-in-law has been suffering from what her doctor calls mental depression—she also has chronic arthritis—and it had been decided by her sons that she should enter a rest home for a course of treatment and physiotherapy. As soon as I saw her surrounded by all that luggage, I realized that Tod must have vetoed the rest home. It seemed clear his mother intended to stay in Cathy's freshly decorated room on a semi-permanent basis, while Cathy doubled up with the twins, and I undertook the nursing.

"I was so appalled that I simply couldn't hide my feelings. I guess I wasn't very polite. Tod was furious. His mother didn't mind a scrap. She went to bed in Cathy's room and spent most of the weekend there while Tod fetched and carried for her; I tried to make amends with appetizing trays. She scarcely touched the good food I prepared. On Sunday Tod skipped his golf so he could cook and serve her breakfast—he has never served a meal to me in his life—and she was delighted to let him coax her into eating. On Monday morning he drove her back to Ed's apartment—Ed is his bachelor brother—and a practical nurse was hired to look after her. Tod and I have scarcely spoken since she left.

"Maybe if my mother-in-law were physically ill, I could be more sympathetic. It seems to me she is just letting herself go. Her own doctor says she needs activity, but she rejects it. I personally signed her up for two civic clubs, but she won't attend the meetings. She prefers to brood and feel sorry for herself and have her sons dancing in attendance.

"It's true I've never liked my mother-in-law. I can't forget that she and Tod's father, who was living then, tried to block our marriage. In those days his family occupied an apartment back in Chicago in the building next door to my family. Our two sets of parents were different in every conceivable way. Our apartment boiled with activity and life, theirs was a tomb. I never saw Tod's father and mother kiss each other. To this day my father grabs and hugs mother if they're separated five minutes. Tod's parents had no friends and kept strictly to themselves; mine had a finger in every worth-while enterprise in the community. It was a lucky thing for me they were leading lights in the P.T.A.

"My brothers made no trouble at school, but I was a tomboy and show-off and made plenty. Scholastically I got by, but my conduct was a caution. Regularly on report-card day my mother or father, usually father, went to the school and told the teacher if I were assigned extra tasks and responsibility I might stop whispering and cutting up in class. Finally, in the fifth grade, I was made a monitor, put in charge of the smaller children, and of course I burst with pride. For the only time my conduct mark was perfect.

"I've always thought Tod's parents considered me too dumb for their brilliant son. When we first became interested in each other I was out of high school and working at an ordinary stenographic job—I refused my dad's offer of college—and he was just out of the Army and winning honors as a student at the University of Chicago. In the three years we were engaged, his mother didn't ever invite me to come next door for a meal. Tod ate with my family four or five times a week. When he finally graduated and received a degree in physics, his parents wanted us to postpone our marriage still longer. They hoped we would break up, I know. My parents were unselfishly anxious for us to go ahead, and we did so.

"On our wedding day Tod moved into my family's apartment and we began our married life in my girlhood bedroom. Although board and room cost us nothing, I'll admit the arrangement wasn't ideal. Every morning I went to my office and presumably Tod went job hunting. Actually, as dad discovered from the neighborhood gravevine, Tod was spending a lot of time next door crying on his mother's shoulder about the lack of opportunity in Chicago for a graduate physicist. On his own dad dug up two jobs which weren't exactly in the field of physics but which Tod could have filled. Despite the fact that he was in no position to be choosy, Tod turned down the jobs without a thank-you. His mother cheered his stubbornness.

"By the middle of September—we were married in June—everybody on the block was talking about the working wife with the non-working husband, and I was frantic. Both Tod's brothers had already left Chicago for the West, and Ed wrote suggesting Tod might have better luck in California. I jumped at the chance, quit my job and Tod and I took a bus across the country. My parents approved. His parents were desolated.

"Tod found work as a salesman—physicists who lacked experience were then in surplus supply even in California—and I found work with an insurance firm. We rented an apartment in Ed's building and for the first time in our marriage began to live like other couples. We had six weeks—six weeks!—to ourselves. Then Tod's parents pulled up stakes, flew to California and moved in with Ed. Two thousand miles of distance couldn't defeat my mother-in-law.

"Ed's apartment was on the ground floor, so every evening Tod made his first stop there, while I cooled my heels upstairs. My in-laws always heard his news before I did. Often I didn't hear his news at all. I could guess from the nose dive in his commissions that he was spending less and less time calling on his customers and more time with his mother.

"My mother-in-law manages to be a hundred per cent clinging vine, and also a subtle meddler and manipulator. In the guise of agreeing with Tod, she maneuvers him. She listened patiently to all his complaints about the boredom of selling. She then encouraged him to resign and take another job at a deep cut in salary, simply because in the poorly paid job he could assist some professors on an important Government project.

"Prestige doesn't put money in the bank. At that time Tod and I were adding to our savings every week so we could buy a house and start our family. I was left in the dark about his job plans, which concerned me, too, until after he made the change. The deliberate slight hurt me more than the loss of the income. We had a terrible quarrel, and I asked why he didn't go back to his mother if he was so daft about her advice. He packed his clothes and moved downstairs. That nearly broke my heart.

"However, I loved him too much to lose him without a struggle. I fought hard to win him back. We were separated six months, but then we started living together again. I made most of the concessions. My in-laws did everything in their power to prevent the reconciliation, which is something else I haven't forgotten. Eventually I prevailed on Tod to move to a different apartment building. The move helped very little. He continued to show his preference for his mother.

"When Cathy was born I gave up regular work—I worked part time last Christmas—and I thought my disappointments as a wife would end. I confidently expected a brand-new deal in marriage. Most normal men are thrilled by a first baby. Tod was unimpressed with our first child, just as he was unimpressed by our twins later on. My mother, who came on from Chicago to be with me, was shocked by his indifference as a father and also by his mother's indifference. My mother-in-law has never shown the least enthusiasm for any of my children. Even when she was in better health she didn't ever offer to act as a sitter.

"It might seem to an outsider that Tod and I have everything that brings happiness. We have our children. We get along well sexually, even though I wish he would be more demonstrative. We're financially secure—Tod now holds a fine job in his chosen field—we have a beautiful home that is fully paid for. Yet we quarrel constantly because he refuses to behave like a husband and father. I can never be happy until he cuts the apron strings."

TOD TELLS HIS SIDE:

"Ivy thinks I'm a mamma's boy," said thirty-five-year-old Tod in a soft but exceedingly firm voice. "It isn't true. I enjoy my mother's company more than I enjoy hers, but so would any other man in similar circumstances. My mother admires me as I am. She doesn't try to push me around. Whatever I want, she wants for me.

"Ivy is the most domineering woman I've ever met. She has always wanted her own way, but her way used to be my way. In the old days I enjoyed taking her to baseball games and boxing matches—we're both sports fans—but then she began instructing me what

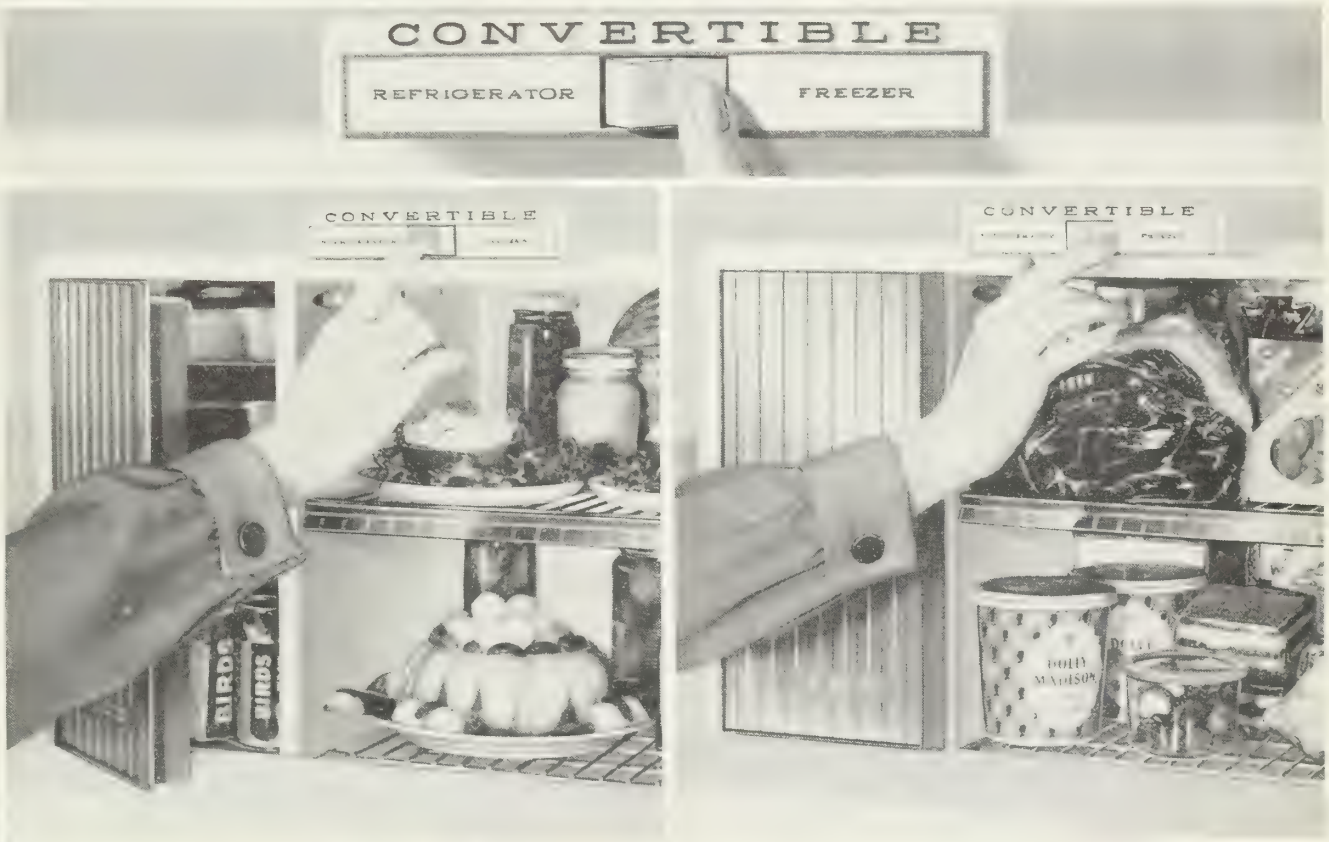
It is good to know that no man or woman can be strong, gentle, good, without somebody being helped and comforted by the very existence of that goodness.

PHILLIPS BROOKS

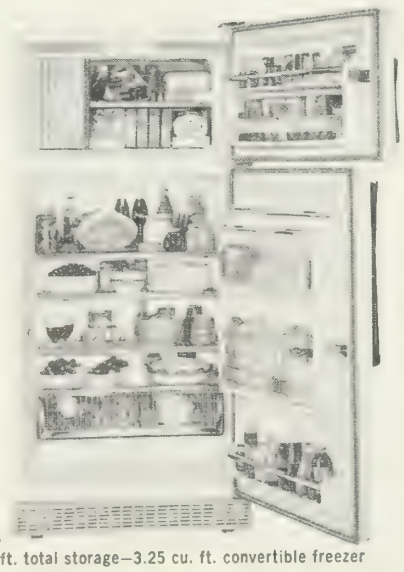
tickets to buy and what price to pay. Ivy used to be physically attractive to me, very. Our strong sex bond has weakened where I'm concerned, although maybe she doesn't know it.

"Ivy has no respect for my profession or for anything I think. I earn eight thousand dollars a year—my future is rosy—and my income right now is adequate for any reasonable demands. Last Christmastime Ivy decided our daughters needed new furniture, although their old furniture looked fine, and that to buy it I should take on a temporary night job at the post office. When I turned down this bland proposal that I work by day as a research physicist and by night sorting mail, she was very annoyed. To pay me off she took an evening job herself and for six weeks left me in nighttime charge of the children.

"My daughters and I don't hit it off together, and it's mainly Ivy's fault. She objects if I correct the girls, but wants me to step in and play the heavy father when they get on her nerves. One time she asked me to spank Cathy for something and I obliged her. When Cathy yelled she snatched the kid away from me and gave her a piece of candy. Right then I decided that in the future I would be careful to steer clear of problems concerning the girls. My mother always backed up my father when he disciplined my brothers and me; she followed his opinions in everything. Ivy flatly contradicts me before our children and makes them think I'm a prize sap. Yet she would like me to take the whole bunch of them out in public—the twins' public behavior is atrocious—and embarrass myself to give her pleasure.



"Ivy burns with energy and thinks everybody else should be her equal. One day last month she cleaned our place from top to bottom, baked six dozen cookies for a P.T.A. meeting, attended the meeting, made a speech, came home and did the family washing, ironed eight shirts for me more efficiently than the laundry, and cooked supper. When I arrived at six P.M. she was fresh as a daisy and raring for me to sweep the cellar and change a filter on the furnace. Instead I snapped on the TV. She began an argument—her plans to order my time are usually supported by as many arguments as a corporation lawyer's brief—but I didn't listen. I don't argue at work and see no sense in arguing at home. Determined to shame me for my 'laziness,' she flounced off and did the chores herself. I wasn't shamed; I was sore. Ivy knew when she married me that I was the product of a city apartment, not a do-it-yourself Joe.



"For years she has tried to take charge of my weekends. I've outfoxed her. On Saturdays and Sundays I play golf, breathe fresh air and conduct myself like a freeborn American. I know she imagines I visit my mother every time I play golf, but she's wrong. I see my mother once a month on the average, if that. I do try to telephone her every morning, but from the laboratory, and I don't consider it any of Ivy's business. My mother's physician recommended that I keep in close touch.

"Ever since my father's death my mother has been in poor shape. Father always made the decisions for her and she is too old and frail to build a life outside her family, whatever Ivy may think. I myself wish she was more independent, but she isn't, and it's now too late. Not long ago she began failing rapidly. According to the doctor her loneliness in the daytime—the hours my brother Ed is at work—was affecting her mind. Ed and I talked it over, consulted our brother in Seattle, and entered mother in a rest home hoping the change would be beneficial. Her reaction was so unfavorable that the doctor advised me to remove her right away. I picked her up and drove her to our house, which she hadn't visited in six months.

"Because I was in no humor to put up with a big argument, I didn't warn Ivy we were coming. She greeted us by telling my poor mother, who is scared to death of her anyway, that we had no room in our house for an overnight guest. The statement was cruel and untrue. Three rooms in our house—two bedrooms and the playroom—are set aside for the exclusive use of our pampered youngsters.

"I put my mother in Cathy's bedroom and looked after her myself. Yet from Saturday afternoon until Monday morning Ivy complained to me about her ordeal. I let her sweat out the two days, without saying how long my mother intended to stay. Last summer I bore up nicely while her mother and father stayed two months with us.

"Even before our marriage Ivy was unfair to my people and thought they should be gregarious like hers. My parents were more interested in scholarship and building for the future. To help my brothers and me get an education and save a little money for a stake, they gladly sacrificed. My mother was ashamed for any outsider, particularly Ivy, to see our shabby furnishings. Ivy knows that. Yet she still holds a grudge because she wasn't invited to a meal fifteen-sixteen years ago.

"And she has never forgiven my parents for wanting us to postpone our marriage until I located satisfactory employment in my own field. My parents were quite right in predicting trouble. My father-in-law repeatedly tried to force me to abandon my profession and accept the type of job a bright high-school boy could handle.

"After Ivy and I moved to the West Coast I took up salesmanship for a short while to escape her nagging, although I still had savings. It would have been wiser for me to keep on looking for the work I wanted. The sales job was tough on my morale; I began to doubt my scientific ability, mistrust my hopes. When my parents moved to California Ivy was outraged, despite the fact that my brother Ed had paved the way for us. I was glad to see my folks. They restored my confidence in myself.

"Both my mother and father were overjoyed when I had a chance to quit salesmanship and go to work at a university here with a group of scientists engaged on a project in basic research. All that Ivy noticed was the salary cut involved. For two years I was associated with some of the biggest men in the world in my particular field of physics, and the knowledge I gained was beyond price. When the project was completed my associates were generous enough to add my signature to several of the published papers. That experience and the reputation I acquired led directly to my present employment. Nowadays Ivy approves of my job and my prospects, but she forgets the background. My mother is ignorant of physics, too, but she has faith in my judgment, sympathy for my aims.

"Since Ivy treats my mother so wretchedly—she is also discourteous to my brother—I feel duty-bound to be extraconsiderate. After all, the major burden falls on Ed. My mother has her own small income and makes no financial demands on me. Unless Ivy shows more kindness and understanding, more regard for my wishes and welfare, I don't see why I should put myself out for her and the girls."

THE MARRIAGE COUNSELOR SAYS:

"Like many persons, Ivy misunderstood the true nature of her difficulty. She blamed her mother-in-law for her marital troubles whereas her own aggressiveness was largely at fault. Tod's telephone calls and widely spaced visits to an ailing old woman would hardly disturb the average wife. Actually, for all practical purposes, Ivy had solved her in-law problem at the time the purchase of the suburban house put distance between her and Tod's kin. Without realizing it, she had continued to exhibit her emotional dissatisfaction by hammering away at a grievance that no longer existed.

"In our discussions Ivy and I traced her aggressiveness back to her school days. As a child whenever she felt unimportant and insecure she misbehaved to attract attention. Years later the old pattern persisted. When Tod commented favorably on his mother's cooking, deserted their home for the golf links, ignored the children she had borne him, Ivy felt unloved and unimportant. So she matched a fight to compel Tod's notice; she attempted to prove her importance by ordering him around, belittling his talents and his job, snubbing his family.

"Her aggressiveness aroused the latent aggressiveness in Tod, who was far from being a mamma's boy or a weakling. When she launched an attack he almost invariably retaliated in some indirect but very painful way. If she commanded him to cut the grass, he might oblige but then he would pay her off by withholding a piece of business news. When she abused his mother, he found the twins' table manners wanting. When she was inhospitable to his kin, he became unavailable for family fun on weekends.

"In their efforts to triumph over each other, Tod and Ivy were making a mess of their lives. They were damaging the three youngsters, whom they had dragged on to the firing line. Their sexual relationship had inevitably deteriorated. In such cases some men seek out other women; others may even become physically impotent as an unconscious means of revenging themselves upon wives.

"After consultation Ivy recognized—and admitted—that her tactics were self-defeating. She wanted Tod to love her and their daughters; she wanted the girls to experience with him the same sound relationship she had enjoyed with her father. She made up her mind to change matters radically. Once convinced of the error of her ways, she had the determination to abide by her resolution.

"As a small girl Ivy had talked freely to her father and he had encouraged her to stand on her own feet and be objective about admitting mistakes. As a small boy Tod had talked freely to his mother, who had endowed him with equal objectivity plus a strong sense of duty. This common legacy from childhood was an asset to Ivy and Tod; after they brought their belligerence under control they found they could talk candidly to each other.

"Ivy's first move was to tame her quick, sharp tongue. Words of appreciation for Tod's good qualities gradually replaced gratuitous criticism. As she abandoned her assaults on Tod's professional dignity, she began to hear more about his work. Wisely, Ivy was careful to be honest and avoid flattery, for truth and sincerity are essential in marriage; when a highly critical wife or husband breaks the destructive habit, the other spouse is inclined to be suspicious of the change and to spot any insincerity at once.

"To curb her excessive energy—no problem to most of us—Ivy altered her schedule. In the mornings after she sees the youngsters off to school, she now goes back to bed for an hour and listens to the radio, reads the newspaper or a magazine. She firmly believes this enforced rest sets the tone of her whole day, reduces her explosiveness, helps her slow down to Tod's easygoing pace. Her housework hasn't suffered and she now concedes that other people, less active and energetic than her parents and herself, aren't necessarily lazy and wicked.

"She also concedes that Tod will never blossom out as an expert handy man. A high-school boy was hired to take over the outdoor chores at a fee well within the family means. Now that Tod is relieved on this score, he sometimes pitches in and voluntarily performs chores he previously shunned.

"Ivy frankly confessed to Tod that she had been wrong in undermining his status with his daughters, and promised to reform. Nowadays she doesn't pass on disagreeable disciplinary jobs to him, interfere with his management of the children, contradict or correct him in their presence. She has developed numerous small opportunities to magnify him in the eyes of Cathy and the twins. Every afternoon she calls on the girls to wash their faces, pick flowers for the living room, put away their toys 'to please daddy.' If they want extra money for ice cream, she tries to say, 'Let's wait and ask daddy.'

"In our consultations it developed that Tod's conscience had been troubled for a long while by his admitted abdication as a father; he was intelligent enough to perceive that in the future Cathy and her sisters, because of his neglect, might be handicapped in establishing satisfactory relationships with their own husbands. By taking an interest in their small-girl concerns, by making them feel content and comfortable with him, he hopes he will brighten their prospects for happy marriages.

"Tod acknowledged that his marked restraint in showing affection reflected the attitude of his dead father, and was unfair to Ivy. As soon as the atmosphere in his home improved he attempted with reasonable success to express more warmth. Nowadays when Ivy greets him at the door he kisses her, and he greets his daughters before he switches on the TV. Sometimes the youngsters watch a program with him and he finds their chatter as amusing and relaxing as the show.

"Tod now eats dinner with his family, and occasionally samples the elaborate dishes Ivy likes to prepare. The children's table manners have benefited and he now is proud to accompany them to a restaurant for special celebrations.

"He still plays golf on most Saturdays, but Sunday is always family day. Perhaps one Sunday a month he and Ivy and the children get together with his mother. When Ivy belatedly realized the underlying cause and the groundlessness of her hostility to the older woman, she mastered her bitter feelings—although it is unlikely the two will ever be close.

"When Ivy and Tod ended their power struggle they were able to agree or compromise on most things. Roughly speaking, they now divide their spheres of authority. Where the youngsters and household matters are concerned, Tod usually listens to Ivy. Where his work is concerned, he is undisputed boss. Ivy never volunteers a suggestion. Once or twice, she reported to me, he asked for her opinion. On those occasions she prudently borrowed a leaf from his mother's book and said, 'Follow your own judgment. It's better than mine.'"

IT LEAPS IN GRACE TO GOD

By JOSEPH CHERWINSKI

Beauty is God. It dances from the bars
Of prisons where the lonely men look out.
It dances from the sparrows, from the stars,
It dances in the wind of the peddler's shout.
Nothing is graceless where the graceful breath
Surges from lungs to move beneath the sun.
Even where bodies rage against their death
And seem to die, beauty informs each one.

Beauty is God, and nothing lacks His grace,
Though we are blinded by its many forms.
Hark to the silence of an empty space:
It trembles with beauty, waiting sighs and storms.
So, Beauty is not relative. It leaps
In grace to God, even where Chaos keeps.

"I had the time of"

Susan has most of her Scout badges in homemaking. Camp means a chance to improve her crawl and qualify for a swimming badge.

Letters from home are read as avidly as if she'd been away for years. Says Susan's mother: "Writing letters to your child in camp is an art in itself. I try to show that we're missing her—but not too much. And that we're well and having fun—but not too much fun without her."

Susan unpacks her 14 outfits. The tents are set up by a Dads' Patrol in late spring, have canvas sides which can be raised for sun and air, lowered when it rains.

new friends new skills

Campers, designated as "Sharks" and "Minnows," line up enthusiastically for intracamp competition at a splash party. Outcome, as in most contests: a tie.

Although Camp Merrie Woode is only twenty-five miles from Kalamazoo, it has enchanting deep woods, and the girls go on rope hikes, treasure hunts, nature hikes, Paul Bunyan hikes and just rambles through the forest.

What did Susan like best about camp? "I learned lots of useful things such as lashing and basketmaking." (She made a hanging basket for her mother.) "But I liked best making many new friends."

HOW AMERICA LIVES

"Mom, do you know where my sit-upon is?" asks pretty, blue-eyed Susan Smith, eleven, searching among orderly piles of camping equipment on her bed.

To the mother of a Girl Scout, the query makes sense; Elizabeth Smith, busy putting on name tapes, says, "Back porch."

With her blond pony tail flying, Susan dashes down to retrieve the "sit-upon," which turns out to be a flat red pad. She explains that it is made from a copy of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL encased in oilcloth, for sitting on when the ground is damp. "Now where's Myrtle? I can't go without him! And mother, do you really think fourteen sets of shorts and slacks will be enough?"

"Yes, I really do," says her mother with good-natured firmness. "That's one for each day you'll be at Merrie Woode, and you'll probably

On the last day of camp, counselors K. C. and Birdie say good-by to Susan and her parents. K. C. told them, "You couldn't have sent us a nicer girl or a better camper."

spend half your time in a bathing suit anyway. Susan, please do try to improve your crawl—to me swimming is the crawl."

"I just don't like it," says Susan. "I guess that's because I can't do it very well. But I'm going to work hard on swimming—I want to qualify for my badge."

"Robin," Mrs. Smith asks, "do you mind if Susan takes your yellow slicker?"

"What are you asking me for?" Robin, a husky seven-year-old, jokes. "She's already got it packed! You'd better take my sou'wester, too, Susan."

Randy, four, contributes his bit by unearthing a green-checked stuffed turtle. "Here's Myrtle! He was hiding under the towels."

Not even Susan is able to explain why a turtle named Myrtle is called "he," but he is an essential item at home or camp; she sleeps with Myrtle. And Herman, a pine-cone mouse, reposes on her bedside table. Susan is at an age where she slips from little girl to poised, demure young lady at the speed of light. At the moment her major concern is her petite size—particularly feet, size 2. "Most dresses my size look so childish," she says, "and they don't start making shoes with any style to them till around size four. I'm so tired of Mary Janes."

Susan recognizes one advantage in being small: she inherits Robin's outgrown shorts, which she likes to wear. "In winter I feel very feminine," she explains, "but in summer I feel tomboyish."

Asked about plans for the future, she says thoughtfully, "I honestly don't know. I dream of being a dancer—and I can't dance. I'd like to be a singer—but I don't have a very good voice. And I'd like to be a writer; I'm really trying to work on my writing." (She displays some poems.) "But what I'd like most to be is grown up!"

Further questioning reveals that to Susan being grown up means "fourteen, or maybe fifteen or sixteen."

Susan is one of approximately 155,000 Scouts who are attending established Girl Scout camps across the United States. Her two weeks will be spent at Camp Merrie Woode, twenty-five miles from her home in Kalamazoo, Michigan. She is an eager old hand at camping, having gone to Merrie Woode for three summers of the four years she has spent in Scouting. This year, she will go for the first time as a First Class Scout; a proud rank which she has recently attained by earning ten badges and completing all other necessary qualifications.

For her "chief interest," Susan chose homemaking; in that field she earned badges as homemaker, cook, seamstress, and in child care and hospitality. Other badges are for needlecraft, birds, games and reading; the last, reading, was a breeze—she reads around four books a week anyway.

"Scout badges represent real effort," says Susan's mother, "and the activities required for each one give valuable training. Under cooking, one item was to cook and serve a dinner; Susan did it very nicely and cleaned up the kitchen afterward." Mrs. Smith laughs. "Then she took a long breath and said, 'I believe I'll go to bed now; thank goodness it wasn't Sunday dinner!' In needlecraft, one thing to be made was a needle-point chair cover. Do you know how long it takes me to finish a needle-point cushion? Five years!"

"The homemaking badge teaches you so much about your own home," Susan comments. "Many things I'd always just taken for granted, and I was surprised to find that mom does them every day. I help more now—set the table and wash dishes and clean my room."

Susan is deeply serious about Scout work. As one good deed in her first year as a Brownie she kept her alarm clock set ahead for the whole year so that she could be up each morning and have breakfast preparations under way when her mother arose.

Each member of the family takes a part in getting ready for Susan's two weeks at camp. Her father, big, jovial Robert Smith, thirty-four, adds a small tube of tooth paste, for easy packing, and a big bag of peanut-butter taffies—for eating after lights out. But Robert Smith has already made a much more solid contribution: he is an active member of the Dads' Patrol, a volunteer group of fathers who go out to Merrie Woode in the spring to do maintenance work and set up the tents, and return to dismantle them after camp is over.

Bob Smith is a rising young architect. "His" buildings in and around Kalamazoo—new fire station, Child Guidance Center, several private homes—all reflect love for the clean, strong lines of modern architecture; yet there is nothing incongruous in the fact that the Smiths' own home at 1704 Whites Road is a comfortably shabby old house of hybrid Victorian origin. "We couldn't afford to build," Bob says frankly, "and this house had better value and more room than anything we could find for $8500. It's in a good neighborhood" (across the road from the country club) "and when we do get ready to build that dream house we have in mind we won't lose anything in selling this property."

Younger Smiths love the area, especially a deep wooded ravine which runs at the back of their yard. They play Indians there, and climb trees, and hunt for bear. Thus far no bears have been found, but the children are delighted—their parents are not!—by a family of six raccoons which makes a nightly sortie from the ravine to their garbage pail.

Kalamazoo is a city of parks and playgrounds and tree-lined streets. Flower beds and window boxes give a note of gaiety; and two blocks in the heart of town have been converted to a delightfully landscaped mall, which Bob Smith's office overlooks.

Every weekend the Smiths take off for Pickerel Lake, fifteen minutes out of town; their cottage is right next door to that of Grandpa and Grandma Smith, who spend the whole summer at the lake. Susan has her own boat, a plywood rowboat given her by her grandfather; she painted it dark green, and christened it The Drifter. She and her brothers spend most of the weekend rowing, fishing and swimming, although, as Susan explains, water in the lake is low this year. "I can just picture me doing a running front dive; I'd end up head first in mud."

Susan and the boys like to hear their parents tell about how they met. Bob was a fighter pilot during World War II; Elizabeth was an Army nurse. Both were stationed in Germany after V-E Day, and when Bob was brought into the hospital for an emergency appendectomy Elizabeth Mearns was his nurse. "I don't know why I liked her," Bob grumbles; "I nearly starved to death, and she wouldn't bring me anything to eat except that measly little diet."

"I did too!" Mrs. Smith retorts with spirit, while Randy squirms in anticipation of the known climax. "One night I sneaked him a pork chop up from the nurses' dining room; but he was sound asleep and —— That reminds me, it's time for you to be asleep right now, Randy. We'll have a busy day tomorrow taking Susan to camp."

Since she leads an active outdoor life anyway, camping does not present for Susan the contrast it would have for a girl from a larger, more crowded city. But there is no less enchantment in the deep woods and blue lake at Camp Merrie Woode. Towering oaks and pines cover the hilly 175-acre tract; in one shady glen, a dense forest of maples rises straight and slender to form a continuous leafy roof over the whole valley. Quiet is broken only by the calls of birds, chittering of squirrels, and the yelps, squeals, shouts, giggles, splashes and songs of Girl Scouts.

Scouts are assigned, roughly, by age to units encamped in separated areas of the forest: Wonderland for Brownies; Sherwood; Greenwood, and Gypsy. They all meet for meals, songfests, square dances at the lodge, a permanent building with huge fireplace and wide, screened porches, which is used for weekend camp-outs year round. Each unit area also has its own solidly built shelter with fireplace and concrete floor, for rainy-day activities. Scattered among the pines are canvas tents, which the Dads' Patrol set up, with wooden floors and screened sidings. Here Scouts are quartered, four to a tent. Furnishings consist of cot and upended orange crate for each girl, plus a keg for a wastebasket.

The camp director and counselors are employed for nine weeks of the summer—one week of indoctrination and four two-week camp sessions. Many are college girls or young teachers; several have had years of Scouting. Aside from this seasonal staff, says Nan Romine, director of Girl Scouts for Kalamazoo County, the only professional workers in the county are herself, an assistant and a secretary. Members of the council, board of directors, neighborhood chairmen and troop leaders are all unpaid volunteers—not to mention the Dads' Patrol, which, says Miss Romine, is "the best functioning I have ever seen in twelve years of Scouting."

She continues, "They do all the spring and fall maintenance at Merrie Woode; I don't know how we could run the camp without them."

A troop may have as leader the mother of one of the Scouts; occasionally, when no leader is available full time, several mothers unite as leaders, each taking charge of activities in which she has special knowledge or interest. "It's not the best system, perhaps," Elizabeth Smith muses, "but it works. Susan wouldn't have been able to belong to a troop last year if some of the other mothers and I hadn't split up the job of troop leader. I worked with the girls on first aid and games. And one weekend last February we went on a three-day campout to Merrie Woode." She laughs. "But I'm not quite sure who was leading whom that weekend. We went on a long hike through the woods one day; I was leading, but suddenly Susan came running from farther back on the trail. 'Where's mother?' she asked. 'I want to be sure she doesn't get lost'!"

Susan's camp fees ($40) have already been paid, and she has had a thorough physical examination, so checking in at camp is a quick process. She registers with the camp director, "Taj," and deposits $2 for spending money—all that is allowed. Her health record is delivered to the registered nurse who is a member of the staff; the nurse gives her another brief physical, and then Susan is free to go to her unit encampment, Greenwood, across an open valley and up a pine-crested hill overlooking Warner Lake.

Greenwood's unit counselor, dark-eyed K. C., and assistant counselor, freckled, friendly Birdie—both old friends from last year—welcome Susan and introduce her to assistant-counselor Mich. The counselors are known only by nicknames, because, as Taj explains, "We want to have a comfortable, easy relationship between Scouts and counselors, but the girls must also recognize the counselors' authority—particularly in an emergency. Calling us 'Miss So-and-So' seems too formal, and first names are just a bit too personal. The nicknames strike a happy compromise, we think."

A steady stream of chatter emanates from Tent 3 as Susan and her tentmates stow their impedimenta neatly and make beds; they are old friends by the time K. C. blows her whistle to announce that Greenwood is due at the water front for swimming tests. Moments later they troop down to the beach. By some strange alchemy the mere fact of being in camp makes the most prosaic event a delightful adventure; a stubbed toe evokes only hilarious giggles, even from the owner of the toe.

Greenwood has been asked to work as "hoppers" at supper; as soon as swimming test is over they stream back to their tents to change clothes and then scamper over to the lodge where they set and serve the tables. By the time that task is finished the girls all know one another, and the circle of friendship that started in each tent has widened to embrace the whole of Greenwood unit.

Camp chores are divided into assigned jobs, "Kapers," which are rotated among the girls each day. Each Scout makes her own bed and keeps her own tent area clean as a matter of course. In addition, she does for that day whatever Kaper has fallen to her lot: wood gathering; dishwashing; cleaning shelter, lodge or latrine; hopping; fire warden, and so on. Kapers are so arranged that no task is onerous, and what might be considered monotonous work actually seems a game. The Scouts like doing Kapers, and whisk through them with gay efficiency.

After supper that first night, Greenwood girls gathered around their open campfire and sang song after song, accompanied by Birdie with her guitar and by the sough of wind in the pines. Clear young voices blended sweetly in the old Scout favorites, "Walk, Shepherdess, Walk" and "Our Chalet"; but on "Dem Bones" they raised such a cacophony of discord that Birdie dropped the guitar to put hands over ears, while the girls dissolved in helpless laughter.

It had been a long, busy day. Soon heads began to nod. Sleepy as she was, Susan held her eyes open long enough to write an ecstatic note home: "The best I had hoped for on swimming test was Intermediate, but I passed as Swimmer. Now I can go to the raft!"

Water sports and safety loom large on the camp program. Every morning each unit appears at its scheduled time for a swimming lesson; three afternoons a week there is a half-hour lesson in boating and canoeing; other afternoons, the period is given over to free swimming. Chip, the water-front director, and her two assistants are Red Cross senior lifesavers and water-safety instructors; they work as hard at making safety almost a built-in instinct as they do at teaching the girls how to be at home in the water.

As a result of the swimming test, girls are grouped according to proficiency. Shallow water inside the dock and nearest the beach is roped off for red-capped Beginners; just outside the dock a deeper area is also roped off for Intermediates, blue-capped. But for white-capped Swimmers—oh, joy!—the open area all the way to the raft is free. Equally satisfying—to Swimmers—is the fact that only Swimmers may use the canoes.

Before permitting any of the girls to touch toe to water, Chip assigned each a number on the "buddy board"—Susan was 59, a number she would keep throughout the time at camp. Numbered tags, one side red, one white, hung on the board, and Chip explained, "Before you go in the water, turn your tag red side up; when you leave the water, before you even reach for a towel, turn your tag white side up. Nobody else is allowed to turn it for you. This is very important." Chip's friendly smile turned into a ferocious frown. "Nothing in this world peeves me as much as girls who forget to turn their buddy tags!"

As another safety precaution, Scouts in each swimming category were asked to choose a buddy, understanding that buddies have a special responsibility to look out for each other. At some unexpected moment during each swimming session a whistle sounded and the call came, "Buddies!" Then buddies lifted "Give of your best to the Master.

Give of the strength of your youth . . ."

Three young voices float out over the stillness of the camp-meeting grounds near Rome, Georgia. The three pretty Kerce sisters—Ann, Ludye and Judye—who bring a lump in the throat to many hearing them, are much admired, too, for the way they pitched in when their mother died, and kept house for themselves and their father.

high their joined hands, to show that they were keeping an eye on each other.

Chip points out that a good Scout absolutely, positively never dunks anyone.

At the first lesson in canoeing, Scouts learned how to enter a canoe properly; then they learned what to do if a canoe should capsize. Before they progressed to strokes and technique of paddling, they had to demonstrate to Chip's satisfaction that, by pairs, they could tip over a canoe in midstream, support themselves by locking arms across the top, right the swamped canoe, re-enter it and hand-paddle it 100 yards back to shore.

Days are not long enough for all the exciting things there are to do in camp. Scouts review fire building (and fire prevention), with much discussion of prevailing winds, burning qualities of various woods, and relative values of tepee, trench and crisscross fires. Woodcraft, knots, lashing, hatchetry, basketmaking, sketching, mapmaking and use of the compass all have their eager and energetic enthusiasts.

The girls go on rope hikes, treasure hunts, nature hikes, Paul Bunyan hikes, and just rambles through the forest. They have nosebag lunches; jungle breakfasts (here they go into the woods to find their own breakfasts: cereal, milk, oranges which some kind genie has tied to branches); and cookouts.

One memorable night Greenwood went on a campout. Laden with food packs and bedrolls (both Myrtle and Herman went along in Susan's), they hiked over to the "primitive" area in the afternoon and set up camp. First order of business was digging a latrine; next, Scouts proudly demonstrated their skill at lashing by building a "Chippewa kitchen"—a combination table and rack for hanging pots over the fire, made from branches joined only by lashing. Work done, Susan and several other girls went off in search of blackberries for breakfast; since most of the briers were surrounded by poison ivy, they got only about twenty berries—which they promptly ate.

At dinner, ravenous appetites made short work of the pigs in blankets (bacon-wrapped hot dogs), corn roasted in the husk, and cowboy sodas (oranges sucked through candy sticks). Clearing up was child's play, then there were games and songs around the campfire. But not for long; the lassitude of healthy fatigue swept over everyone. Soon the girls were bedded down to sleep under the stars.

Susan, ensconced with Myrtle and Herman in her bedroll, was aware of the hard ground beneath her and sure she wouldn't sleep a wink. But the dying notes of taps from Birdie's cornet blended somehow with the morning calls of the birds; suddenly it was time to be up and searching for a jungle breakfast.

On evenings in camp there were games and ghost stories, impromptu costume parties and skits. Square dancing was a favored pastime; on rainy nights the lodge rang to the rafters with the sounds of flying feet and the strains of "Red River Valley" "Take a Little Peek" and "Strut, Miss Lizzie." One warm evening Greenwood girls, in bathing suits, held an enormously gratifying water fight.

On Sunday evening Scouts assembled in the "green cathedral" for vesper service. Only stars and altar candles lighted the serious young faces as they sang loved old hymns and listened to reading from the Bible. Voices were still subdued and eyes thoughtful as the girls quietly returned to tents after the service in the pines. Susan wrote home, "It was a lovely way to end Sunday."

With all the activity, careful thought is given by counselors to health and safety. Meals are planned to be nutritious and satisfying, and Scouts are asked not to keep candy or other nibbles in their tents. Susan, learning that her bag of taffies was taboo, asked K. C. if she might pass them around among all the Scouts to get rid of them.

Rest is also planned; every afternoon Scouts remain "quietly" in their tents for an hour of rest; and evening bedtime comes at 9:30. But in Susan's tent subdued chatter and giggling go on, as the four girls swap confidences: "Have you ever danced with a boy?" . . . "A girl at our school blew a great balloon of bubble gum and it burst all over her face; she was all pink." . . . "Do you think you'll like junior high?" . . . "I'm glad we've got K. C. and Mich and Birdie; they're the three nicest counselors in camp, I think," and so on into the night. Susan wrote home, "It's nice our tent isn't too close to the counselors'. They only want you to sleep."

Susan's letters carry a running commentary on camping: "They have three mice over in Tent I, pretty little soft gray things. I do hope we'll get mice in our tent." . . . "I have a blood blister. I was holding a tent stake when Suzanne hit it." . . . "Mickey and I are going to swap rings. Some of the girls swap clothes, but I can't because I'm smaller." . . . "Our tent didn't pass inspection this morning because Bones didn't clean her orange crate." . . . "I can dive and back-float fine. I'm better at the crawl, but I still don't do it very well." . . . "K. C. said today that I'm a good Scout."

When camp was over Bob and Elizabeth drove out to pick up a bronzed, happy daughter who proudly announced, "Mom, I've gained a pound!" Although rain on the last day had prevented Susan's qualifying for her swimming badge, she was happy in Chip's approving remark that her crawl had improved appreciably. She had swum forty yards "in good form" using the crawl, and similar distances with the breast, side and back strokes. She had floated for two minutes, trodden water for one, done a standing front dive in good form, and had swum 100 yards free style. "I don't have any doubts about my swimming badge now," she said. "I can pass it the first opportunity."

Asked what she'd enjoyed most about camp, Susan reflected. "Well, I learned lots of useful things, such as lashing and basketmaking—oh, mom, I made this hanging basket for you. And I loved the woods . . . and sleeping with the sound of rain on the canvas . . . and hearing the whippoorwills at night . . . and the baby cardinal we saw. But I guess I liked best making so many new friends. Barbara and I will be going to the same junior high this fall, and it's so nice that we're close friends already. . . . There just isn't anything about camp that I don't like. Mom, do you think I could go for a whole month next year?"

thus can be symbolic of love everlasting, and it also bears blossoms and fruit at the same time. The wedding veil is thought to be a sample-size relic of the bridal canopy once carried over the heads of both bride and groom to ward off the evil eye, and the rice thrown at the departing couple is what's left of an ancient Hindu and Chinese religious rite in which rice, their chief food, was showered on the couple to ensure health and prosperity. If a selfish spook were hovering about, the rice might serve also as a bribe. The wedding cake seems an outgrowth of the Roman custom of breaking a sort of cake over the bride's head to bring her wealth and joy. Bits of cake were picked up by each guest to share in her good luck. The Roman groom carried his wife over the threshold to prevent her tripping (an ill omen) and also because she might forget to enter on her right foot and thus bring bad luck to both of them.

One thing is for sure: all these magic formulae are aimed at two targets, ensuring a lasting affection and warding off any evils threatening wedded bliss. But believe Brother Pat, it takes something more substantial than rice and veils to ensure a happy marriage, and it takes more than a circle around an imaginary vein to guarantee an "ever after" love. The real magic is to begin buying your Happy Marriage Insurance policy before you meet your future partner, then for both of you to invest a great deal of yourselves in it before your wedding day and to go on investing after the honeymoon.

IS IT FOR REAL?

Here's the big, No. 1 question. And parents, wise in experience, beg, "Wait, and be sure!" I'm not being a traitor to young love when I say that's sound advice. Before I met Shirley I went "steady" twice, for three weeks as a high-school freshman, and for six months as a sophomore. My heart did the cha-cha, my brain went into orbit each time. It was painfully serious, but it wasn't the stuff marriages are made of.

How can you tell the difference? The first rule is, Give it the time test. Get acquainted. If you're hasty you may find yourself quaking at the altar, like the bride whose mother found her weeping bitterly before her wedding.

"My dear," said her mom, "this is no time to cry. Why, the day I was married was the happiest day of my life."

"But that was different," sobbed the girl. "You married dad. I'm marrying a complete stranger."

Don't let that happen to you. Don't be afraid to let time test the caliber of your love. If it wilts in the spring, believe me, marriage wouldn't have kept it alive!

There are four pluses necessary for Happy Marriage Insurance, and only time can reveal them. First, attraction plus companionship. One of my cagiest buddies has finally gone and got himself engaged to a pretty, talented, popular gal—but no more so than some of the other beauties he's been dating for years. When he told me he'd finally been "hooked" I asked: "How did you know for sure this is it?"

"Because," he said, "we have a ball together no matter what we're doing." He explained that he certainly found her physically attractive, but "as I really got to know Sue—well, I just enjoyed her company more than anyone else's." The physical attraction was still there, but as time passed it ceased to be so important, and without this clouding his mind he was able to judge her more rationally.

Now I buy this explanation because it was the same with Shirley and me. I thought she was (and is) the most attractive girl I knew, plus the best company. Once when we quit going steady at my parents' request, because they felt we were getting serious too soon, we both just wound up not dating at all. We had a lot in common. We both liked sports, singing, movies, laughed at the same things—and it didn't matter where we went. I enjoyed taking her to church just as much as taking her to a party or a show.

Second, there's admiration plus trust. This means more than simply trusting someone not to flirt. You trust your gal or fella not to let you down, to be sound in any situation or with any people. If you only enjoy being with someone at a party, or with his crowd, and don't look forward to being with him in church or sitting around your folks' living room, there's something missing. The sexy dresser may be admired by the gang, but it can make you mighty uncomfortable if she's your wife. And the boy with the jokes isn't always the life of the party around the house.

Third comes love plus liking. It's easy to love and live with someone's virtues. It's a different thing to continue to love him and live with his faults. An important part of judging true love is to be realistic about these faults. Everybody has them and certainly love will make a girl or guy try to improve, but don't expect miracles.

Take my revoltin' habit of being late. Now I try, but Shirley has finally decided I just lack organizational ability—plan too much in too little time—and somehow she's managed to adjust as I've managed to improve . . . somewhat. But it isn't easy on her. So take it from me (or from Shirley), it's important that you like your true love and are going to be willing and able to adjust to his or her faults.

The fourth test is that, as time goes by, what pleases her (or him) pleases you. This means more than just having mutual interests. It means we have learned to love someone else more than we love ourself. Then when all the early petals fall off our spring romance, and we are faced with budgets and dishes and diapers (and the time comes, ol' friend!), re'll still be apples on your tree in winter

n if you have to tie them there yourself!
is kind of love brings real magic. If you can s the time test you've got the right foot for-
rd. Now, when do you take the all impor-
it step?

RE WE OLD ENOUGH TO MARRY?

I, personally, don't think the answer to this a matter of age. I've known couples who re old enough at nineteen and others who dn't seem old enough at twenty-nine. The al question is, are you mature enough to ke the responsibility? And maturity is sim-y a "state of full development." Here's here you can begin investing in Happy Mar-age Insurance even before you meet your ne-and-Only.

The SALVATION ARMY provides about three and a half million meals each year for transient, homeless persons. It operates 37 maternity homes and hospitals in the United States, secures jobs for about 115,000 persons annually, locates more than 1200 missing persons a year.

About 900,000 religious meetings are conducted annually—nearly 75,000 of them in the open air, which the Salvation Army considers its greatest cathedral.

terfere with their finishing school. (This had been the cause of my own family's concern—the reason for Shirley's and my elopement—although we had the added emergency reason that Shirley's dad was moving out of the state, which meant a real and long separation.)

But as I listened to these two young lovers I remembered the questions Shirley and I had had to ask ourselves before we faced a minister to take our vows. Did we see our responsibilities clearly? Could we fulfill them? Could I work, support a wife and still get a diploma? Would marriage interfere with my grades?

On that last one I could give the young couple the answer as it worked out for me, and they could carry it home to their parents who had encouraged them to come east for our talk. Marriage had given me a greater sense of responsibility and incentive to do well. This objection answered, I advised them to go ahead and get married if they really wanted to. Why? Because it had worked for Shirley and me? No. Because, as far as I could tell, they are mature people.

Their aims and principles checked; and the chief problems Shirley and I faced in the young-married-and-going-to-college days—the time-money hassle—they seemed to have well in hand. Both had jobs. She had a car bought and paid for by herself. He had a savings account he had been accumulating. Both were determined to finish college. They spent all their spare time together anyway—and here they stood to gain, because once Shirley and I were married, spending time together wasn't as difficult and didn't have to be stolen from jobs and studies.

To my mind, these two were old enough to get married. They were ready, mature and responsible. They could be independent of their parents.

If you want to know whether you, yourself, are making good progress in the direction of maturity, ask yourself these questions:

How close am I to taking full charge of my own life and conduct? Have I developed self-reliance? Self-control? Or am I still dependent on everyone around to do things for me? Do I have to be told to pick up my clothes, do my homework, get my laundry ready?

Will I be a desirable mate? Do I guard my conduct and reputation? Have I developed the skills necessary for my part in marriage? (Financial responsibility for boys, household skills for girls.) Have I gained a proper understanding of sex from a trustworthy source (parents and ministers are best) and abstained from cheap experiments and gossip?

Do people trust me willingly with responsibility? Has anyone ever said, "If you want it done, get Jane"—or Joe—"to do it"?

Am I resourceful? Do I keep my head and know what to do in an emergency? Am I in constant need of entertainment, or can I find plenty to do if left by myself for a while?

These are for you alone—but here are a few to be faced by the engaged couple as a team: Can we solve our differences of opinion by compromise? This doesn't mean "You take, I give"—or vice versa. It literally means both yielding a little here and there. For example, Shirley didn't want me to have a sports car. To her it meant high speed and low safety. I wanted one, but I didn't want my wife to be worried every time I drove out of the garage. So we compromised. Shirley agreed to the sports car—and I agreed to have a governor put on it so it wouldn't go over seventy. Fair enough?

And then there are aims and goals, those little items Wendy brushed over so lightly. Unless you ask yourselves Do we agree on vital issues? no amount of true love can make two opposed ideals into one united marriage.

Take the issue, Family Life. Shirley's and mine were identical. A sizable family. A simple existence centering around our church, children, work, each other. Now supposing Shirley (or I) had wanted, instead, a penthouse, Page 30 in Who's Who and maybe (horrors!) poodles instead of children. We would have had a pretty rough time making one set of aims and ideals blend with the other, right? Other vital issues include Religion (not to mention politics) and Money Matters. If and when you check out on these you are probably "old enough" to get married. Have a lovely wedding—and when you're in your new home you can begin to build the "ever after" on a solid foundation.

POST-ALTAR MARRIAGE INSURANCE

Here are a few Boone specials for warding off the evil eye. Don't drift away from small attentions. Don't fall into the trap of putting off doing things for the one you love and doing for others instead, thinking that one will understand. Shirley has a wonderful knack of doing things I ask her to do right now. It's the knowledge that she thinks of me, not only that she finds time to fit it into her busy schedule, that touches me. From time to time I send my wife one single long-stemmed rose—just that, nothing more. But it pleases her more than a bouquet. It's usually after we've had a hassle and it means, "The two of us are more important than all this fuss."

Second: Marriage is no time to stop developing interests in common. It's an opportunity instead to grow together along new lines. Not long ago Jack Spina, my co-manager, invited us to a hockey game. Shirley had never seen one and didn't much want to, but she did want to spend the evening with Jack and me. The result? The Boones are hockey-conscious. And I've learned to go shopping with Shirley.

Third, and this I pass on to you from my high-school principal, Mack Craig, still one of my best friends: If you and your wife can laugh together, there's no problem you can't lick. Take a "situation" that developed recently. On our television show I got soundly kissed, without any warning, by a Hollywood glamour girl with an accent and an enormous collection of jewelry. While I wiped the blush off, I ad-libbed, "Looks like I'll spend the night at the athletic club." But when I drove up in front of the house an hour later, it appeared to be no joke. No light in any window. No little woman to greet me. As I opened the door I saw the TV still flickering and decided Shirley had flounced off to bed without even bothering to turn it off. How wrong I was! There, in the dim light, draped before the screen in jeweled slippers, a Chinese kimono, false eyelashes, and sporting every bit of jewelry she owned, was my bride. Slowly she smiled, dropped the lashes, and said in a deep accented voice, "Dahling, I've been vaiting for you!" See what I mean?

The best, and surest, way to ensure a happy marriage is: Take God into your partnership. Whether your wedding is large or small, whether you elope or have twenty bridesmaids, don't trust to luck in this greatest adventure open to man or woman. Trust your heavenly Father. Enter into holy matrimony asking His help and guidance every step of the way. That's real marriage magic. That's why I still think the best wish we can give a bride and groom is the old, old one our great-grandmothers embroidered on samplers: "God Bless This Happy Home."

And Shirley and I, when your time comes, from the bottom of our hearts wish the same to you!

SHOULD MOVIE STARS BE PARENTS?

mother was a very busy woman. There was her absorbing romance with Tyrone Power. There were two stepfathers for Cheryl (Lana's third and fourth husbands). There was, of course, moviemaking. Lana might be in Europe, Mexico, New York, Nevada, or on the set. Said Lana in a recent interview, "Unfortunately, sometimes when Cheryl wanted me, I wasn't there. You can't be in two places at once." Her logic, to her, seemed irrefutable.

Barbara Burns is an example of a child who started out unlovable—she was a fat little girl. Overweight is often a sign of emotional disturbance. Barbara remembers that her father used to jeer at her, "You fat slob!" She grew up with a sense of utter desperation about herself—a problem her parents had neither the time nor the patience to solve.

Edward G. Robinson, a man of taste and intellect, tried fancier-than-usual "hired hands" for his son, a problem almost from the time he was old enough to toddle into the family living room. The younger Robinson has written in his autobiography, "First there was a lady doctor, a psychologist . . . a White Russian sculptor got to be a big authority, telling them how to handle me. A painter would have different ideas. And an Italian composer had a new school—just the place for me."

Ironically, young Robinson happened to be in court on a drunk charge at the same time that his mother and father were in another court ending their twenty-nine-year marriage. Afterward, mother and son met in the corridor. She told the press, "This is a wonderful son. No matter what he does, I'll always love him and stand by him." Then she left for a Hawaiian vacation.

On the surface, the Crosby boys seemed to be getting an ideal, well-publicized upbringing. Their parents were never divorced. All the boys had eight years at parochial school, four years at a Jesuit preparatory school. Summers they spent working together on the family's Nevada ranch. Until each reached the age of seventeen they had to be home by ten o'clock. All dates were screened. The boys earned spending money. They were disciplined when necessary.

Bing has publicly offered a dozen explanations for his boys' immaturity. Maybe he shouldn't have let them go away to college after prep school. Maybe he should have made them go back to college after military service. Maybe he gave Gary a car too soon. But then he hit on another explanation—perhaps the real one: "I think I gave them too little time and attention."

Bing's professional career has often taken him away from home—especially during the war years, when the oldest boy was barely adolescent. Even when Bing was in Hollywood, home was a place he returned to in a state of exhaustion at the end of a working day. He was relieved that Georgia, the Crosbys' housekeeper of many years, seemed to be a second mother to the boys; happy that his agent, George Rosenberg, was willing to take on a fatherly role. "Rosie handles them better than I do," Bing once told me. "He seems to take them more to heart. It seems I'm the last one they come to when they have problems." Then Bing showed me the familiar touch of anger of a parent who is hopelessly and bafflingly out of touch with his offspring: "The thing that burns me up is that they won't listen to me. . . . Ten minutes after they leave me they fall in with somebody else who undoes everything I've said." Children the world over are apt to resent parental advice that comes noticeably too late.

"Parental neglect" is a large term. It can wear a dozen different faces. In Hollywood neglect seldom takes place against a background of emotional tranquillity. Stars don't neglect their children quietly. Decibels created by breaking marriages and domestic tantrums mount well above average—like the sound of fire sirens in the night and just about as disturbing to the community.

It follows, then, that the insecurities of Hollywood children are above average. Cheryl Crane told a packed court that she stabbed Johnny Stompanato "to protect mother." A local psychiatrist who knows both Lana and Cheryl told me he hadn't a doubt in the world that this was true. Lana, indifferent mother or no, was one of the few constant people in Cheryl's life. When she blew into her daughter's life—trailing a new man—she also brought a gust of warm affection. According to this psychiatrist, Cheryl had so little security that she could spare none. The overheard threat to scar her mother frightened the child more than she could bear—so she reacted violently.

Cathy Crosby's mother had already filed for divorce twice before Cathy walked out of her parents' house. The Bob Crosbys are a Catholic family. June Crosby retreated from divorce both times. But the parents' twenty-one years together were full of wrangles. Cathy remembers trying in terror at the age of nine to separate her fighting parents. Before her breakdown she told the press, "I listened to their quarrels and reasoned that if my parents no longer loved each other, how could they love me?"

Psychiatrists know that the sights and sounds of parents who cannot get along terrorize a child. Perpetually quarreling parents seem to be the one thing the human child—that tough, resilient creature—cannot take. Whether the parents stay together or separate, the child is damaged. Psychiatrists agree that many children, deeply uncertain about their own place in a shaky family, finally and tormentingly decide that they are the causes of the lack of love between their parents.

As one Hollywood psychiatrist puts it, "In something so close to them, they cannot help feeling implicated." If two towering grownups can't get along, the fault must be their sinning, inadequate selves.

But in the glamorous film colony, quarrelsome parents who stay together are in the minority. Hollywood is the land of the multiple divorce. With multiple divorces, complications multiply. A psychiatrist who has worked for years with Hollywood children warns, "As stepfathers come and go and grownups prove unreliable, the child may withdraw from any warm relationship with an adult. Older children are forced into an independence and self-reliance that they are not emotionally ready for. It may be a self-reliance designed to cover panic."

Most children of divorces are almost automatically placed in the custody of the mother. If the divorced father is a star, he has the money and the power to make life particularly tense for the child. Sterling Hayden, defying a court order issued at the request of his former wife, took his three children on a ten-month cruise to the South Seas. If the mother is a star, the enormous conflicts and pressures of her career divide her time. She is also, after a divorce, a beautiful woman suddenly without a man. "Oh, I was lonely!" says Joan Crawford in explaining her third marriage, to Phillip Terry, one that also failed.

Miss Crawford, a woman of extraordinary strength, has performed the astonishing feat of adopting four children, keeping them fairly well out of the news, and devoting to them every ounce of attention she could spare. The youngest, twin girls, are reportedly affectionate and mannerly children. The oldest, Christina, is beginning to make her way as an actress in New York. But the son, Christopher, has never found himself. His trouble may be hereditary. But one can only speculate what life must have been like for him in that household of women, his adoptive mother of overpowering temperament, often plunged in loneliness, so demanding that her servants trembled and seldom stayed. He began to run away from home at the age of five. He was recently placed in the care of an East Coast psychiatrist, got into police trouble with a group of boys, and is now, in his late teens, in a correctional institution by court order.

There is something else. The children of movie stars have immensely magnified for them a problem that all growing children face: that of living up to their parents. Dr. Frym points out that all children need a model to grow by. When a child has parents who are admirable, just, loving and wise, these are the traits he wants for himself. But a Hollywood child's movie parent is something else above all: he is famous.

Most Hollywood stars are males. To Dr. Frym it is not surprising that many of his juvenile patients are the sons of male stars. "The son feels especially that he must compete with his father. But in Hollywood, the father is not life-size but screen-size. The son is defeated before he starts." Many conflicts, he says, can cluster around the looming image of a father who has made his fame by acting. If he is a hero on the screen, the son is disillusioned to find him less than heroic at home. The sons of many comedians are ashamed that their fathers should be public buffoons. The screen father who has a vast reputation for his numerous love affairs and capacity for holding liquor sets his son a terrifying pace. It is especially devastating for a son, says Dr. Frym, if a father who is a masculine image to the world is married to a female screen star who dominates the household, or if he is humiliated in family quarrels at home.

Finally, it is only fair to point out that Hollywood children have the money and sophistication to give their delinquencies a flashier look. Not every unhappy daughter has a pink Cadillac to run away in; not every frustrated son can afford to comfort himself with a gambling-circuit show girl. As Hollywood children grow up, they are imbibing the atmosphere of the movie kingdom: plenty of spending money, no particular self-discipline, and everybody on a search for an ideal, screen-type "romance." At Beverly Hills High School the imported sports cars fill the parking lot. The girls wear $65 sweaters, the boys $100 sports jackets. A fifteen-year-old sophomore wears a $10,000 diamond pendant to school. I recently chauffeured a group of pretty girls to a friend's house, and this was the conversation I heard between two fourteen-year-olds:

"Well, I don't think I'll be too young to marry at sixteen. If it doesn't work out, we can always get a divorce."

"Right. If one guy doesn't work out, try another. Just keep trying until you find the right one."

Thus were these children prepared for their roles as wives and mothers.

The pressures on Hollywood children, then, are many. Those most seriously disturbed end up, as so many have, in police courts. Or they marry at too young an age partners their parents disapprove of.

Those less disturbed certainly take less violent paths, but to my mind far too many of them try another path that often means tragedy on a smaller scale. It is dismaying to start counting up the children of the stars who want to enter show business.

Sometimes, it is true, a splendid family tradition is started this way—although the Barrymore family finally ended in the shambles of Diana and the modest career of John, Jr., who has chosen to act under the name John Drew. Keenan Wynn has had the character and ability to make his own reputation quite distinct from his father's (it's worth noting here that, in spite of a tragic marriage, his parents adored each other for many years, and always adored him). Henry Fonda, a good trouper who belongs more to New York than to Hollywood, is giving his daughter Jane a good start in the disciplined atmosphere of the stage rather than the movies.

But meanwhile, there is Christina Crawford, already with a part in a movie being made on the East Coast. There are the Crosby boys trying desperately to hoof it. Plump little Barbara Burns reports that one of the cruelties her parents inflicted on her was their lack of interest in her dream of becoming an entertainer. Cathy Crosby spent two years doing nightclub and TV shows. Some of these dreams are more realistic than others, but there is something pathetic about the adolescent whose biggest dream is of seeing her name in lights.

I think I know the lure for Hollywood children of this dream. All during childhood they sensed that the great and glamorous profession of the screen was the biggest reality in their parents' lives. A little more real than children. The children hope that if they enter this glittering wonderworld at last, open the door that shut out so much when they were small—there, at last, they can find their parents. END
